san, and Iowa, were rapidly peopled. The flourishing and populous towns of Galena, Dubuque, and many others, sprang into existence like magic, and in a few years the wilderness was made to blossom like a garden. Look, for one moment, at the results. This people dug from the bowels of the earth hidden riches, and from that time have increased the production of lead until it amounts annually to twenty or thirty millions of pounds being, perhaps, sufficient to render us independent of foreign nations for this important material necessary to our defence in time of war. Massachusetts, and other manufacturing States upon the Atlantic border, where labor is cheap, are as much, or more interested, perhaps, than we are, in thus producing national wealth, as they supply manufactured articles in return for the raw material. His own constituents had also contributed to the sum of national wealth by the production of several millions of pounds of lead annually; much of it was made from public lands, or from private property acquired under previous pre-emption laws. They were now turning their attention, with energy, to the cultivation of hemp; and such was the value of the article for its fineness, silkiness, and strength, that it commanded, in the Boston market, twenty dollars per ton more than that raised in Kentucky, and was now even imported into that State for the purpose of being wrought into bagging. He understood, from undoubted authority, that it is stronger than the best Russian hemp. This hemp was raised upon lands the title to most of which was acquired under the operation of the pre-emption laws, or by squatters, who are now awaiting the passage of one. This was important for the support of an important arm of national defence—the navy. How was it that Daniel Boone commenced the settlement of Kentucky? There were no such laws then as our pre-emption laws, taking from the settler a dollar and a quarter per acre for his lands—no law to restrain him from the wilderness. He roamed and squatted where he pleased; and no one knew better than his friend [Mr. CRITTENDEN] what had been the results. A paradise had been opened; but almost every acre of its soil had been fattened by the best blood of the land. Driven from Kentucky by injustice, and impelled by his love of danger, Boone sought a lonely spot in Missouri, on the extreme frontier of civilization, squatted on the public land, and contributed to its defence. It seemed as if his fearless spirit still hovered over what was once his favorite haunt, and pointed his descendants to the shores of the western ocean; and these descendants are now soliciting him (Mr. LINN) to use his influence to procure them appointments in any expedition for the Oregon Territory. It was to be regretted that this old man, this hardy and adventurous pioneer, could not have lived a few years longer, to see this broad Union extending itself from one great ocean to the other.

Boone was a living type, an impersonation, as it were, of the spirit which had settled this continent. He (Mr. LINN) rejoiced to see the same spirit in full force and operation to this hour. God forbid he should ever see it stopped; but that could not be done. The whole force of the Government could not arrest it. He defied them to do it. Looking at the whole course of the American Government and nation in relation to the public domain and commerce, it seemed to him to be governed chiefly by an eye to the dollars and cents. He saw with regret how his countrymen suffered themselves to be kicked about and trampled on; how they permitted their property to be destroyed upon the ocean and the land, and their citizens murdered even within sight of their own shores. He saw their patience, their meekness, their forbearance; but what was the foundation of it all? The dollars and cents! What a contrast did this exhibit to that prominent and admirable feature of the British system of policy which was to protect the MAN, (the British subject,) wherever he might be! Without this, she never could have stood so long the enormities of her system. He thought that, as American citizens, we ought to feel proud whilst witnessing the march of the Anglo-American race in its onward progress for the benefit of the human species. He would rejoice to see it surmount the rugged tops of the Rocky mountains, and, pouring over into the fertile valleys beyond, form, by its presence and its valor, an impenetrable barrier against Great Britain on the north, and any other power to the south. Let the free race of American pioneers go onward West, carrying their love of liberty, and all their free and beneficent institutions with them; and he would encourage their progress, by every means within the compass of his ability, even to the utmost verge of the continent.

When the bill in regard to the Oregon Territory should come up, Mr. LINN hoped the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] might take the same view of the subject which he did, and that he should then enjoy all the benefit of his powerful aid. It was the State from which that Senator came, and his own native State, that first settled its public lands under the system of free occupation. They came first into the great wilderness of the West; their fathers had had the brunt to bear; and he hoped one day to see a noble monument erected, if not to these bold and enterprising men, at least to the noble-souled women who had accompanied their fathers and husbands into the wilderness, often fought by their sides, and shared in their toils and dangers. Cheated they had been, and wronged in every practicable shape, by the petty county court lawyers and other reptiles, who were ever found haunting the precincts of a court; and now, to this hour, they were pursued by the same class of wretches—heartless speculators—who were every where prowling along our frontier, but who were not now permitted by public opinion to wrong them.

These advancing pioneers were made of the sterling stuff, which presented a tremendous battery for the protection of the secondary, but more timid and effeminate, class which followed in their footsteps. They hewed down the timber; they subdued and exterminated the beasts of prey; they discovered and developed the natural resources of the country; they compelled the roving Indian to recede, and seek more distant hunting grounds; they added to the national wealth. And would gentlemen forego advantages like these, for the sake of obtaining some five or six cents more per acre for the public lands? Why should not a pre-emption bill be prospective, as well as retrospective? If such a law was fit and right to heal a wound after it had been made, why not adopt a measure which should cause no wound? There would always be illegal combinations of citizens for mutual support against pre-emption restrictions which they considered oppressive, on the frontier. An army of thirty thousand men would be insufficient to repress them. Then why not at once supersede both the temptation and the cause?

As to the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands amongst the States, he would give it as his opinion that, should such a measure ever prevail, the inevitable result would be that the lands would be kept back from sale from year to year, until their value had risen to thirty dollars an acre, as he had heard it once suggested by an honorable Senator on this floor.

He greatly regretted that, by unwise and mistaken legislation, men should be strongly, irresistibly tempted, nay, he would say, compelled, to evade the law; and still more, the attempt to enforce such law, by the troops of the United States. Should a contest of that miserable character ever take place, no man who who was acquainted with the people of the West could doubt for a moment how it would end. Our population must and will go West, according to the great law of nature regulating its onward march to the Pacific ocean.

The bill having been ordered to be printed together with all the amendments hitherto adopted, The Senate adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR. BENTON,

OF MISSOURI,

In Senate, Tuesday, February 12, 1841.—The bill to authorize the issue of Treasury notes having been taken up as in committee of the whole, and the question being on ordering it to a third reading,

Mr. BENTON asked for the yeas and nays, that he might have an opportunity of recording his name in opposition to this annual Treasury Note bill, which now seemed to come in as a mere matter of course when the Treasury needed money. He was willing to vote for a loan, or for duties on proper objects, if money was necessary—if more was necessary than the current income would supply—but he was averse to Treasury issues of paper, and wished to appear so upon the record. He, therefore, asked for the yeas and nays.

They were ordered.

Mr. B. said he had once voted for a Treasury note bill—voted for it with extreme reluctance—with an almost inexpressible repugnance—and had no sooner done it than he regretted it. This was at the extra session of 1837, when the Government was suddenly stripped of its revenues by the general suspension of the banks, and when, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, it would have been impossible to negotiate a loan in time to prevent the catastrophe of a stoppage of payments by the Government. Under such circumstances, he had yielded to the iron hand of imperious necessity, and voted for a Treasury note bill, which he then hoped was to be the last which he should ever see. Even then he did not yield until every feature of a currency had been eradicated from the character of the notes—until they were placed upon the footing of real promissory notes, to be payable to order, and not to bearer—to be transferable by endorsement—to bear a fair interest—to be payable at a fixed time—and when paid, not to be reissued, but taken up and cancelled like any other paid off and extinguished bond. It was not until the notes were made to wear this form, and were raised in their minimum denomination from twenty to one hundred dollars, that he would consent to vote for the bill. Even then he could not do it without a protest and remonstrance against it. He spoke against it—delivered his sentiments decidedly, if not strongly, in opposition to the policy of the measure; and, with the leave of the Senate, would now read a read passage from the speech which he then delivered.

"I trust I have vindicated the bill from the stigma of being a paper currency bill, and from the imputation of being the first step towards the creation of a new national debt. I hope it is fully cleared from the odium of both these imputations. I will now say a few words on the policy of issuing Treasury notes in time of peace, or even in time of war, until the ordinary resources of loans and taxes had been tried and exhausted. I am no friend to the issue of Treasury notes of any kind. As loans, they are a disguised mode of borrowing, and easy to slide into a currency; as a currency, it is the most seductive, the most dangerous, and the most liable to abuse of all the descriptions of paper money. 'The stamping of paper (by Government) is an operation so much easier than the laying of taxes, or of borrowing money, that a Government in the habit of paper emissions could rarely fail, in any emergency, to indulge itself too far in the employment of that resource, to avoid, as much as possible, one less auspicious to present popularity.' So said General Hamilton; and Jefferson, Madison, Macdonald, Randolph, and all the fathers of the republican church, concurred with him. These sagacious statesmen were shy of this facile and seductive resource, so liable to abuse, and so certain of being abused." They held it inadmissible to recur to it in time of peace, and that it could only be thought of amidst the exigencies and perils of war, and that after exhausting the direct and responsible alternatives of loans and taxes. Bred in the school of these great men, I came here at this session to oppose, at all risks, an issue of Treasury notes. I preferred a direct loan, and that for many and cogent reasons. There is clear authority to borrow in the Constitution; but, to find authority to issue these notes, we must enter the field of constructive powers. To borrow is to do a responsible act; it is to incur certain accountability to the constituent, and heavy censure if it cannot be justified; to issue these notes is to do an act which few consider of, which takes but little hold of the public mind, which few condemn and some encourage, because it increases the quantum of what is vainly called money. Loans are limited by the capacity, at least, of one side to borrow, and of the other to lend; the issue of these notes has no limit but the will of the makers and the supply of lamplight and rags. The continental bills of the Revolution, and the assignats of France, should furnish some instructive lessons on this head. Direct loans are always voluntary on the part of the lender; Treasury note loans may be a forced borrowing from the Government creditor—as much so as if the borrower was put to his breast for necessity has no law, and the necessities claimant must take what is tendered, whether with or without interest—whether ten or fifty per cent below par. I distrust, dislike, and I would fain eschew, this Treasury note resource. I prefer the direct loans of 1820-'21. I could only bring myself to acquiesce in this measure when it was urged that there was not time to carry a loan through its forms, nor even then could I consent to it until every feature of a currency operation had been eradicated from the face of the bill."

Mr. B. said such were his sentiments in 1837; they were the same now, and stronger than they were then. All the evils which he then foresaw and dreaded, have been gradually developing themselves since. Three acts for notes had been passed since. The notes were assimilating nearer and nearer to a currency. The hundred dollar limit which he had procured to be introduced, was reduced to fifty; the interest was sometimes reduced so low as to be made illusory; the notes came to be re-issuable, and payable to bearer; the facility of granting them had become so great that the demand was now annual; and the bills passed without the show of opposition. The present bill was put upon its passage without a word being said pro or con; it was about to be passed without yeas and nays; it was going through like water, when he (Mr. B.) arrested its progress for an instant, and gave rise to some little discussion—some little show of resistance. Such was the downward progress of the paper money policy. Its course is downward, and rapidly so. The resource was too easy, too seductive, too irresponsible, to be rejected; it has become the ordinary alternative; and unless arrested soon, must eventually run the career, and receive the catastrophe, of all paper money.

Mr. B. said there were but half a dozen Treasury note acts upon our statute book, and the one-half of these bear date in the last three years. The Administrations of Washington, Jefferson, the two Adamses, Monroe, and Jackson, afforded no instance of a Treasury note bill, although each of these Administrations, except the last, had been a frequent borrower of money, and of sums of all amounts, from as low as forty thousand dollars, and for periods of time of all durations, from a few months to several years. Mr. B. here exhibited the captions of above seventy acts of Congress during the Administrations which he had mentioned, for borrowing sums of money, many of them for the support of the Government, some to enable the Administration, if found necessary, to carry into effect the appropriations made by Congress; and all of them with the ways and means prepared to pay them when due. The old way was to borrow in preference to striking paper, and to lay a tax at the same time to meet the debt and its interest. This was the old way in our Government, and it was the old way in England, when patriots bore sway in that country. It was the responsible and the safe way; for, when a loan was made, and a tax laid, the people would call their representatives to account; they would hold them to their accountability; they would make them give reasons, when they got home, for creating this debt and imposing this tax. Not so with these Treasury notes. They dropped into existence without the knowledge of the people; they created no present burthen; they put off the evil day; they avoid accountability; and an issue of tens or hundreds of millions of this paper would find applauders and defenders in nearly all the advocates for a strong and splendid Government—in nearly all the friends of the paper system—in most of the advocates for the relief of the people, the assumption of State debts, and the "payment," as it is called, of the fourth instalment.

At a subsequent part of the debate,

Mr. B. rose again to say that if he had expected aid enough to make a respectable show on a division—aid enough to have presented the least chance of success—he should have moved for the small loan for the few months which the exigencies of the Treasury might require in some portions of the present year. From one and a half to two millions was all that was required, and that for not more than three or four months, and this not to supply a deficiency but to equalize the income, and to meet the extraordinary demands—the pension demands—of March and September. If he had seen the possibility of success, he would have moved this bill; he would have taken the responsibility, or the odium, as the case might be, of moving it. But he saw no chance of success. The general tendency is still for paper; paper from the General Government; paper from the State Governments; paper from the banks; paper from town and city governments; paper from individuals. Paper was still the word; and with nearly one hundred millions of specie in the country, lampblack and rags was still the favorite resort. Very well, he said. Things must take their course, and, though omnipotent now, yet he would venture to say that the course of paper money would soon be run, at the rate we were going on.

Mr. B. appealed again to the early history of our Government, and showed, from the debates in the Federal Convention, from the terms of the Constitution, from the first revenue act of 1789—from all these sources, he showed that hard money was to be the currency of the Federal Government, and that neither paper issued by itself, nor by the States, nor by corporations or individuals, was ever intended to come into the Federal Treasury. The standard of value was to be preserved there; and it was one of the boasts of the Independent Treasury system, that it was to restore that standard to the Federal payments. Treasury notes were struck out of that bill—six short months they were struck out; and now they rise up in a separate bill—rise up like mushrooms, and are full grown as soon as seen. It was one of the main arguments in favor of the Sub-Treasury, that it would keep up a circulation of gold and silver; but at the rate we go on, that argument must prove illusory.

Mr. B. reiterated his assertion that the public debt of Great Britain, now so enormous, had grown up, not on loans, but on exchequer bills. Annual issues of these bills for as many millions as the ministry chose to ask, had been the course of raising the wind there for upwards of a century past. These millions were granted without noise, and without notice. When due, they were funded, without noise and without notice. Taxes, from time to time, were laid, not to pay principal, but to pay interest; and now the interest of the national debt is one-half larger than the principal was at the commencement of this delusive policy. A century and a half ago, the British national debt was only about twenty millions sterling (one hundred millions of dollars,) the annual interest is now about thirty millions sterling, (one hundred and fifty millions of dollars.) Such is the progress of a public debt growing up on issues of Treasury paper. No such progress could have been made in the British public debt, if responsible loans and taxes had been resorted to.

Mr. B. deprecated the whole policy of these Treasury notes as being the most dangerous species of paper money—as being contrary to the intent of the Constitution, and the practice of the Government under the administrations of Washington, Jefferson, the two Adamses, Monroe, and Jackson, and only tolerated in Mr. Madison's time on account of the war—and as being at war with all our talk about the gold currency, the hard money, the Independent Treasury bill, and all our promises to keep alive, and preserve, the only standard of value which the wisdom of the world has yet discovered.

Mr. B. reminded Senators of the origin of the British debt, and how it had grown up, in the short space of a century and a half, from the small sum of twenty millions sterling, to the frightful amount of four thousand five hundred millions of dollars. This vast debt had grown up, chiefly upon Treasury notes, called in England exchequer bills. The way of raising the debt was this: When the Ministry needed money, they applied to Parliament for leave to issue exchequer bills. The leave was granted, the bills made payable on time, and with interest, and the present wants of the Treasury thus supplied. When the bills became due, and it was not convenient to pay them, the first resource was to pay old bills with new ones; and the next was to fund them, and make a permanent debt of them. Sometimes the interest would be raised, to prevent them from coming in for a while. This has been the course of things in England. It is thus that her enormous debt has been created—has grown up to its mountainous size, without shocking and alarming the people as it grew. And are we not now taking this same course? Are we not issuing our exchequer bills, as a matter of course? Are we not taking up old bills with new bills? And is not the prospect of having them funded now staring us in the face? Do not the friends of the new Administration allege the existence of a new national debt, created by us, and more than hint at the necessity of funding it?

Mr. B. said the bill now before the Senate proposed the issue of five millions of these notes, not to meet a debt of that amount, but to provide for a temporary deficiency which may exist in the Treasury during some part of the present year. He understood the Secretary and the friends of the present Administration to stand upon the position, that the income of the year will be equal to the necessary appropriations of the year; but that the expenditures being heavier in March and September than in other months of the year, on account of the pensions and some other large items, it will be necessary to have something more for those two months than the current revenue at the time will bring in; and, therefore, a temporary supply is wanted, which can be reimbursed in the course of the year out of the existing income. This is what he (Mr. B.) understood; and it seemed to him to be a proper case for a brief loan, such as was constantly made under like circumstances during all administrations, except that of Mr. Madison, during the war with Great Britain, and the administration of Mr. Van Buren, under the difficulties imposed by bank suspensions. Mr. B. conceived it to be no objection to a loan to say that short loans cannot be made. He believed that very long loans, and very short ones, were the kind most easily made; and that the United States had never yet failed to make a loan of either kind; and never will, while it preserves the character of paying to the day. It has that character now, and, while it preserves it, can borrow as much as it wants, and more than it ought.

Mr. B. said he would prefer a brief loan in the present case, because it was clear that the amount could be reimbursed out of the current revenue during the present year. Were it otherwise, and could the loan not be reimbursed out of the current revenue, he (Mr. B.) would be willing to lay duties for the purpose; but not duties on French silks and French wines, but on luxuries coming from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and from countries with which we had no commercial treaties, nor any commerce of a kind to affect or disturb our own pursuits of industry. The Asiatic commerce, from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, presents a proper subject for the levy of a small revenue, if any is wanted. It is a commerce fed principally by hard money, no way dependent upon our agriculture, no way connected with our domestic industry, and large enough to yield a handsome income; and the whole of it coming under the character of luxuries. Silks, teas, spices, fine cottons, were the principal articles of this trade; and, except the cheapest description of teas, which might be excepted from tax, the whole might be considered as luxuries. This trade, Mr. B. said, now averaged about ten millions of dollars per annum, of which above eight millions were free of duty, and the remainder subject to a very small duty. To this commerce he would look, with the exception of the low priced teas, for an imposition of duties, if additional revenue was needed, in preference to French silks and French wines; but believing that no additional revenues were necessary at this time, he should vote for none, either on Asiatic or European productions.

Mr. B. said that as long ago as the year 1826 his attention had been turned to the fact of occasional and temporary deficiency in the revenue, arising from fluctuations in the amount of imported goods. From these fluctuations it must result that the same rate of duties will give different amounts of income in different years—an excess in one year and a deficiency in another. By the sinking fund act of 1817, two millions were to be kept in the Treasury to answer the demand during these occasional deficiencies; but he (Mr. B.) objected to keeping any amount on hand for that purpose, and would prefer a permanent act, authorizing the Administration for the time being, to borrow a limited sum, say three or four millions, if found necessary to carry into effect the appropriations made by Congress.

Mr. B. concluded what he now had to say, on the subject of these Treasury notes, with saying that experience had developed a new objection to them of the most serious character to the South and West. It was their inevitable tendency and effect to draw the specie of those sections of the Union to the Atlantic cities, where it lay until the rate of the foreign exchanges carried it to Europe. The course was this: these Treasury notes all flowed to the great centre of our moneyed operations—to New York; when due, specie was ordered from the South and West to redeem them; and as there was nothing in the course of trade to carry specie back again, it lay there until events carried it to Europe or the East Indies. This had been the case with the Treasury notes heretofore issued; they had occasioned an immense drain of specie from the South and West; they had done immense injury to the South and West; the same would be the case with all that should be issued hereafter; and he (Mr. B.) would look upon this bill, if it was acted upon to the extent of its limit, as an order to transfer five millions of hard dollars from the South and West to New York and Philadelphia, thence to take its departure to Europe, when the course of trade made it profitable to export specie.

THE PUBLIC FINANCES.

SPEECH OF MR. BARNARD,

OF NEW YORK.

In the House of Representatives, January 18, 1841—the House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the bill making provision for the issue of five millions of Treasury notes—

Mr. BARNARD rose, and spoke nearly as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I had occasion last year to present my views in regard to the issuing of Treasury notes by this Government, in the form proposed by this bill. I have no doubt of the constitutional right of this Government, being authorized by law, to borrow money, and to give for such money its bonds or its notes as evidences of debt. I have no doubt of our constitutional right to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue promissory notes, payable at a future day, with or without interest, to such of the public creditors as are willing to receive them, instead of receiving payment in cash. At the same time, I do not think this the best mode of borrowing money, or of paying debts. Both may be resorted to under the pressure of circumstances, but neither should ever be without such apology for it.

My great objection to Treasury notes as proposed to be issued by this bill, which does but adopt the provisions of the Treasury note act of last session, is, that under it paper may be issued designed to become, and which would become, a common medium of payment and circulation between the Government and its debtors and creditors, and, as far as it would go, a common money medium in circulation in the community. Such paper, not resting on specie as a basis, like sound convertible bank paper, but resting wholly on the faith and credit of the Government, is nothing more and nothing less than bills of credit. It is precisely that description of paper to which all the evils and all the odium of bills of credit attached in the earlier periods of our history, and is precisely what the Constitution prohibits to the States, and what this Government itself has no authority to employ. These views, as I have said, were expressed fully on a former occasion.

At present I have other and very different objections to urge to this bill, or rather to the measure for which this bill provides. This is a fiscal measure, and a measure of relief. As such I do not agree that it is either a proper or an adequate measure. It supposes that there is or will be a deficit of means in the Treasury to meet the demands upon it, in the whole or some part of the year 1841; and that that deficit may amount to five millions of dollars, but not more. It supposes also, since it is not accompanied, as the act of borrowing by the Government always should be, by some measure for ultimate supply and repayment, that if the notes issued shall not be redeemed, as the bill itself seems to anticipate on its face they will be, out of current revenues within the present year, they will be redeemed out of current revenues in the year 1842, the revenue laws standing just as they now do. Such, indeed, in both the particulars now referred to, is the position and argument of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. JONES of Virginia,] who has just addressed us on the subject.

Now, sir, I think that, in all this, there is great and manifest error. I think, in the first place, that we want, for the service of 1841, over and above all revenue and receipts from all sources, under existing laws, ten millions of dollars, instead of five, including a small and necessary balance in the Treasury, such as always should be provided for. And then, I think that neither in 1841 nor in 1842 will it be possible to redeem either ten millions or five millions, or any other amount, however small, of outstanding debt, by the application of ordinary revenue, after the support of Government shall have been provided for, unless there shall be a material amendment of our revenue laws, made now, or made, at any rate, at no distant day. Things remaining as they are, I compute an actual deficit for the service of the present year of at least seven millions and a half of dollars. This supposes that the receipts from customs may reach sixteen millions; the Secretary estimates them at nine or ten millions. But what an empty account will the Treasury exhibit in 1842, when, as the Secretary shows, five millions of duties go off under the compromise act, and when the whole sum realized from customs, as he thinks, will not exceed ten or eleven millions of dollars? How is the Treasury, then, to pay all current expenditures, and redeem also several millions of debt?

These remarks will indicate sufficiently the grounds of my present opposition to this measure. It wants propriety and it wants adequacy. Money ought not to be borrowed by this Government on bills of credit, prepared and designed for circulation; nor is there now any such exigency as would justify a resort to this mode of paying off the public creditors in promises, instead of cash. This is one objection; the other is, that, whether it be designed to pay with these notes, or to borrow with them, or both, the amount proposed to be realized is utterly insufficient, in the first place; and then, no provision whatever is made for their redemption or for supplying to the Treasury a competent revenue for the coming year. In the want of these two things—an adequate supply, by borrowing, in addition to all receipts from ordinary sources, for the service of 1841; and a present amendment of the revenue laws, with a view to increase the amount receivable for duties in 1842—in the want and neglect of these two things, if they shall be neglected, will arise, in my opinion, an inevitable necessity for resorting to an extra or early session of Congress, after the present Congress shall have expired. It is the solemn and sacred duty of the present Administration, holding the political power in both branches of the Legislature, to take care that that burden shall not fall on the Government and the country.

But, Mr. Chairman, in order to understand how inadequate this measure is to the real exigencies of the public service, it will be necessary that we should possess ourselves of a pretty full view of our financial condition, and of the state and prospects of the Treasury; and to this task I shall now address myself.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] deprecates the mingling of political considerations with the discussions on this bill. I sir, shall, not be the first to introduce politics into this debate. Certainly it could be no part of my purpose, on this occasion, to assail the Administration, or any body connected with it. It would be out of time and out of character to begin a warfare, at this day, on a fallen and expiring Administration.

At the same time, it must be apparent enough to all that, if the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, and the President in his message, following the Secretary, have fallen into gross errors, mistakes, and miscalculations, in the account they have given us of the fiscal operations and affairs of the country, the earliest opportunity should be taken to make the necessary corrections, and set the whole matter in its true and proper light. So much is due to this House, which must act officially in the case; so much is due to the country, which has a right to know, not only what we do, but the grounds of our proceedings also. So much is due also to another interest, bound up intimately as it must be, for good or for evil, with the interest and honor of the whole land, and which has a right to demand protection against all fraud and imposition, if any such has been attempted, which I do not charge, and, at any rate, against the evil consequences to itself of error and mistake, into which others may have fallen. I allude, of course, to the incoming Administration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the condition of the country, in regard to its finances, is one of deep embarrassment and difficulty, bordering on bankruptcy and dishonor. Government is the agent of a great estate; out of which it is the agent's proper business to raise revenue enough, year by year, to serve both for its preservation and its improvement. But the estate has not paid its own way. It has been, on the whole, perhaps, sufficiently productive, if good economy had been observed; but, of what it has produced, too large a share, I am afraid, has gone for the benefit of the agent and those in his employ. The owners had certainly realized very little from it; and, so far from any improvement having been made, the very effort or attempt at improvement, in some matters of the highest consequence, has been openly abandoned, and the inheritance suffered to run down into a state of dilapidation and decay. In the mean time, vastly more money has been actually expended, somehow or other, than ever before, in the same space of time; for the agent has found it convenient to seize upon and convert to his use, in his management of affairs, very many millions of property, not the current proceeds of the estate, belonging to his owners; all, all now consumed and gone. And, notwithstanding this profuse and extravagant expenditure, besides the abandonment, or neglect, of many valuable interests, already referred to, it is found that, in many cases, the creditors of the Government have not been honorably or fairly dealt with; that claims and demands to a large amount, and which could not be resisted or deferred with justice or with honor, have been denied or postponed; and, finally, that this agent is about to hand over to his successor in office a deficient and exhausted Treasury, and an impoverished estate, with a heavy burden of undisclosed debt resting upon it.

Very different indeed, however, from all this is the view which the President presents in his farewell report to Congress and the people. It is evident that the President has done in this case precisely what the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means has just told us this House ought to do. We ought, he says, to rely implicitly on the statements and estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury. To whom should we go—to whom can we go—but to thee, thou most wise and accurate Head of Finance! Well, the President has done this; he has sat down humbly at the feet of this clear-headed Minister of Money, and learned of him. Look into the report of the Secretary, and then into the message, and you will see that the President has given us no lessons, no information or instruction whatever, in finance, but just such as he had first learned out of the financial gospels according to Mr. Woodbury. Hear what the President says, Mr. Chairman:

"The present sound condition of their finances, and the success, &c. are matters upon which the people and Government of the United States may well congratulate themselves."

"From the commencement of this period, [the commencement of his administration,] to the present day, every demand upon the Government, at home and abroad, has been promptly met."

"The small amount of Treasury notes, not exceeding four and a half millions of dollars, still outstanding, &c. may be redeemed out of accruing revenue." &c.

"The available balance in the Treasury on the 1st January next [1841] is estimated at one million and a half of dollars. This sum, with the expected receipts from all sources during the next year, will, it is believed, be sufficient to enable the Government to meet every engagement, and leave a suitable balance in the Treasury." &c.

"It is also, [this Government is,] as is believed, the only Government which, having fully and faithfully paid all its creditors, has also relieved itself entirely from debt."

"The facts here stated [a recital just made] fully authorize the assertion that all the purposes for which this Government was instituted have been accomplished during four years." &c. and "that this has been done when the ordinary revenues of the Government were generally decreasing." &c.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am forced to take issue with the President—or rather, I should say, with his Secretary—on every one of these bold positions and statements, and to give to every one of them, as I do, a bold contradiction and denial. There is not one of them that will bear examination and the test of facts. I shall examine them in order, and with some particularity. In this work, I must use such facts and data as I have been able to gather for myself, without the aid of those important disclosures which I had hoped, before this time, to have the benefit of, under my resolution of inquiry, introduced at an early day in the session, and directed to the Secretary of the Treasury. I hope yet, under favor of the House and the friends of the Secretary here, to get the information sought for by that resolution, before the session ends; when, I believe, it will be found, the truth and the whole truth being honestly told, that things are even worse in the department of finance than our worst apprehensions have led us to suppose them to be.

Mr. Chairman, I begin my examination of the positions assumed by the President—assumed always, I conclude, on the authority of the Secretary—with that unqualified claim and declaration, made, of course, to confirm and illustrate the somewhat boastful allusion to the general sound condition of the finances, and the success which has attended their management—the declaration that, in the whole four years of his administration, “every demand upon the Government, at home and abroad, has been promptly met.”

Sir, what is meant by meeting demands promptly? What would a business man be understood to mean, who should be found walking up and down Chestnut street, or Wall street, proclaiming to every one he might meet, while rubbing his hands with self-satisfaction, that he had promptly met every demand upon him? Suppose it were universally known of him, on ‘Change that, whether dishonest or only unfortunate, he had found it convenient, for a series of months together, to make terms with many of his creditors, some of whom had been kind enough, trusting to their knowledge of his ultimate responsibility, and his general good credit, to take for their debts and demands, due and past due, instead of cash payment, his own promissory note, payable one year after date, bearing such rate of interest, not exceeding six per cent. and not always above a mill or two, as they could bargain for? What would be thought of such a man and his bold declaration of habitual and invariable promptness in meeting all demands upon him? Well, sir, what has this Government been doing for four years past? In that time it has issued twenty-five millions of Treasury notes—and now asks authority to issue five millions more; and of this twenty-five millions, I know not how much, but very much of it, has been issued directly to creditors in payment, or rather in postponement of the payment due to such creditors—yet every demand upon the Government has been promptly met! One who pays a debt past due, with his own promissory note, may change, and does change, the form of indebtedness, but certainly not the fact of indebtedness. If he gives a negotiable note, he may change his creditor, satisfying one by raising up another to take his place, but the debt remains. True, in this case, the immediate demand is met; but how met? Not, certainly, with payment in cash, which is what the creditor wants, but with a bit of paper, which is nothing more nor less than an authority to the holder to go into the money market, and borrow, in the name and for account of the Government, money enough to pay himself with, of any body who will lend it. Sir, brokers are a very odious tribe to the present Administration and its supporters; and the Administration has furnished, in four years, more business to brokers, through the issue of its promissory notes and Treasury and Sub-Treasury drafts, than they have had, I venture to say, out of the operations of any twenty, or fifty, perhaps, of the largest proprietors and dealers in the land. Instead of cash payments, which the Government ought always to make, it has dealt extensively in its own paper—its notes and its drafts; articles of traffic and brokerage, and sometimes bearing one value and sometimes another in the market—sometimes above par and sometimes below. A Government dealing thus with its creditors had best talk as little as possible about the promptness with which it meets demands upon it. If some have been favored or fortunate enough to gain premiums on their paper received from the Government, others, I am well advised, have suffered losses on theirs. Some of the poor clerks in the Departments in this city, I think, might testify to losses, if they would. But their demands were promptly met, and they were satisfied. Oh, yes; it was better to be satisfied with the loss of a small per cent. on their salaries, than be turned adrift, and lose salary and all together. They were satisfied! And so was I satisfied, sir, when, at the close of the last session, I received, for a little balance of per diem due me, first the Speaker’s note, and then, upon that, a Treasury note or two in part payment, though the gold had been demanded at the Treasury, in my name, for the whole—just by way of experiment. Sir, it has been said, and the accounts of these things have frequently been published, that the drafts of the Government drawn on depositaries or holders of public money, and issued to satisfy creditors, have often been protested and dishonored. I suppose the fact to be so, though I am not prepared to state it on my own or any certain and reliable authority. I feel much more certain of another fact, and that is, that drafts drawn by contractors, agents, and officers—drawn under authority, and in due and legal form, on the Treasury, for moneys due and payable, sometimes for large amounts, and where the exigency of the public service made the demand urgent and imperative—that such drafts have, in more instances than one or a few, been refused and rejected. It must be known somewhere, and in some department of the Government, if such things have occurred; I believe they have; and, if so, it affords a most apt illustration of the boast that “every demand upon the Government has been promptly met.”

But, sir, without dwelling further on the paper transactions of the Government, and its delinquencies as a debtor under the use of such paper, I will come to some instances—a few, just by way of example and specimen—which do not seem to me to accord perfectly well with the assumption that “every demand upon the Government has been promptly met.”

In looking into the recent report of the Quartermaster General, I was struck with the tone of just complaint—so I read the document—in which he there indulges. Last year he presented an estimate, as was his duty, for the service in Florida. That estimate was six hundred thousand dollars. And now he states the fact that he was required to modify and reduce that estimate one-half! Only three hundred thousand dollars, therefore, were appropriated. And what has been the consequence? Why, just what was known must happen. General Jesup says: “there are outstanding claims to a considerable amount, arising out of the volunteer and militia service, which have been recognised by the Executive, and for the prompt payment of which funds are required;” and he urges importunately, that, for this object and for current service, an immediate application be made to Congress for at least four hundred thousand dollars. I have seen a letter from a highly respectable gentleman on the spot, or near it, to his friend in this House, in which the amount of arrearages due to volunteers and militia, &c. is stated at not less than $300,000. So, then, Mr. Chairman, we have here demands for volunteer and militia service in Florida, due and past due, running up to hundreds of thousands of dollars, recognised by the President, and yet not paid. And why not paid? Oh, of course, because there was no appropriation: and how can money be paid, be the Treasury never so full, without an appropriation? Well, and why was there not an appropriation? Why, that was cut down—cut down by positive order and command—when it was just as well known as it is now, that the money would be required and wanted. In short, you—this Government—putting forth a boastful claim that you had met every demand promptly—you declined and refused, at the proper time, to make an appropriation to meet debts and demands which, at that very time, you meant to contract and create; and this you did—I think you must be content to bear this impeachment—this you did deliberately, intending to cover yourself behind the legal excuse of “no appropriation,” from the approach and the reproaches of your own delayed, suffering, and abused creditors. You employ citizen soldiers in the field for months together; you promise to pay them and provide for their subsistence and comfort; you suffer large arrearages to accumulate against you; you recognise the debt; but when payment is demanded, your answer is—“no appropriation.” The true and only honest answer would be—no money. That is the secret why you do not pay. It is inconvenient, at least, for you, and you want the next Administration to pay it. No appropriation! Common honesty required you to make it at the last session. But it was omitted then—then the debt was only in prospect; now, however, it is reality, and why is the appropriation not now to be made? Look to the estimates of your Secretary—do you find any such item there as this? No, no; after the debt has become due long since; after it has been “recognised by the President,” and after the earnest appeal made by the Quartermaster General—after all, your old excuse stands good. You have made no appropriation, and you propose to make none! at least it is not in the estimates of the Secretary—of that Secretary who teaches the President to make proclamation to all the world that this is a Government which promptly meets all demands upon it.

Well again, sir. Before this Government puts forth its claim to so much credit for honorable dealing with its creditors, it seems to me it would have been prudent at least to have taken care that there were no very flagrant cases to be alleged against it of neglect and refusal to redeem its faith solemnly pledged. By a treaty with the Cherokees, ratified in 1836, the United States agreed that such Cherokee warriors as were engaged on the side of the United States in the last war with Great Britain and the Southern tribes of Indians, and who were wounded in the service, should be entitled to pensions. The Secretary of War in his recent report urges the demand of these warriors on the notice of the President. “They are very destitute,” says the Secretary, “and the good faith of the Government is pledged in their favor.” Here are demands, then, due for four years, under solemn treaty stipulation, and, during all that period they have not only not been met, but there has been no effort and no disposition to meet them. No appropriation has been asked of Congress, none is now asked, nor would those in Congress who might be disposed to have the faith of the Government kept have been permitted by the Administration at any time, I suppose, to pass an act in fulfilment of this treaty. These miserable Cherokee warriors, who fought for you, and shed their blood in your quarrel, wounded and disabled, have received your promise of a pittance wherewith to render the fragment of their broken life comfortable or endurable, and for years you delay and refuse to pay as you have promised. You, you, do this, who make it your loud boast that all demands on you are promptly met.

Mr. Chairman, there are other illustrations behind of the prompt manner in which this Administration has met all demands upon it. Take the case of those works of public improvement, our harbors and rivers, and the Cumberland road, heretofore carried on, but abandoned midway in the operations upon them during the last two years. The engineers tell us of arrearages on these works, not as large perhaps as they were numerous—demands outstanding against them; some of which must have been long outstanding, and not therefore promptly met, and many of which would not have been met at all, at least under this Administration, if the engineers had not, during the last summer, sold off public property connected with these works, expressly to raise the means for this object. Col. Abert tells us that “sales were absolutely necessary, in many cases, in order to raise funds to liquidate small demands against the works.” I have great doubts whether all demands against these works have yet been liquidated; and, if they have, the contemptible and tardy mode in which it has been done amply illustrates the ideas which some persons seem to enter, tain of what it is to be faithful and prompt in the discharge of honest debts.

And then, Mr. Chairman, how has it been with the operations of the past year on the barracks and fortifications of the country? One or two cases, I suppose, may serve as an example for all. A stinted appropriation was made for these works last year. Under authority granted by Congress to order, the application of these moneys was postponed by the President, so that, to use General Jesup's language, "the operations have been limited, with a few exceptions, to paying outstanding claims," etc. This, one would suppose, would have effectually arrested the progress of these works; under any other Government, such would have been the effect. But no such thing here. "Owing to a demand for employment," says Col. Totten, a most worthy gentleman and able officer, mortified and stung, I am sure, as a high-minded and honorable man, by such a condition of things, "Owing to a demand for employment on the part of laborers, mechanics, and contractors, we have been enabled to do something," &c. In other words, to tell the story plainly myself, and relieve Colonel Totten, the case is this: The Government is engaged in constructing fortifications, which are large and expensive works, and are carried on by yearly appropriations. It has in its employ on these works superintendents, and contractors, and mechanics, and laborers, most of whom, at least many of whom, make their arrangements, domestic and otherwise, with reference to permanent employment on these works, from the commencement to the completion of them, running, of course, through a number of years. They know that these are works undertaken by Government—a wealthy old gentleman, who generally does what he says he will do. Such a thing as failure or bankruptcy is not thought of. These contractors, mechanics, and laborers are on the ground promptly with the return of every working season, invited by the Government, and taught to expect nothing else than to go on with their work as usual, and to be paid for it, of course. Then comes the Government, by its agent, and, to their bitter disappointment, announces that funds are low, and prompt payment for labor is not to be expected. To work or starve—this is the condition of labor all over the world. What shall these men do? Their business is here, and they have no employment elsewhere, and might not now be able to find any. Well, this creates, to be sure, "a demand for employment"—a pressing demand. The Government, too, is as urgent to have the work done as they are to do it, and the end is, they are employed, and go to work. They will earn the money, and though the Government cannot pay, it will owe; and with this debt or demand, by selling it, or pledging it, or in some way, but of course not without serious sacrifice and loss, they will continue to realze something out of it for their current necessities.

Now, sir, this is precisely what has taken place. I have now in my hand a letter from an intelligent and worthy gentleman, a personal friend of mine, residing at Oswego, by which I am informed that, during the past season, the work on the fort at that place was carried on on a credit. It was understood, and so stipulated on the part of the Government, that payment was not to be demanded or expected before April next; nor would any evidence of debt be given, except by a credit entered on the books of the superintendent. It was permitted, however, graciously to the poor laborer, to transfer his demand, and the purchaser had his name noted on the book opposite to the account. My correspondent has furnished me with a copy of one of the orders under which these transfers are made, drawn by a laborer who makes his mark, with certain cabalistic letters of the superintendent noted on it, by way of recognition. The paper might, perhaps, with propriety, be added to some others, as one more specimen of the "better currency" of the Government.

But I have given this case as an example of the prompt manner in which the Administration has met all demands upon it. By a species of moral coercion it compels its creditors, who ought to be paid promptly in cash every Saturday night, to submit to an unjust and cruel delay of payment for several months, and to resort, therefore, to the necessity of hawking the credit of the Government in the market on petty accounts, with serious loss to themselves; and then, having done this, it turns round, in the face of such a transaction, and blows a trumpet of praise to itself for having promptly met every demand upon it!

I will allude to one other case, very much in point. I am informed, and I believe correctly, that, to carry on operations on the important works of Fort Schuyler, on the East River, a sum of money was borrowed of one of the banks in New York—the Mechanics' Bank, I think—borrowed for six months on an interest of three per cent. for that time. Here, then, the contractors, mechanics, and laborers, and those who furnished supplies, were paid in cash, and paid promptly; yes, paid promptly in cash, but with a rigid and invariable deduction from the old total of every account rendered of three per cent. Here were accounts for work and labor performed, and provisions and supplies furnished, at stipulated prices; and before these accounts would be paid, a discount must be submitted to equal to the interest on the money for six months. In other words, and in effect, the creditors themselves are obliged to borrow the money, using the name and credit of the Government, with which to pay their own demands on the Government, already due and past due, and to pay six months' interest for it. How such a transaction may affect this Government I know not; but I know that no private gentleman could ever hold up his head again in an honorable community, after he had once resorted to such a mode of meeting his engagements.

But, Mr. Chairman, I should never be done, if I should attempt to go through the cases in detail of delinquency in the matter of prompt payment on the part of the Administration. I must be brief in what I have further to say about it.

The Indian Department is full of instances of gross neglect and delinquency. So I understand and believe. Some hundreds of thousands of dollars, it is believed, yet remain unpaid, under a treaty entered into with the Potawatamies, I think, in 1833. At the last session, we made an appropriation of $36,000 to carry into effect a treaty with the Stockbridge and Munsee Indians; and I am told that not one dollar of it has yet been paid. A payment has been asked for, on vouchers acknowledged to be sufficient, of the proper department here, and refused on the plea that arrangements had been made, or would be, for payment somewhere else, and by an Indian agent. Payment has also, as I am told, been demanded of an Indiana agent—the only one who could be thought of as at all likely to be entrusted with the case—and nothing could be obtained. Several cases of strong and urgent claim are mentioned by General Jesup in his report. One by the Choctaws, where their property, land, has been taken for a fort—taken for public use, and no payment made, or proposed to be made. And another claim on the part of the Creeks, on a positive agreement made with them by the General himself, some years ago, and no payment is made, or any disposition shown to make it.

And, then, what has been the course of the Administration in regard to claims, whether in the Departments or before Congress? It is well understood that these claims in the Departments amount to a very large sum—probably to millions—claims growing out of the Florida war, and Indian affairs, and other things. These demands have not been promptly met. In some cases, as I suppose, appropriations have been made to meet them, but the accounts have not been adjusted. In other cases, there has been service according to law, and the demands are according to law, but there has been no appropriation. I do not doubt that the next Administration will find millions of these demands lying over under one pretence and another. We hear General Jesup complaining that disbursing and accounting officers are hung up in the Departments for one or two years before they can get their accounts and demands adjusted. Before Congress, it is said, there are ten thousand claims now pending. Nobody doubts that very many of these are just, and ought to be promptly paid. Yet, who that was here at the last session of Congress failed to observe the studied and systematic effort of the Administration, by every possible device, to prevent the action of Congress on this whole subject? And that effort succeeded. Congress passed bills for private claims, in seven months, to the amount of $14,000! Justice and honor were sacrificed openly, with the sacrifice of the claims of the public creditors. Appeals to the mercy of the Government, as well as to its justice, fell unheeded on the cold, dead ear of party. The rejection was as deliberate as it was heartless; the appearance of things must be saved for the benefit of party; the Treasury must not bear the burden of these just dues at a crisis of so much political importance. And thus were thus dues boldly shuffled off. They amount, doubtless, to millions, and are left, with other things like them, as a legacy to the next Administration. He is a bold man, Mr. Secretary, who could claim, in the face of facts like these, and teach his master to claim for the Government the credit and the praise of having promptly met all demands upon it!

But, Mr. Chairman, I pass from this point, to consider another, closely connected with this. A happy man is that President of these United States who can say, with truth, at the close of his term, that, under his administration, "all the purposes for which this Government was instituted have been accomplished," and that is precisely what Mr. Van Buren says for himself. Sir, I solemnly declare that I would gladly allow this declaration to pass without a word of animadversion from me, if I could do so without manifest injustice to the incoming Administration. It is due, however, to those on whom the burden of Government is to fall after the fourth of March, that the error, amounting to delusion, on which this position rests, should be thoroughly exposed. In attempting this, I shall carefully avoid all differences with the President on matters involving constitutional doubt or difficulty. I shall say nothing, for example, of the course of the Administration in regard to currency and credit. Many very important interests have been sacrificed, during the last four years, in regard to which the President claims to shelter himself under a constitutional scruple. I shall respect that claim, on this occasion, and offer him no disturbance upon it. I shall take him, as I may find him, beyond this magic circle, and there is matter enough, in Heaven's good name, with which to impeach the perfect accuracy of the self-satisfying declaration to which I have referred.

If any body will take the trouble to look into the reports of the present session from Departments and heads of Bureaus, and note the number and variety of urgent recommendations for the public service which they will find there, and which are and have been all the while wholly neglected by this Administration, he will then be able to appreciate the force and value of the claim that "all the purposes for which this Government was instituted have been accomplished." I will refer to a few things.

The providing of proper barracks for the accommodation of the army falls within the province of the Quartermaster General. These works are indispensable, and are required in various parts of the country. The last year "little was done," Gen. Jesup says, "except to pay some outstanding claims," even on the small number of those works for which appropriations were made. The money was withheld by the order of the President. The appropriations of the last year are to fall as an extra burden on the Treasury in the year 1841. But, besides this, there are a large number of cases presented as urgent by General Jesup, and urged also by the Secretary of War, for which no provision whatever has been made, and none is proposed.

The Secretary alludes to the fact that 40,000 Indians have been removed during the last four years, adding, therefore, that number to the multitude already on our Western border. These are, most of them, dissatisfied, moody, and restless, brooding over wrongs, and waiting for the chances of revenge. They are planted on the immediate confines of States and Territories belonging to this Union; and "the Government has contracted," says the Secretary, "a solemn obligation, not only to defend that people when attacked, but to anticipate the danger by erecting such works as will insure their safety, and inspire them with confidence, in the means employed for their protection." Surely, this must be something "for which this Government was instituted!" But what has been done? The Secretary recommends, for the Western frontier, the erection of posts which shall be made fire-proof, and so constructed as to serve as defences with a small garrison "against any number of men not provided with artillery." What has been done? Nothing; and nothing is thought of by the present Administration.

Permanent barracks and defences are wanted at Buffalo; wanted at Plattsburg, where the work has been suspended; wanted at or near Fort Gibson the most important and exposed point on the Western frontier; posts are wanted at Spring river and Marais de Cygne, and the navigation of the Neosho and Osage requires to be improved as a military highway; one or more posts are required on the Missouri; one on the St. Peter's; one at or near Sandy Lake; another at Fond du Lac, the southwestern extremity of Lake Superior; barracks and defences are required also at or near Detroit, and others in Maine. So at least says the Quartermaster General, backed by the Secretary of War; and yet no more notice is taken of any of these things, in the estimates for the year, than if we had neither army to provide for, nor country to defend.

While on this point, I may add, also, that Col. Henderson, Commandant of Marines, thinks, also, that certain barracks are quite indispensable for the force under his command, which it would require $150,000 to construct. He gets $75,000 in the estimates as a special favor. The work, of course, is to be done at halves.

Among other objects, one of the highest magnitude, mentioned by Mr. Poinsett, as requiring attention, reference is made to the importance of continuing the surveys of our rivers and great lakes for military purposes; the want of new barracks at West Point; the want of a fire-proof building for the archives of the War Department; and the propriety at least of paying for the sites which have been selected and contracted for, for marine hospitals on the Western waters. Is any notice taken of these modest suggestions? By no means. The estimates maintain a dead silence on the whole subject.

A military post or two for the concentration of troops, in the event of hostilities, is a very natural idea, and not altogether, perhaps, beyond the pale of those things "for which this Government was constituted." The Secretary of War suggests, with this view, a position near Albany for the Northern frontier, and another near St. Louis for the Western; and for the maritime frontier of the Gulf of Mexico, he thinks it important to establish a depot for armed steam-vessels, somewhere below the Falls of the Ohio. With what hope these suggestions are made, we may imagine, when we find the Secretary at the same time speaking, in a tone of utter despair, of his "having repeatedly recommended, without effect, the establishment of a national foundry."

Mr. Poinsett seems quite in earnest when he speaks of the neglected military defences of the country. Of the state of these defences on the Western border and against the Indians, we may judge by what I have said already. Nothing is, as yet, complete or hardly approaching completion in the defences for the long line of boundary between the United States and the British provinces. And as for our maritime frontier, "the whole coast," says the Secretary, "from Passamaquoddy Bay to the Sabine river, is exposed on every point not defended by Nature, to be invaded with impunity." Indeed! In the event of a sudden rupture with a foreign Power, he may strike a fatal blow at any point he pleases; he may lay our cities under contribution, or reduce them to ashes, and pollute our soil with the foot of hostile soldiery; and yet the Administration of the last four years, which in all that time has failed to complete the defences of one single point on the whole coast, now retires, hugging itself in its own arms with all self-complacency, and declaring that it has accomplished all the purposes for which this Government was instituted.

There is another not unimportant interest, that has fared even worse at the hands of this Administration than the national defences. I mean the harbor and river improvements. They belong to commerce, the regulation of which appertains to this Government, and out of which it has its principal revenue and support. The Administration cannot shelter itself here behind constitutional scruples. A majority of its own friends in this House, I suppose, have no such scruples. And yet, for two years, every movement towards continuing these works—works begun and prosecuted half-way, perhaps, to their completion—has been promptly met and voted down—nay, frowned and trampled down. About three millions of dollars are asked by the Engineers for these works the present year—the whole of it for works partly executed—and not one dollar can or will be obtained. In my poor opinion, until these works are finished, nobody can say, with truth, that the Government has accomplished all the purposes, or even the most important of the purposes for which it was instituted.

There is one other interest which I must not omit to advert to in this connection. That Administration in this country which does not take care of the Navy, takes care of nothing. If it be guilty of neglect in this quarter, it is guilty, indeed, and deserves no credit for any thing. This sin, if committed, should be deemed unpardonable. And what has this Administration done for the Navy, or rather what has it not neglected to do? I would not say a word to wound the estimable gentleman at the head of the Navy Department. I apprehend it is not altogether his fault, if the Navy has run down; and that the whole service is in a most wretched condition I suppose there can be no doubt. The Navy Commissioners estimate that, for a long time, the appropriations for "repairs," &c. of vessels have not been equal to the actual loss and decay, while the "increase" has been very moderate. It will be seen that, instead of any reform or improvement in this matter, less than ever is proposed to be done the present year.

It seems that the task of making estimates for the naval service devolves on the Navy Commissioners; but at the same time they are not at liberty to say how much that service really requires. A specific and restricted sum is given them, and they are to work out the problem with that; just so much canvass is furnished, with which they are required to dress up a line of battle ship in a full suit of sails, though there may not be really enough for a sloop of war. Officers and men must be paid, stores must be provided, and navy yards kept in order: that takes so much; and then so much is left for "repairs" and for "increase." For "repairs," a certain sum is indispensable, in order to preserve a value in vessels and stores equal to the original cost of the existing force already afloat. And now, Mr. Chairman, what do you suppose remains of the restricted sum to which the Commissioners are limited for the "increase of the Navy" in 1841? Just one hundred thousand dollars—"much less," say the Commissioners, "than the average annual appropriations for this purpose for the last twenty-five years." The Commissioners deem it indispensable to complete two steamers now in progress, and to commence a third; to complete, also, the frigate Congress, and to build another frigate to replace the Guerriere; and, for all this, they are limited, by an iron will above them, to the sum of one hundred thousand dollars; and this is called accomplishing all the purposes for which this Government was instituted!

It cannot surprise any body, after what we have now seen, to find the Secretary of the Treasury instructing the President to ask for another laurel to be added to the brow of this Administration for its financial achievements. While every demand on the Government has been promptly met, and all its purposes accomplished, how will the world be astonished to learn that all this has been done at a time "when the ordinary revenues of the Government were generally decreasing?" A pretty plain intimation, as I read it, that the Administration has had nothing but ordinary revenues with which to accomplish so much. The Secretary is explicit on this point. "It follows, therefore," so he concludes, "that the current revenue, notwithstanding all reductions, has been adequate to defray both the ordinary and extraordinary demands," &c. How very just and true it is that the Administration has met all demands on the Treasury, and has accomplished all the purposes for which the Government was instituted, we have seen already; and just about as near the fact is the assumption that for all the expenditures it has relied altogether on current revenue. It is true within just about thirty-three millions, as nearly as I can ascertain. The Secretary confesses, indeed, to eight millions received from the Bank of the United States; but this, he says, went to pay off old funded debt—a debt we were often assured was paid off in General Jackson's time. And he remembers, too, that there are Treasury notes outstanding; but these are hardly worth considering, because they are sure to be paid off in 1841 out of current revenue. We shall see about that directly.

No, sir, the simple truth is that, in four years, this Administration, in supporting itself, and carrying on two wars—one on a handful of Indians in Florida, and another on the currency, credit, and business of the country—with very little done to build up and sustain the public defences, or any of our great national interests—has expended thirty-three millions of dollars over and above all current revenues. Here is the brief but significant account!

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress, at the September session of 1837, shows that there was of available means in the Treasury (including sums then on deposit with the State) on the 1st of January, 1837	-	$42,468,859
There had been received, subsequently to that date, from banks, &c. and found available	-	1,670,137
		44,138,996
Deposited with the States	-	28,000,000
Leaving in the Treasury, say	-	16,000,000
There has been received from the Bank of the United States on its bonds for stock sold	-	8,000,000
There has been collected on old merchants bonds	-	6,000,000
There are Treasury notes outstanding on the 1st January, 1841	-	$4,652,991
Out of which deduct the balance estimated to be in the Treasury on that day—(though it is now acknowledged to be much less)	-	1,590,000
Making, altogether, a round sum of		$33,000,000

The Administration has got, all the while, what it could out of the estate—and the current revenues have not been small—and it has seized upon this little amount of thirty-three millions of other property belonging to its owners, and has used that up also.

And, now, Mr. Chairman, it is modest, to say the least of it, in the head of finance to inform us, through the President, that the revenues, from ordinary sources of course, for there are now no others, diminished, as he says they have been, will be found abundant, in 1841, "to meet every engagement (debt on Treasury notes and all) and leave a suitable balance in the Treasury," &c. It has required eight millions a year, besides all current revenue, for this Administration to pay its way—and it has not paid its way, for it leaves large amounts of debt behind it, as I will show; but the next Administration can get on very well, not only doing without the yearly addition of eight millions, but actually paying off, in the very first year, several millions of outstanding Treasury note debt—to say nothing now of other debt—besides providing for all ordinary expenditures. This, I say, is modest; and I must now examine, a little in detail, the basis of the estimates on which the Secretary comes to such extraordinary conclusions. We shall find, I think, that what the Secretary somewhere calls his "probability of a conjecture" is not altogether to be relied on.

I begin with his estimate of charges falling on the Treasury in 1841, and I pronounce it altogether below the mark: The first thing that struck me on looking into this estimate was the extraordinary difference between the total sum required for the service of 1841 and that which had been expended in 1840 and previous years.

The Secretary's estimates for 1841 stand thus:

For new appropriations	$16,621,520
Under former acts of Congress, exclusive of public debt	864,000

Total	$17,485,520
To which he adds for "omissions," &c.	1,764,480

Total sum required for 1841, exclusive of public debt and Treasury notes	$19,250,000
--	--------------

The expenditures of 1840, for ordinary purposes, estimating, as the Secretary does, a round sum of five millions for the last quarter, have been $22,459,349. But the Secretary says the other Departments estimate the expenditures of the last quarter at more than five millions. Taking them at the average of the first three quarters, which must be nearer the truth, and the total expenditures in 1840, exclusive of debt and Treasury notes, have been $23,319,131. I believe it will be found they have not fallen below $24,000,000. Between this sum of $23,319,131, expended in 1840, and the sum shown in the Secretary's table of estimates for the like service in 1841, ($17,485,520,) the difference is $5,833,611; and after adding, as he does, more than a million and three quarters for omissions and contingencies to the estimates for 1841, the difference is still $4,069,131.

But the difference between the estimates for 1841, taking the Secretary's highest sum, $19,250,000, and the actual expenditures for the like public service in the former years of the present Administration, is still greater and more extraordinary. Thus, in 1839, excluding payments on account of public debt, Treasury notes, and trust funds, the expenditures were $25,410,000; and in 1838, they were $31,544,000. The difference in the one case is $6,161,000, and in the other $12,294,000.

Another thing deserves to be noticed. The estimates for the year are usually summed up or referred to in gross, under three heads, namely, civil, miscellaneous, and foreign intercourse; naval, and military.

Now the reduction in the public expenditures in the course of this Administration, up to the present time, has been little or nothing under the first two heads, but has taken place almost wholly under the head of "military."

Thus, under the head of "military," the expenditures were:

In 1838	$19,916,000
In 1839	14,266,000
In 1840 (part estimated)	11,667,000
Under the head of "civil," &c. they were:
In 1838	$5,666,000
In 1839 (short session of Congress)	4,918,000
In 1840	5,490,000
And under the head of "naval," they were:
In 1838	$5,941,000
In 1839	6,225,000
In 1840	6,160,000

For the year 1841, taking the table of estimates, a still further reduction is proposed under the head of "military," while, at the same time, and for the first time, it is proposed to bring down the expenditures under both the other heads.

The table of estimates stands thus:

For military	$8,589,000
For civil, &c.	3,450,000
For naval	5,445,000

These figures show how handsomely, in the opinion of the Secretary, the work of retrenchment may go on in the civil and naval departments; but it has taken him full four years to make the discovery.

But, seeing this great saving of several millions in the total amounts proposed for 1841, compared with the expenditures of the last and previous years, the inquiry naturally arose, how is all this? Is the country less broad and extensive than it was? Are not its interests as various and as vast? Do not our limits extend as far in the direction of the Restock, and in the direction of the Red river and the Arkansas as formerly? Is not the Briton still on our Northern border, and the Indian still on our Western border? Is not the Seminole still in Florida? Are not the seas and oceans over which our commerce spreads itself as wide as ever? Has the civil list been cut down? Does not our army number as before? Have we fewer ships and men to keep aloft than formerly? Nothing of the sort that I can find.

But the Secretary does tell us that he has himself, in his own Department, commenced some retrenchment. Out of sixteen hundred officers in the custom-house department, he has dispensed with the services of a few subordinates; he has reformed the revenue cutter service; and he has knocked out an eye or two among the light-houses—all very beneficial to commerce, no doubt; but he certainly has not saved by all this those millions which his diminished estimates would indicate. No; but these millions—they are saved, to be sure, in another way; and here we have the secret.

The Secretary says in his report, (and the President echoes the joyful sound:)

"It is believed that the ordinary expenses of 1841 ought to fall some millions below those in 1840; as the pensions have diminished by deaths; fewer Indians remain to be removed, several expensive public buildings have been mostly finished; and hostilities with the Seminoles must be nearer to a close."

Well, sir, observe that all this is proposed as reducing the estimates for 1841—this present blessed year—and as reducing the amount some millions. Was the Secretary dreaming? Compare the estimates for 1841 with those for 1840, and look at facts. How much speculation does the Secretary make out of the deaths of pensioners? He proposes an appropriation for this year less than that of the last by $350,000. But will death relieve him to that amount? No; what with old appropriations standing over, added to the new, and to be applied to pensions, the saving, I apprehend, will not equal one half of that sum.

In the Indian Department, very large sums are standing over to fall on the Treasury in 1841, and the new appropriations proposed for the present year are scarcely $30,000 less than those of the preceding year. I venture to say the actual expenditure will be greater in this department this year than last.

As for the public buildings, the great saving in this quarter is soon told. The custom-house in New York is supposed to be out of the way. There was appropriated to this building last year $118,743. To three public buildings in this city last year $330,000 were appropriated. I understand that the estimates of the architect the present year, for all buildings in this city, amount to $400,000. We shall find no saving here going very far towards making up the Secretary's "some millions."

And, finally, as to the last particular named by the Secretary, under which this "some millions" was to be saved, namely, that "hostilities with the Seminoles must be nearer to an end." Well, Mr. Chairman, I should have great doubt of the fact of this war being nearer to an end than when it first began, if I did not recollect that this Administration is nearer to an end. But we are to have a great saving in 1841, not because this war is actually to an end in 1841—I hope it may—but because, in 1841, the war must be nearer to an end than in 1840! That, sir, is ciphering and logic worthy of the Secretary.

But, really, to talk of expenditures on account of this Florida business being less this year than last, is mockery, or something worse. With outstanding indebtedness on account of volunteers and militia to the amount probably of $300,000, the Paymaster General declaring that no provision has been made for paying those troops, and that they have not been paid; with the Quartermaster General urgently demanding, more than six weeks ago, $400,000, as a partial appropriation, to answer immediate and pressing necessities in this service; with the war still going on; and 2,000 volunteers and militia in the field, and to remain in the field, as Mr. Poinsett shows in his report; with these facts all before the Secretary at the time, it is amazing how he should have brought his courage up to speak of a saving to the Treasury in 1841 in reference to this service. Last year, $300,000 was all that was appropriated for this service, the officer making the estimate having been required—ordered—to cut it down to that sum; this year, unless this Administration mean now to abandon the whole concern, the Treasury must bear, not only the burden of the current service, but the greater part of that of the last year also; and yet the Secretary is not afraid to talk to us of a great saving to be made in this quarter!

Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in all the official acquaintance we have had with the Secretary of the Treasury calculated to inspire very implicit confidence in his accuracy. The last year his mark for new and permanent appropriations was $20,000,000; and he told us he thought the expenditures would be within that sum. With all the efforts of all the party to "keep the appropriations within the estimates," about which so much was said or sung, they found it necessary to swell the appropriation to $23,686,037, and the actual expenditures of the year have not fallen much, if any, short of $24,000,000. Mr. Woodbury is not nearer the true mark now than he was then. He pays to the next President the equivocal compliment of supposing that, in his hands, the same Government can be administered this year, with the same public service, for nineteen and a quarter millions, which has cost the country, under the present Chief Magistrate, the past year, twenty-four, and in previous years twenty-five and thirty-one and a half millions. Give the next President time to make reforms, in such manner that the public service shall not suffer, and then it may be reasonable enough to expect retrenchment.

But, sir, the omissions and deficiencies of the Secretary's estimates for 1841 are gross and glaring. He attempts to cover with a general sum, added to his "tables" of estimates, some of these omissions. With this general sum added, however, the whole estimate reaches only to $19,250,000, which is four millions and a half less than the expenditures for the same objects the past year, as we have seen. His "tables" contain nothing for private claims to be allowed by Congress, which may amount to a million; nothing for the Florida war, when two millions may be required; a very inadequate sum for the war steamers and frigates necessary to be completed or put in progress this present year; nothing for navy pensions, when $150,000 was wanted; nothing for public buildings in this city, for which $400,000 is required; nothing to pay large sums due, I suppose uncontestedly, to Maine, and to Georgia, and to some other States; nothing for the survey of the Northeastern boundary line; nothing to pay for the sites of marine hospitals on the Western waters, or for the hospitals themselves; nothing for the President's House,

* A letter from the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, dated December 17, 1840, one month before this debate began, transmitting "estimates of appropriations for the continuance of the Florida war," was finally, on the 21st January, 1841, after having been referred to by Mr. EVANS, a member of the committee, disclosed and laid before the House. It must be observed that, in the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1841, adopted as correct, by the chairman of Ways and Means, in his speech of the 18th of January, not one dollar is asked for, or proposed, for the Florida war. The Secretary of War, in his letter, shows that the appropriations for this service, partly for arrears, to the amount of $2,355,329 75, are indispensable. This is one single item to be added to the Treasury estimates. Here is the sum of this account:

Estimates for the Florida war, 1841, presented by the Secretary of War
For arrearages of pay for militia and volunteers	$250,690 10
For pay of militia and volunteers now in service, for 1841	565,217 78
For Quartermaster's Department—
Arrearages	$200,000
For 1841	1,100,000
	1,300,000 00
For subsistence for 1841	222,421 87 1/2
For Medical Department	16,000 00
For Ordnance Department	30,000 00
	$2,385,329 75 1/2

that the worn out itself now there may be replaced with furniture, as it ought to be, of good substantial American manufacture; and nothing for many other things which may be likely to find their way into the appropriations. I greatly distrust these "ables" of the Secretary, especially under the head of "military." His estimates for 1841 are $8 500,000 under this head; last year they were $9,300,000; and the actual expenditures have been $11,600,000.

But the point of greatest error and fallacy in his estimates is still behind. In a very obscure and involved paragraph of his report, he does refer to the matter to which I now allude. He admits that "a greater proportion of the outstanding appropriations at the end of 1840 may be expended in 1841 than will be left unexpended of the new charges imposed." This requires elucidation; as what does not in this report? Nor does the Secretary give to the fact at which he here aims the force and effect which belong to it. I will explain.

On the first of January in every year, it is found that large sums out of the appropriations of the preceding year, have not yet been drawn from the Treasury. In the first place, large amounts have been earned, and the money is due, but it has not yet been called for; and then other large amounts under these old appropriations have not yet been earned, but they will be in due time, and the money called for. In both cases, and for both amounts, these sums fall on the Treasury mainly in the year following that in which the appropriations are made. This year the amounts thus standing over, under old appropriations, and which will fall as a charge on the Treasury in the year 1841, are estimated by the Departments, as we learn from the Secretary, at $10,411,027. This, as I have said, becomes a charge on the Treasury in 1841, and ought to be so stated, and must be in any accurate account of the burdens which the Treasury may have to sustain within the year. This important item, however, being included in such an account, there should, of course, be deducted from the sum of the new appropriations for the year, so much out of these appropriations as it may be estimated will be found standing over at the close of the year, and which will not, therefore, be a charge on the Treasury within the year. This course I have taken in an estimate for the year which I have made, and which I will soon present to the committee.

The Secretary says: "These two items"—by which, I suppose, he means these balances of appropriations standing over from year to year—"are usually computed to equal each other." I am of opinion that these balances of 1840 and 1841 will be found to be very far from equalling each other.

In the first place, I am not satisfied that the Secretary has got the amount standing over from 1840 high enough. He takes the sums as they are estimated and given him by the Departments, and these are not always to be depended on. In his report of last year, the Secretary himself said these estimates were not high enough then by two millions of dollars. He had quite as much reason to doubt their accuracy now. In looking into the reports from some of these Departments, I find very large sums shown to have been standing over so late as the 1st of October last—in some cases enormously large. For example, in the Indian Department alone, $3,000,000 were standing over, while at the same time there was about $2,225,000 in the hands of disbursing agents yet unexpended. I doubt if there be a cent less than $2,500,000 under this head alone, reserved to fall on the Treasury in the present year. Upwards of $700,000 for taking the sixth census in 1840 remains to be paid in 1841. Other examples might be given.

A very decided effect in throwing over charges from the last year to the present, in a way altogether new, has been produced by postponing the application of appropriations made for certain works and objects, under the authority given to the President in some of the appropriation bills. Whatever may be the President's understanding about the fact, certain it is that several of the principal officers testify positively in their reports to these postponements. This, added to the fact of the very late period at which the principal appropriation bills were passed at the last session, rendered unusually large sums unavailable within the year. Thus Col. Talcott, of the Ordnance Department, says:

"The appropriations for 1840 were made by Congress at so late a period (20th July) that very few of the objects authorized could be effected during the year; moreover, the restrictions of the third section of the appropriation law having been applied to a large portion of the funds of this Department, (viz. $550,452 31), the balances remaining in the Treasury on the 30th of September last were, consequently, very large, and far beyond the usual amounts."

So the Chief Engineer, Colonel Totten says:

"The appropriations of the last Congress applicable to these objects (in his Department) were not made till the middle of July; and, when made, the state of the Treasury attached restrictions, leaving the grants intangible for the rest of the year."

It is evident that these balances of appropriations standing over must always be greater in those years when the bills are passed at the close of a long session of Congress than in those years when the bills are of necessity passed early, as in the short sessions. It must now be evident, also, from the considerations just presented, that the difference in these balances between the year 1840 and the year 1841 must be unusually great. It is but too apparent, moreover, to my mind, and so the fact, I have no doubt, will turn out, that there have been other postponements than those that have taken place under color of law. The first object, and one pursued very assiduously, has been to avoid demands on the Treasury by avoiding and refusing appropriations, even when it was positively known that indebtedness must be incurred, as in the case of the Florida war; and then it has been made a point, by every possible delay, and every possible device, where appropriations have been made, to avoid and postpone expenditures. For all this, the Treasury must groan and sweat in the year 1841.

So much then, Mr. Chairman, for the Secretary's estimates of expenditures in 1841, which are altogether too low; and now for his estimates of revenue and receipts in the same year, which, in my opinion, are altogether too high.

On this latter score—the estimating of receipts—the Secretary has not certainly heretofore been very happy in his "probabilities of a conjecture." I am indebted to a friend who sits near me, [Mr. Everett of Vermont,] for the fact, that, in the whole six years of Mr. Woodbury's administration of the finances, his annual guesses at in-coming revenue, taken altogether, have been just according to the result—wanting only the trifling sum of sixty two millions of dollars.

At the commencement of the last session of Congress, he confidently expected to realize from customs $15,000,000, in 1840; he has got about $12,500,000. This year he expects $19,000,000 from the same source; I do not believe he will get $15,000,000, though in my calculations for the year I allow $16,000,000.

It seems to be supposed by the Secretary, as well certainly as by some others, that business and prosperity will greatly revive after the late depression; and that, therefore, there will be a great increase in the imports. I do not think this follows. Confidence will, no doubt, to some good extent, come in with the new Administration, and business will begin to be more active. But there can be no full prosperity in this wide country, so long as exchanges continue to be deranged, and the currency remains unregulated. Intelligent business men know this, and importers as well as others. That there may be some effort and some active competition, in the early part of this year, to supply the supposed deficiency in the importations of the last year, is to be expected. With this view, no doubt, imports on foreign account may for a while come in pretty actively. But there are causes, I think, to check any great excess of imports.

In the first place, I cannot learn that there really is any scarcity or deficiency of foreign goods. There is no extraordinary demand in any quarter. The country was satisfied with what it got last year, and it will be satisfied this year with about the same amount of foreign articles. The first effect of a very full supply will be to knock down prices. The country has learned some moderation; and that, for a while at least, will stand in the way of excessive importations.

Again. In 1839, there were excessive importations, running up to one hundred and sixty-two millions; and last year it was a favorite notion of the Secretary that "subsequent to a large importation and a fall of prices in articles exported, as in 1839, the amount of imports often declines for one or two years. After 1825 it declined (he says) uninterruptedly for six years." He seems now to have gotten over this notion entirely.

In his report of last year, too, the Secretary remarked on the effect of a restricted circulation, which existed then and exists now, and must continue to exist. And he declared that "hence a diminution in the imports had already commenced, and was confidently expected to continue for some time." The fact of a restricted currency, with the deranged state of the exchanges, must have the effect to limit importations. And this is a state of things which cannot be cured until the Sub-Treasury shall be removed, and the country shall have time to recover from its unhappy effects.

Another important agent in limiting imports is our foreign indebtedness. This was strongly insisted upon a year ago, both by the Secretary and the President. Twelve millions of exports are required annually, say they, to pay interest on loans abroad, and so much at least of the exports can bring in no returns of imports.

The Secretary admits that importations will be somewhat checked the present year from the consideration that a very large amount of duties go off under the compromise act in 1842, commencing in January of that year, which will induce importers to keep back their goods for the benefit of the reduction. Undoubtedly this will have its effect.

Now, it is in the face of all these considerations that the Secretary, to make a good show of means in the Treasury, ventures to anticipate, not merely a moderate increase of imports from last year, which I am willing to concede, but absolutely a most extravagant and excessive state of the import trade. For, observe, Mr. Chairman, in order to get his $19,000,000 of duties, he must compute the imports at about $158,000,000. This is within four millions of the great excess of imports in 1839, which was the year of largest importations the country has ever seen by very far, except one, the year 1836! And this is not all, sir, for while the Secretary would make us believe that we are to be supplied with foreign goods in 1841, amounting in value to $158,000,000, which he does not seem to regard as at all excessive, yet when in another part of his report he comes to talk of the prospects ahead, and to recommend economy, or something else, why then he discovers that, in the very next year, 1842, it would not be safe to expect that the imports would exceed those of 1838. And what were the imports of 1838? Less than $114,000,000! What a happy and instructive consistency!

Mr. Chairman, if the value of imports in 1841 shall come up to about $133,000,000, which is full $28,000,000 more than last year, we shall have $16,000,000 of duties out of them, as I calculate. I do not believe the imports will come up to that; and if we get fourteen or fifteen millions from customs, it is as much as I expect to see, especially after drawbacks and bounties are taken out. But in my estimates I shall take the sum of $16,000,000, that I may not be found below the mark.

I am now prepared, Mr. Chairman to offer you my estimates for the year, only remarking that, instead of beginning, as the Secretary does, with an available balance in the Treasury, I am forced to set down a large balance against it.

Estimate of charges which will fall on the Treasury in the year 1841 for ordinary purposes, but including charges on account of funded debt, and the redemption of Treasury notes.

On the 1st of January, 1841, the aggregate of Treasury notes outstanding was $4,650,000. The whole of this sum will be redeemable in 1841, but it is computed that $500,000 of the amount may not come in within the year, which deduct

be redeemed, add	200,000
	$4,350,000
There was available in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1841, according to the Secretary, though it is now understood that the amount is much less, the sum of $1,590,855, which deduct	1,590,855
Leaving as a charge in the Treasury in 1841, on account of Treasury notes outstanding on the 1st of January, over and above any balance in the Treasury, this sum	$2,759,145
To this sum of $2,759,145 is to be added the balances of appropriations made in 1840, and previously, standing over on the 1st January, 1841, and which will be a charge on the Treasury within the year 1841, amounting to, though I suppose this sum is not enough by $2,002,000	10,411,027
Making together	$13,170,172
Thus we have $13,170,172 chargeable on the Treasury in 1841, before making any new appropriations whatever for that year. And to this is now to be added the amount of new and permanent appropriations to the extent to which they will become a charge on the Treasury within the year
The estimates of the Secretary for new and permanent appropriations and for public debt amount to $19,399,200
To this I add for all errors and omissions, the particulars of which I have before explained, as the least sum	3,000,000
Making the estimates for the year	$22,399,200
But out of this sum is to be deducted so much as may remain, not called for and standing over at the close of 1841, which I compute at	8,000,000
Leaving of new and permanent appropriations for 1841, which will fall as a charge on the Treasury within the year	$14,399,200
Making the sum chargeable on the Treasury in 1841 for the purposes above named	$27,569,372
Estimate of revenue and receipts which will come into the Treasury and be available in the year 1841 under existing laws, and showing the deficit.
From customs	$16,000,000
From lands, probably too high by $500,000 at least	3,500,000
Miscellaneous	80,000
Banks, balance	220,000
Treasury notes, which, under the act of March, 1840, may yet be issued, amount may be	$342,618
But of this amount there will be returned and redeemed within the year at least	100,000
	$242,618
Availables in all for the year	$20,042,618
Charges on the Treasury	27,569,372
Deficit for the year	$7,526,754

Here, then, Mr. Chairman, is my "conjecture" in regard to the state and prospects of the Treasury for the present year. The committee will judge what reliance is to be placed upon it. I have given them the grounds on which I have proceeded in making these calculations. Let them be impeached if they can be. I do not mean to claim for them any sort of infallibility. I have made the best use of the materials I had, and have endeavored to come to honest and just results. I may have fallen into errors; but this I will say, that if the Secretary and his friends are willing to abide by his estimates for the year, I am willing to abide by mine, and we will see whose "conjecture" will turn out to be nearest the truth.

I have now, Mr. Chairman, one impeachment more, and only one, to offer, of the accuracy of the financial statements of the Secretary and the President. "This," says the President, "is the only Government which, having fully and faithfully paid all its creditors, has also relieved itself entirely from debt." The only shadow of exception to this sweeping declaration which I can find, either in the Message or Report, relates to Treasury notes outstanding, and to "an obligation entered into in behalf of the District of Columbia;" and both these items are readily disposed of. As to the four and a half millions of Treasury notes outstanding, they are to be redeemed in 1841, out of "current revenue." The statements I have submitted, as well as the very bill now before us for a new issue of notes, show what chance there is of that. And as to the "obligation in behalf of the District of Columbia," why, that obligation "must soon be discharged"—as if the debt was to be paid by the District of Columbia, and that would relieve this Government from the "obligation." I will only say, sir, that, as I understand this matter, this debt is ours, and not that of the corporate cities of this District. It has been distinctly assumed by this Government, upon a good consideration passing between the parties, and these cities have nothing further to do with it.

But the President thinks himself justified in declaring, on the whole, that this Government has "relieved itself entirely from debt." I am not able to flatter myself so much in regard to this item in our financial condition, as the ominous statements which I hold in my hand, and will now present, may serve to show.

Statement of the public debt, regarded as ascertained and certain, existing on the 1st January, 1841, though the amounts may not be exact.
Treasury notes outstanding	$4,650,000
Interest which will have accrued on them	250,000
Remains of old funded and certificate debt	335,000
Debts of the cities of the District of Columbia, assumed by the Government, without interest	1,500,000
Amounts required to be invested for Indians and Indian tribes, at least	2,580,000
Principal sums payable to Indians, probably	1,000,000
Amount required by law to make good the deficit in the Navy Pension Fund, Annuities to Indians, (supposed to be $600,000,) part payable in perpetuity and part for terms of years; the purchase or value of the whole not less than	5,000,000

Making, of actual debt, it is believed, not less than $16,515,000

To this is to be added probable amounts of indebtedness and liabilities growing out of past transactions, as follows:

For claims growing out of Indian affairs and relations, allowed, and which will be allowed in the Departments or by accounting officers, probably	$2,000,000
For claims growing out of the Florida war, &c. and which must be allowed by Congress, probably	3,000,000
Due from the Government on account of trust funds, other than Indian, probably	500,000
The fourth instalment under the deposit act of

1836 claimed by the States	9,000,000
There are claims of American citizens for French spoliation on our commerce previous to 1800, quite likely to be allowed by Congress, to	5,000,000
	19,500,000

I have only a word or two of remark to offer with this statement. In the account of actual and ascertained debt, I put down $5,000,000 as the value or purchase of the annuities to Indians. When looking at these annuities as a debt, that debt can only be stated in a principal sum. I have not myself made a computation of the value of these annuities—a thing easily done, according to well established rules and principles; but I am informed by others, who have looked more closely into the subject, that their value is much greater than I have supposed. It is probably eight or ten millions. I do not say, of course, that this principal sum is ever to be paid; but there can be no just computation of how much the country owes, without stating this item, and stating it in this way. The same general remark applies to the item of sums required by law to be invested for Indians, if the policy shall hereafter be, as it has hitherto been, to pay an annual interest on these sums, instead of investing them. It is not likely, however, that the positive obligations of treaties are hereafter to be so lightly regarded. The Government will probably pay what it really owes.

In the account of general liabilities, which I have added to the statement of actual and certain debt, I do not mean to be understood that anything there is beyond doubt or cavil. That the "claims" there mentioned exist, and that the amounts are not exaggerated, I confidently believe. Many suppose the amounts to be vastly greater. I believe the Treasury will yet groan under them. The fourth instalment of deposit money is claimed by some of the States at least. So much, at any rate, is true, that a law now exists directing, in the most positive terms, this money to be deposited with the States; and that law has never been repealed, and it has never been executed. Until one or the other thing takes place, I can do no otherwise than count this as a "liability" of the Government. In regard to the last item in this account, I do not here say that the claims on account of French spoliation ought to be allowed—I will give my opinion about that at the proper time, if called upon to do so; but we know that they have many advocates, and my opinion is, that it is quite likely that this will ultimately be acknowledged in Congress as a just debt long due by the Government, and, therefore, to be paid.

Mr. Chairman, I have one statement more to present, and then I shall have done with my notice of the remarkable position that this Government has "relieved itself entirely from debt." My object in this statement is to make as near an approach as I can to the sum of all the burdens and charges which will, or may probably, fall on the Treasury in the four years of the incoming Administration, over and above all ordinary and current expenditures. The items in this statement will be sufficiently understood after the explanations which I have already given.

Estimate of the probable amount of public debt and liabilities growing out of past transactions, for which the Administration of the next four years may have to provide—being over and above all current expenditures, viz.
Treasury Notes outstanding, with interest on them, including such as may be issued before the 4th of March, under the act of 1840	$5,250,000

Making in all	$40,380,000

Mr. Chairman, the views which I have presented of our financial condition will, if recurred to, sufficiently show the ground of the position which I now distinctly take. That position is, that ten millions of dollars ought to be immediately borrowed for the service of the year 1841. I have shown that there will, by my estimates, be a deficit of means to meet the indispensable engagements of the year of at least $7,500,000. It is quite as likely to be more as to be less. But if we had this sum, still, at the end of the year, the Treasury would be swept clean. Nobody will dispute that $2,500,000 is quite as small a sum as it would be at all prudent to depend on for a balance in the Treasury.

Ten millions, then, is the least sum we ought to have. And it is the bounden duty of this Administration to provide for it. In the ordinary course of things, there can be no Legislature convened to act on this subject, after this is dissolved, until next December. This Congress is bound, therefore, to legislate for the whole year.

But this is not all the duty of this Congress. It is conceded that this Government must not rely on borrowing for current support. This would be that creation of a national debt in time of profound peace which the President so much deprecates. But it is demonstrable, and stands confessed, that, whatever may happen in 1841, the Government cannot pay its ordinary expenses in 1842—to say nothing of redeeming Treasury notes or debts—with ordinary and current revenues, nor without new revenues to a large amount from new duties, or in some other way. This is clear enough, from the Secretary's own view of the case. Duties are to fall off in January and July, 1842, to the amount of $5,000,000; and the whole income from customs, he says, will not then exceed ten or eleven millions. Now, if we are to wait till the session of Congress in 1842, before any new provision for revenue shall be adopted, is it not positively certain that we must live in 1842, to a considerable extent, by borrowing? Commerce ought to have, and must have, several months' notice before new duties are made to operate; and the only way in which the revenue from customs can be materially increased in 1842 is to amend the duties acts at the present session. So says Mr. Woodbury, who tells us he has digested a plan for his purpose, which he is ready to offer if Congress will call for it; and so must every body say who knows any thing of the matter. This, then, is another position which I take, and which I wish to express emphatically, namely, that it is the indispensable duty of this Administration, with this Congress, in which it holds the political majority, to amend the laws laying duties on imports so as to give, as soon as possible, and especially for 1842, an increased revenue from customs. This it may do, probably, without touching one really debatable point or principle in relation to the tariff, keeping within the policy of the Compromise Act, and making the wealthy consumers of luxuries contribute a fairer proportion than they now do towards the public burdens.

I have only to repeat, here, that the neglect of the two principal measures now adverted to, by this Administration, must, I suppose, force the next Administration unavoidably into the calling of an extra session of Congress at an early day. If that is the purpose of those who now hold the control here, we shall know it by what they do, or rather neglect to do, on this subject.

Mr. Chairman, if this Administration will do its duty, the next will be relieved from some embarrassment. And yet at best that coming Administration will find enough to do. What its general hue of policy will be I cannot say; I can only say, as an humble individual, what, in some things, at least, I hope it may be.

I hope it will provide for all the just debts of the Government, and meet all just claims and demands upon it in a prompt and manly way. If the amount of outstanding debts shall be found to be large, and such as to press upon the Government, I hope they will be funded, and a proper sinking-fund provided for their gradual payment.

I hope that current expenditure—always within the limits of a just economy—will be met by current revenue, derived chiefly from duties on imports.

I hope that duties on imports will be so imposed—preserving, as I hope may be done, without sacrificing any great national interest, the policy of the compromise act—that while we shall have revenue enough to meet the economical wants of the Government, the rich shall not escape taxation by receiving their luxuries free of duties, the poor shall be relieved from undue and heavy burdens, and the industry of the country shall be protected from the injurious policy and measures of foreign legislation.

I hope to see the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, in proper time, distributed among the States. Nothing should postpone this measure of justice short of war, or the pressure of a heavy debt.

I hope to see the necessary military and naval defences of the country put on a proper footing, that we may not be called to mourn over some sudden disaster or dishonor.

I hope to see a vigorous but economical prosecution of our works for improving harbors and rivers. It is a commercial matter of the highest importance, and, through commerce, they ought to be prosecuted and paid for.

Finally, I hope that that cumbrous and dangerous political machine—the Sub-Treasury—will be promptly dispensed with; and I hope to see the Government return, without delay, to all its constitutional duties touching money and currency; taking the public money out of the hands of the President, and putting it under custody of the law; providing for its safe keeping and ready disbursement without expense to Government; and, by a due exercise of the authority of Congress, providing for the whole country a sound and uniform national currency, and effecting thereby a due regulation of the exchanges; and if all this high duty cannot be exercised without it, then I hope to see a National Bank promptly established for the purpose.

Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Jones] at the close of his speech, was pleased to allude, in no unkind terms, to the incoming Administration. Sir, it deserves to be contemplated with kind feelings on all sides. Great and most arduous duties will devolve upon it. In some things, it will have to take an entire new departure, with difficulties to encounter scarcely less than those which embarrassed the men of '89, who undertook to set the Government originally in motion under the Constitution. Then, indeed, there was much to be done; now there is much to be done, and much first to be undone. This will be found to be true, I apprehend, in an especial manner, in the department of finance. Every thing there is in confusion and derangement. The redoubtable Secretary, under instructions, has been fighting a long and obstinately contested battle with the people; at last he is conquered; and no wonder that his decks should now be found strewn thick with unsightly fragments, and accumulated ruin. There is danger even that the battered and riddled craft in which he has sailed may go down in the open and calm sea, though within sight of the harbor, before relief can reach him; and if she lives through, as I hope she may, and holds together long enough to be hauled up for repairs, I think it will be found that there is really nothing left of her above her keel that will ever do to build upon.

Sir, the honorable gentleman from Virginia seems to expect much—I hope in all sincerity—from the new Administration. My trust and confidence is, that he will not be disappointed. I trust he will find, as we all shall, that that Administration will move forward to its work with becoming boldness, and an unshaken firmness; shrinking from no duty, and from no responsibility; that it will take its measures calmly and wisely for the good of the country, and the whole country, and with no view whatever, at any time, to catch the breath of an ephemeral popularity; that it will do nothing for the mere sake of popularity, and omit nothing which it ought to do, from any craven and cowardly apprehension that it may not be popular; that it will have the moral courage to do right—always right—trusting to an intelligent and generous people to approve the right, and utterly regardless of the clamors of demagogues, or those whom demagogues delude and lead. Thus acting, I know that still that Administration may be overborne and trodden down by a reckless and unprincipled Opposition, gathered and organized hereafter in the land; but, at least, it will have deserved success, and it will command the approbation and support of all whose approbation and support is worth striving for, or worth having. Sir, we know that we live in a glorious country; we think we have the happiest form of Government on earth; let that Government be, once again, in God's name, wisely and happily administered. This will save us, and nothing else can; this will save our institutions, and give a new guaranty to freedom under Republican forms, for the present and all future time, and nothing else can or will. And for so much virtue, and so much reform, I am happy, for one, to be able to give to the new Administration full credit and confidence beforehand; and this I will say, in conclusion, to the friends of that Administration, and to all, that so much virtue and so much reform the country expects at its hands; so much the country will hold that Administration accountable for, and it will not brook disappointment.

Mr. BARNARD closed his remarks by moving to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, giving notice that, if the motion prevailed, and a report to that effect should be made to the House, he would then offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the subject of making provision for the wants of the Treasury be referred back to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions:

First, To bring in a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow ten millions of dollars on the credit of the Government, and to issue bonds or scrip therefor.

Second, To bring in a bill imposing duties for additional revenue on wines, silks, linens, spices, and other articles, being luxuries, imported into the United States; but in such manner as not to conflict with the principles, policy, and spirit of the act of March, 1833, commonly called "the Compromise Act."

SPEECH OF MR. EVANS, OF MAINE,

In the House of Representatives, January 18, 1841.—

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the bill making provision for the issue of five millions of Treasury notes—

Mr. EVANS said he felt himself called upon, as a member of the committee from which the bill under consideration emanated, to submit a few observations upon the state of the Treasury, present and prospective, as well as upon some of the topics connected with the revenues and expenditures of the Government, which had been discussed and recommended to our consideration in the annual report of the Secretary, and having intimate relation with the measure now proposed. The whole subject, in all its bearings, is one of very grave importance, and to which the attention of Congress cannot too early on too earnestly be directed. The bill we are now considering authorizes the issue of Treasury notes, not exceeding the amount of five millions of dollars. It is urged upon the ground of a present and pressing necessity. Greater means than the Department is now possessed of are absolutely indispensable to meet the current expenses of the Government, and to discharge obligations devolving upon it daily. We are assured, both by the Secretary and the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means, if the amount now proposed to be granted is not promptly furnished, there is great danger that the public credit will be dishonored, and the public faith violated. However this humiliating condition of our fiscal affairs may have been occasioned, the line of our duty, it seems to me, is plain and obvious. It is, to furnish the necessary supplies, and to furnish them seasonably. The motion immediately pending is that just made by the honorable member from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] to strike out the enacting clause of the bill; in other words, to defeat it altogether, with a view to obtain the required means—first, by loan, and ultimately by an increase of revenue, to be derived from an assessment of duties upon certain articles now admitted free. I regret that, under present circumstances, I cannot concur with the honorable member in the expediency of this proposition; not, however, because I do not deem it, generally, the most eligible mode of supplying deficiencies—undoubtedly it is so; but merely because it does not seem to me to meet the present exigency. I am far from approving this constant recurrence to the use of Treasury notes. For many reasons, unquestionably, a loan is preferable; and revenue sufficient for all the purposes of Government, derived from the ordinary sources of revenue by just legislation, is better than either. But we have no alternative offered to us. The pressure upon the Treasury is actually existing, and has been for months; and I fear that means cannot be obtained in the mode indicated by the honorable member from New York, early enough to guard the Treasury from the insolvency hanging over it.

[Mr. BARNARD said he thought his proposition was not correctly understood. He proposed to borrow money for present necessities, either upon the issue of scrip, or upon bond; and he was confident the credit of the United States was such, that almost any amount could be immediately obtained upon bond.]

Mr. EVANS. Undoubtedly, so far as public credit is concerned, there will be no difficulty in obtaining by loan whatever may be wanted. But can it be obtained seasonably? How are public loans contracted? If upon bond, as suggested, it strikes me, that varies very little from Treasury notes. The ordinary mode is, to issue proposals, and in this way to invite competition, and thus to obtain more favorable terms. For this purpose, time is necessary. It cannot be done in an hour or a day. Is it designed to vest the Secretary of the Treasury with power to issue bonds, which he may negotiate in the market upon such terms as he may see fit, or as the pressure of circumstances may compel him to accede to? I trust not. I cannot but think, therefore, that the mode proposed in the bill under consideration is the most prompt and certain, and, therefore, in the present exigency, preferable. It can be rendered effectual, instantly. The relief is, what the crisis requires—immediate. Besides, we must take this or nothing. This is the favorite financial expedient of those now in power, and of the majority of Congress. What hope is there that they will abandon it? In this matter we have no alternative. We are driven to this extremity either to grant the relief in the only mode the Administration desire it, or to permit the public faith to be broken, and the national credit dishonored. For myself, sir, I prefer to grant the relief, notwithstanding the objectionable form in which it is proposed; and I am the more reconciled to it, from the consideration that it is the last time

—unless, indeed, the Secretary finds it necessary to call for another issue before the close of the session, to carry him safely through the residue of his remaining quarter, which is not very improbable—the last time we shall be forced into such a position. Hereafter, I trust, Congress will be allowed some little freedom of action, and be permitted to exercise some discretion of its own, as to the best mode of guarding against deficiencies in the revenue, and of supplying them when they occur—a freedom and discretion which has not been vouchsafed to Congress for many years. What has been our experience during the whole of this period of perpetually recurring deficiencies? Has Congress been advised seasonably of the critical condition to which the Treasury has been so frequently reduced? Never. The Executive communications, at the commencement of the sessions, have almost invariably represented our fiscal affairs as prosperous and successful. Whatever of apprehension has been expressed, has always been in such vague and indefinite terms; so obscurely shadowed forth, as to attract little notice, and excite no action on the part of Congress. Deficiencies have never been acknowledged or anticipated in the official documents. The Treasury has experienced no difficulties but such as grow out of “fluctuations,” temporary in their character, and inconsiderable in amount. Such is the general character of Executive communications at the commencement of the sessions of Congress. But soon the scene is changed. The Treasury is in distress. The public credit is in danger. Immediate relief only can save it from insolvency. And how are these calls made? To whom is this information communicated? To the House—to Congress? No; but privately—in letters to the committees who have charge of all matters pertaining to the finances of the nation. Then follows the bill precisely as the Executive recommends; and it must be hurried through just in the shape it is reported, because there is not time to devise any more effectual mode of relief. This has been our experience in past years. We are always upon the brink of the precipice before we are admonished of the danger. Congress has been kept in ignorance of the true condition of the finances, always assured of the great success which has attended the various experiments which have been tried, and lured on by assurances of brightening prospects. It is so now. The Secretary perseveres to the last. The country, he tells us, is prosperous; the finances prosperous; the prospects most cheering; the revenues of the year will exceed the expenditures five millions of dollars; all the outstanding claims upon the Treasury can be met; all the notes heretofore issued redeemed; the public credit preserved; the operations of Government successfully conducted, with a balance of near a million of dollars in the Treasury at the end of the year! This is the exhibition which goes to the public. This is the document which we publish and spread over the country by thousands and tens of thousands; and to which the people look for information as to the true condition of their affairs. The date of this official exposition is the 7th of December last; but it does not contain the information on which the present bill is founded. That was transmitted to the committee on the 21st of December, only fourteen days afterwards. Now, sir, I do not doubt the pressure; but why was it not foreseen on the 7th of December? Why was it not communicated to us in the annual report of the Secretary? What occurred between the 7th and the 21st of December, which could not have been, and ought not to have been, anticipated, to render this issue of notes necessary? The Secretary has himself informed us. In the first place, an appropriation bill of about four hundred thousand dollars had passed, most of which would probably be soon called for. Might he not have expected this? Did he not know that such a bill would pass early in the session? It has been the constant practice for many years past. The corresponding bill last year appropriated $650,000; and if this has, in any degree, rendered a resort to Treasury notes necessary, the Secretary should have foreseen it, and recommended it in his annual report. Then, he says, the appropriation of $150,000 for the payment of navy pensions is a charge new in its character, and not anticipated. Granting this to be so, it is of comparatively small amount; by no means large enough to justify a call for additional means to the extent now desired. Then, again, the duties to be refunded on refined sugar exported, about $75,000; this, also, ought to have been anticipated. Drawbacks of this description are payable and paid every year, and constitute a part of the ordinary expenditures of the year; and, although I do not say that the Secretary ought to have foreseen this particular instance, yet, with the experience of the past before him, he ought to have taken into his estimates the probable liabilities of the Treasury for claims of this character. But, at all events, this is quite small; not sufficient, one would suppose, to embarrass a flourishing and well-administered Treasury so seriously as it seems to have done. Besides these, are “some recent decisions of the courts that appear to require the refunding of more duties from the Treasury to a considerable amount.” What the Secretary means by “a considerable amount,” I will not undertake to define. I apprehend it is not very large, or the amount would have been stated. By the letters communicated with the Secretary’s application, it appears that the decisions referred to relate to “soda-ash,” “gunny-cloth,” and “worsted-plush,” all of which, it seems, are entitled to be imported free of duty. What amount of revenue has been hitherto derived from these sources, I have no means of knowing; but I imagine it is very inconsiderable. These, then, are the charges thrown upon the Treasury between the 7th and the 21st of December, amounting only to about $650,000, the most of which ought to have been anticipated and provided for, relied upon to justify the call for the issue of five millions of resources to the Treasury. Now, sir, can that be a successful or prosperous administration of so vast a machine as the Treasury of this nation, which can be thrown into disorder and derangement by so comparatively insignificant a call upon it, even if wholly unexpected, as a little over half a million of dollars—not a fiftieth part of the expenditures of the year, and requiring means to obviate ten times greater than the assigned causes themselves? No, sir, these are but pretexts. They are seized upon because they happen to have occurred subsequent to the date of the annual report, and are all which have occurred since. Why were not the real causes of the embarrassments of the Treasury communicated in that report? and why was not Congress requested to provide for the deficiency? For the reason already given. That is a document for the people, for general circulation, prepared accordingly, with a just admixture of self-congratulation and a glowing account of the success of the Treasury, notwithstanding many embarrassments and trials. Surely that was not a place to expose deficiencies. Such an exposition would not have been in good keeping with the valedictory panegyric which the Secretary seems to think the occasion required.

Now, sir, although, as I have already remarked, there is unquestionably a very great pressure upon the Treasury at this moment, requiring prompt relief, I am constrained to say that the exhibitions of the Secretary upon this subject are far from being satisfactory. The explanations which he offers do not show such a pressing exigency as is represented to exist, and as undoubtedly does exist. How does it appear by his own showing? He has made no communication directly to the House, nor even to the committee; but the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has a private communication, which he has used, showing the embarrassments of the Department. It is not an official document, the accuracy of which we have any mode of testing now or hereafter. But what is it? First, as to the means of the Treasury during the first quarter of the year. The Secretary represents them to be as follows:

Receipts from customs, deducting drawbacks	$3,000,000
Receipts from lands	450,000
Miscellaneous sources, and banks, &c.	50,000

$3,500,000

To this is to be added the balance on hand at the commencement of the year - 1,596,855

 And the power to issue Treasury notes under the act of March 31, 1840 - 342,618

Forming an aggregate of available means for the first quarter of this year, by the Secretary's own computation, of - $5,433,473

The Secretary has undoubtedly estimated the receipts of the quarter quite as low as they will be found to be. The customs he estimates after deducting all drawbacks, whether including fishing bounties or not, I cannot say, although it seems they are generally retained out of the accruing revenue. The receipts from lands he puts at about half only of the average receipts of the year, as estimated by himself, and of the average of the actual receipts of the last year. Why the receipts of this quarter should be expected to fall so far below the ordinary average receipts of the two years together is nowhere explained. I think it would be quite safe to add about $400,000 to the estimated receipts from this source. But let the estimate stand as it has been given us, at $5,433,473. What are the estimated expenditures of the quarter? They are stated as follows:

For ordinary expenses, pensions, session of Congress, &c. - $4,500,000
 For debt of the District of Columbia - 80,000
 For fishing bounties - 300,000
 For expenses of the census - 550,000

Forming an aggregate of - $5,430,000 which, it must be admitted, presses very hard upon the means of the quarter. But it seems to me, that, on this side of the account, the Secretary has been somewhat too liberal in his estimates. He has given us no items which go to make up the aggregate of four millions and a half for ordinary expenditures. Does it embrace the drawbacks which he has spoken of repeatedly as a charge upon the first quarter of the year, and which are already provided for, by deducting them from the amount of incoming revenue?

The fishing bounties are included in the aggregate of expenditures for the quarter, although I should infer from the practice which the Secretary says prevails, that they are also usually retained out of the accruing revenue, and, if so, are provided for in the same way. Besides, the Secretary in his annual report, to which he refers, embraces among the charges falling upon the first quarter of the year, the expenses incurred by the session of Congress, and "private bills." What amount is likely to fall upon the Treasury from "private bills," it is not easy to foretell. From present appearances, nothing whatever; and the Secretary, though he wishes his own quarter to be amply provided to meet "private bills," does not estimate a single dollar as likely to fall upon the whole year from that quarter. But private bills do not necessarily fall upon the first quarter. Many of them, and, indeed, all where any great amount is involved, require the accounts upon which they are founded to be audited, often taking months, and sometimes years, to finish. The whole charge last year for private claims was about fourteen thousand dollars, and I see no disposition to increase it greatly the present. Now, sir, making some allowances, which seem to me called for, on both sides of the account, although it would still present a case requiring some relief, yet it does not exhibit a condition of so much peril, and exciting so much alarm, as the Secretary evidently perceives and feels. He says, on the 7th of January, "I do not see how it is possible to preserve the public faith," &c.; "any further delay will place the Department in daily jeopardy," &c.; and he entreats "the speediest action possible." I doubt not he has just grounds for entertaining these apprehensions. I have no question the demands upon the Treasury are very heavy. Calls for payment are undoubtedly made for services rendered last year, and not then paid for, both from a want of means and from a desire to keep down the apparent expenditures of that year. The Administration boasts of its economy and of reduction of expenses; and it is very desirable, no doubt, that the exhibits of the Department should furnish some grounds upon which it may be maintained. No question there are large calls for postponed appropriations, where the work has been already performed and the materials furnished, and which ought to have been paid for and charged to the expenditures of 1840. Large arrearages are falling due, and creditors who have been kept off are becoming importunate. All this I can well understand; and I am desirous of affording the Secretary sufficient means to preserve the public faith, and to pay the public debts. In my judgment the amount proposed by this bill is far short of what will be required for these purposes during the current year. If gentlemen are disposed to supply adequate means for the whole year, I trust they will enlarge the amount proposed to be issued, or provide in some other mode for a deficiency which must happen. I am aware that the Secretary of the Treasury and the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means, adopting his views and repeating his estimates, entertain a different opinion. They tell us, as they told us last year: The revenues of the whole year will be equal to all the expenditures of it; this is only an anticipation of the resources of the latter part of it, when the receipts will be greatest; for the service of the former part of it, when the disbursements are heaviest. There is no deficiency of means. We desire only a safeguard against fluctuations. All this we have heard before. It is the old argument; and one would suppose that the honorable gentlemen who use it would be little distrustful of their own judgment, when they recollect how widely they have been mistaken before in their predictions upon this subject. Last year, the honorable chairman, supported by two other of my honorable associates on the committee, [Messrs. ATHONTON and VANDERPOEL] gave us the strongest assurances that the issue then contemplated could all be easily redeemed within that year. Well, sir, they are nearly all outstanding still; and, so far from being able to redeem them, we are called upon for a fresh supply, to be redeemed within this year—certainly to be redeemed out of the abundant incoming revenues. I ventured to differ with the Secretary and the honorable members to whom I have referred, at that time, and endeavored to demonstrate not only that the revenues of the year would be inadequate to meet the expenditures of it, but to predict that, before the close of that session, another call would be made for about five millions more. Accordingly, in July, another call was made for four millions and a half. The event happened precisely as was anticipated. Congress, however, thought it had gone far enough, and did not accede to the Secretary's request; but, in lieu of it, resorted to the expedient of postponing a portion of the appropriations to the present year. This expedient, together with the payment by the late Bank of the United States of its last bond, amounting to two millions and half, enabled the Treasury to weather the storms which threatened it, without, however, the redemption of the notes issued under the act of 31st March last, which had been so confidently promised, amounting, at the close of the year, to near five millions. And, what is further to be remarked, also, if the Secretary's estimates of the receipts of last year had been verified by the results; if there had been no falling off in the customs and sales of lands, he could not then have redeemed the outstanding notes. In his annual report to the last session, he estimated the receipts of the year 1840, from customs, lands, and miscellaneous, at $19,600,000. It now appears that they amounted to $17,197,763, falling short of his estimates over $2,400,000. Now, if this last sum had been received, and his expectations thus fulfilled, it is evident he could not have redeemed the outstanding notes, even with the aid of all the unexpended sums in the Treasury at the close of the year. The deficiency would still have been over two millions. With this recent experience fresh before us, what degree of confidence can we be expected to repose in the assurances now given of the ability of the Treasury to redeem the proposed issue within the current year? I regard it as utterly out of the question, not merely to redeem these, but impossible, without other means, to redeem the five millions now outstanding, which will fall due at no distant day; and this I will proceed to demonstrate. At the last session I endeavored to show, and believe did conclusively show, that the expenditures of the Government for the three preceding years had exceeded its accruing revenue, upon an average, about eight millions annually; and just at the close of the session I attempted to demonstrate that the expenditures of last year would exceed the income by nearly the same amount. What has been the result?

The receipts into the Treasury from the accruing revenues, lands, miscellaneous, and all the ordinary sources, (estimating for the fourth quarter,) were - $17,197,763
 And the expenditures, for ordinary current expenses were - 22,489,349

Showing a deficit of - $5,291,586
 The estimates of the fourth quarter, embraced in the general aggregate of expenditures, are five millions; but the Secretary says that the other Departments place the amount higher. The probability is, that the "others" will come nearer the mark, and that the deficit will thus be increased. Now, sir, as well as I can judge, about a million and a half of appropriations of last year, and which would ordinarily have been expended then, have been postponed to this. If the operations of the Government, therefore, had been conducted in the usual mode, the deficit would have fallen little, if any, short of seven millions of dollars. It was supplied in this way:

The effectual balance on hand January 1, 1840, was $3,246,749. In the annual report of the Secretary, December 3, 1839, he estimated the balance which would be on hand 31st December at $1,556,384; but it now appears to have been about $690,000 more. Why he should have been so far mistaken so near the close of the year is not explained, and perhaps is of no consequence:
 To the actual balance on hand - $3,246,749
 Add receipts from Bank of the United States and other deposit banks - 3,300,000
 Excess of Treasury notes issued over those redeemed - 1,675,488

Amounting to - $7,222,237
 Deduct balance on hand now - 1,590,855

$5,631,382
 By this computation, which probably is the best mode of stating the account of the year, it appears that, for the ordinary current expenses of 1840, exclusive of the redemption of Treasury notes, over five millions and a half, besides all the accruing revenues of the year, were requisite; and this after the postponement of so large an amount of appropriations as has been already stated. In any view of the subject, the result is the same. With these incontrovertible facts before us, what reason is there to expect that the receipts of this year will not only be adequate to meet all the expenditures of it, but will so far exceed them as to enable the Department to pay near five millions of outstanding notes? Yet the Secretary expects that, while in each of the last four years the receipts have fallen short of the expenses six, seven, and eight millions, the tables are now to be turned. The receipts are to take the lead, and to advance beyond the expenditures, nearly as much as for four successive years they have fallen behind. This will certainly be a very great change in our financial affairs, and a very desirable one. Let us see, however, whether it be practicable, and how it can be effected. In the first place, as regards the expenditures of 1841:

The Secretary estimates them, "for ordinary purposes," at - $19,250,000
 We have already seen that they amounted last year to - 22,489,349

Showing a proposed reduction of - $3,239,349
 The first question arising here is, upon what class or classes of expenditures is this great reduction to fall? Where are the items which make up this sum to all? If it required near twenty-two millions and a half last year, and over twenty-four millions and a half for the preceding year, to carry on the ordinary operations of Government, what ground is there for supposing that the same services can be performed this year for nineteen millions and a quarter? I am not now looking at all at the appropriations made or proposed for the last or the present year, but at the amount actually expended. I am aware the appropriations which have been requested are made to correspond to those estimates of expenditure. But I wish to know what lavish expenditures were made in 1840, which may be dispensed with in 1841? What extravagance is to be reformed? We all know that, owing to the embarrassed state of the Treasury last year, both the appropriations and the expenditures were kept down to the lowest possible amount. Where can there be any greater reduction for the present year? The Secretary answers in these words:

"It is believed that the ordinary expenses of 1841 ought to fall some millions below those of 1840, as the pensions have diminished by deaths; fewer Indians remain to be removed; several expensive public buildings have been mostly finished; and hostilities with the Seminoles must be nearer to a close."

These are the heads of expenditure in which the reduction of over three millions and a quarter is proposed to be made; and I will examine them in the order they are named.

1st. As to the pensions. The Secretary has referred several times in his reports, to the great relief which the Treasury is to experience from the deaths of the old soldiers of the Revolution, and their aged and impoverished widows. He seems almost impatient, because they are so long a charge upon the country. But let that pass. How much does he expect to save from this source? By the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, and of the Secretary of War also, it appears that "the total amount drawn from the Treasury during the past year, to pay pensions, is $2,048,663," in round numbers, two millions. It appears, further, from the statement of the Commissioner, that the pensioners, exclusive of naval, are divided into six classes, viz: invalid, under act of 1818; under act of 1828; under act of 1832; under act of 1836; under act of 1838. Under the first class there are 4,289 pensioners, and the deaths last year were 48—not quite one per cent. Under the second class there are 7,947 pensioners, and the deaths last year were 256—a little over three per cent. Under the third class there are 605, and the deaths were 17—about three per cent. Under the fourth class the number is 23,207, and the deaths were 974—something over four per cent. Under the fifth class there are 2,760, and the deaths were 139—which is five per cent. Under the sixth class the number is 5,586, and the deaths were 171—a little over three per cent.

Now, sir, making some allowance for deaths, the knowledge of which had not come to the Department, as the Commissioner suggests is the case, and something for the advancing age of the remaining pensioners, from which it is probable that the per centage of deaths will increase from year to year, I suppose that the number of deaths in 1841 will be ten per cent. of the whole number in all the classes; and this is a larger proportion, I think, than has ever taken place in any two years together since the pension laws have been in operation: the saving upon that basis will be just $200,480, and no more. But, on the other hand, the Commissioner supposes that there will be 1,400 added to the sixth class during the present year, whose applications have already been made, and are under examination; and, if so, they will be entitled to the whole five years' pension, payable at once, which will undoubtedly require from three to four hundred thousand dollars.

The appropriation bill already reported for the payment of pensioners, exclusive of the fourth class, which is provided for by the act of 1832, amounts, agreeably to the estimates, to

The standing appropriation under the act of 1832, as estimated by the Secretary for this year, is

The unexpended balance of former appropriations, now on hand, applicable to the service of this year, is Making, for the payment of pensions for 1841

This exceeds the amount actually drawn from the Treasury for last year, $154,892. The amount thus estimated, and to be appropriated for the year, is either wanted or it is not. If it is wanted, it exceeds the amount drawn from the Treasury in 1840, as before stated, and there will be no reduction, but rather an increase from this source. If it is not wanted, why is it embraced in the estimates, and why are bills reported to appropriate it? It is not understood, I presume, that the whole amount paid for pensions last year was but $2,048,663. This was the sum "drawn from the Treasury," and formed part of the current expenses of 1840. The amount actually paid was probably somewhat larger, perhaps 200,000 to 300,000 dollars. The balance was made up of money drawn in 1839, and forming a part of the expenditures of that year, but remaining in the hands of the various pension agents unexpended. Something undoubtedly remains in their hands now, which is to be added to the sums before stated, as applicable to the service of 1841, but which will form no charge upon the Treasury of this year, as it is already withdrawn from it.

The second reason assigned by the Secretary, for the expected reduction in 1841, is, that "fewer Indians remain to be removed." Now, what were the expenditures for removals last year? The Commissioner of Indian Affairs reports: That, during the preceding year, 5,671 were removed; 4,500 of them being of the Winnebagoes, for which an appropriation of $45,000 was made last year, and which was probably sufficient. If the remaining 1,171 were removed at the same rate, the whole cost of removals last year was but $56,710. It also appears by the same report, that 21,774 still remain to be removed; and although there are "fewer" than there were a year ago, yet there is full enough remaining to allow as many to be removed in 1841 as were removed in 1840. How does it appear that such will not be the case? But grant that the whole amount will be saved, and it will add but $56,710 to the reduction estimated on pensions.

The next reason is, "several expensive public buildings have been mostly finished."

Last year we appropriated for finishing the custom-house in New York, which will be saved this year

For the Treasury building	$105,000
For the Patent Office	100,000
For the Post Office	125,000
Amounting to		330,000
This year the Commissioner estimates—
For the Treasury	40,000
For the Patent Office	30,000
For the Post Office	175,000	245,000

Less than last year . . . $85,000
Which added to the $118,000 for the New York custom-house, amounts to $203,000, as the total of reduction on public buildings; unless Congress see fit to reduce the appropriation below the estimates of the Commissioner.

The last reason relied upon by the Secretary is "hostilities with the Seminoles must be nearer to a close." Well, I suppose "they must be," if they ever come to "a close," which is somewhat doubtful. But how does that bear upon the expenditures of this year? Is the war to cease now? Are no expenses to be incurred for its prosecution this season? Now, sir, although this Florida war has been the great vortex in which so many millions of money have been engulfed, yet the expenditures of last year on account of it were exceedingly small—only $300,000 were appropriated for that object. This was the only appropriation made last session for this service, and if the whole of it can be saved in the expenditures of this year, it contributes but a small proportion of the whole amount expected to be reduced. We are dealing with millions. More than three millions and a quarter is the amount of reduction proposed; and all the items with which we have been furnished amount to but a few hundred thousands, viz:

On pensions	$200,480
For removal of Indians	56,710
On public buildings	203,000
Seminole hostilities	300,000

Assuming this statement to be correct, which it is not, and that this whole reduction could be made, it is nearly counterbalanced by one single item of a new charge upon the year 1841, for which no corresponding expenditure was made in 1840. I mean the payments for the census—a service rendered in 1840, and for which appropriations were made that year, but have not been expended—not drawn from the Treasury. The charge thus imposed upon 1841 will be about $720,000; of which $550,000 are wanted for the first quarter; the balance will fall upon the residue of the year. This single item, new in its character, and chargeable solely upon this year, very nearly meets all the reductions which can be made from the sources indicated by the Secretary.

But this is not all. There are other and heavier expenses to fall upon the Treasury in 1841, of which the Secretary takes no notice, although it is scarcely possible he was not advised of them. The honorable chairman of the Ways and Means is equally silent upon the subject, though well known to him also. So far from their being any reduction this year, because "hostilities with the Seminoles must be nearer to a close," there is now a proposition before the Committee of Ways and Means for an appropriation of near two millions, and a half of dollars, submitted by the Secretary of War on the 17th December last, ten days only after the estimates for the year were prepared. The necessity for this is represented as very urgent. About half a million of it is wanted to pay for arrearages of 1840, for services already rendered, and which ought to have been a charge on that year, and not on 1841. Why was it not embraced within the estimates for this year? Was it not known to the Secretary on the 7th December, the date of his annual report? Was it kept back by the Secretary of War, and why so? His report is dated December 5. Now, sir, on the 13th November preceding, the Paymaster General, in obedience to the directions of the Secretary of War, submitted to him an estimate, amounting to $250,000, for the payment of militia mustered into service in 1840. On the 17th December, the Secretary of War speaks of it in these words:

"This pay is now due; and, as the troops stand much in need of it, justice to them requires that it should be paid to them at the earliest possible day."

Again, General Jesup, on the 14th November, submitted to the Secretary of War, by his directions, "an estimate of the amount which will probably be required for the service of this department in prosecuting the war in Florida." This estimate, including two hundred thousand dollars for arrears of 1840, expenses already incurred, but not paid, amounts to $1,300,000; of which he requested that $400,000 might be appropriated "as early in the session as possible," being wanted for immediate use. On the 23rd November, General Jesup, in another report to the Secretary of War, says that the failure of the Arkansas delegation to effect a satisfactory arrangement with the Seminoles induces "the belief that a greater amount will probably be required than that for which I presented an estimate on the 14th instant." Again, I inquire, why were not these sums, thus approved by the Secretary of War, and made known to him by the middle of November, and urgently requested on the 17th December—why were they not embraced within the estimates submitted on 7th December? For the reason before suggested. That is a document widely circulated—the official exposition of the financial condition of the country—of its income and its disbursements—a document which warns us not to exceed the estimates, and attempts to show that great reductions can be effected in the expenditures of this year. If these sums had been included in the estimates, all these boasted reductions would have been scattered to the winds. The fallacy would have been obvious. But there are charges upon the year, which I see no way of avoiding. The expense has been incurred and is now going on under Executive authority alone. It requires no sanction from Congress, and we have no alternative but to supply the means of defraying it. I have already said that near half a million is required to defray the arrearages of 1840. The balance is required for pay, subsistence, ordnance, and the Quartermaster General's Department, of casioned principally, if not wholly, by retaining in service about 2,000 men called militia and volunteers. They are already in the service, by Executive direction, and the Secretary proposes to retain them during the year, or until the war be closed. The estimate is in this form:

For arrearages to militia, service of 1840	$221,244 02
For pay of Georgia volunteers, three months, 1840	29,446 08
For the Quartermaster General, as before stated	1,300,000 00
For pay of 1,500 mounted and 500 foot volunteers for the year 1841, estimated by Paymaster General,	489,010 96
For pay of one battalion foot volunteers	77,206 82
For subsistence for militia and volunteers and inhabitants, estimated by the Commissary General of Subsistence	222,421 87
For Medical Department, by Surgeon General	16,000 00
For Ordnance Department, by Colonel of Ordnance	30,000 00
	$2,385,329 75

To show that these expenses are already partially incurred, and are now going on, daily, and weekly—and monthly, I will read from the report of the War Department:

In order to render the regular forces available for offensive operations, a brigade of Florida militia was raised for the defence of Middle Florida, and placed under the command of Brigadier General Leigh Read of the Territorial militia."

"The troops that were in the service of the Territory in virtue of a law of the Legislature of Florida, were mustered into that of the United States, and form part of General Read's brigade, which has been increased to 1,200 mounted, and 500 foot men, and may be raised to 1,500 mounted, and 500 foot; a force which is considered ample for the protection of that portion of the Territory assigned to Gen. Read's command."

"The regular troops now in Florida amount to about 4,500 men, and the militia in service to about 2,000. I recommend that authority be given the Executive to engage the services of this description of troops for a twelvemonth, or during the continuance of hostilities in Florida. The term of three months is much too short to insure efficiency, and frequent enlistments are a fruitful source of insubordination as well as of great additional expense."

General Jesup also says, under date of November 23th:

"There are outstanding claims to a considerable amount, arising out of the volunteer and militia service, which have been recognised by the Executive, and for the payment of which funds are required. Means are also necessary to carry on the service during the remainder of the year, (1840,) as well as to provide for the approaching campaign. The urgency of an immediate appropriation is therefore obvious."

Now, sir, from these extracts, it is obvious that the militia and volunteers are already in the service, and that it is intended to keep them in the service. They are called out by the Executive for a period of three months; and, when that expires, they are discharged, and immediately called out for another term of three months; and so on, amounting to constant service. This, probably, the Executive has the power to do, under existing laws; and this, it is manifest, he intends to do, and the estimates are framed accordingly. The authority which the Secretary requests is, not to call out an additional force of 2,000 men, over and above what are now in the service, for a twelvemonth, but to extend the term for which he is now authorized to call them out, from three to twelve months. If it be granted, very well; the expenses are not increased by it, because, if it be not granted, he will exercise the power he now possesses, and take them into service from three months to three months, as long as, in his judgment, it is necessary. In either mode the service is rendered, and Congress must supply the means of payment. It is, therefore, apparent that the appropriation requested, of near two and a half millions, is not at all dependent upon whether Congress grants or withholds the authority to call the militia and volunteers into service for a term of twelve months. This expense is going on, and will go on, unless the Executive, after 4th March, order this description of force to be disbanded. It will not be done before; and, if done then, the expenditures will probably amount to at least a million of dollars, which will fall on 1841, but embraced within the estimates of the year. To give a little further insight into this expenditure, and the mode in which operations in Florida are conducted, I will read a letter from an officer of the United States Army, of high rank, now on duty there, not known to me personally, but who, I am assured by an honorable member of the House, to whom it is addressed, is a gentleman of high reputation, and of the strictest honor and veracity. I am not at liberty to give his name; the reasons for which every gentleman can readily appreciate. I will read only the portion of it bearing on this subject. It is dated

"St. Augustine, December 31, 1840.

"Before it was known, last summer, whether the bill authorizing the President of the United States to accept the services of not exceeding 2,500 volunteers would or would not pass in Congress, a force of 500 mounted and 500 foot militia were authorized by the Secretary of War to be received into the service of the United States in Florida. The mounted force was afterwards doubled; and again in September increased to 1,200, all to be called Florida militia, and to be mustered for a term of three months. The mounted force was all mustered in, and, when the first term expired, discharged, and re-mustered for a second term of three months; and this practice is to continue, so as to perpetuate the force, both mounted and foot, in service. None of the foot were mustered till recently, and not till they were assured the duty to be required of them would not take them from home. In going hence to Tallahassee, in October last, I saw a letter from a lieutenant colonel of militia in this mounted force, to a man who was requested to raise a foot company, in which it was stated, the men of the company will remain at home, and if any Indians or signs of them shall be discovered, word will be sent to the nearest mounted force to go in pursuit. This changed the disposition in several companies, and induced the members to become foot men instead of mounted. Since my arrival here, I have been furnished with the following copy (from the original) of a letter from the Brigadier General in command of the Florida militia. Its genuineness cannot be doubted, for the order is in the handwriting of that officer. It is proper for me to mention that there is no Florida militia in Middle or East Florida, except a small company uniformed in this place and in Tallahassee. None else have had the least organization since the commencement of the war; and the companies now in service, and called 'Florida militia' by order, are made up of such as are willing to serve in them—some residents in the country, many discharged soldiers, citizens from Georgia, and some entire companies from that State.

[Copy of Order.]

"HEAD QUARTERS FLORIDA BRIGADE,
NEWNANSVILLE, Dec. 4, 1840.

"The troops of the Sedentary Infantry service, of which Captain Broen's company is an integral portion, shall not, at any time, be ordered on active duty; nor will it ever occur, during their term of service, that they shall be ordered to march a greater distance than twenty miles beyond the headquarters of their respective companies. They will be directed to remain at their usual places of abode, and expected to engage sedulously in the pursuit of their usual occupations."

[Signed]

"LEIGH READ,
"Brig. Gen. Florida Brig."

"Captain BROEN, Mandarin."

"This 'sedentary' service for which they are paid, subsisted, clad, and doctored, is suggested, as I am credibly informed, by the Secretary of War to General Read. His letters of October last, will no doubt show it."

We have here some account of the mode of conducting affairs in Florida: "a sedentary infantry," "directed to remain at their usual places of abode, and expected to engage sedulously in the pursuit of their usual occupations." The value and the economy of this description of force may be in some degree appreciated by the description which General Jesup gives of the laborious duty devolving on his department. Among others, he instances "the examination of accounts purporting to have been certified by volunteer and militia officers, for the services of boats, wagons, and other means of transportation, and for supplies of forage, fuel, building material, camp equipage, &c. purporting to have been purchased, which accounts are found, upon investigation, to be entire fabrications, both in certificates and affidavits, or to have been certified by the officers under the mistaken idea that this was the proper mean of obtaining, through the amounts so charged, payment for supplies which they believed should have been furnished in kind to their men."

The result of this is, that, so far from anticipating any diminution of expenditures on account of the Florida war, an excess of expenditures in 1841 of two millions of dollars seems inevitable.

But, further: there are other expenditures falling upon 1841, from which the Treasury was relieved in 1840. The postponed appropriations amount, as well as I can judge, to about a million and a half. In many instances, the work for which the appropriation was designed has been already done, and the materials furnished; upon fortifications, forts, ordnance, navy yards, &c. The service of 1840, and the expenditures consequent thereon, have thus been thrown on 1841; and are a proper charge of increased expenditure for the latter year. The sum already appropriated for navy pensions, $150,000, is also a charge, as already stated, on this year, from which the last was exempt. There are various others, such as the claims of Maine for militia services, about $225,000, private bills, &c. nowhere embraced in the estimates; but all of this description I will group together on a rule furnished by the Secretary himself, and which was formerly practised upon. In his report submitted in December, 1837, speaking of the expenditures of the year, he says:

"The propriety of adding also the contingent sum of at least one million of dollars to cover appropriations made by Congress beyond the estimates, has been so fully tested by the experience of several years past, that the correctness of the measure may no longer be considered as doubtful. But the usual excess of appropriations thus made by Congress is not imputed by the undersigned to any special inattention or extravagance."

In estimating the appropriations for the coming year, the Secretary embraces nothing for this contingent sum, and his estimate of disbursements is predicated upon that of appropriations. Now, sir, to sum up the comparative expenditures of the two years, now does it stand?

Actual expenditure in 1840, for current expenses	$22,489,349
Deduct saving on the items enumerated by the Secretary	760,190
	21,729,159
Deduct further, excess last year for long session	300,000

Add expense of census	721,000
Florida war	2,385,329
Navy pensions	150,000
Postponed appropriations	1,500,000
Contingent sum	1,000,000
	5,756,329

Expenditures of 1841, based on those of 1840

This is the sum for ordinary and current expenditures merely, which, by the course of policy and the measures of the Administration now in power, has been thrown upon the present year, and for which those who are soon to administer the Government are in no degree responsible. I have not included the debt due on account of this District, being a charge of $60,000 more this year than the last. Let that stand as part of the "contingent million." To this aggregate is then to be added the redemption of Treasury notes outstanding, issued under former laws estimated by the Secretary at $4,500,000, and we have the sum total for the service of the year of thirty-one millions six hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars, ($31,685,000.)

This estimate, I am aware, differs widely from that of the Secretary. He assumes that the expenditures of the year, "for ordinary purposes," if Congress makes no reduction from the estimates will be

For the funded debt and District debt	$19,250,000
For the redemption of Treasury notes	149,200
	4,500,000

Amounting in the whole, to

Before placing that implicit reliance upon this estimate which the honorable chairman does, I desire to see the calculations of the Secretary—the manner in which he proposes to distribute the nineteen millions and a quarter among the different branches of the service—where the reduction is to fall. When the honorable chairman said that he might possibly be told that the estimates of the Secretary were not to be relied upon, he only repeated what is the common judgment of the country. Experience has not furnished us much ground for such reliance; and, indeed, the gentleman himself labored considerably to demonstrate the difficulty, if not impossibility, especially in these times of "fluctuation," of forming any estimates which would be likely to be verified by the results. I readily admit that, for myself, I do not place much confidence in the accuracy of the estimates. They seem to me to be formed, not upon the wants and requirements of the service, but in reference to the ability of the Treasury, and so formed as to produce a desired result. Sums total are assumed in the first place, and then the component items arranged to meet the aggregate. The Administration desires to make a favorable exhibition of its fiscal affairs, and to show that the income of the year will exceed all its disbursements. Nothing is easier. Assume the receipts will be so much, and divide it up among the various sources of revenue; then assume the disbursements to be so much, and frame the estimates accordingly for the various branches of service; and deducting the one from the other furnishes exactly the foregone conclusion. I say it seems to me that this is the mode of proceeding; and this supposition is verified by statements appearing in the documents submitted to us. General Jesup, in his report of 28th November, and also in his letter of 14th November, says, "at the last session of Congress I presented an estimate, for the service in Florida, of six hundred thousand dollars; that estimate I was required to modify, and reduce one-half." He did reduce it: not because the wants of the service would admit of it, but because he was "required" to do so in consequence of the condition of the Treasury. The result shows that the sum first proposed was wanted; and so pressing was the necessity that he required $400,000 early in the present session, growing out of the reduction of his first estimate.

The same thing appears in the estimates for the naval service, submitted at this session. The navy commissioners, by whom these estimates are prepared, say that they were limited to the sum total of five million and twenty-five thousand dollars. All that was left to their discretion was, to apportion this sum among the various objects of expenditure in that branch of the public service. So much for pay of officers and seamen; so much for provisions, medical stores, &c.; so much for superintendents and naval constructors at the several yards; so much for hospitals; so much for increase, repair, armament, equipment, and wear and tear of vessels in commission; and so much for improvement and repairs at the navy yards, &c. How was this aggregate of $5,025,000 obtained? Not because it would cover all the wants and necessities of the service—by no means. No estimate had been formed on that basis. No; but it was a sum arbitrarily assumed, and the commissioners were directed to make their details conform to it. They plainly inform us that this is not enough. They find themselves unable to allow more than $100,000 of it for increase of the navy, out of which they wish to finish the two steamers now being built, and the frigate Congress, and to commence a new steamer, which they wished to do last year, but "were only prevented from including in the estimates of 1840 by the supposed necessity of limiting the estimates to a certain amount." It seems this mode of forming estimates was adopted last year also. In regard to the navy yards, they say "the board are of opinion that much larger expenditures would be very desirable, to place them in a proper situation to operate efficiently in a period of war. It is manifest, therefore, that the estimates submitted to us are not founded upon the interests of the service, or the wants of the country, but are arbitrarily assumed to bring out a desired result. In any estimates so framed, I declare again I have very little confidence.

If the expenditures of the year are to be what I have endeavored to show they must be, or any where near it, it is manifest that the revenues and receipts of it, from all sources, will be inadequate to meet them.

The Secretary estimates the whole receipts of the year at twenty-two million five hundred and eighty thousand dollars. This would fall short of the ordinary expenses near five millions, being almost as large a deficit as existed last year.

But to this sum	$22,580,000
Add available balance on hand	1,580,855
Expected receipts from banks	220,000
Balance of Treasury notes, authorized by act of March 31, 1840	342,618

And we have the whole resources of the Treasury for the year, as stated by the Secretary himself

In regard to these estimates, I think they are somewhat nearer what will be realized, than those for the expenditures are. I differ with the honorable member from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] as to the probable receipts from customs, and shall not be surprised if they come quite up to what is supposed by the Secretary. The receipts last year were not far from thirteen millions. We all know that business is recovering from the stagnation and lethargy in which it was then sunk. Men begin to feel confidence, and look forward in the assurance that the country is no longer to be afflicted with a succession of visionary experiments. Importations are much greater now than they were at the corresponding period of last year—I should think nearly double. Homeward freights are quick, and rising. All accounts from the English papers represent the American trade as briskly reviving. It would require an increase of about fifty per cent. on the importations of last year to give nineteen millions of revenue; and this, in ordinary times, would be a great increase. But the importations of last year were small, and the country is somewhat drained of foreign goods. Probably the business in the latter part of the year may decline to some extent, in consequence of the great reduction of duties to take place on 31st December next. Besides, there will probably be a large importation of free goods, from the apprehension that duties may be imposed upon them at the next session of Congress; and this may, to some extent, check the importation of dutiable articles. However, as these are all speculations, which may or may not be correct, and as I cannot assign reasons in which I have much confidence myself for supposing the Secretary's estimate greatly too large, I am willing to adopt it, as showing the probable receipts of the year. What, then, will be the deficiency? What amount of additional means will be required to meet the expenditures of the year?

Whole expenditures, as before stated	$31,635,000
Whole resources	24,723,473
Deficit	6,961,527
Deduct Treasury notes proposed by the bill	5,000,000
Deficit	1,961,527
Add least balance which ought to be in the Treasury at the end of the year, the Secretary states	2,000,000

So that, in addition to the sum now proposed to be issued, we shall require for the service of the year, and to leave a sufficient balance in the Treasury at the end of it, a further sum of at least four millions. It is not safe to proceed without it. If Congress will provide for the redemption of the notes now outstanding in some other mode, and not make them chargeable upon the revenue of this year, in my judgment, the five millions now proposed will be sufficient to carry us through it. The Secretary himself seems to have some lurking apprehensions that this may be necessary; for he suggests that it may be found expedient to authorize "a contract to be made, under proper restrictions, extending the period of payment of a portion of the temporary liabilities falling due in that year." (1841.) This is very softly expressed, to be sure. He does not recommend the reissue of the Treasury notes, because he assured us they could all be redeemed last year; and he had just demonstrated that they certainly could be in this. He does not even speak of them as "Treasury notes." No; they have become "temporary liabilities." He would not reissue them, but would merely make "a contract" to postpone payment." How far this operation would differ from a debt, or from borrowing money, gentlemen can judge for themselves. It strikes me as being very much the same thing. Now, sir, is it not apparent, from this review of the state of the Treasury, and the prospects for the current year, that there is a deficiency in our revenue—a permanent deficiency? But we have been told by the Secretary, and it is repeated by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that it is merely temporary; nominal rather than real; the result of the fluctuations between the receipts and expenditures in different portions of the year. I hardly know what ideas gentlemen attach to these words, "permanent" and "temporary." The receipts, every year, for four years past, have fallen short of the expenditures, upon an average, nearly eight millions. It must be so this year, though to a less amount. In the next year (1842) the deficiency will be greater still, unless new sources of revenue are opened. If this be not a "permanent" deficiency—a deficiency which has existed four years—which now exists—and will continue to exist and increase, unless some modification of the laws affecting the receipts be made, I confess I do not know what a permanent deficiency is. The Secretary informs us that the reduction of duties next year will amount to about five millions of dollars; and, unless the expenditures be reduced in a corresponding degree, there will then be a deficiency, which may be considered permanent, to the amount of about five millions; and he adds, "this may be considered the first of that character which will occur under the tariff act of 1833."

I do not see the distinction which is in the Secretary's mind between such a deficiency and that which now exists. Under the reduction of duties which has been going on, and the increase of expenditures, we find ourselves without sufficient revenue to meet the expenses of the Government. It will be so, to a greater extent, in 1842. There may be a difference in the amount of deficiency; but I can perceive none in the character of it: both seem to me to be permanent. The history of the last four years demonstrates that the deficiency is not temporary; not occasioned by "fluctuations," by heavy disbursements in one part of the year to be supplied by increased receipts in another part. The heavy expenditures have run through the whole year, and have been met, not by accruing revenue, but by Treasury notes, and by funds which had accumulated in preceding years, and the capital which was invested in the late Bank of the United States. All these resources have been exhausted; and that brings us to consider how the Secretary proposes to supply the deficiency of the present and of future years. What "plans for the improvement of the revenue" has he "digested and prepared," as is his duty to do, by the act establishing the Treasury Department? What measures does he propose? In the first place, as regards the present year, after suggesting that a "contract might be made to extend the time of payment of the 'temporary liabilities,'" and thus relieve the Treasury, he announces that such is not his plan. "The best mode," he says, would be "without either an extension of this kind, or a loan, or a further issue of Treasury notes, or a change in the tariff; but merely by lessening the appropriations below the estimates." That is his mode. If you have not got revenue enough to carry on the operations of Government, to meet its current expenses, why, stop operations, neglect your duty, abandon the protection of the public interests. That is all very simple and very easy; and then you will have no deficiency, no debt, no increased duties, no Treasury notes. Take no measures to supply means, but spend what you happen to have, and stop there. That is the recommendation. But if Congress thinks that is not the best mode of carrying on the public service, then he suggests "secondary measures." Enforce the present tariff laws, stop frauds and evasions, modify the system of drawbacks and bounties. Really, sir, it strikes me that these ought to be regarded as primary, and not "secondary measures." They should be first resorted to, and that on other and higher considerations than as merely affecting revenue. But the Secretary looks upon them in no other light than as bringing money into the Treasury; and even that he prefers to dispense with for his favorite measure of reducing appropriations below the estimates. Passing over the political offence and turpitude of defrauding the revenue; the evil example of permitting your laws to be violated; the injury inflicted, not only upon public morals, but upon the business and property of honest merchants and fair dealers, who pay their duties agreeably to the laws, the Secretary seems to be content, and supposes all these evils are sufficiently cured or compensated, merely by reducing appropriations below what he himself, and those charged with the administration of the Government, consider to be essential for the public service. Then, as to "drawbacks," why have they not been reduced to correspond to the rate of duties imposed? Year after year we have been admonished of the fact that the amount of drawback upon certain articles is greater than the amount of duty received upon their importation. Why has it not been corrected? Who of the majority of Congress—they who have controlled its proceedings and shaped its policy—who has found time to attend to such small matters as the revenue of the country, when the great concerns of party were at stake? But this also is only a "secondary measure," not to be resorted to if the primary one of reduction can be carried into execution. What modification of "bounties" the Secretary thinks suitable, I do not understand. Does he propose abolishing the fishing bounties? If so, I shall be ready to say something in regard to it when the proposition is distinctly submitted.

In the next place, as to the deficiency which the Secretary admits will exist next year, and which may be considered "permanent," what remedy does he propose for it? What mode of supplying the means necessary to conduct the affairs of the nation? Hear him: "The idea that such a deficiency in time of peace ought to be supplied by issues of Treasury notes, or by a loan, has never been entertained by the undersigned. Nor can it be countenanced by any sound principle, either of finance or political economy." In this sentiment I concur; and can only regret that the Secretary has not hitherto recommended some other remedy than those which he now repudiates. Then as to recalling any of the deposits with the States, he thinks that is "not likely to be adopted."

"Another practicable mode would be to resort to direct taxes." But this he regards "unsuited to the general habits, and unobjectionable to the opinions of most of our population," and abandons it. "Some other permanent resource must, then, be looked to." And what is that "permanent resource?" "The choice will rest between the large reduction of expenditures, with the other accompanying measures before specified, and some extensive modification of the present tariff. Explanations have heretofore been given by the undersigned in favor of the former course."

Here is the "permanent resource" which the Secretary recommends for supplying revenue—"large reduction of expenditures." Now, sir, that may be a tolerable mode of obviating a deficiency, but as a "permanent resource" to supply it, to furnish revenue, the idea is somewhat novel. And the Secretary supposes that it will probably prove sufficient to meet the emergency, "if the reduction be pushed vigorously," and the imports shall increase. A "permanent resource" to supply an exhausted Treasury, and provide for a deficiency, is to push a vigorous reduction; and upon what branches of the service is this to fall? It is not designed, I suppose, to abolish Congress, or the Executive Departments, or to break up our intercourse with foreign nations, or to dispense with the judiciary. The civil list must be maintained, and all persons connected with it paid. Nobody suggests that the army can be or ought to be reduced; many are of opinion that it ought to be increased. The army, also, must be paid, subsisted, clothed, and all the expenses attendant upon it must be met. Does any body propose to diminish the naval force—the number of persons actually employed, or their compensation? They must be paid and fed. Our Indian treaties must be fulfilled; and very heavy burdens have been within a few years imposed on the National Treasury from this source. Where will you push "a vigorous reduction," then? I can find no place upon which this process may be commenced and carried on, but fortifications and works of defence, arsenals, ordnance, barracks, and increase and improvement of the navy and navy yards. Who, that knows any thing of the actual condition of these various works and objects, will recommend "a vigorous reduction" here? Read the reports upon these subjects, submitted by the Departments and officers having charge of them, and what a humiliating spectacle do we find exhibited, not to ourselves alone, but to the world! Fortifications unfinished, unarmed—some of them largely dilapidated, and requiring extensive repairs; arsenals, already authorized by Congress, not built for want of means; barracks not commenced, or left partially completed; and in every branch of the military service, pressing calls for larger appropriations. Besides these, how many new works of defence have been projected, and strongly recommended to Congress, upon which nothing has yet been done? The original plan of defences, adopted more than twenty years ago, is very far from being completed. Not only new works are recommended as essential to the protection and security of the country, by distinguished engineers and military officers, but they are called for by the people in various sections, and pressed upon our attention by resolutions of State Legislatures. Our line of coast, as well as of the inland frontier, is yet very imperfectly and inadequately protected, and much, very much, remains to be done; and yet we are admonished to push reductions "vigorously." How is it upon the Indian frontier? Are we to have perpetual peace there? Look at the recommendations from the proper department for military posts, barracks, forts, &c. in that quarter. I notice that the Governor of Arkansas, in his late message to the Legislature, complains loudly of the neglect of the General Government to provide suitable protection on the frontiers of that State; and intimates pretty distinctly that Arkansas will take its own defence into its own hands. Is this, then, a suitable place for a vigorous "push" for reductions? And so upon the lakes and the Niagara frontier, there is a loud call for defence, but who heeds it? The subject is not even considered by Congress. Every thing of public importance, of national benefit, is abandoned, in obedience to the Secretary's recommendation of the vigorous work of reduction.

Then as regards the Navy. What that looks at the imbecility which has so long marked its administration is surprised at its present deplorable condition? Ships decaying, condemned and broken up because they are beyond the reach of repairs, for want of early and seasonable means. Read the report of the Navy Commissioners on this subject. The larger portion of our vessels seem to be divided into two classes—those "fit for repair," and those not fit. Two ships of the line are now lying, and have been for a long time, unable to be repaired for want of a dry dock at New York, which has been so repeatedly urged; and of which the Commissioners say that, at the cost of a million of dollars, it is a "measure of true economy and of very great advantage, with reference to the future repair and employment of the Navy." I have no doubt of the correctness of this opinion. For want of it, these two ships of the line will be eventually condemned and broken up, and their places, if supplied at all, will be supplied at a cost fully equal to that which would construct the dock. How many others are destined to share the same inglorious fate, for the same cause, no one can foresee. And yet the Secretary of the Navy, for some reason or other, makes no allusion to the subject. The Navy Commissioners, with the characteristic boldness of their profession, are not restrained by any such timidity. Why should we abandon the Navy, which has been our protection and our pride in better times than these, when patriotism had some claims upon us over those of party? Why see it sinking to rapid decay? Rather let us sell it under the hammer—save something from the general wreck. Sell it to some foreign Government which has the ability and the disposition to keep itself in an attitude of security and defence. Let it still ride upon the waves of the ocean, where it has before rode in triumph, rather than be buried in its sands, or strewn upon its shores, proofs of our imbecility and our poverty. Other nations, with which we are likely to come in collision, if we are ever again driven to hostilities, are pushing, not a "vigorous reduction," but a vigorous improvement and increase of their naval strength, and especially in steamships of war, while we are doing comparatively nothing. I have already spoken of the miserably insufficient amount estimated for the increase of the Navy this year. One hundred thousand dollars only—to complete two steamers now in process of building; to commence another, which has been already authorized; to complete the frigate Congress; to collect materials for another frigate in lieu of the Guerriere, which has just been condemned and broken up, and to bear the same name; and to build one of the small vessels authorized by the act of 3d March, 1837, which has been hitherto omitted, "in consequence of the insufficiency of the appropriation." And for all this the Secretary of the Navy has so restricted the Commissioners, that only $100,000 can be spared for it. For a long series of years past, the standing appropriation for the increase of the Navy was half a million of dollars annually, and for some years a million. Now, indeed, under the injunction to "push reductions vigorously," it is thought one-fifth of the sum will be sufficient. This is the condition in which these who have had unchecked and unlimited control of public affairs for twelve years leave these great interests. This is all they have to show for the enormous sums of money which they have expended. And now, when they are about to surrender the power which they have so long wielded, and to hand over these broken and prostrate institutions, to be rebuilt and re-established in a manner worthy of the country and of the age, they begin to cry out to "push the reductions vigorously." Sir, I have frequently heard in this Hall and elsewhere, of late years, many predictions of speedy hostilities with England. Alarms have, from time to time, pervaded the country on this account; and I have heard many gentlemen display excessive patriotism in denouncing the wrongs which we have received from that powerful nation. For myself, sir, I have no apprehension of, and no desire for, hostilities with Great Britain. I know we have received injuries; and I am deeply sensible we have been kept out of our just rights by most unfounded pretensions. All these matters still rest in negotiation, and, the President assures us, are in a favorable train. Other counsels are soon to prevail, and I indulge the fullest conviction that our rights will be asserted, and our just claims vindicated, with an ability and a spirit which must lead to favorable results. But of those who think otherwise, if they do not wish it, and have expended their patriotic effusions in invectives upon our supposed enemy, how many of them have exerted themselves to put their own country in a proper posture of defence? How many of them are willing now to vote the necessary means to place the navy in an attitude of only tolerable respectability? Observe, sir, what a miserably inadequate force has lately been ordered to the East Indies, where we have many millions of commerce afloat, at a time, too, when the peace of that whole hemisphere is in imminent peril—the smallest and poorest frigate in the navy and a small sloop of war only; and why is this, except from this financial policy of "pushing reductions vigorously?" Indeed, such was the embarrassment of the Treasury, that the vessels, insufficient as they are, were delayed near three weeks, as I am told, for the want of means. The circumstances of this case furnish another illustration of the fallacy of the assertion which the honorable member from New York [Mr. BARNARD] combatted by many proofs, that "all demands upon the Treasury had been promptly met;" and another illustration, too, of the energy and promptitude which characterize the proceedings of the Navy Department.

I have understood from very good authority that, in the preparation for this cruise, the purser of the frigate had laid in supplies to the amount of thirty thousand dollars, and that he wanted twenty thousand more to carry with him for the purposes of the cruise. He had been requested by the Navy Department to delay drawing for this amount as long as possible, in consequence of the inability of the Treasury to furnish the funds. He accordingly delayed until the vessels were ready for sea, and then drew for fifty thousand dollars; five thousand only were forwarded. The merchants who had furnished the supplies became uneasy, and resorted to legal process to obtain payment. The purser was arrested and committed to jail; from which he was released only upon the assurance of Commodore Downes that the vessel should not sail until the affair was adjusted. The Department finally furnished the money, and, after considerable delay, the frigate sailed on its cruise. These facts are not within my own knowledge; but I have received them from a gentleman in the Navy, who had some agency in procuring the release of the purser, and who was acquainted with all the circumstances. I should not repeat them here if I had not full confidence in their correctness. This is but an illustration of the effects of the policy recommended by the Secretary, of "pushing reductions vigorously." Sir, I do not desire to see unnecessary or extravagant appropriations, nor, above all, wasteful expenditures of what has been appropriated. That is the great evil of which we have had hitherto so much reason to complain—the wastefulness and extravagance of the expenditure, rather than of the appropriation. But I do desire to see sufficient and prompt appropriations made for the public service. We have committed great errors on this subject. I verily believe that our public works, both naval and military, have cost at least twenty-five per cent. more than was necessary, in consequence of the dilatory and parsimonious appropriations which from time to time have been doled out. In repeated instances the work comes to a pause, because the appropriations are exhausted, and after a lapse of several months, or a year, when it is recommenced, thousands of dollars are required for repairs, to bring up the condition of it to what it was when left. We are greatly too long in point of time in the completion of our public works. If a hundred thousand dollars are wanted to complete a given work this year, and every thing is favorable for the purpose, we grant twenty thousand; or, in a moment of extraordinary liberality, may allow fifty. Why are we so long in building our ships? Foreign Governments come here, and at private ship yards commence, complete, and launch steamers of war, of the best models and workmanship, before we are able, by our procrastination, to lay the keel for one. One of the most scientific and faithful of our engineers, having charge of extensive and important public works, assured me last session that he could demonstrate, to mathematical certainty, that, in consequence of the delay and insufficiency of appropriations, these works cost at least one-quarter more than they would under a system of prompt and sufficient appropriations. I have no doubt of it. True economy requires that a work, once undertaken, should be prosecuted with vigor, and that ample means should at all times be at command. In this way, the person in charge of it may always avail himself of favorable circumstances which are constantly occurring, to obtain materials and labor at the smallest expense. Much is saved in repairs; the structure is sooner fit for service, and the public interests are in every way promoted. But this is not the mode in which our affairs are now conducted, nor the principle upon which the estimates are formed, and the appropriations made. How much can the service be pinched, and embarrassed, and retarded by "reduction," seem to be the considerations which govern the counsels of the Department in their present estimates; and at a time when every branch of the public service is languishing and almost prostrate, the only recommendation submitted to us from the Executive is, to "push reductions vigorously."

The Secretary, in closing his "last annual report," enters into a review of some of our financial operations during the period he has been connected with the Department; and he states that "during this term there has occurred much to evince the great fiscal power as well as prosperity of the Union." Although "some reverses have at times overtaken the rashness displayed by parts of the community in certain branches of business," yet "the period, and the country, as a whole, have been almost unexampled in prosperous developments." "Notwithstanding unusual revulsions," and biennial reductions of duties and losses by "officers, and banks, and merchants," "our condition has been so flourishing as to yield a revenue, during that time, sufficient, after all these deductions, to accomplish the following important results;" and then follows the enumeration of the purposes which have been accomplished. All this, the Secretary says, is "recorded evidence of the prosperity of the country, and the fiscal ability of the General Government." Now, sir, I have no desire to disturb or find fault with this complacent self-congratulation, but I desire for a single moment to consider what the condition of the country really is. Is it prosperous and successful? Where is the evidence of it? The National Government embarrassed in all its operations, and struggling on from day to day under the pressure of an insolvent Treasury; public works neglected and postponed; public credit endangered. Then, as to the States: most of them deeply in debt, and hardly able to pay even the interest as it accrues; their bonds from 10 to 30 per cent. below par; their internal improvements abandoned in a great degree, and resort to heavy taxes inevitable, with no prospect of immediate improvement in their condition. As to the affairs of individuals: what kind of business is prosperous? Manufactures have largely declined; commerce, distinct from navigation, diminished; internal trade greatly reduced; specie payments suspended over a considerable portion of the Union, and but lately resumed in the great State of Pennsylvania; and from all quarters of the land, as with one voice, a demand for a bankrupt law, to relieve the business of the country from the enormous pressure of debt which now bears it down to the dust.

How is it with the planting States—the growers of the great staple of our exports? Are they prosperous? Why, sir, the marshal of Mississippi returns to us that he has received for fees last year the enormous sum of eighty-seven thousand dollars, growing out of the immense number of suits instituted for the recovery of debts. The banks of the State are unable to pay the small amounts still due to the United States for deposits, and have applied for still longer postponement. How is it in Alabama, and the other cotton-growing regions? Cotton, I believe, has been ranging last year from 5 to 7 or 8 cents—probably not bringing over 6 or 7 to the planter. I recollect to have seen it stated, within a few years, that the cost of the production of cotton was about 7 or 8 cents. Some gentleman can probably put me right on that matter. [Mr. HUBBARD of Alabama nodded assent to the statement.] The honorable member signifies that I am correct. The cost to the planter, therefore, has been quite equal to, perhaps in some instances greater than, the amount he has been able to sell for. Is that a prosperous condition of thing? The Secretary says: "It is a source of great satisfaction to witness the indications which the unprecedented amount of exports, during the last four years, has given of the continued prosperity of the country," &c. "Again: 'The general prosperity has been such as to create a large surplus of products, and to enable us to send abroad immense and increased values of them, however great the complaints have been as to low prices.' Now, sir, if prices are so low as scarcely to remunerate the producer, it does not strike me that the great quantity produced is very good evidence of prosperity. General prosperity is made up of individual prosperity; and how the country, as a whole, can be successful, when all branches of its business is depressed, is not very apparent to my mind. Undoubtedly it is better to produce and sell even at low prices, and thus furnish, as far as it goes, means of extinguishing our foreign indebtedness, than not to produce at all; because the laborers, if not employed, must still be subsisted and clothed; and if they cannot earn more than half their support, it is better to do that than remain in idleness. All that can be said is, that by reason of our great production, though no profit is made upon it we are not so deeply involved and so much distressed as we should be if the crops entirely failed. The grain-growing sections of the country—the great West; the growers of pork and other provisions—are they prosperous? Do they find ready markets and remunerating prices? We know that it is not so; and yet we have "recorded evidence of the prosperity of the country." Sir, I should like to read this record elsewhere than in the universal embarrassment and depression which broods over the whole land; and all, all brought upon it within this very period which the Secretary has selected as one "unexampled in prosperous developments"

—all within the last eight years. The "recorded evidence" to which the Secretary refers, is found only in the vast receipts into the Treasury which have enabled him to accomplish the great results he has enumerated. The Secretary has not always considered it in that light. The enormous receipts alluded to occurred chiefly in two years, 1835 and 1836, and in a considerable degree from most extraordinary and unexpected sales of public land. The receipts of 1835 were about $35,500,000, of which 15,000,000 were derived from the lands. The receipts of 1836 were close upon 49,000,000 of which over 24,000,000 were derived from lands. Whole amount for two years . . . $84,303,051
Expenditures during same years . . . 47,238,000

Excess of receipts . . . 37,065,051

These years, therefore, are the great source of the vast receipts which the Secretary now regards as "recorded evidence" of our prosperity, because the receipts of the last four years have not equalled the expenditures. Sir, I cannot but recollect how often, within the last two years, I have heard the importations and the land sales of those years denounced as "over-trading"—"speculation"—forced on by bank expansions—growing out of fictitious credit; and as the cause of all the embarrassments and revulsions which followed. The specie circular was issued avowedly to check the land sales which were going on to such dangerous extent. What vehement denunciations have we not listened to both of banks and of State debts, as occasioning such enormous importations from abroad, destructive of our industry and our resources? And yet it was these very importations and sales which furnished the Treasury with money—now relied upon as "recorded evidence of the prosperity of the country." The Secretary himself, in his report to Congress in December, 1838, says: "An over-flowing tide of speculation and bank issues like that of 1836 is not anticipated, while the recent evils and disasters from these sources are fresh in remembrance." He was constrained "at that time to regard many of the appearances of extraordinary prosperity as delusive, the existing surplus as temporary and fallacious," &c.

By what strange process is it that this fallacy, these delusive appearances, have become entitled to the great weight and the high authority of "recorded evidence?" But, sir, not to hold the Secretary bound by opinions expressed two years ago, and which he may have since changed, we find in the same document—the report of this year—a repetition of the same sentiments. Having stated the great results which he has accomplished, he next proceeds to explain the difficulties which he had to encounter. "One of the greatest evils to the public service, as well as to the security of private business, during a part of the above period, has consisted in the fluctuations to which both have been subjected." These fluctuations are exhibited, among other proofs, in the great falling off of imports, which, he says, "fell within two years from near one hundred and ninety millions to one hundred and fourteen; and in the single year just past, almost sixty millions." "Such inflations and contractions must be destructive of all confidence in calculations for the future, while the causes of them shall continue to operate unremedied. What are these causes? They will be found to have been chiefly connected with the abuses of banking. On the occasion just referred to, they were the superabundance of a fictitious medium of circulation, with the attendant overtrading and speculations in 1836, and the consequent suspension of specie payments in 1837, as well as the disasters and scarcity of any medium till the latter part of 1838." Then another expansion, he says, and "increase of imports of nearly fifty millions," followed by contractions, suspensions, and commercial reverses. "The great principles of trade can never be long violated with impunity. And any fictitious or unnatural excess of credit soon ends in revulsions," &c. Understand the Secretary, in all this, to affirm that in 1836, "the great principles of trade" had been violated; that revulsions necessarily followed; that there was a superabundance of fictitious credit, bringing on overtrading and speculation; the consequence of which was, suzpension of specie payments, disasters, and scarcity of any medium, &c. He says, also, "some imprudences abroad may have augmented the evils here." Now, if all this be so, I cannot comprehend how it is that the operations of these years of abundant revenue and large receipts—operations which have brought in their train reverses, disasters, and evils, and have inflicted such deep and wide spread injury upon the country—how it can be that they furnish evidence of great fiscal ability and unexampled prosperity. According to the Secretary's statement, we have been undergoing, in pretty rapid succession, for several years, these alternate contractions and expansions; or, to use another expression of his, the community has been "kept under the constant excitement and depression of the hot and cold fits of a violent fever." Is that a condition of health? Does it indicate prosperity? I shall not now go into the consideration of the causes of the revulsions and fluctuations which we have experienced. They may all be directly traced to the action of the Government itself; and whatever of disaster the community has undergone, the Administration is responsible for. That I hold to be clearly demonstrable.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to confine my attention to the present condition of the Treasury, and to its probable necessities during the present year. As to what will be the state of affairs in the next and succeeding years, I shall not now undertake to examine. I have no expectation that this Congress will look so far in advance as that. Very heavy burdens, I am aware, will be thrown upon the coming Administration for many years, by the measures and policy of that which is about to close. The aggregate I shall not venture to compute. I have already said that I should prefer early action on the part of Congress to supply, from the ordinary sources of revenue, sufficient means, not only for this year, but for the future. I despair of that. The present measure I consider wholly inadequate for the service of the whole year; but it will relieve the Treasury from present embarrassments, and keep the wheels of Government rolling yet awhile. To the wisdom and patriotism of those who are so soon to enter upon the administration of the Government, and to succeed us in these seats, I look with confidence for such measures as shall restore not only the revenue of the Government, but the business and prosperity and happiness of the people.

SPEECH OF MR. BELL,

OF TENNESSEE,

In the House of Representatives, January 20, 1841.—
The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the bill making provision for the issue of five millions of Treasury notes—

MR. BELL said it might well be considered presumptuous in any one to attempt to follow the two honorable gentlemen [Messrs. BARNARD and EVANS] who had preceded him on the same side of the question presented by the bill under discussion, for all who heard their remarks must be willing to admit that they were distinguished for uncommon acumen and ability. Nor (said Mr. B.) would he have undertaken so hazardous an enterprise, were it not that the subject, in some of its aspects, had impressed itself upon his mind as of far higher importance than those gentlemen appeared to attach to it; and he also felt constrained to differ with them in some of the sentiments which had fallen from them in the course of their remarks. He hoped—indeed he did not suppose—that this difference would be found very material, when those gentlemen should come to make a practical application of their views; nor was he satisfied that he had fully understood that portion of the remarks to which he could not give his assent. But if he had not mistaken the tenor of a sentiment expressed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] he (Mr. B.) must say that he could not look forward with the same complacency and satisfaction to that prospective redundancy of means in the Treasury, the mere contemplation of which had supplied the gentleman's fancy with such delightful visions of future improvement and grandeur. The other gentleman [Mr. EVANS] had also loomed a little too largely, when he spoke, in anticipation, as it were, in the atmosphere of an overflowing Treasury and unrestricted appropriations. Mr. BELL said that while he had as little respect as those gentlemen could have for the narrow—he had almost said the mean—spirit of parsimony which appeared, all at once, to have become the favorite policy of the expiring Administration, yet he still held that there was a real and substantial merit in economy in the administration of a Government, as well as in private affairs. He acknowledged that there might be an ill-timed and stinted system of expenditure upon great and indispensable establishments which would be a false economy, and productive, in the end, of a far greater drain upon the public treasure, than a more free and liberal use of it; yet, as a general rule, and when we come to trace the outlines of a policy best adapted to a free system of government, economy in the public expenditures and allowances of every kind must ever stand as one of the most essential features of it, while profusion and extravagance will always be the most certain means of undermining the most skillfully devised fabric of liberty, and ultimately of destroying the very foundations of all real prosperity.

The other considerations incidentally connected with the subject under debate, and which had appeared to Mr. B. not to have been sufficiently regarded and pressed by the gentlemen who had preceded him, were, first, whether the amount of means proposed by the bill now presented was not much below the necessities of the Treasury, and whether this was not the most suitable occasion which could arise during the session for providing an adequate supply for the service of the whole year, (1841;) and, secondly, whether the propriety of making some immediate provision for supplying the much larger deficiency which would occur in the revenue of the year 1842 was not equally manifest.

Both these questions, said Mr. B. are directly connected with another of considerable interest and importance to the country; that is, whether we are to have a called session of the National Legislature. If the means provided by this bill are not sufficient to meet the demands upon the Treasury during the whole year; or if it shall be found that great and vital public interests require that provision shall be made in advance for the deficit which is certain to appear in the revenue of next year, (1842,) and it is not done now, an extra session of Congress will be unavoidable. Upon this point, I desire to address my remarks chiefly to the gentlemen who are in the majority in this House, and who still control the administration of public affairs. It rests with them to say whether we shall have a called session or not; and with them, I propose to demonstrate, must rest the responsibility of all the inconvenience and expense which will attend such a step. They now hold all the power in their own hands. They can move effectually in whatever may be necessary to be done. We cannot move at all, in the present organization of the House. Our hands are tied. They cannot only provide adequate means for the service of the present year, but they, and they only, can provide in due time for the deficiency of the next, without the extraordinary charge of a special session. We can only express our sentiments. They, only, can act, for they have the majority in both Houses of Congress.

The gentleman from Maine (Mr. EVANS) has contented himself with demonstrating that there is a clear necessity for passing this bill authorizing the issue of five millions of Treasury notes; that five millions, at least, will be necessary for the service of this year, (1841;) but leaves the question of further supply for the service of the present year, and the grant of that supply, to be brought up and acted upon some other day before the close of the session; and, as to the necessity of meeting in advance the anticipated deficiency in the revenue of the ensuing year, he is wholly silent. Has that gentleman reflected how improbable it is that our opponents, when they find the means provided by this bill ample enough for the time they remain in power, will trouble themselves to make any very careful scrutiny into the probable necessity of the Treasury during the remaining three quarters of the year? Or if, under a sense of duty to the country, they shall be disposed to do so, has the gentleman from Maine reflected how difficult it will be, at any future day of the session, to move in a matter giving rise to so much difference of opinion? We are now advanced to the 20th day of January. Only about five weeks remain which can be effectually devoted to business, and not one of the great appropriation bills has passed. These are bills which ought never to pass this House without the closest scrutiny. In my opinion, sir, this occasion, this bill presents the only opportunity we shall have during the present session of providing an adequate supply for the service of the whole of the present year, and of making suitable provision in advance for the deficiency in the means of the next. I trust those gentlemen with whom I have been so long associated in our political course will think seriously on these points, and, if they agree with me, I pray them to unite with me in an effort to effect both objects, so far as we have the power.

I am not satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that it will be altogether safe, in the present state of the political influences of the country, and in view of the change that is soon to take place in the public Administration, to rely upon the estimates of our opponents in forming an opinion of the sufficiency of the current revenue, or other means, for the present or any future year. Those who are to be responsible for the administration of public affairs after the 4th of March next ought to remember that, as far as party interest and influences are apt to control the judgment and conduct of men, the strongest temptations exist with the majority in this House to cripple and embarrass the new Administration by consigning to them an exhausted Treasury and a deficient revenue. It is the first time, in a period of forty years, and it is only the second time in the history of the country, when a new Administration has been called upon to carry on the Government with the aid of such supplies and means only as political opponents, soured and resentful by defeat, have thought proper to dole out to them. The committee of this House charged with the duty of inquiring and reporting upon all questions of revenue and supply, is organized in opposition to the new Administration. This state of things occurred in 1801, when Mr. Jefferson came into power, after a most fierce and desperate political encounter, but never before nor since, until now. The passions and biases adverse to just and public-spirited legislation, exerted by such a collision, are natural, and, with many, uncontrollable. I do not mean to charge that these passions and biases are peculiar to the party still in the majority in this House. One thing appears certain, however. The present majority in Congress are resolved to provide means enough to keep themselves afloat during the remaining brief term of their power; but the danger is, that, like the mass of mankind in private life, while they are liberal and bountiful in their supplies for the subsistence and comfort of their own household, they will show themselves niggardly and parsimonious in their dealings with their neighbors and countrymen generally.

But I appeal to the present majority in this House whether, in accordance with their new and much vaunted devotion to economy, they will not be constrained to make at all events a sufficient provision of means, both for the present and ensuing fiscal year. It would seem that economy has lately become not only the cardinal, but the only virtue in their political creed. Even the Sub-Treasury is seriously advocated as an engine for enforcing economy, not only in public, but in private life. I am in favor of encouraging and fostering this new-born zeal for economy in our opponents. For one, I have no fears that the dreams of those will ever be realized, who imagine that, by this sort of death-bed repentance—this late profession of economy—they can atone for a whole life of extravagance, wastefulness, and profligacy in expenditures, and thereby work out a future redemption.

If the present majority in this House are really desirous of infusing a spirit of rigid economy into the operations and expenditures of the Government

I warn them to take care how they force upon the new Administration the necessity of an extra session, which cannot cost the nation less than half a million of dollars. Half a million ought, in my opinion, to be regarded as a substantial item in their estimate of what constitutes economy; and they will most assuredly be justly responsible for the sin of it, unless they shall, at the present session, make suitable provision for the wants of the Treasury. I warn them not to indulge the hope that, by any ingenious disguise of the true state of the Treasury, or of the large amount of debt now suspended over it, or by any other artifice, they can so manage to drive the new Administration to the necessity of a called session, with the expectation of raising a successful clamor against them on that account. I tell them that, unless they act promptly—unless they act effectually at the present session upon the subjects I have indicated—the reasons for a called session may become too manifest—the necessity too palpable to admit of deception or misunderstanding: a called session, or a meeting of Congress in advance of the stated period, will become, in my opinion, indispensable.

As to the immediate questions presented by the bill, there are two of them about which little need be said. The first relates to the fact of an existing deficiency in the means of the Treasury to meet the current demands upon it, and of this I think there can be no doubt; nor can there be a reasonable doubt that this deficiency is at least equal to the five millions demanded by the bill. The other question directly presented by the bill is not so clear, but there would be quite as little reason in taking up the time of the committee in the discussion of it. It is, whether the mode of supply proposed by the bill is the proper one—whether the issue of Treasury notes or a direct and open loan is the more constitutional and eligible mode of granting the necessary supply. The policy of resorting to the issue of Treasury notes, however objectionable in time of peace, has been adopted and sanctioned by the majority in this House since 1837, in opposition to the opinions and principles of those with whom I have generally acted. As long as the same majority control the decisions of the House, the policy may be regarded as permanent; and, although their supremacy, we may hope, will terminate with the present Congress, they are still in the ascendant here, and must be allowed to have their own way. While, therefore, I cannot vote for the issue of Treasury notes in time of peace, for the reasons often assigned by others on this floor, yet I will not repeat the arguments against the bill on this ground; nor do I feel myself called upon to propose any amendment to change the mode of supply provided for in the bill, especially so far as regards the amount necessary to meet the immediate demands upon the Treasury. I choose to devote the time allowed me in this discussion to more practical views and objects; and to leave to those who have the numbers and the power to regulate the mode of the supply which they think expedient to grant at their own discretion and upon their own responsibility.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are two other questions, naturally enough connected with the subject of this bill, of the greatest importance, and about which much may be said; and about which there will probably be some controversy. The first of these, both in point of time and importance, concerns the extent of the deficiency that will exist in the resources of the Treasury during the present year, and raises the inquiry whether, instead of five millions, ten or even more will not be necessary to meet the demands upon the Treasury within the year.

Relying chiefly upon the proof furnished by the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I shall attempt to show that the amount of existing debts or demands, as well as the demands which will certainly accrue against the Treasury in the course of the year (1841) is largely underrated by that officer, and that a high degree of probability exists that he overrates the amount of the current receipts into the Treasury, both from customs and lands.

Let us first inquire what will be the total amount legally chargeable upon the Treasury during the present year (1841); and secondly, what amount will probably be actually presented or demanded at the Treasury within the year.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, states the amount legally chargeable upon the Treasury within the year 1841, at thirty-two million five hundred and fifty-five thousand seven hundred and fifty-seven dollars; but it further appears, from his own statement, that he estimates the actual demands upon the Treasury, within the year, at no more than twenty-two millions one hundred and thirty-four thousand, seven hundred and thirty-four dollars—the difference between these two sums being ten million four hundred and eleven thousand and twenty-seven dollars. This last is the precise amount of the appropriations for 1840, and former years, outstanding at the end of the year 1840, either already applied or set aside for the service of that year, and not yet called for, or not applied, (postponed) and remaining applicable to the service of 1841. For this large amount the Secretary thinks it will not be necessary to make any provision, on the supposition that an equal amount of the appropriations for the present year will lie over uncalled for, or unapplied at the close of it. This as I will show hereafter, is mere conjecture on the part of the Secretary; for, as to the amount which may be outstanding at the end of the present year, it may be ten or it may be only two millions, according to circumstances.

If the Secretary of the Treasury is correct in the supposition that no more than twenty-two millions and a little upwards will be actually called for or demanded at the Treasury within the year, it will only be necessary to provide means to that amount, and a sufficient balance in the Treasury to meet contingencies. But if it can be shown that a much greater amount of payments will be required from the Treasury within the year, it must be met by an increased supply of means.

The best mode of detecting and exposing the errors of the Secretary will be to take up and examine the items in his estimate, both of charge and supply, separately.

The appropriations estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, as a new and specific charge upon the year 1841, amount to a small sum over sixteen and a half millions of dollars. This is the lowest estimate since 1835. I do not complain of it because it is well enough to bear in mind that it is evidently a forced estimate; and for that reason, and the further one that the nearer the estimates or appropriations for any one year approximate the actual wants of the Government, the larger the proportion of them which will be expended within the year. The Secretary had said, two years ago, that the annual expenditures might, in his opinion, be soon reduced to seventeen or eighteen millions of dollars; and, to verify, as nearly as possible, his own predictions, he made a sort of Procrustes bed of the Treasury estimates, to which every branch of the public service was to be fitted at all hazards. These estimates are certainly not adjusted to the demands of the public service at the present juncture, as will abundantly appear from various public documents emanating from the Executive departments. To make the demands of the public service square with his standard of expenditures, the Secretary, like the tyrant of old, has lopped off a foot here, and a head there, and, had it been necessary for his purpose, he was even prepared to have sacrificed an entire branch of the public service for a time.

The next item, or rather the next class of the new charges upon the Treasury for the year 1841, is one which the Secretary could neither add to nor diminish—it being the amount which is already appropriated for the service of the year, by existing laws, to certain specified objects. The aggregate amount of this description of new charges is five million five hundred and thirteen thousand two hundred dollars. The principal item of this amount is four millions and a half of dollars, which will be required to redeem outstanding Treasury notes within the year 1841. The sum of these two items or classes of new appropriations, for the year 1841, will exhibit the whole amount which the Secretary of the Treasury supposes will be actually demanded or paid within the year. When thrown into the usual Treasury form, they will stand thus:

Estimate of appropriations to be made specifically chargeable upon the year 1841	$16,621,520
Appropriations specifically chargeable upon the year 1841, by existing laws, viz:
For military service, &c.	$864,000
Public debt, including interest and first installment on debt assumed for District of Columbia	149,200
For redemption of Treasury notes falling due within the year	4,500,000
Total of appropriations by existing laws	5,513,200

Total amount specifically chargeable upon the year 1841

But there is another large class of appropriations chargeable upon the year 1841, which ought to be included in the regular and formal statements which issue from the Treasury Department, but which, in general, are only to be ascertained from a careful reading of the annual report. I mean the balances of appropriations for former years, which are outstanding at the close of one year, and become a legal charge upon the ensuing year, without any new legal sanction. These balances, at the end of 1840, appear, from the statement accompanying the annual report and estimates, to have been, as I have before stated, ten million four hundred and eleven thousand and twenty seven dollars. In general, these balances of former appropriations are the first that are drawn from the Treasury in each year, and the means, therefore, must be provided to meet them in some mode or other; but I notice them at present only as constituting legally and properly a part of the entire charge upon the Treasury in the year 1841. By looking into the annual Treasury report, it will be found that the Secretary so regards them. The total amount of appropriations legally chargeable upon the year 1841, according to the Treasury statements and estimates, will, therefore, exceed thirty-two millions. When expressed in the usual form, the account against the Treasury would stand thus:

Amount of appropriations specifically chargeable upon the year 1841	$22,134,720
Amount of former appropriations outstanding at the close of the year 1840, and which become a legal charge upon the year 1841	10,411,027

Total amount of appropriations legally chargeable upon the year 1841, according to the estimates and statements of the Secretary of the Treasury

But this statement does not show the entire legal charge which will exist against the Treasury in the year 1841. The Secretary of the Treasury makes his estimates upon the basis of the usual and current service of the year. The present Secretary has never departed from this rule that I remember, even in a case as important and pressing as an existing war, when a large force of militia and volunteers were in the field, and large expenditures had been actually incurred on their account. Such a case occurred in 1837. At that time the annual estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury were made out for the year 1838 (December, 1837) there were between five and six thousand mounted volunteers on service in Florida, besides four or five thousand regular troops. Before the close of the year 1837, and very probably before the estimates for the following year were made out, a million of dollars had been expended beyond the amount appropriated for that service in that year; yet the Secretary took no notice whatever, in his estimates of the expenditures and appropriations for the year 1838, of the large and extraordinary demands upon the Treasury which the Florida war would necessarily produce; nor did he make any provision whatever for the million of dollars then being expended in that service within the year 1837, beyond the appropriations. The fact, therefore, stated by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] of half a million of dollars having these expended in 1840, for the pay and subsistence of the seventeen hundred militia now in the Florida service, and no notice taken of it in the annual estimates, is no novelty in the conduct of the honorable Secretary. His usual practice in this respect shows how little reliance is to be placed upon his estimates generally, as exhibiting the amount of the probable demands upon the Treasury in any one year. Congress has already been called on to vote at the present session one hundred and fifty thousand dollars to supply the deficiency in the naval pension fund, which the Secretary must have known to exist before he made out his estimates for the present year. This is, therefore, a new charge upon the Treasury, not included in his annual estimates. To this we may add ninety-two thousand dollars reported by the Committee of Ways and Means for the same object. We must also include in our account of the new charges which will certainly be created against the Treasury within the present year, the amount proposed to be appropriated for the public buildings in this city, now under contract, or in a course of construction. This sum will not fall short of one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars, and may far exceed that amount. We may also safely estimate that at least two hundred thousand dollars will be voted by Congress to miscellaneous objects at the present session. This item has been set down by the Secretary of the Treasury, in some of his estimates, at one million of dollars. In addition to these several amounts, we learn from the speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] that the Secretary of War had sent to the Committee of Ways and Means an estimate of appropriations for the support of the Florida war in the year 1841, amounting to two and a half millions of dollars; and as it appears that a large portion of this amount had already been expended, and the war still continues, I take it for granted that that sum, at least, will be voted by Congress for that service. These several items of new appropriations, not included in the annual estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, will, of course increase the amount already stated as constituting the gross legal charge upon the Treasury in the year 1841, according to the Treasury estimates. Stated in the usual form, the whole amount legally chargeable upon the Treasury in the year 1841, will stand thus:

Total amount legally chargeable upon the Treasury in the year 1841, according to the annual Treasury estimates and statements,	$32,505,747
New appropriations, not included in the Treasury estimates, viz:
Amount already appropriated to supply deficiency in the naval pension fund	$150,000
Amount reported by Committee of Ways and Means for the same object	92,000
Amount reported by Committee on Public Buildings	115,000
Amount asked for by Secretary of War for support of the Florida war	2,500,000
Amount of probable appropriations for miscellaneous objects	200,000
Total of new appropriations not included in the Treasury estimates and statements	3,057,000

Total amount legally chargeable upon the Treasury in the year 1841, $35,562,747

Of the whole amount thus shown to be chargeable upon the Treasury in the year 1841, we have already explained that ten million four hundred and eleven thousand and twenty-seven dollars consist of former appropriations; and although, as already stated, these are the first that will be expended and paid from the Treasury within the year, yet the Secretary of the Treasury, in making out his estimate of the amount of means necessary to meet the actual demands upon the Treasury within the year, assumes as the basis of his estimate, that there will be a balance of the whole amount of appropriations legally chargeable upon the Treasury in the year 1841, remaining unexpended or uncalled for at the end of that year, about as large as the similar aggregate balance outstanding at the end of the year 1840. If the Secretary is correct in this assumption, then, instead of thirty-five and a half millions of dollars, it will only be necessary to provide means sufficient to meet a demand of twenty-five millions and a little upwards within the year—this being the balance of the entire charge upon the Treasury, after deducting an amount equal to the outstanding balances of former appropriations at the end of the year 1840. The question is, whether the Secretary of the Treasury has not made too high an estimate of the outstanding balances of appropriations at the close of the present year.

Now, sir, as to the question whether the Secretary of the Treasury has not overrated the balance of the appropriations chargeable upon the present year which will be outstanding at the close of it, and for which he thinks it unnecessary to make any provision within the year. In deciding upon the probable amount of the appropriations of the present and former years which will be outstanding at the end of this year, it is necessary to look into the nature and condition of the service and objects for which they were voted by Congress. Of the ten millions and upwards of these balances which appear from the Treasury statements to have been outstanding at the close of 1840, the largest portion—in fact, nearly all of them—were specifically chargeable upon the year 1840. From the same statement it appears that upwards of six millions and a half of the entire amount have been expended or applied to the service of the last year, but the payments thereof have not been demanded or made from the Treasury. They, therefore, continue to be a legal charge upon the Treasury during the present year and until paid. The condition of this part of these outstanding balances may be made more intelligible by the employment of a term not strictly admissible in financial parlance. They may be properly represented as mortgaged or secured for the payment of debts already due by the Government, or for the fulfilment of contracts and engagements entered into before the close of the year 1840, and which remain to be paid in the year 1841. Another, and the only remaining portion of these balances, after the transfer of a small part to the surplus fund, has not been expended or applied to the service of any former year; they have been postponed, and remain over to be expended or applied to the objects for which they were originally appropriated within the year 1841. These unapplied or postponed balances amount, as appears from the Treasury statements, to upwards of three and a half millions of dollars. They might and ought to have been applied to the service of the year 1840, had there been sufficient time after they were passed by Congress, or had the Executive been pleased to do so, but which were not so applied, either for want of time or inclination. The obligation on the Executive to expend or apply these unapplied or postponed balances within the present year is just as binding as though they were made a specific charge upon 1841 by law.

It is true that the Executive administration may so manage as to postpone or suspend the application of a portion of these unapplied balances to another year, as the present Administration has done within the last two years. In the same manner a large portion of the expenditure of the new appropriations for the present year may be postponed until 1842; but, in both cases, it would be a postponement—a suspension (except as to a small part, in its nature contingent, and which may never be wanted) against law, and in violation of a high moral, as well as legal and constitutional duty. When Congress appropriates moneys, it is meant that they should be applied to the respective branches of the public service for which they were designed as speedily as may be consistent with the nature and demands of the objects. The Executive, except in cases expressly provided, is vested with no discretion in the matter, and the assumption of it is an abuse of power. It is the exercise of a dispensing power. Executive influence and patronage are necessarily increased when authority is assumed to apply large sums of money, or not, at discretion, to objects and interests in which large bodies of men feel a personal concern.

It may be of use to notice briefly the nature and history of these outstanding balances within the last ten or twelve years. They have attracted too little attention from Congress. The theory of our system of annual and specific appropriations supposes or requires, in general, that the appropriations made by law for the service of a year shall be expended or applied within that year to the objects specified. This is so at least as to all appropriations not contingent in their nature, or not in their terms confined to the service of a single year. To carry out this theory rigorously would often be very inconvenient, and sometimes impossible. For example: Payments upon contracts for supplies of the army and navy; upon contracts for supplying timber to the navy; and even the pay of the army and navy, from the nature of the service, cannot always be made at regular periods. In such cases, although the expenditures may be said to be incurred within the year, the payments are often not made from the Treasury until after the close of the year for which the appropriations were made. But a constitutional and faithful administration of the Government requires that the appropriations and the expenditures for each year shall correspond as nearly as possible. By the existing practice, the Government assumes the power to reduce or enlarge the expenditures within the year, at its discretion. The practice of the present Administration, in this respect, will put it in the power of the Government, within the present year, for example, to expend twenty-five or six millions of dollars, provided the Treasury is sufficiently replenished, although the new appropriations specifically chargeable upon the year may not exceed twenty-two millions; and of the whole amount legally chargeable upon the Treasury in 1841, we have seen that the Secretary estimates that upwards of ten millions will remain either unexpended or uncalled for at the close of the year. This is an abuse for which there is no adequate apology or necessity. If the Secretary is right in his estimate of the probable balance of outstanding appropriations at the end of the present year, he might and ought to have brought down his estimates of new appropriations to twelve instead of sixteen millions of dollars. The progress of this abuse deserves notice. The charge upon the year 1829, consisting of former appropriations, I find was of applied but unpaid balances, three million four hundred and seventy-eight thousand three hundred and eighty-four dollars, while the amount of unapplied or postponed balances was two hundred and twenty-seven thousand eight hundred and seven dollars only. In 1830 the applied balances lying over for payment amounted to two million four hundred and fifty-seven thousand dollars, and the unapplied to eight hundred and sixty-two thousand dollars. In 1832 the applied balances were three million four hundred and twenty-three thousand dollars, and the unapplied five hundred and one thousand dollars. In 1834 the applied balances were five million one hundred and ninety thousand dollars, and the unapplied four hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars. After that year this irregularity increased in so rapid a ratio that, at the close of the year 1836, the aggregate amount of these balances was sixteen millions seven hundred and fifty-two thousand dollars. At the close of the year 1837 they amounted to fourteen million one hundred and fifty-seven thousand dollars. And we have already seen that at the close of the year 1840, while the applied balances were only six million six hundred and sixty-one thousand one hundred and twenty-three dollars, showing an increase of this class of balances since 1829 of about one hundred per cent. the unapplied or postponed balances were three million seven hundred and forty-nine thousand nine hundred and four dollars, an amount more than sixteen times greater than the same class of balances in 1829!

In order to form some just estimate of the proportion of these three million seven hundred and forty-nine thousand nine hundred and four dollars of the unapplied appropriations of former years, which will be expended within the year 1841, allow me to point out some of the most considerable items which make up the amount as they appear in the Treasury estimate. First, there is the sum of eight hundred and fifty thousand dollars applicable to the pay and subsistence of the army. The second I will note is the sum of six hundred and fifty-seven thousand four hundred and sixty-two dollars applied to the payment of pensions. A third is the sum of four hundred and forty thousand seven hundred and ten dollars applicable to the ordnance department. The last I shall enumerate is the sum of eight hundred and sixteen thousand four hundred and forty-three dollars which remain of last year's appropriations applicable to fortifications. These four items make an aggregate of two million seven hundred and sixty-two thousand six hundred and five dollars; and from the nature of them I infer that every cent of them will be or ought to be expended within the year in addition to the amount of new appropriations. A part of the sum applicable to pensions may lie over.

It will be found that the Secretary of the Treasury himself was conscious when did up his report that it would not be altogether safe to rely upon so large an amount of appropriations outstanding at the close of 1841. He suggests "that a greater proportion of outstanding appropriations at the end of the year 1840 than will be left unexpended of the new charges imposed." Why this suggestion? Undoubtedly because he well knew that there were circumstances calculated to produce this result, which could not long escape detection. He knew that the policy of staving off every demand against the Treasury as the slightest pretext existed for doing so, which has prevailed for the last two years, was obliged to come to light. He also well knew the extent to which the practice has obtained of late of postponing or suspending the application or expenditure of appropriations. The policy in both cases has been dictated by the low state of the public funds, and the effect has been to cause a heavier drain upon the Treasury in the ensuing year; and at the same time to ensure the necessity of applying or expending a larger proportion of both the old and the new appropriations to the rightful objects within the present year. Another cause of an increased expenditure in the year 1841 may be added: the appropriations for the year 1840 were passed at so late a season of the year that a large amount of them could not be expended for want of time, and, as to a part of them, there was a suspension authorized by law.

It sometimes happens that Congress makes a large appropriation, which, from its nature, cannot be expended within one year; and such appropriations of course cause a temporary increase of the balances at the end of the year. One example of this kind is to be found in the appropriation of upwards of five millions for carrying into effect the Cherokee treaty. This amount hung like a dark cloud upon the Treasury for several years, but it is now so much reduced that it is no longer of any importance. No similar appropriations of very great extent swell the present amount of these balances. Upon the whole, I conclude that, from all the causes and from all the reasons I have assigned, instead of ten millions remaining unpaid or unapplied at the end of the present year, (1841,) the balance so remaining of both classes will not exceed six millions of dollars, if it turns out so much. Deduct this amount from the gross sum shown to be chargeable upon the Treasury in the year 1841, and the remainder will show the true amount for which a cash provision must be made within the year. I will make the statement in the usual form:

Total amount legally chargeable upon the Treasury within the year 1841, as before stated and explained	35,562,747
Deduct amount of balance of applied and unapplied or postponed appropriations, which will probably be outstanding at the end of the year 1841	6,000,000

Amount of actual demands upon the Treasury in the year 1841, and for which provision must be made . . . $29,562,747

This amount must be provided for in some form or other. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the balance of cash means in the Treasury, at the close of the year 1840, at one million five hundred and ninety thousand eight hundred and fifty-five dollars; but this is but a small portion of the whole sum required during the year. How does the Secretary propose to make up the balance? He informs us that two hundred thousand dollars will probably be collected from debtor banks; from miscellaneous sources eighty thousand dollars; and that, until the 31st of March, an authority will exist, under the act of 31st March, 1840, to issue three hundred and forty-two thousand six hundred and eighteen dollars in Treasury notes, provided the whole emission outstanding does not exceed five millions of dollars. These several items, supposing them all to be available to the extent stated, make an aggregate of means amounting to two million two hundred and thirteen thousand four hundred and seventy-three dollars. But the main resource relied upon by the Secretary of the Treasury to meet the demands upon the Treasury is the receipts from the customs and lands within the year. From the customs he estimates that there will be received, in the course of the year, nineteen millions, and from the sales of the public lands three millions and a half of dollars; making the aggregate receipts from the two sources twenty-two millions and a half of dollars. This amount, added to the aggregate sum of the smaller items of supply first enumerated, will make the total means of the Treasury during the year 1841, according to the statements and estimates of the Secretary, twenty-four millions seven hundred and thirteen thousand four hundred and seventy-three dollars. This amount, deducted from the twenty-nine million five hundred and sixty-two thousand seven hundred and forty-seven dollars, the amount which, as I have shown, will probably be demanded at the Treasury within the year, will leave a deficit amounting to four million eight hundred and forty-nine thousand two hundred and seventy-four dollars. Stated in the usual form, the account between the wants of the Treasury within the year and the supplies estimated by the Secretary will stand thus:

The probable amount of actual demands upon the Treasury within the year 1841 . . . $29,562,747

Means stated and estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, viz:

Amount which will be collected from debtor banks in the year 1841

$200,000

Amount which will be collected from miscellaneous sources . . . 80,000

Amount of Treasury notes which may be issued under act of 31st of March, 1840 . . . 342,618

Amount of the estimated balance in the Treasury at the close of the year 1840 . . . 1,590,855

Estimated amount of receipts from customs within the year 1841 . . . 19,000,000

Estimated amount from sales of public lands in the year 1841 . . . 3,500,000

Total of means stated and estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury . . . 24,713,473

Deficit . . . $4,849,274

It must be observed that the deficiency here stated will result, without leaving a balance of one cent in the Treasury to meet contingencies. But it is more important at present to analyze the nature and substance of the means stated by the Secretary of the Treasury; how much of them is cash, or equivalent to cash; and what portion of them consists of mere speculation, dependent upon conjectural estimates, which, in these times of great and sudden fluctuations, are seldom more than half equal to cash. The balance in the Treasury at the close of 1840, whatever it may be, and the authority to make a further issue of Treasury notes, are the only cash items in the whole budget of means brought forward by the Secretary of the Treasury. Of the twenty-four millions and upwards which he supposes will be received into the Treasury during the year, nineteen millions are dependent upon the amount of importations and the receipt of duties upon them. How does the Secretary arrive at the conclusion that the customs will yield this amount within the present year? Upon what information of large orders sent out or of increasing importations does he found this expectation? He does not tell; and I was surprised, not to say astonished, to hear the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means declare that he looked only to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury upon that point, and that he went no further; contenting himself with the observation that the Secretary was the chief officer of the Government entrusted with the management of the finances, that he was presumed to be the best informed upon this whole subject, and that he could not rely upon better authority. The honorable chairman did not even condescend to state the data in possession of the Secretary of the Treasury, and upon which he founded his estimate of the receipts from customs; nor did it appear to the House that the chairman himself had been so far honored and confided in by the Secretary as to communicate to him the information he had collected upon that subject. And has this House, the constitutional revenue-raising branch of the National Legislature, and has the Committee of Ways and Means, the appointed and trusted organ of the money-raising power of the House, "shrunk to this little measure?" It was not so of old! We are required not only to take the mere estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury as equal to cash in deciding upon the sufficiency of means to meet the demands upon the Treasury and to uphold the public credit within the year, but we are not even put in possession of the grounds upon which he makes them out. The Committee of Ways and Means, so far as we can see from their course in relation to this bill, have neither eyes to see, nor ears to hear, nor tongue to speak, any thing but as they are advised and directed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Can any gentleman on this floor for his life give any reason why the receipts from the customs in the present year should be estimated at nineteen millions instead of eighteen or twenty? Why, indeed, should they be set down at a greater amount than fifteen millions? A reasonable degree of certainty ought, at least, to be required when the faith and credit of the Government are to depend upon their estimates. The receipts from customs last year (1840) were thirteen millions and a half, ascertained and estimated. The receipts for this year are set down as good for five millions and a half more than they yielded last year. All the light we have received upon this subject since the date of the annual estimate is contained in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury read by the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the opening of this discussion. In that letter he informs the committee that the net receipts from the customs for the present (current) quarter of the year will not exceed three millions of dollars. This would indicate a considerable falling off from the original estimate. At this rate of quarterly receipts, the customs will not yield more than twelve millions of dollars; but my friend from Maine, who is a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, and who is better informed on this subject than I am, thinks the original estimate of the Secretary not too high, yet the argument employed by himself does not corroborate this conclusion. He stated that he thought the estimate of three millions for the first quarter of the year low enough, but he felt confident that the receipts for the two succeeding quarters of the year would be fifty per cent higher. Admit it to be so. The second and third quarter's revenue from customs will then amount to four millions and a half each, or nine millions of dollars for the two. Suppose also that the fourth and last quarter of the year will supply an equal amount, (a case not very supposable, considering the large reduction of duties which is to take place at the end of the year,) the total amount of receipts from customs would then be only sixteen millions and a half, an amount less than the original estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury by two and a half millions. I beg leave to say that I think the estimate of sixteen millions and a half quite high enough to be assumed as certain—so certain, that no provision need be made by law for supplying any deficiency in the revenue below that point, when we are deciding upon the necessary supplies for the support of Government, and maintaining the public faith during the year. The revenue from the customs may, indeed, turn out to be much greater than the original estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury. The precise amount of receipts from customs must always be subject to much uncertainty. I was quite confounded, when I heard the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, after he had, with the utmost complacency, declared his intention of relying upon the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury as the very best authority he could consult, and that we must take them as the basis of our supplies for the support of the public credit during the year; turn about and argue in direct terms that there was no sort of certainty in these estimates, nor could there be, from the nature of the source of this branch of the revenue—the commerce of the country, the fluctuations and revolutions of which being so great and irregular as to defy all calculation. "Happy," he said, "would the man be who could make a close approximation to the actual receipts" in his estimates. Yet, sir, it is these uncertain and unreliable estimates, and, in the case of the receipts from customs, assumed to exceed in the present year those of the last more than five millions of dollars, that we are to consider as a certain cash fund to meet actual demands upon the Treasury to their full amount within the year. What though it should turn out that the receipts from customs within the year may exceed nineteen millions, does that possibility weaken the argument that, in providing the ways and means to support the public faith and credit, we should make our estimates so moderate and reasonable, that if we err at all, we should err on the safe side, that we should be sure not to exceed the actual receipts? Every circumstance considered, which may and ought to influence the importations within the present year—the small stock of goods on hand, and the reviving trade and confidence on the one hand, and the danger of over importation on the eve of the great reduction of duties to occur so soon on the other—satisfies me that sixteen millions and a half is as high an estimate of the receipts from customs in the present year as can be safely relied on.

Another item of the Secretary's estimate, I believe, will turn out to be quite too high. I allude to the estimated receipts from public lands. He states them at three and a half millions. This is a much larger amount than appears to have been received within the past year. The receipts from this source in 1840 probably have not exceeded two and a half millions of dollars. Upon what theory of increasing prosperity—upon what just expectation of a sound and abundant circulating medium likely to be realized within the year 1841, does the Secretary base his calculations on this point? Do we not well know that the season of bank resumption is always one of diminished currency, of straitened means among the people? Again, sir: where are those tracts of new and fertile lands which are to be brought into market within the present year—what fine and virgin region is yet to be offered to the cupidity of the speculator, or to the more humble ambition of the pioneer and settler, which holds out the prospect of increased sales and receipts from that source within the present year? If I wanted evidence of the over estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to this branch of the revenue, I need go no further than his own more recent statements, contained in the letter read by the Committee of Ways and Means. In that letter he informed the committee that the receipts from public lands within the current quarter of the present year, will not exceed four hundred and fifty thousand dollars. At this rate the receipts of the whole year from that source, will not exceed one million eight hundred thousand dollars.

You, sir, [Mr. CASEY,] know that the expectations indulged by the Secretary on this subject are, and must be, delusive. If we receive two and a half millions from lands this year, we will do well.

I do not forget that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, holds out the prospect of an increase of receipts from the lands during the year from the adoption of the pre-emption and graduation policy—but this too is all a delusion—a humbug. It is only a continuation of that system of imposture with which the country has been so long misguided and lured on to the most injurious and destructive measures. The supporters of the pre-emption and graduation principles in the future sales of the public lands well know that the receipts from that source will not be increased to the amount of one cent within the year, even if they should succeed in carrying out the views they profess upon this subject at the present session. I go further. I say they not only do not expect any increase of means from that source, but they do not intend that there shall be any. If I am wrong in this statement, I challenge any gentleman who knows the contrary to rise in his place and correct me. No, sir, they know they have no intention of putting any additional means from this source into the Treasury within the present year. Yet we continually hear that the Treasury is to be replenished by the passage of a pre-emption law.

[Mr. HUBBARD of Alabama said that he intended that sales should be effected under the pre-emption law, if it should pass, during the present year, and he added that a large amount of the public lands had been surveyed and could be entered within the year.]

I do not undertake, said Mr. BELL, to speak of the views of every individual among the friends of the Administration, in or out of the House, upon this subject. I only speak of the aggregate intention and policy of the party now and lately in power; and I know them to be such as I now state, from the most conclusive facts and circumstances. But, let me ask the gentleman from Alabama, though he may not intend to prohibit prompt payment from the settler or the present owner of a farm, who may wish to buy adjoining lands, under the graduation principle, if he intends to compel immediate payments, or, rather, if he does not intend to give time? Does he not know that the determination is to give at least twelve months' credit to both the settlers and holders of adjoining lands? Sir, I have long been a close observer of their policy. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REYNOLDS] brought the subject of the graduation policy before the House at an early day of the session, and he made quite an effective speech upon the subject, but not a syllable did he utter to commit him to the policy of immediate sales and prompt payment. The pre-emption principle has been chiefly discussed in the Senate, and, although I have been kept from my place here by indisposition for several weeks, I have not lost sight of the important movements now making on the political chessboard. I have been so attentive to them that I am able to affirm with confidence that no money was intended to be brought into the Treasury, within the year, by the adoption of either of the measures alluded to.

[Here Mr. REYNOLDS rose and remarked that, as he had been alluded to, he would explain what he had said upon the subject of the public land if he was permitted.]

It is not necessary, said Mr. BELL. I have read the gentleman's speech, though I did not hear it. I understand him well. I will do him the justice to say that he is one of the most ingenious gentlemen in this House. He excels in the art of getting along with the people, if I may be allowed to convey in common phraseology the idea of superior tact and address in electioneering. But, at the same time, it ought to be borne in mind that many an honest and confiding people are most egregiously and grievously deceived and imposed upon by such talents. Yes, sir, I understand the gentleman's speech well enough, and there is nothing in it to contradict the views I have expressed. I have also noticed the shape of the pre-emption bill introduced in the other branch of Congress, and the course of the remarks made in its support. That but is a perfect model of legislative diplomacy. There is not a word in it that indicates the time of payment by the settlers. Yet I know that it is not intended that a single settler shall pay a dollar within the year, unless he does it voluntarily. Nor do I find fault with the policy of the friends of the bill in this respect. In the first place, good money is very scarce in the West, as every where else. If the banks do not resume, the money cannot be had, to any great extent; and the settler would lose his pre-emption right for the want of means, and his improvements would fall into the hands of speculators and capitalists from other sections of the country. On the other hand, if the banks should resume specie payments in the West, to require the settlers to pay for their lands immediately would shut them up again. So that either way great mischief would ensue.

But I undertake to say, if the door were thrown wide open, and it were in the power of the advocates of the graduation and pre-emption policy to carry out the plans which they profess to have so much at heart, at the present session, they would not do so. I have known them too long, and understand them too well, to believe they would settle both these questions at this time, if they could. For six continuous years have I warned the sincere and candid advocates of this change in our land system, that it was not meant by the great leaders to settle these questions for a series of years to come. I am not sure that the managers of this subject out of the House desire that the pre-emption bill should pass at the present session. To pass both, I am sure, is not designed, for that would exhaust their stock in trade; and the people in the far West could no longer be made the dupes of those who profess exclusive devotion to their interests. All agitation upon this subject would henceforward cease, and those who live and hope to rise by it would lose at once their occupation and their prospects. There are gentlemen present, and from the West, and who belong to the majority in this House, who know that I have expressed these views to them privately for the last six years. I do not mean to be understood, in these remarks, as being opposed to the pre-emption policy, or to the engrafting of the graduation principle upon our land system. On the contrary, I have been uniformly in favor of the pre-emption policy—believing it far better that the right should be enjoyed under legal sanctions than in violation of law. And I believe it will be expedient to adopt the graduation principle also. But, upon such questions, I think our laws should be fixed and permanent. Our policy ought to be proclaimed and established in advance of the settlement of the fine regions of the West, that are brought into market every year or two. This whole question ought to be settled, not only for the sake of the West, but for the honor of the country and its institutions.

I beg pardon of the committee for this digression. It is a subject too nearly allied to the one under debate to pass without any notice; and it was too full of immediate interest, in other aspects than that which relates to this question, to justify me in saying less upon it. My prime object was to show that we have no reason to expect any increase of receipts into the Treasury from the public lands within the year, by any change in the land system. I have already expressed the conviction that two millions and a half would be the maximum of receipts from that source within the year, or, at all events, that it would be unsafe to rely upon a greater amount.

If I have not erred in assuming that sixteen and a half millions of dollars from customs, and two and a half millions from lands, were the highest amounts which could be safely and confidently relied upon from these sources within the year, the means of the Treasury will be less than the Secretary estimated them by the sum of three millions and a half—that being the difference between his estimate of the receipts from customs and lands and the one I have stated and rely upon. This will, of course, show an increased deficit in the means of the Treasury in the year 1841; and instead of four million nine hundred and fourteen thousand six hundred and seventeen dollars, as before stated, there will be wanting eight million four hundred and sixteen thousand six hundred and seventeen dollars of additional means to meet the public engagements and actual demands upon the Treasury during the year 1841.

26TH CONG....2ND SESS.

Treasury Note Bill—Mr. Bell.

H. of Reps.

But this is not the whole amount of additional means which must be provided, if we intend to make full and adequate provision for the support of the public faith and credit. The large deficit I have just stated will arise without allowing a balance of one dollar in the Treasury to meet unexpected or contingent demands—not one cent to carry on the operations of the Mint. The Secretary of the Treasury himself informs us, in his annual report, that a less balance in the Treasury, at all times, than five or six millions of dollars is neither judicious nor safe; and he has earnestly invoked the attention of Congress to this point for the last three or four years. Gentlemen may differ as to what would be a proper excess of means over the estimated demands upon the Treasury within the year. It seems to me that what would be a safe rule with individuals of moderate fortunes or incomes, in the management of their private affairs, would hold good with a Government of moderate revenues and expenditures, like our own. A quarter's income or revenue should always be held in reserve to meet those emergencies which often arise in the affairs both of individuals and Governments. Five millions, by this rule, would not exceed a proper allowance for the Government. This provision of a suitable balance in the Treasury will then make a total deficit in the means of the Treasury during the year of thirteen million four hundred and sixteen thousand six hundred and seventeen dollars. This statement of the true condition of the Treasury will be better understood by assuming the usual synoptical form:

Deficit in the means of the Treasury according to the estimate of receipts from customs and lands, submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury,	$4,916,617
Add for error in the estimate of the receipts from customs and lands in the year 1841, being the difference between twenty-two millions and a half, his estimate of means derivable from both sources, and nineteen millions, the highest estimate that can be safely relied upon	3,500,000
Add for suitable and expedient balance in the Treasury	5,000,000
Total deficit	$13,416,617

But it is proposed to authorize the issue of five millions of Treasury notes by the present bill. Suppose the bill passed; there would still be a deficiency, after deducting that amount, of nearly eight millions and a half. When we advert to the large claims upon the Government growing out of the Florida war and the execution of Indian treaties, which we hear of every day, and which it is now so manifest it has been the policy of the Administration to defer the settlement of to some more propitious time, there can scarcely be a doubt that the real deficiency in the Treasury during the present year, if the credit and justice of the Government be properly upheld, will not fall short of fifteen millions of dollars. I feel quite sure there are existing claims or demands upon the Government in the quarters I have indicated more than sufficient to balance any error into which I may have been betrayed by my zeal in my estimate of the receipts and expenditures in the present year.

Before I close my remarks upon this branch of the subject, I wish to advert for a moment to the not unusual, though extravagant—not to say ridiculous—assumption of the friends of the Administration, that this bill is only intended to anticipate the resources of the Treasury within the year. The idea is actually held out by the terms of the bill, that these five millions may be redeemed within the present year. And the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means rehearses the old story, "that the resources of the Treasury are still ample enough, and it is only intended to anticipate them for a short period." If this is any thing else but downright mockery or burlesque, it supposes that the receipts from customs and lands within the year, instead of amounting to twenty-two millions and a half, according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, will amount to twenty-seven and a half millions. But, sir, old habits are hard to overcome. For the last three years, the necessity of these Treasury note bills was saddled upon the poor banks, crippled and broken down as many of them were by the policy of the late and present Administrations. The story went, if the banks would only pay what they owed the Government, there would be no use for Treasury notes. That fund having been exhausted it has become necessary to invent some other pretext. Now, it is said that the receipts from customs and lands flow into the Treasury in the first quarter of the year too slowly to meet the immediate demands upon it. The artifice is too shallow. The country is no longer deceived by it.

But, Mr. Chairman, if the condition of the Treasury in the present year is gloomy enough, what are we to think of the year 1842? With a debt of at least ten millions entailed upon the Treasury in that year, growing out of the deficiencies of the present, and a revenue from customs reduced five millions below the probable receipts of this year, or yielding not more than ten or eleven millions, what does our duty require of us at this point of time? After December, 1841, says the Secretary of the Treasury in his Annual Report, a reduction of duties under the existing tariff will take effect to the amount of about two millions and a half of dollars. On the 1st of July afterwards, (1842) "at least two millions and a half more of duties will be removed." "If the imports, then," continues the Secretary, "should not differ much from those of 1838, this would leave an income from them not probably exceeding ten or eleven millions of dollars yearly." Eleven millions from customs and three millions from lands, which would be a liberal estimate of receipts from that source, will make the aggregate revenue for the year 1842 not more than fourteen millions of dollars. Until the Navy, now almost in a state of general dilapidation, and the other public defences, are put upon a respectable and safe footing; and especially while our relations with Great Britain remain in their present unsettled condition, I take it for granted that the annual and current expenditures of the Government, exclusive of the public debt incurred by the present Administration, cannot fall below twenty millions of dollars; though, under other circumstances, they might be reduced to seventeen or eighteen millions. Here, then, is exhibited a certain and inevitable deficiency in the future annual revenues of the Government to the amount of five or six millions of dollars. The public debt or deficiency already existing, and which must constitute a charge upon the receipts of next year, we have seen, exceeds ten millions—making together at least fifteen millions of dollars, which must be provided for to meet the deficiency in the revenue of 1842. It will not surprise me, sir, if the deficiency in the means of the Treasury next year shall be twenty millions; but I will suppose, for the present, that it will not exceed fifteen millions. This state of things, it would seem, ought to sink all partisan feelings, and unite both sides of the House in an effort to provide, in advance, for a deficiency which cannot but be embarrassing to the Government and to the country generally. But, instead of finding the majorities of the two Houses of Congress engaged in making an adequate and necessary provision for the support of Government during the next and succeeding years, what do we behold? The veteran leaders, nothing daunted by past adventures and miscarriages, and with all the animation and hope that belong to youth and new enterprises, are renewing their bids for the American PURPLE. They are ready to dispose of the public domain at any price that will assure to them the great reward they aspire to. Nothing seems of sufficient interest and importance to occupy their attention but pre-emption and graduation bills. The agitation, at least, upon these subjects, must not be permitted to slumber. The future and certain embarrassments of the Treasury scarcely receive a passing thought from them.

The time has come, sir, in my opinion, when we should think seriously of making some permanent provision upon this subject. It is premature, in the opinion of some, to legislate upon this subject.

That depends upon the remedy which it is most expedient to adopt. If it shall be thought the best and wisest policy to supply the anticipated deficiency in the revenue by the use of the credit of the Government—in the continuation of a public debt, either in the disguise of Treasury notes, or more openly by loan—then I admit the necessity of immediate legislation is not so clear. But the idea of public debt appears to be totally repudiated by the present majority in Congress. An admitted and undisguised public debt, whatever may be thought of one under color of Treasury notes, is so abhorrent to their feelings, that in no emergency which can arise in time of peace will they countenance it. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, condemns, in the most unqualified manner, the use of Treasury notes as a means of providing for a permanent deficiency in the revenue, such as he says will take place in 1842. What other alternatives are presented to our choice? Direct taxes; such a retrenchment of the public expenditures as will bring them down to the reduced revenues of the Government; or such a revision of the existing tariff as will supply the anticipated deficiency. Direct taxes appear to have few advocates of late. All seem to consider that remedy wholly inadmissible. If there be any who entertain different views on this point, they ought now to bring them forward. If a retrenchment of the public expenditures can be effected without injury to the public service, to such extent as to bring them down to the standard of the annual revenue without the imposition of new duties upon foreign goods of any kind, that would undoubtedly be the most appropriate remedy. But if a revision of the tariff shall be considered the appropriate remedy, I shall contend that the earliest day we can proceed to act upon the subject will be the fittest, if indeed it is not absolutely indispensable we should do so in order to avoid great confusion and embarrassment to the commercial as well as the financial interests of the country.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, expresses the opinion that the choice of remedies will be between "some large reduction of expenditures"—"vigorous system of retrenchment," and "some modifications of the present tariff." His favorite scheme is the reduction of the expenditures to the standard of the revenue as it will be in 1842, without a revision of the tariff or new taxes of any kind. Is the scheme of bringing down the annual expenditures at once to fourteen millions of dollars practicable? If the honorable Secretary is sincere in the expression of his sentiments upon this point, what assurance has he furnished the public of his sincerity in the course of his administration of the Treasury? While General Jackson was in power, he was one of his most efficient advisers and advocates. So also has he been of his successor. He has been six years at the head of the Treasury. Yet in the period of their joint terms the expense of the collection of the customs alone has increased from about seven hundred thousand to a million and a half of dollars. The honorable Secretary maintains in his annual report that, if the reductions in the expenditures be "pushed vigorously," "it would supersede the necessity" "either of a higher tariff, direct taxes, or permanent debts." What branches of the public expenditure does the Secretary propose to retrench, so as to bring them down at once four or five millions below his estimates for the present year? He favors us with no specifications on this point. Let us see if we can infer them from his past labors in the work of retrenchment. He informs us that considerable retrenchments have already been made in the public expenditures, within the last two years especially. The President, in his last annual message, makes the same statement, and dwells upon it with much complacency; and he, too, appears to be pleased with the prospect of future curtailment in the public expenditures. I propose to examine the character and circumstances of these boasted retrenchments. The President assumes to himself great merit upon the subject of economy, and claims to have commenced a system of retrenchment from the time he came into office in 1837. He states that "the severe revulsion in the commerce and business of the country, pointing with unerring certainly to a great and protracted reduction in the revenue, strengthened the propriety of the earliest practicable reduction of the public expenditures." "The attention of every department of the Government was immediately directed to that end, and has been so continued to the present moment." Let us test the correctness of this statement of the President by the prominent features of his administration in the years 1837 and 1838, connected with the public expenditures and finances. Between four and five thousand troops were called or admitted and continued in the service in Florida more than the Commanding General recommended as useful or necessary; and, consequently, upwards of two millions and a half of dollars were expended in that war in the course of that year, in addition to the four millions which had been appropriated by Congress before the new Administration commenced—thus making the whole expenditure for that service in the year 1837 amount to seven and a half millions of dollars. In December, 1837, the Secretary of the Treasury included in his annual estimates for the service of the year 1838 appropriations to the amount of six hundred and sixty-four thousand dollars for the construction of roads, and one million and sixty-five thousand dollars for the improvement of harbors, rivers, &c. and Congress actually voted to both these classes of objects upwards of a million and a half of dollars.

For the services of the Florida war, in 1838, there were appropriated and expended upwards of six millions of dollars. In December, 1838, we find the Secretary of the Treasury once more presenting his annual estimates of appropriations for the service of 1839, including the sum of five hundred and eighty-seven thousand dollars for roads, and one million seven hundred and thirteen thousand six hundred and ninety dollars for harbors, rivers, &c. I refer to the estimates of the Treasury in this branch of the public expenditures to show that the President and his Secretary did not then consider roads, harbors, and rivers proper objects of retrenchment under the orders which he states he gave to the Departments in 1837, to carry out in good faith the policy of "the earliest practicable reduction of the public expenditure." In his annual message of 1837, he stated that "it seemed proper in the condition of the country, to have the estimates on all subjects made as low as practicable, without prejudice to any great public measure." "The Departments were therefore directed to prepare the estimates accordingly," and he was "happy to find that they had been able to graduate them on so economical a scale." It is curious to trace the progress of this new-born passion for economy in its operation on the measures and recommendations of the President. We have seen that the estimates and appropriations for roads, rivers, and harbors for the service of the year 1838 (the first year over the expenditures of which, as the President states in another part of his message, he had any control) amounted to upwards of a million and a half of dollars. In the same year more than six millions were appropriated and expended in the Florida war. It was also in the same year that, in pursuance of the recommendation of the President, the rank and file of the regular army was increased from about eight to between twelve and thirteen thousand men; thus imposing upon the country a new and permanent charge of nearly a million of dollars. In the same year, and upon the express recommendation of the President, the staff of the army and the ordnance corps were also reorganized and enlarged, and forty-seven new officers added to the military and topographical corps of engineers, in order, chiefly, to secure a more effective superintendence of works of internal improvement. So much for the reductions effected by Mr. Van Buren and his economical Secretary in the first two years of the present Administration.

The President may with some more propriety advert to the reductions which have taken place within the last two years; but let us see what credit he may properly take to himself on that score. At the first session of Congress which followed the enlargement of the military and topographical corps, a majority of Congress rejected the entire estimates for works of that nature. And in the next annual message of the President, we find a corresponding change in his tone and language with regard to retrenchment and economy. In his message of December of 1839, he informs Congress that he had "directed the estimates for 1840 to be subjected to the severest scrutiny, and to be limited to the absolute requirements of the public service." I will not stop here to inquire how much below the prescribed standard of 1840 the public expenditures can be properly reduced in order to square with the revenue in 1842. I will simply ask how it was that in the fall of 1839 the necessity for reduced estimates and expenditures was so much more imperative than it was in 1837. We were borrowing money and issuing Treasury notes in 1837, and again in 1838, at the rate of ten millions per annum. The expenses, also, of the Florida war, were then kept at their maximum. It is apparent, therefore, whatever the President may declare to the contrary, that there was no serious effort to reduce the public expenditures within the two first years of his Administration.

Let us inquire into the nature and extent of the reductions which have taken place in 1839 and 1840. The President in his last annual message boasts that the expenditures of 1839 were reduced six millions below those of 1838. That was a most wonderful performance, indeed. How was it brought about? In 1838, as we have seen, there were upwards of six millions expended upon the Florida war; and upon roads, rivers, and harbors, a million and a half. In the year 1839, there were expended in the Florida war one million eight hundred thousand dollars only, and upon roads, rivers, and harbors, nothing at all; so that the difference between these two items of expenditure in the two years (1838 and 1839) comes within three hundred thousand dollars of the whole saving in 1839, so much vaunted of by the President and his supporters. The operation was effected simply by reducing the number of troops in Florida in 1839, without any favorable change in the circumstances of the war, and the voting down by Congress of all the appropriations included in the annual estimates for internal improvements. This may be stated as the sum total of the President's merits on this score.

But the President claims to have reduced the expenditures of 1840 two or three millions below those of 1839. Let us see how this may be accounted for. There were appropriated for the service of the Florida war in 1839 one million eight hundred thousand dollars, as already stated, but for the same service in 1840 only three hundred thousand dollars. This would make a difference in the expenses of the two years of a million and a half of dollars. It now appears that half a million of dollars were expended in the Florida war in 1840, which was not provided for in the appropriations of that year, and which, of course, will increase the amount of expenditures for that year by that sum. The appropriations for fortifications and the ordnance service in the year 1839 were one million one hundred and fifty-two thousand dollars, which were nearly all expended in that year, while out of more than one million seven hundred thousand dollars appropriated to the same objects in 1840, not quite half a million was expended in that year. There was, therefore, a difference in the expenditures of the two years upon these three objects alone, viz: the Florida war, fortifications, and ordnance service, of upwards of two millions of dollars.

But, says the President in his last message, the expenditures in 1840 will appear to be nine or ten millions less than those of 1837. Let us see how this was effected, and what credit the President can justly claim on that account. The expenditures for the Florida war in 1837, as has already been stated, amounted to seven and a half millions of dollars. Upon roads, rivers, harbors, &c. and upon new light houses, the public documents will show an expenditure in that year of three million two hundred and ninety-six thousand dollars, making together the sum of ten million seven hundred and ninety-six thousand dollars. The expenditures upon similar objects in 1840 did not exceed the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars, and this was confined to the Florida war alone. Thus is the extraordinary difference between the expenditure of 1837 and of 1840 fully accounted for, simply by the curtailment of the expenses of the Florida war, and the refusal of Congress to make any appropriations for internal improvements of any kind. The only retrenchment worth notice, therefore, in what has been considered, for the last twelve years, the ordinary and current expenditures of the Government, has been the withholding of all appropriations for the Cumberland road, for the improvement of the great navigable rivers, the harbors upon the Atlantic and Lake frontier, and the building of new light houses for the convenience and safety of commerce. The next most considerable retrenchments have been effected in the expenditures upon the navy, the fortifications and other establishments connected with the public defences—the most deserving, the most suffering, and the most important of all objects of public expenditure. All other retrenchments, especially such as looked to the reduction of offices and agencies, or the emoluments connected with them, have not exceeded fifty thousand dollars, nor do I know that so much has been retrenched in that branch of the public expenditure.

It would be easy to demonstrate from the Executive documents that the system of retrenchment, meagre as it was, entered upon two years ago, in respect to the Navy, the Ordnance department, and the defences of the frontiers, Atlantic, Lake, and interior Western, has been carried into execution in opposition to the earnest remonstrances of every scientific and patriotic servant of the public, both military and naval; that after the engineers superintending the works in progress for the public defence had cut down their estimates to the lowest point consistent with the necessary progress of the works to prevent dilapidation, the Heads of Departments actually reduced them still lower, in order to comply with their arbitrary standard of expediency and economy. In December, 1839, when the chief of the engineer corps demanded one million, one hundred and ninety-eight thousand dollars for fortifications, to be expended in 1840, as the least that the public service would admit, consistently with the idea of sensible progress upon the works deemed most essential to the safety of our opulent cities and other exposed points on the frontier, and, of course, concerning deeply the honor as well as safety of the country, the Secretary of War first reduced them three hundred thousand dollars, and the Committee of Ways and Means finally reported no more than two hundred and ninety-eight thousand dollars! Such has been the contracted and impolitic character of the retrenchment with which these recent converts to reform have commenced their work. The navy and the other public defences appear to be the only destined victims of their system. And this, too, at a period when we not only have frequent alarms of war with the most powerful nation in the world, but when we know that the pending subjects of controversy with that power are involved in so much difficulty that it may not be in our power to avoid a war by the practice of the greatest caution.

I trust, sir, that these two nations are too enlightened to suffer themselves to be plunged into a war, on account of interests really so inconsiderable as those in dispute. But when we reflect that wars oftener arise out of mere points of honor and of supposed or actual insults to national pride than from any greater causes, we have no guaranty for the continuance of pacific relations between the two countries. In view, apparently, of a possible rupture with England, the annual message of the President in December, 1839, contained an earnest invocation to a vigorous prosecution of the system of defence recommended by our military and naval officers. That message contains this passage:

"The present condition of the defences of our principal seaports and navy yards, as represented by the accompanying report of the Secretary of War, calls for the early and serious attention of Congress."

Yet, strange to tell, in the same message, the President directs that the estimates for the year 1840 should be subjected to the severest scrutiny, and that they should be limited to the absolute requirements of the public service; and when we also bear in mind that it was in the appropriations for the same year (1840) upon the estimates made out in December, 1839) that the extraordinary reduction from about twelve hundred thousand dollars, demanded for fortifications, to a little less than three hundred thousand dollars, took place, it must be admitted by all that there has been neither sincerity in the professions, nor system or consistency in the recommendations and measures of the Administration on this subject.

As to the policy of lopping off about two millions of the usual expenditures upon the Cumberland road, rivers, harbors, &c. there is a diversity of opinion and interest. The sections immediately interested, of course, feel the strongest objections. I do not mean to enter on a discussion of the expediency or justice of this retrenchment. I have long thought that these improvements, if carried on at all, should be subject to some fixed and known rules—some system which should give a proper assurance that the objects were such as required by their utility and national character the aid of the General Government. But how do these views and the recent course of the Administration stand with their former practice? In the year 1838, as has been already stated, the military and topographical corps of engineers were largely increased upon the recommendation of the President, with express reference to the continuation of these works, the utter abandonment and condemnation of which is assumed as a high and patriotic virtue in 1839 and 1840.

It is pretended that the President and the party to which he belongs since 1839 have been guided in their public course by the Republican maxims of a strict construction of the Constitution and a rigid economy in the public expenditures; and they are now proclaimed as virtuous and consistent reformers, for having dispensed with all appropriations for the Cumberland road, rivers, harbors, &c. If any one is disposed to test their consistency and principles by their course in relation to the Cumberland road, let him remember that, since Mr. Van Buren came into office he has signed and approved of appropriations to that road to the amount of nine hundred and fifty-seven thousand dollars; and that General Jackson, before him, approved of a similar disposition of the public moneys, amounting to three million two hundred thousand dollars, making an aggregate of upwards of four millions expended upon this road since General Jackson came into power. If the improvement of harbors, rivers, &c. is preferred as a test, then be it remembered that Mr. Van Buren, in his brief term of power, has approved bills granting three millions six hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars to these objects, and that General Jackson, in the course of his administration, sanctioned the appropriation of six million four hundred thousand dollars to like objects, making an aggregate of upwards of ten millions of dollars expended upon such works during the administrations of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren. It would be useless to comment at length upon these facts. The Cumberland road, after an expenditure, altogether, since its commencement, of six or seven millions of dollars, (being nearly finished throughout the whole extent of one great State, and remaining half finished in two others,) appears destined to stand a magnificent monument of national caprice and folly. The numerous works for the improvement of harbors upon the lakes, in various stages of progress, which have cost the country so much treasure, with the full approbation of the leaders of the party now in power, remain exposed to utter loss and destruction from the winds and the waves. It would seem to me that gentlemen whose consciences had been pliant enough to apply so many millions to these objects already, might, without any greatly increased responsibility, have stretched them a little further, and completed what they had begun at so much cost to the country. But it seems they have discovered that it is better that the millions which have already been expended should become a total loss than that their principles of economy and constitutional construction should any longer suffer violation. What a pity this, when we reflect that more money was utterly wasted in a single campaign in Florida than would be required to finish the Cumberland road, and in the whole war quite enough to finish all the works projected for the improvement of the lake navigation.

I have pursued this subject of retrenchment, which has made so great a figure in the Executive messages and reports for the last two years, into some details, that I might discover, if possible, what branches of the public expenditure might be still further retrenched in the prosecution of the "vigorous" system of reduction recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, in order to limit the annual expenditures to the sum of thirteen or fourteen millions of dollars in 1842 and succeeding years. Reductions in the navy, in fortifications, and the ordnance service, can go no further, unless these branches of the public defence are intended to share the fate of the lake harbors and other works of a similar nature. Seeing the course of the Administration with regard to appropriations for the public defences, it may surprise gentlemen who have not turned their attention to this subject, to be informed that an elaborate and able report was made to the Senate at the last session of Congress by a board of able, skilful, and experienced officers attached to the military service, in which they state that a further expenditure of at least fifteen millions of dollars will be required to complete what may be called a reasonable, a good system of defence upon our Atlantic, Northern, and inland frontiers, including ordnance and the necessary armament of fortifications. Not a perfect system—far from it; but such a one as may save our large towns and border settlements from plunder and devastation, and the national honor from deep disgrace upon a sudden outbreak of war. The Board of Naval Officers at the same time report that it would require an expenditure of upwards of fifty-five millions to place the navy proper, the navy yards, depots, &c. &c. including large supplies of timber, &c. in a condition to commence a war. If this estimate should exceed the resources of the country, still, when we reflect upon the increasing armaments of other and rival powers, and the still extending circle of their acquisitions in every part of the world; and especially when we contemplate the magnitude of American interests, the extent and value of our foreign commerce, which depend for their protection, their very existence, upon our naval establishment, we cannot doubt that that the country will sanction a liberal measure of appropriations to this favorite branch of the public service. Into what other department of the public expenditure, then, does the Secretary expect to push his system of reduction? I need not say, sir, that I regard the opinion expressed by the Secretary of the Treasury upon this point as an unworthy pretension to economy, which, under the circumstances of the country, and in view of his own past conduct, must be considered by all as hollow, and merely intended to catch the applause of the ignorant.

The only alternative, then, which remains for supplying the prospective deficiency in the revenue is a revision of the existing tariff. Certain auxiliary means or remedies of some importance, it is true, are recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. I allude to the correction of the undue and disproportioned allowances of drawbacks upon certain articles, the reduction of fishing bounties; but, above all, the prevention of the gross evasions and frauds alleged to be practised under the present tariff. If these corrections should take place, it is assumed that a considerable increase of revenue might be expected under the existing tariff of duties. Why, then, have not these remedies been urged with appropriate zeal by those gentlemen who are so averse to the imposition of any new duties, to any new taxes, even upon silks and wines? Why have these patriotic defenders of Southern interests stood so long silent and indifferent spectators? Why have not the Committee of Ways and Means moved in this business? These evils are now of long standing. Where are the bills reported from that committee for their correction? or, if reported, when have they been pressed upon the consideration of this House? It is a subject peculiarly and appropriately within the jurisdiction of the Committee of Ways and Means. We have had repeated and continued applications for new loans or the issue of Treasury notes to supply deficiencies in the means of the Treasury; but when, I repeat, have we seen any movement which looked to a permanent supply? Have we not seen, sir, this subject of evasions and frauds in the collection of the revenue—this continued violation of existing laws—quietly surrendered, session after session, to the Committee on Manufactures, of which the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] is chairman, as if there was no interest in the country concerned in the due execution of the laws, or the faithful collection of the revenue, but that of the manufacturer? The times, indeed, are sadly out of joint when such things may be, and yet attract no serious notice—excite no surprise. How long, sir, will this state of things be patiently tolerated by any portion of the people of this country?

It is quite of a piece with the same system of omission and disregard for every thing which looks to the due enforcement of existing revenue laws, that now, when a national debt is rejected and denounced as a policy alike injurious and dangerous—when direct taxes are either wholly disapproved or known to be condemned by public sentiment—when a large and permanent deficiency in the revenue of the next and succeeding years is not only foreseen but acknowledged by the Secretary himself—when, in the present state of the establishments designed for the public defence, it is clear that an immediate reduction of the annual expenditures to the standard of the future revenue (to fourteen millions of dollars) is impracticable—and when a revision of the tariff is the only remaining alternative for supplying the deficit—we should be stunned by a sudden outcry against the imposition of new duties upon any articles whatever. We are told, if we proceed in that direction we shall find a "lion in our path"—that a high protective tariff will inevitably be the result—that there can be no medium, no middle ground, between a modification of the existing tariff and a renewal of the odious policy of 1828 in all its rigor—that the whole South ought to take instant alarm and meet this question on the threshold. I do not mean to argue this question in detail, sir. I only desire to place the unreasonableness—the absurdity of the course of our opponents upon this subject, in such a light as to make them obvious to the most careless observer. I need not say, sir, that, in any revision of the tariff contemplated by me, I look to the increase only upon some, and the imposition of new duties upon such other articles as may be taxed consistently with the compromise act of 1833, and, in doing so, to lay the charge chiefly upon such articles as are commonly regarded as luxuries.

There is one observation, Mr. Chairman, not directly connected with the subject under discussion, and partaking rather more of a party nature than any thing I have before said, that appears to me so appropriate while upon this point, that I cannot forbear to make it before I sit down. In the leading public journals, in the speeches and addresses of notorious partisans, both in and out of this House, we have heard and read repeated charges against the party which so signally triumphed at the late election, against the Whigs as an aggregate body, that they owe their success to the perpetration of the most stupendous frauds, and the intervention of foreign influence—to the potency of a foreign money power, to British gold; that the leading and prominent members, indeed, of the Whig party are but the tools and instruments of foreign interests—traitors to the honor and welfare of their own country, and the saviors of foreign corruption. American institutions, their efficiency, their value, their stability, are in consequence depreciated, derided, and scandalized all over Europe, while many of the same journals, the same artful and prominent leaders throughout the Southern and Southwestern sections of the Union are, at the self same time, often in the self same harangues, with equal vehemence, with equal assurance and confidence of success in rousing the prejudices and blinding the judgments, denouncing the Whig party as got up and cemented mainly by Northern interests; that their grand purpose all along has been to reconstruct the famous American system upon its old foundations; and that, besides a splendid and costly system of internal improvements, the Southern and planting interests are once more to groan under renewed restrictions and burdens upon foreign commerce, and the intolerable weight of high protective duties, laid to enrich the manufacturers of the North and East. The meaning of all this, sir, when properly interpreted, is, that we are no longer to consume the products of British capital and British industry; that we are about to set bounds to the system of foreign credit, which subjects both our domestic trade and currency to such ruinous vicissitudes and revulsions; in short, that instead of upholding the policy which only enriches the foreign capitalist, increases the wealth and financial resources of rival nations abroad, we design to adopt a system of home production and policy which will tend materially to reduce and cripple the energies of Great Britain and other foreign nations with whom we have any considerable commercial connections. If these adverse and contradictory charges be true, the Whigs will certainly be the most arrant and ungrateful knaves recorded in history: for while they are indebted to foreign gold and foreign influences for their present triumph, it would seem that they had determined to use the first moments of their power to make unrelenting war upon the interests of their foreign patrons and friends. We are in the habit of regarding ourselves, Mr. Chairman, the most enlightened people in the world; and, taking the people as a whole, I believe we are so. But that such downright absurdities and nonsense should pass current for rational and probable truths, and that any of our leading statesmen should condescend to practise such impostures, shows that we are yet far in the rear of that degree of enlightenment which the due efficiency and preservation of our free system require.

I shall conclude, Mr. Chairman, with repeating the sentiment with which I set out. If those who are in the majority in Congress desire to avoid the inconvenience and exposure of a called session of Congress, they have it in their power to do it. They must, in the first place, make adequate provision for the deficiency in the revenues and means of the Treasury the present year. To do this they must authorize the issue of ten millions of Treasury notes at least; when they have done this, if it is decided that the increased deficiency of the next year ought to be provided for by a revision of the tariff, they should set to work to effect that object at the present session. It will be too late at the commencement of the next regular session to provide by tariff regulations for any deficiency in the revenue for 1842. No bill for that purpose would probably pass until four or five months of the session had elapsed. All such regulations, furthermore, must be prospective. In the mean time, the country will be flooded with the importation of free goods in anticipation of the charges about to be laid upon them. The whole trade and business of the country will be in danger of being thrown into confusion and disorder; and as to any deficit in the means of the Treasury in that year, the only remedy which will then be in our power will be a loan, more Treasury notes, or a national debt. All these inconveniences will result if we fail to act early in the present year, and all the responsibility for them will rest upon those who have the power to anticipate and avoid them, but fail or refuse to exercise it.

SPEECH OF MR. THOMPSON,

OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, January 21, 1841.—On the bill to authorize the issue of Treasury notes.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the bill making provision for the issue of five millions of Treasury notes—

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON, of South Carolina, addressed the committee as follows:

It is not my purpose again to discuss the constitutional power of Congress to issue Treasury notes, intended to circulate as a currency. It is not necessary for any practical purpose that I should do so; and, if it was, I should regard it as a work altogether superfluous until the arguments heretofore made on that point have been answered, which, as yet, has not been done. I have no wish to disturb the self-complacency of the Secretary, nor to controvert the assertion in his report of the "financial ability" with which he says, with equal truth and delicacy, "the affairs of the country have been managed by him." Considering his present peculiar condition, he is entitled to some indulgence, as he has been tried, and all that remains to him is "to show cause why the sentence of the law should not be pronounced;" and in all such cases much latitude is allowed. The honorable Secretary congratulates the country that, "notwithstanding some depressions in particular branches of business, or in particular places, the general prosperity has been such as to create a large surplus of products, and to enable us to send abroad immense and increased values of them, however great the complaints have been as to low prices."

I certainly do not envy the man who, having charge of the most responsible office in the Government—one which wields a power over the currency and business of the country little short of absolute autocracy—and who, by a series of experiments, recklessly and ignorantly made, has reduced the public Treasury to bankruptcy—carried insolvency and misery into the abodes of affluence and happiness—waged an unceasing and Vandal war upon commerce and credit—repeating his blows before the flesh had ceased to quiver from those already inflicted, having at last reduced our importations almost one-third by destroying, not the wants of our people for foreign commodities, but their ability to purchase them, and reduced the value of every one of the products of our industry—now coolly congratulates the country that he has not also destroyed the physical ability to labor and produce—that the limbs and sinews of our people are left uncrushed—that they still labor industriously—although, it is true, they get very little for the productions of that labor.

We have been told by the Chairman of the Ways and Means that this measure is only temporary, and that these notes will be redeemed within the year. If that honorable gentleman will turn to his speech at the last session, on a similar proposition, he will find that he told us the very same thing and "in ipsissimis verbis." I then, as now, said that it was not true, and that no one intelligent of the condition of the country could think so. And what has been the result? But the honorable member says, who could have anticipated such a falling off in the customs?—who could have anticipated such a curtailment of importation? I answer, every man in the United States of any intelligence, except the Secretary. This, as far as I am concerned, is no ex post facto prophecy. In a speech made early in the last session I used this language:

"The receipts into the Treasury will be less, very much less, than the Secretary estimates, and the expenditures much greater than those estimates. The revenue from customs for the first quarter, which was estimated at $3,600,000, will not be one million, and the prospect for the future is not more cheering. Goods will not be imported, for many reasons. There are more goods now in the country than are needed in a healthy condition of commerce and currency, very many more than can be sold at all, as things are. To whom is the importing merchant to sell these goods? To the country merchant. To whom is he in turn to sell them? To the people. If he does, he will not receive payment. They want the goods, but they have no money to buy them. No, sir, instead of duties on imports, we are destined to drawbacks on exports. The goods cannot be sold, and the only alternative is to re-export them, or let them rot on the shelves."

The two identical things have occurred which were predicted—a diminution of imports, and increase of drawbacks. The account in the report of the Secretary, after the events, with a change of a very few words, is the same as my confident prediction before; and yet he regards it as a great wonder; and the chairman of the Ways and Means most innocently exclaims, who could have anticipated this? I answer, any one, not wilfully blind. We wanted foreign goods, it is true, but we wanted also the ability to buy them. The great law of demand and supply governs this, as all the other operations of commerce. But what is demand? It is not simply the wants of a community, but it is compounded of those wants, and an ability to buy. The Comanche Indians, no doubt, need fifty millions of merchandise, but they have not the means of buying. Would any one, then, say that there was a demand there for these fifty millions? Certainly not. The severe and protracted pressure which we have been suffering, has cut down the consumption of every class of society to the lowest possible point. Never has there been a greater revolution in the personal circumstances and habits of a people—a change almost instantaneous from repulsion to inanition—from profuse indulgence to a parsimonious economy. Men have been restrained to the pressing wants of absolute necessity. What wonder, then, that importations have been diminished as the market has been reduced, and that the public lands have remained unsold to a people who have had no money to purchase them. But it was not at the last session alone that we were told that these loans were only temporary. It has been the uniform language which has been held to us. I well remember that more than two years ago my colleague [Mr. RHETT] read me a severe lecture, because I preferred a loan—an honest, bona fide, constitutional loan—to this fraudulent, deceptive, and unconstitutional measure. He was amazed that I, a Southern man, should be in favor of a public debt. I could not then, as I cannot now, see any difference in that particular between a debt contracted by the issuing of certificates of stock, bearing five per cent. interest, and the issue of Treasury notes to the same amount, bearing five per cent. interest. I could not see that it was the less a debt when the obligation was precisely the same, because these obligations were written on different kinds of paper, and with different engravings and devices, nor because, in the case of stock, we should have one hundred creditors, instead of, by this measure, five thousand. But I did see another, and, to me, not an unimportant difference; the one was a measure clearly constitutional, the other palpably and dangerously unconstitutional. And what was the reply—the single and only reply? Why, it was this: that the loan would be a permanent debt, and that these notes would be redeemed probably in three, certainly in six months. How has the result falsified this calculation? And yet the very same men, one and all, with a modest self-complacency—I had almost said with cool assurance—come and make to us, with an air of oracular confidence, the very same predictions which the result has already thrice falsified. I am opposed to these temporary and unconstitutional expedients to raise money—this spendthrift course of not looking one month ahead to anticipate the exigency, but providing for it under present and extreme pressure, and then only providing for it, not by paying, but by changing the form of the debt; this Jeremy Diddler policy of living from hand to mouth, and depending forever on the last resource of all reckless spendthrifts, of borrowing or giving a note; and, I repeat, that the financial ability of the present Secretary seems to be summed up in the rare art of giving a note. No, sir, let us come up to the work. Let us meet the emergency with the firmness and intelligence of statesmen, and provide permanent means for meeting a permanent deficit in the revenues, and abandon this course of temporary expedients as dishonoring in the end to the credit and character of a Government as it is to those of an individual. That there will be a deficiency of means to meet the demands on the Treasury, I cannot suppose that any one doubts. It has already been demonstrated by those who have preceded me, and if I again advert, however briefly, to that branch of the subject, it is not with the idle and unnecessary purpose of showing the inaccuracies of the Secretary, his want of intelligence, or his want of candor. That would be to pile Pelion upon Ossa—one more added to the multitude of his mistakes would not even be noticed; if any one of his estimates has been verified, by results for the last three years, I am ignorant of it. Certain it is that mistake is the general rule—accuracy the exception. I do not in the least doubt that Mr. Woodbury will leave the Treasury twenty millions in debt. I am certain fifteen millions. Will the accruing revenue support the Government, however economical, and pay this debt? It will not. I do not believe that those revenues will even meet the current expenses of the Government, even if things stand as they are, without any of those extraordinary demands to which a wise forecast should look. It was said by the member from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] that it seemed that these estimates were manufactured with a view to square the receipts with the disbursements. It is strictly true; the estimates of receipts are habitually exaggerated, and the expenditures as habitually reduced. I have heard—I do not vouch for it, but I believe it—that, previous to the last session, the Secretary, having made up his estimates of the receipts, called upon the heads of the different departments for their estimates of expenditures, urging that those estimates should be reduced to the lowest possible point. It was done. For these wise and candid rulers of ours exhaust all their economy in their estimates, and practise all their extravagance in the actual appropriations. Well, sir, the estimates were presented to him, and they were found to exceed the estimated receipts by some three millions. What was to be done? Provide additional resources. Oh, no; but to put down in the report, haphazard, three millions in addition to the estimate of receipts already made. I will show, from the report of the Secretary himself, that items of appropriation which he knew were now existing and must be met, are not included in his estimates; and he tells us himself that the heads of the other departments estimate the expenditures of their respective departments higher than he does. Who is most apt to be correct—they who are presumed to be conversant with the circumstances and calls upon their particular departments, or the Secretary of the Treasury? He assumes to know more of the situation of the War and Navy Departments than the heads of those departments themselves do.

The estimated amount of Treasury notes to be redeemed during the next year only includes those already issued, and the small balance authorized to be issued under the existing law, and yet this is urged upon us as an accurate estimate in the discussion of a proposition, which no one doubts will pass, to authorize the emission of five millions more. Here, then, is at once an additional item of five millions. We are informed by the Secretary that the amount of unexpended appropriations which will be called for in the next year is three million seven hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars. Here is a subsisting charge upon the Treasury to an immense amount. There is no evading it. It is not even looked to in the estimates. It must be met, and yet no provision is asked for it. Is it surprising that, with this habitual want of forecast to see future calls upon the Treasury, and, when seen, a want of candor to say so, our Treasury is always straitened, and that, with all the slang about saving the plighted faith of the country from violation, we are, again and again, urged with an indecent haste to adopt a measure pernicious in its consequences, and in violation of the Constitution? Once for all, let me answer this cry about plighted faith. I, sir, have plighted my faith by the most solemn sanction known to man, to preserve the Constitution—that faith I will maintain, whatever other may be violated—and let the responsibility that may result, be it what it may, rest with those whose incompetency has created the emergency, not with me, because I will not violate the Constitution to meet it. If you add to these items of near nine millions, three hundred thousand dollars due the State of Maine—a large and admitted deficiency in the Post Office, much larger, no doubt, than is admitted—the abstraction of the two per cent. fund of about $800,000 by the States of Alabama and Mississippi, you have a clear excess over the estimates of more than ten millions. If to these be added the large balances due to public creditors of all sorts, especially on account of the Florida war, and the funds necessary for the prosecution of that war, unless this Government is to be forever regardless of all the obligations of duty, and deaf to the calls of humanity, and the appropriations for certain works of defence on the most economical scale of absolute and present necessity, and there will be added at least five millions more of appropriations—not probable, but certain and inevitable—making fifteen millions more than the report estimates. I do not hesitate to say that I would not agree to pay those demands for twenty millions, and my life upon it the Secretary would not. Another item of at least $5,000,000 (I believe more) should be added to this amount—that for the payment of private claims. There is an immense accumulation of these claims—they have been postponed until the current of legislation is literally dammed up by them—very many of them are of admitted justice, and it is peculiarly proper that they should be speedily decided, and no longer postponed, as the principle has been adopted that no interest is to be allowed upon claims, however long justice may be withheld.

With all these facts staring him full in the face, the Secretary estimates the appropriations for the next year at $19,000,000 against his own admission for the last year of $22,489,000, and which I have no doubt amount, in truth, to at least $26,000,000. And inclusive of redemption of Treasury notes, at $22,500,000 against his own admission for the last year of $26,643,000, and which, in truth, is not short of $30,000,000. His estimate of receipts from customs, notwithstanding another reduction of the tariff, is about seven millions more than the receipts of the last year. How can this be? It is only possible in one way, and that even the Secretary would have blushed to announce. He no doubt knows that there will be greater economy than has heretofore been practised, and hence the disbursements will be reduced in amount, and the war having ceased which has been waged against credit, commerce, property, civilization itself, the powerful though prostrate, but yet uncrushed energies of this great people will once more be exerted, and we shall see the country rising up like the strong man from his sleep. But the force of these causes, powerful as they are, the sanguine temper of the Secretary has over-estimated. It will take more than one month, or one year, to redeem the country from the effects of ten years of misrule.

But, admitting that we were encumbered with no debt at all, will the future revenues support the most economical administration of the Government? I am very sure they will not. The tariff will be reduced finally in January and June, 1842, and it is demonstrable that the revenues will then be insufficient. The Secretary estimates the accruing revenues from customs after that period at between ten and eleven millions. It will not, and cannot, be more, with nearly one-half of the articles of importation paying no duty. If to this you add three and a half millions from the public lands, you will have fourteen millions. Does any one man really believe that the Government can be carried on with that sum? No one does, although I have no doubt many a demagogue, here and elsewhere, will say so. For myself, I calculate on little, very little, revenue for the future from the public lands. I will not consent to see that source of revenue withdrawn, and the whole thrown upon imposts, much less will I vote for any tax with a view of supplying a deficiency to be created by surrendering those lands. But he is blind, indeed, who does not see that our vast public domain has become a mere fund with which aspiring politicians play their games. It has already become a regular contest which shall outbid the other. In the declining days of Rome, the candidate for the Empire succeeded who would promise the largest distribution of corn from the public granaries—so it is now. We have not the corn to bribe with, but, what is the same thing, we have the land upon which to raise the corn. We have got the most that we shall get from that source, rely upon it.

I do not in the least doubt that the future revenues of the Government will be insufficient for the most economical administration. That this deficiency is not temporary, but permanent, and, therefore, that it should be met by providing some permanent source of supply; and it is upon the postulate that there will be such a deficiency that I proceeded to the inquiry—Whence is the additional revenue to be derived? Only three plans have or can be suggested: direct taxes, imposition of increased duties on protected articles beyond 20 per cent. and in violation of the compromise, or the imposition of adequate, but moderate, duties on certain articles of luxury now duty free.

I hardly know whether I ought to regard the plan of direct taxes as having been proposed. One of my colleagues has suggested it; but, as far as I know, it is unendorsed by any one member on this floor, or by any individual anywhere, except by two or three of his own constituents. In the present condition of things, it is about as practicable, and not a whit more so than would be a proposition to raise revenue by alchemy; and when either of these plans shall be seriously brought forward, it will be time enough to discuss them. The choice, then, is between taxing luxuries, where the tax is paid equally by all sections of the country, is paid by the wealthy and is paid voluntarily, and increasing the taxes on protected articles which are paid exclusively by one section—that which does not manufacture—which are paid by the poorer classes, and where the tax is not voluntary, but cannot be avoided. Between these I cannot hesitate. But, sir, I do not conceive that I have a right to choose; I am bound by that which I regard as of little less authority than the Constitution—the compromise of 1833. I cannot violate that compromise consistently with my own ideas of what is right, and I would not if I could. The case of deficiency of revenue was anticipated in the compromise act, and provided for. Shall we, honestly and in good faith, comply with the compact then entered into?

I propose to show, 1st. That the compromise act of March, 1833, prescribes what is to be done in the event of a deficient exchequer. 2d. That this compromise is binding upon us. 3d. That the exemption from duties of the free articles was one of the leading objections to that act on the part of the anti-tariff party, without one single exception; and that it was a concession to the manufacturing interest. 4th. That if it were entirely an open question now, it is the best, the fairest, the only practicable mode of raising revenue—that it is the most advantageous to the whole country, and especially to that section from which I come. The sixth clause of the act of March 3, 1833, commonly called the compromise act, is as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act of the fourteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, or of any other act as is inconsistent with this act, shall be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the passage, prior or subsequent to the said thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, of any act or act from time to time, as may be necessary to detect, prevent, or punish evasions of the duties on imports imposed by law, nor to prevent the passage of any act, prior to the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, in the contingency either of excess or deficiency of revenue, altering the rates of duties on articles which, by the aforesaid act of fourteenth day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, are subject to a less rate of duty than twenty per cent. ad valorem, in such manner as not to exceed that rate, and so as to adjust the revenue to either of the said contingencies."

Can language be more explicit? Will any gentleman suggest words that would more distinctly express the idea that if more revenue is wanted, it shall be raised by duties on the articles bearing a less duty than twenty per cent.? The case, then, has occurred, Shall we comply with our engagement, and the more especially, when we are asked to do that which is not only right in itself, but is the carrying out of the very principle for which we of the anti-tariff party, in all time, and without one solitary exception, have so strenuously contended? The tariff party have submitted without murmur to the annual reduction; they do not ask even to be relieved from the great ultimate reduction in 1842; and shall we now violate our obligation to observe that compromise, and at the same time go counter to all that we have ever contended for? No, sir, no; "it is so nominated in the bond;" and if I was opposed to the principle, I would still submit to it. Much more readily will I do so, when those heretofore opposed to us are willing to adopt our own principle—that of taxing luxuries, sustained as it is by every writer on political economy, great and small.

I do not pretend that there is any constitutional or legal disability to disturb the compromise. But there are considerations not less forcible with me than either. I feel that, as a South Carolinian, I am bound by it, whatever may be the case with others. I regard it very much in the light of a treaty, and a treaty made almost on the field of battle. What will be the just imputation upon us if we now violate it? Why, sir, it will be that, under the pressure of circumstances and the influence of feelings not the most honorable to us, we submitted to terms disadvantageous and unjust, which we now seek the first opportunity to violate. The whole tenor of that act shows that it was intended as a termination of that too-exciting and dangerous controversy—not as a mere truce—as a final extinguishment of its fires—not as a temporary smothering of them, that they might hereafter break out with a more consuming fury. I can, with truth, say that I have seen no single individual in South Carolina who did not regard it as a permanent adjustment of the whole matter, and for that reason, mainly—regarding it as a security against all future agitation—were the people of the State reconciled to many of its provisions, and, amongst others, to that one in particular which exempted luxuries from taxation. It is a great error to regard that act as terminating in 1842. It would be more proper to say that it begins then. The annual reductions previous to that period are only a preparation, gradual and proper, for the ultimate and permanent settling of the question.

Dr. Cooper, not the least ardent and violent on this subject, at the close of his collection of all the leading documents of the nullification controversy, uses the following language:

"Mr. CLAY introduced into Congress the act known as Mr. CLAY's compromising law. I hope and trust it will prove in fact what it was intended to be, a full and final settlement of the tariff contest."

Mr. CALHOUN used, in the Senate, while this act was under discussion, the following language:

"Among the objections to the bill, he thought the reduction of the duties, in the first part of the series, too slow, and the last too rapid, and that the time for the final reduction was too remote."

"He also objected to the home valuation, but he thought these objections outweighed by the consideration that the bill provided, as to the final result, that the revenues should come down to the just and economical wants of the Government. With the contemplation of this result, as to its final operation, he believed it would be accepted of by the South, and that peace and harmony, as far as this subject was concerned, would be restored to the country."

What is meant by the "final result" and the final operation, if this law is to cease in 1842? Then it is that the tariff is to come down to the revenue standard by the final reduction; and, as I can only understand it, this final reduction reconciled the very distinguished speaker to the slow process of reduction and to other principles of the act. What is meant by restoring harmony? A paltry truce, in which both parties would be arranging their armor for another and fiercer conflict.

Again, he says, in the same speech: "If this measure is acquiesced in, it will be the termination of that long controversy which began in the convention, and has been continued under various fortunes to the present day." What is the plain and obvious meaning of this language? Was it that he regarded this, as he says, as "a termination" of this protracted and dangerous controversy, and therefore a fit subject for the congratulations of every patriot; or as merely an act of ordinary legislation, imposing no sort of obligation upon either of the parties, which might, with perfect propriety, be repealed before any of its provisions were executed, as giving no security for repose from this exciting controversy, and therefore not only unimportant in itself, but unbecoming the dignity of the position which South Carolina had assumed, and a paltry suspension of a struggle, at the head of which he had so long stood? Did South Carolina engage in this struggle, with all its odium and its dangers, for such a boon as that? No, sir, no. With a full perception of the dangers and difficulties with which she was surrounded, she believed that the questions involved were of vital, primary, and permanent importance, and never would have been satisfied with any thing less than what she regarded as a permanent security for her rights and the principles involved.

Mr. Calhoun, again, in 1837, uses the following language; and be it remembered that it was used in a proposition to reduce the duties on salt—an article of primary importance as a necessary, and the article, perhaps more than any other, objectionable to the anti-tariff party, of which he was confessedly the head—an article to the duty on which he was then still opposed, but, agreeable to him as a reduction of that duty would have been, he was restrained from voting for it by a regard to the sacredness of the compromise:

"The announcement by the chairman of the Committee on Finance that this bill was framed and introduced on the assumption that the act of 1833 was no longer to be respected, gave to it an importance which demanded the most serious consideration. That act closed the tariff controversy between the North and the South; and the question now presented is, shall it again be opened? Shall we reopen a controversy which, during the long period from 1821 to 1833, agitated the country, governed its legislation, controlled the Presidential election, and finally shook its institutions to the centre? Shall we of the South, in particular, assent to open this formidable controversy—we who are on this subject in a permanent minority? Shall we agree to surrender our share of interest in the act of 1833—an act which has already repealed from twenty to twenty-five millions of dollars annually, and which, if left undisturbed, will in a few years take off ten more, and reduce the duties to the constitutional and legitimate wants of the Government? Will we agree to surrender all these advantages, which were extorted from the adverse interest at the hazard of civil conflict, and take our chance in the renewed conflicts that must follow if the controversy be again opened? This the chairman of the Committee on Finance asks you to do; and what is the compensation he holds out to you for such great sacrifices?"

"But, whichever may be preferable, it is certain that the practical difference, as far as the South is concerned, is too small to warrant the sacrifice of the great interest which she has in maintaining inviolable the law of 1833, particularly when we consider, as small as is the difference, we have no assurance of even receiving this inconsiderable boon."

"Then followed the proclamation and the force bill, as the ultimate measure of prolonging the existence of the odious and unconstitutional act of 1833, which the party of which the Senator is a member had attempted to fix on the country by a scheme of permanent distribution; and, when the issue was made, they were ready to sustain it at the hazard of civil war. But, thanks to a kind Providence which had watched so constantly over our destinies, this counsel did not prevail. The spirit of conciliation and compromise overruled that of violence and force. The memorable bill of 1833 was introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY], and became a law of the land in spite of the protective and force bill party. It closed the conflict between the North and the South, which, if not revived by the acts of those who passed the tariff of 1829, will, I trust and believe, remain closed forever. Such is the train of events which led to the act of 1833, and the circumstances under which it passed; and we are now called upon to decide whether we shall adhere to its provisions or not. The Senator from New York invites us to surrender our interest in it, and to open anew the tariff controversy; and, with a view to test our determination, has inserted in this bill the repeal of the duty on salt. He signifies his dissent. I am glad of it. It proves that he dreads a direct issue on the subject, which is not surprising after the statement made; but I must tell him that it is immaterial whether it was so intended or not. Salt is one of the items comprehended in the act, and if we touch one item we may touch all. To vote for the repeal of a single item, unless with common consent, as effectually surrenders the compromise as to vote for the repeal of all."

"The Senator from New York must excuse me. I feel it my duty to speak plainly where the interest of my constituents and the whole country is so deeply concerned. I must tell him I lack confidence in him. I see in this bill a design, under the show of reduction, to revive the tariff controversy, by which he and his friends have so much profited at the expense of the country. It is an artful and bold stroke of policy, calculated to distract and divide the Opposition, and place almost unlimited control over the capital and labor of the country in the hands of those in power. It affords the means of appealing to the hopes and fears of every section and interest, while the distraction and division that must follow would prevent the possibility of united efforts to arrest the abuses and encroachments of power. Experience has taught us to understand the game, and be on our guard against those who are playing it. We cannot close our eyes to the fact that the party which is now so intent to disturb the compromise is the very party that was the author of the tariff of 1829; and which, after using every effort to render it permanent, was ready to shed our blood rather than surrender the act. Their devotion to a measure of which they are the authors, and to which they owe their present elevation, prepared us to expect that deep hostility to the act which gave their favorite a mortal blow, and opened the way for a united, and we trust, ere long, a successful resistance to power, acquired by deception, and maintained by delusion and corruption. The entire South may well apply to the Senator, as the author of the tariff of 1829, the reply which a distinguished Senator gave, after its passage, to one who now occupies a higher station than he did then, and who undertook to explain to him his vote on this occasion: 'Sir, you have deceived me once, that was your fault; but if you deceive me again, the fault will be mine.'

"Alas, for Virginia! that once proud and patriotic State, she has dismissed her honest and enlightened son who served her with so much fidelity, and has elevated to the highest office him who betrayed her, and trampled her interest in the dust."

"I know full well that attempts will be made to misrepresent my position on this occasion, and to weaken me in the confidence of the public. I fear them not. I know well those whom I represent. They have too clear a conception of their true interest, and place too high an estimate on truth and honor, to withhold their confidence from him who fearlessly follows their dictates. They will scorn the miserable boon proffered by the Senator from New York, and the hand that offers it, and will cling to the act which they so proudly wrung from this Government. Were I to listen to the voice of the Senator from New York, they would hold me blind to their interest and indifferent to their honor. I shall not assent to disturb the act of 1833 in the slightest degree, so long as the manufacturing interests shall adhere to its provisions, be the conduct of politicians what it may. Thus far they have firmly adhered. Not a murmur has been heard or a petition been offered from that quarter against it from its passage to the present day, while the memorial of the Legislatures of the two great tariff States, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, which pledged themselves to abide by the provisions of the act, give strong additional assurance that, if we do not disturb it on our part, they will not on theirs."

Truth, sir, every word truth. I regard now, as he did then, those who would disturb the compromise; and I warn those now who would do it, as he did then, that if they do, "they will have ample time to reflect upon the evil they have done." Let them well reflect before they again break up that deep and turbid fountain of bitter waters? Whoever makes the attempt will find that our people, prompt as they ever are to peril every thing in defence of a great principle of the Constitution and of public liberty, will look well about them and fully examine for themselves all the reasons, before, on any authority, they will revive that dangerous conflict. And, sir, if we do break up this compromise, what hope have we, "in a permanent minority," as we are, that we shall obtain any better terms?

In a debate in the Senate, in 1838, between Mr. Clay and Mr. Calhoun, the two great actors in this compromise, Mr. Clay, in giving a history of that measure, uses the following language, which was not contradicted:

"In the consultations between that Senator [Mr. Calhoun] and myself, in respect to the compromise, on every point upon which I insisted he gave way. He was for a shorter term than nine years, and more rapid reduction. I insisted, and he yielded. He insisted upon fifteen per cent. as the maximum duty, but yielded. He was against any discrimination within the limited range of duties for the benefit of the manufacturers, but consented. To the last he protested against home valuations, but finally gave way."

Now, if this act was regarded as a definitive settlement of the whole matter, I can very well see reasons for this pertinacious adherence, but if it was not so, but a mere act of ordinary legislation, I am at a loss for a reason for it, especially for contending that the duties were to come down in 1842 to fifteen instead of twenty per cent. This was a matter of vast consequence, if this adjustment was to be permanent; but of none earthly if its provisions expired in 1842. The good or evil could not have lasted more than a few months. But, sir, the whole act is full of provisions to regulate duties after 1842. Why was this, if the act was intended to cease then to operate? That it was regarded by our Convention as a permanent adjustment, the report of that body acceding to the compromise fully shows. It is full of evidence to that point. Listen to the following brief extract. After reviewing the provisions of the compromise, the following language is used: "These provisions embody great principles in reference to this subject, for which South Carolina has long and earnestly contended; and if the pledge therein contained" (what pledge but to maintain the Compromise Act?) "should be fulfilled in good faith, they must, in their operation, arrest the abuses which have grown out of the unauthorized appropriations of the public money." This pledge has been honestly fulfilled. Shall we, on our part, violate it?

My next proposition is, that the principle that luxuries should be taxed, and that they should not, in any case, be exempted from taxation, has been the principle of the anti-tariff party, without one single exception—of men of all degrees and sizes, from the almost inaudible whisper of our smallest men up to the thunder of Hayne and McDuffie; whilst the proposition to exempt them from taxation has always been made by and received the support of the tariff party. In 1831 Mr. Clay submitted a resolution making duty-free those very articles upon which it is now proposed to impose duties. He was supported by every man of the tariff party, and opposed by every member of the anti-tariff party.

Mr. Clay's resolution was as follows:

"Resolved, That the existing duties upon articles imported from foreign countries, and not coming into competition with similar articles made or produced within the United States, ought to be abolished, except the duties upon wines and silks, and that those ought to be reduced; and that the Committee on Finance be instructed to report a bill accordingly."

Mr. Hayne moved the following amendment:

"Strike out all after the word countries, and insert as follows: 'Be so reduced that the amount of the public revenue shall be sufficient to defray the expenses of the Government, according to their present scale, after the payment of the public debt; and that, allowing a reasonable time for the reduction of the present high duties on articles coming into competition with similar articles made or produced within the United States, the duties be ultimately equalized, so that the duty on no article as compared with the value of that article, vary materially from the value of that article.'"

Mr. Clay's proposition—the tariff proposition—was to raise the whole revenue by imposts, with a view to protection on articles where similar articles were made here. Gen. Hayne's proposition was not, as has been erroneously stated, to impose equal duties on all articles, but that there should be no material difference. Mr. Clay's proposition was ultimately adopted in the Compromise Act. A large class of articles was by that act admitted free of all duty; and now the proposition is made to us by our old opponents to adopt our principle—to tax articles bearing no duty—to tax them to the extent of the necessities of the Treasury; and Southern men are found opposing it. How and why is this? I appeal to those with whom I once acted—to the members of a party towards which I have felt a stronger attachment than I ever shall to any other—not to run across every principle for which that party has contended; to leave me some one principle, if only one, upon which I may stand; and, when charged with inconsistency, let me be able to say, Here is one principle to which we adhered.

Mr. Clay advocated his resolution, exempting a large class of articles of luxury from any duties whatever. He was supported by every tariff man in the Senate who spoke upon the subject. I shall not weary the committee by reading extracts from their speeches, unless this is denied. But I must read from the speeches of those who opposed the protective policy.

I begin with Gen. Hayne, who was confessedly the head of the anti-tariff party in Congress, and who has left an enduring monument to his fame in the ability which he exhibited in discussing this subject with the ablest debaters in this or in any country. No man enjoyed in a higher degree the confidence of those with whom he served in the Senate; and the best evidence of the estimation of his native and much loved State is, that he was called to the helm by one voice, at a period of unprecedented danger and difficulty, and well did he earn and merit this confidence. He did not aspire to the character of an original genius. He was much too wise for that. He was no theory-monger; no constructor of impracticable plans of Government, like the philosophic dreamers of the French Revolution; no visionary schemer, like Sieyès; nor could he have split hairs on a point of mystic metaphysics, or of scholastic dialectics, with Dun Scotus. His business was with this sublunary world as he found it—not as a Utopian transcendentalism would have had it—wise, cool, bold, forbearing, disinterested; all the qualities of a great statesman were softly and beautifully blended in his high and useful character. Listen to the opinions of this able and practical man on this question of taxing luxuries:

"What was that scheme? Why, that from all articles of luxury the taxes should be taken off entirely; while upon articles of absolute necessity they were to remain undiminished. Articles consumed by the rich were to come into the country duty free, while articles consumed by the poor were to be burdened with exorbitant taxation. The rich man was to drink his costly wines, and his family to be arrayed in fine silks, without paying one cent towards the expenses of Government; while the poor man was to be heavily taxed on the coarse woollens which were to shield himself and his family from the winter's cold. Now could a system of taxation resting on such principles seriously be defended? Could it be tolerated in a free country and a liberal and enlightened age? He trusted not.

"There is another objection to this scheme, which was to his mind equally conclusive—it was, that by it the duties were to be taken off from what was called the unprotected articles—articles, too, of general consumption, (and which according to the general principle of political economy, and the common consent of all mankind, are the proper subjects for taxation,) and the entire revenue of the country was to be raised upon the protected articles—upon cottons, woollens, and iron, articles of necessity, on which enormous duties are now imposed; duties which operate as a heavy tax on certain portions of industry and certain branches of the country, and as a bounty to other portions of the country and other branches of industry.

"Against a system so unjust, so unequal, and oppressive, the tax paying people of the United States, those who receive no portion of the bounties of the protecting system, the people of the Southern States, those whom he, in part, represented on this floor, must forever protest.

"Gentlemen might consider such an arrangement as constituting a judicious revision of the tariff; but for his own part, he had no hesitation in saying that he would consider a repeal of all duties on the unprotected articles, while the duties on the others should remain untouched, as the worst of all possible adjustments of that great question which now agitates and disturbs the whole country."

In another speech he says:

"The next objection to this scheme is, that it proposes to relieve luxuries from all taxation, while the taxes on the necessities of life are to remain just as they are, subject to duties of from 50 to 100 per cent. It is true that the gentleman in seeing, I presume, the cogency of the proposition in its original form, now consents that some very moderate duty may be levied on wines and silks. But, sir, I should be glad to know in what wines and silks differ from the numerous articles which, by the gentleman's scheme, are to come in free of duty. Here is a list of some of them, and it will be for the Senate and the country to say how far it is reasonable or just that the consumers of these articles shall contribute nothing to the public revenue, while the honest laboring man is to be taxed from thirty to one hundred dollars on every hundred dollars which he expends on the woollens and the flannels, the iron and the sugar, which are indispensable to the health and comfort of himself and family.

"It is one of the grandest farces ever attempted to be played off upon a free people, to see an attempt made to reduce the taxes on olives and capers, anchovies and brandy fruits, mace, cloves, nutmegs, precious stones, alabaster ornaments, cordials, perfumery, artificial flowers, billiard balls, batledores, shuttle-cocks, coral beads and gold snuff boxes, silver spectacles and ivory headed canes, velvet and lace muslins and gros de naples, camels' hair shawls, morocco and prunella shoes, fine cambrics, plated chafing dishes, porcelain and china dinner and tea sets, gold watches, Cologne water, Champagne and Burgundy wines, oranges and pine-apples, embroidery, ivory fans, fine Irish linens, parasols, centre tables, gilt boots, pier looking glasses, vermicelli and macaroni, Italian marble and mantel ornaments, rouge, essences and court plaster, chessmen, sweet scented soap, silk stockings, gold and silver thimbles, mantel time piece, tooth powder, wax dolls, and a hundred other things used by the rich.

"I ask for the reason of this distinction, which relieves luxuries from taxation, and throws them upon the necessities of life; which burdens the poor, and exempts the rich; and I am told it is necessary for protection."

Next comes the venerable Macon. Listen to his opinions:

"There were certain things that ought not to be taxed in any country—things that entered into the plain food of the poor and laboring classes, and which were necessary to support life. It is said that it [silk] is an article which cannot be smuggled; and is that a reason why it should be taxed? Is it good reasoning to say that, because laces and silks can be smuggled, they must not be taxed as high as an article of necessity to the poor?"

His distinguished colleague (Mr. MANGUM) thus expresses his opinions on this subject. [As an evidence of the confidence of South Carolina in this distinguished citizen, I need only mention that he has once received the vote of that State for the Presidency, and to a higher gentleman or a purer patriot that vote could not have been given.]

"What is the effect of the resolution on the table? It is to aggravate the evil; it is to tax the necessities of the poor man while the rich may revel in luxuries as free from taxation as the air he breathes; it is to increase the extravagant bounties already enjoyed by the rich capitalists by diminishing the cost of many of the articles which enter into the consumption of his establishment. The duties in the shape of protection remain the same nominally, while, in fact, they are enhanced to the whole amount of deduction from the prices of articles consumed by the manufacturer and his laborers."

Judge Grundy thus speaks:

"The resolution of the Senator from Kentucky purports to abolish the duties entirely on all articles of a kind not manufactured in the United States, except silks and wines, and to reduce them on these articles. So long as duties are paid on imported articles, for the purpose of raising revenue, I cannot consent to this proposition. The true principle of taxation is to impose it on those who are best able to bear it. The reduction on your table purposes a total abandonment of this principle. The articles to be released from taxation are luxuries, used almost exclusively by the rich, while the burdens are left with all their weight upon the poorer portion of the community. This would be no alleviation of the evils complained of, and I will not unite in holding out to the poor man the delusive hope that he is to be able to clothe his family in silks, and regale himself on wines every day, while all the articles of dress he purchases—his salt, his sugar, his plough, his axe, and his hoe, and all the utensils with which he earns his daily bread—are so taxed as to render him unable to raise his family. No, sir, give him his necessities of life untaxed, or taxed lightly. Let his labor have its full reward, and he will then increase in his means, and in time be able to indulge in luxuries, if he shall please to do so."

Mr. McDuffie, than whom no one enjoyed or deserved more of the confidence of the anti-tariff party, from his commanding talents and known devotion to the principles of that party, thus speaks:

"Mr. McDuffie said that the resolution only proposed an inquiry, which did not commit the House; and every resolution for an inquiry, he thought, ought to be adopted. The resolution decides nothing; if it did, he should be opposed to it; for there was nothing, he thought, so unwise as to remit the duties on articles of luxury, while they were retained on articles of necessity."

"Let us examine this matter. Our imports of foreign merchandise may be divided into two great classes. The first consists of articles which are entirely produced in foreign countries, the second, of articles partly produced abroad and partly produced in the United States. The former are usually denominated the unprotected, and the latter the protected articles. Now, as to the former class, comprising teas, coffee, silks, wines, and a variety of other imports, I will assume that from these one half of the federal revenue will be collected, though, in point of fact, it would be more correct to say one third only.

"As to this portion of the revenue no one has ever pretended that the burden is not equally distributed over the Union, in proportion to the consumption of articles from which it is derived. It must be apparent that the manufacturing States have no grounds for alleging that the duties on silks, wines, tea, and coffee, expose them to an unequal and oppressive burden. Will a solitary voice be raised to denounce this part of the bill under consideration? I assuredly there will not."

"Can any one be so blind as not to see that the reduction, or more properly speaking, the repeal of the duties on tea, coffee, dye stuffs, manufacturing materials, and on most of the unprotected articles, will operate as an additional protection to the Northern manufacturers?"

"There are two modes of giving this protection to the manufacturing States: the one, consists in imposing duties on such articles as they make themselves; the other, in taking off or diminishing duties on such articles as they consume, and do not make at home, but import from abroad in exchange for some of their own domestic productions. In this twofold aspect of the subject, I regard this as one of the most ingeniously contrived schemes of protection that has ever been presented to Congress."

"Of the reduction of duties for which this bill provides, about one half is as direct a protection to the manufacturers as if it had consisted of an increase of the articles which they make. In proportion as you reduce the cost of tea and coffee, you diminish the wages of the operatives, and, in proportion as you diminish the cost of materials used by the manufacturers, you diminish the cost of producing their manufactures."

It was, then, true; no one denied the justice and perfect equality of such a tax; but new lights have broken upon us, and it has been left to the men of our day to discover that the tax which the undivided South contended for as not only just in itself, but the only just tax, and especially advantageous to the South, is now discovered to be as especially injurious. Such, sir, without one exception, was the course and argument of the anti-Tariff party. But it does not stop with the mere authority of individual names, however distinguished. The anti-Tariff Convention which met in Philadelphia in 1836—a rare assemblage of character and talents—passed three, and only three, resolutions. One of the three was on the subject of taxing wines, silks, &c. What was that resolution? Listen, sir; I will read it:

"3d Resolution. That wines, teas, coffee, and similar articles, be not added to the list of those now free of duty, but may, on the contrary, be subject to duties corresponding in proportion to their respective value with those laid on other imported articles subject to duty."

Yes, sir, this resolution passed, unanimously, that body. It was not only regarded as important that these articles should be taxed, but so important as to be embodied in one of the only three resolutions that were adopted. There was scarcely a public meeting in opposition to the tariff, where this point of taxing luxuries was not insisted on as a primary principle. The objection to the tariff was not from any opposition to raising the requisite revenue, but that the tariff of duties was so laid as to operate unequally, by laying those duties chiefly on articles made in this country, and thus enhancing their price for the benefit of those who manufactured them, and at the expense of those who were consumers, and not also manufacturers; and as this inequality did not exist as to articles not manufactured in this country, and as to which we were all equally consumers, and only consumers, the tax was equal on all the sections and interests. This is the sole, real foundation of the celebrated forty bale theory. No one, I presume, ever contended if an article, the produce of Georgia, is exchanged for merchandise of a kind not manufactured in this country, and that the article so imported is sold at a price increased by the duty, and is consumed by the people, not of Georgia, but of Maine, that the producer in Georgia, and not the consumer in Maine, pays the duty. Such a proposition is absurd beyond the reach of argument. But where the article so imported and enhanced in price by the duty comes in competition with a similar article of American manufacture, the price of the latter is also raised; and supposing the consumption of the article to be equal between the producer of the article of foreign commerce and the home manufacturer, it is perfectly clear that the former pays all the duty, the latter nothing, for whilst they are both consumers, and the consumer pays the duty to the producer, that duty is uncompensated taxation, whilst the manufacturer receives back, in the increased price of his own article, all that he pays as a consumer of the foreign one.

This is the objection which runs through all our papers upon the subject. I will read a few extracts from the celebrated and able exposition of the South Carolina Legislature in 1828:

"Men ask not for burdens, but for benefits. The tax paid by the duty on imports by which, with the exception of the receipts of the sales of the public lands, the Government is wholly supported, and which, in its gross amount, is annually equal to about $23,000,000, is then, in truth, no tax on them. Whatever portion of it they advance as consumers of the articles on which it is imposed, returns to them from the labor of others, with unusual interest, through an artfully contrived system. That such are the facts, the committee will proceed to demonstrate by such arguments as the confession of the party by its acts, conclusive as that ought to be considered."

"The manufacturing States, however, indemnify themselves, and more than indemnify themselves, for the increased price they pay on the articles they consume, as has already been proved by their confession, in a form which cannot deceive, by their own acts. Nor is it difficult to trace the operation by which it is effected. The very acts of Congress imposing burdens on them, as consumers, give them the means, through the monopoly which it affords the manufacturers in the home market, not only of indemnifying themselves for the increased price on the imported articles which they consume, but in a great measure of commanding the industry of the rest of the Union. The argument urged by them for the adoption of the system, and with much success, is, that the price of products and property in the manufacturing States must be thereby increased, which charge proves the beneficial operation of the system on them. It is by this very increase of price which must be paid by their fellow-citizens of the South that the indemnity to the manufacturer is effected. And by means of this, the fruits of our toil and labor which, on every principle of justice, ought to belong to ourselves, are transferred from us to them. The maxim, that the consumers pay, strictly applies to us. We are mere consumers, and destitute of all means of transferring the burden from ourselves to others.

"The case, then, fairly stated between us and the manufacturing States, is, that the tariff gives them a prohibition against foreign competition in our own market in the sale of their goods, and deprives us of the benefit of a competition of purchasers for our raw material."

This, sir, was the gravamen of all our opponents to the tariff—that duties were laid on articles which were manufactured here, and as to which the manufacturers received compensation in increased prices of what they sold for all they paid as consumers; and that such duties were "not laid on articles as to which they, like ourselves, were consumers only."

The following is an extract from an address of the same convention, on the part of South Carolina, to her sister States, after she had nullified the tariff laws. In a grave, solemn, and well considered appeal to these States, the principles of a tariff, with which alone it was declared that the State would be satisfied, are laid down, and this of taxing the articles now duty free was the leading point insisted on:

"Is there any justice in taxing the iron, salt, sugar, the coarse woolsens and the calicoes of the poor and middling classes, of the farmer and mechanic, and not taxing at all the wines, the silks, and the spices of the wealthy and luxurious classes of society? Of our importation of 1839, seventy-six millions were duty free, and eighty-five millions paid duty. The articles duty free were, almost without exception, articles used by the wealthy, or raw materials used in the factories; whilst the articles taxed are as invariably articles of necessity, used by those in indigent or moderate circumstances. There are one hundred districts represented on this floor in which there are not twenty men who would be affected by duties on wine, and not twenty who are not affected by the present tariff."

"Having now presented, for the consideration of the Federal Government and our confederate States, the fixed and final determination of this State in relation to the protective system, it remains for us to submit a plan of taxation in which we would be willing to acquiesce, in a spirit of mutual concession, provided we are met in due time, and in a becoming spirit, by the States interested in the protection of manufactures."

"We believe that, upon every just and equitable principle of taxation, the whole list of protected articles should be imported free of duty, and that the revenue derived from lighter imports should be raised exclusively from the unprotected articles; or that, whenever a duty is imposed upon protected articles imported, an exccise duty of the same rate should be imposed upon all similar articles manufactured in the United States. This would be as near an approach to perfect equality as could possibly be made in a system of indirect taxation. But we are willing to make a large offering to preserve the Union, and with a distinct declaration that it is a concession on our part, we will consent that the same rate of duty may be imposed upon the protected articles, provided that no more revenue be raised than is necessary to meet the demands of the Government for constitutional purposes; and provided that a duty substantially uniform be imposed upon all foreign imports."

This point, however, was not yielded to us, and there was a long list of articles free of duty. How was this done? At the instance of the anti-tariff party? No. But in spite of their earnest and continued remonstrance. The list was made out by a tariff man, and with a special view to the benefit of the tariff interest. Mr. Clay, in the same article to which I have referred, gives the following uncontradicted account of this matter:

"Then beyond that period is the provision for cash duties, home valuations, a long and liberal list of free articles, carefully made out by my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. KNOX], expressly for the benefit of the manufacturers."

A second meeting of the Convention was called to consider the compromise act. Its leading provisions are discussed in the report of that body; and one of the leading, indeed the most prominent objection presented in that report to the act of March, 1833, was, that certain articles were admitted duty free. Hear what is said upon that point:

"It is this aspect of the question which has reconciled us to the provisions of the new bill, (certainly not free from objections,) which provide for the introduction of wines, silks, wooleens, and a number of other articles, free of duty."

It was objectionable, greatly objectionable; but, in consideration of other compensating benefits, the Convention was "reconciled" to it. It did not approve but was reconciled. Now, sir, how stands this whole matter? The principle that luxuries would be taxed, at least equally with necessities, no one ever has or can controvert. In addition to which, it is the principle for which we of the anti-tariff party have in all time contended, as not only just on the well-settled and admitted principles of political economy, but as the only principle which is not grossly unjust and unequal in its operations. The combined influence of experience and argument has convinced our opponents. They say to us, Gentlemen, you are right in this matter, and, as we need more money, let us not disturb the compromise, but let us tax those luxuries which none of us manufacture, and all of us use. And we refuse to do it. To what end have we labored to enforce our arguments? Was it to convince our opponents, and to obtain the practical results of a corresponding change in the system of imposts? or merely for the dialectic triumph—not only to show that we could take any side of the argument and maintain it—that we would not then lay taxes on the protected articles, nor allow the duties to be taken off other articles? Now, it is proposed, not to increase the duties on the protected articles, but to restore the duties on luxuries, which we protested strenuously against being taken off. And we again object to the duties being laid on. May it not well be asked what will satisfy us? Is not such a course like that of a pouting child, who refuses to have his biscuit buttered on one side or on the other? I broadly assert that there is no one principle which has been so constantly asserted by the anti-tariff party as this of taxing luxuries and other articles now free of duty. Suppose that we had no revenue at all, and it was proposed to lay duties on wines and silks; would any anti-tariff man oppose it? No one would. Although we have some revenue, we have not enough; and as to the deficiency, it is precisely the same; not a shade of difference.

This brings me to the last proposition which I have asserted—that, if I was free from all obligation upon the subject, I should, without one moment's hesitation, adopt the principle of taxing luxuries. The two greatest points of consideration in all questions of taxation are, that the tax should be as little as possible burdensome, and that it should be willingly paid. Both these are attained by a tax on such articles as wines and silks, in an eminent degree. The tax is paid by the wealthy, and those who do not feel in the slightest degree the increased price from the duty, and it is paid willingly. No one pays it who does not choose to do it. Not so with such articles as now bear the whole burdens of the revenue. They are articles of prime necessity, such as salt and iron, which the less opulent are obliged to have, and cannot choose whether they will pay the tax or not.

I will not weary the committee by the discussion of a proposition which no one has as yet questioned—the peculiar justice of a tax on luxuries. The principle, as universally admitted, goes further than is necessary to this argument. It goes to taxing luxuries and exempting necessities. But all that is now contended for is, that they should bear some tax, although not even as high a rate as necessities. This being a principle universally conceded, and specially insisted on by the South, I would not oppose it even if its sectional bearings and tendencies were disadvantageous. I will not, either from principle or policy, act from the dictates of that terrapin patriotism which draws itself within its own shell. In a matter where a just discrimination may be made, I shall, of course, prefer my own section. But I will not violate the well-established principles of political economy and of manifest justice to benefit myself or my own peculiar people; and, sir, let me say to Southern men that, if they are restrained by no other considerations, is it wise to adopt such a course? We are, and always will be, the weaker interest. If we act upon principles thus exclusive, what are we to expect from others? If we adopt Ishmael as our model, and set our faces against all men, may we not expect that all men will set their faces against us? If we thus act, with what grace shall we hereafter read lectures to our Northern brethren about honor, justice, patriotism? But, sir, if gentlemen will listen to no arguments on this subject but those of an exclusive character, forgetting that we owe duties to the Confederacy as well as to our particular sections, I submit to them that no principle of taxation can be as fair and as just to the South as this is. One reason for this is enough—duties must be laid on something. These articles (silks and wines) are not manufactured in this country, and therefore no class or section is benefited by the increase of price. They are consumed equally in the different sections, and therefore the duty is paid equally. Is there any other better source of revenue? The only other that can be suggested is an increased duty on the protected articles—on the articles manufactured here. Does any anti-tariff man prefer that? If he does, let him dare to say so. But, sir, I submit that an increase of duties on the protected articles would not increase revenue. It is not every increase of the rate of duty which increases revenue. On the contrary, writers of the highest authority maintain that any duty beyond twenty per cent. diminishes revenue. The manufacturers well know this; we of the anti-tariff school always told them so; and that the present rate of duties was better for them than any higher rate. Experience, that great teacher, has proven to them what our arguments failed to do, and this accounts for the fact that the gentlemen from New York and Maine [Mr. BARNARD and Mr. EVANS, tariff men,] and myself are found together on this subject. How we come together is no lockout of mine. I stand where I always did. They have come to me. Why have they done so? Because it is stipulated in the compromise so—so stipulated at the instance of the South; that a deficit of revenue shall be supplied by duties on the unprotected articles; and because they have found, as we have always asserted, that the present rate of duties was protection enough. The only object of protecting duties, as the term implies, is to keep out foreign competition. The present duties accomplish that; additional duties would do no more; whilst a domestic competition would be thus encouraged. The manufacturers, therefore, cannot possibly gain by it, but must lose.

I have heard one, and only one, objection made to this proposition, and that is, that, as Southern staples, rice, cotton, and tobacco, are received in exchange for French silks and wines, any increase of duty will greatly diminish the consumption of those articles, and destroy the ability of France to purchase our commodities. This, sir, is a genuine humbug from the original Missouri mint. I have seen another humbug from the same quarter, pervading the country and my own State, with the exception of my own district, and adopted and cherished until it became superstitious fanaticism—a thing not to be met with argument, as no superstition is. I believe it is a law of all superstitions that the more absurd it is, the more fanatical are its devotees. I cannot say that this, the latest humbug, will not have an equal run—but a humbug it is. Will any gentleman inform me what article of foreign production we can tax which is not liable to this same objection, that it is paid for with Southern staples? All our commerce nearly is carried on with those staples; wines, and silks, not a whit more than salt, sugar, rice, or any other article. Those staples may be said to be the currency of foreign commerce—the medium of all its exchanges. Unless some answer can be given to this, there is an end of the argument. You must forbear to lay any impost duty at all, and resort to alchymy and direct taxation. But I go further. As to any other article, it may not only be said with equal truth that it is paid for with Southern staples, but as to those articles the effect is uncompensated; but as to silk, the incidental compensation, if not complete, is nearly so; certainly greater than on any other article. If silk dresses are not worn, cotton fabrics will be substituted, and cotton muslins cost nearly as much, and are one-fourth as durable, so that, for any silk fabric excluded, an equivalent will be supplied in others of cotton, our own particular staple. Thus, I repeat, shall we incidentally be compensated more on this than on any other article. But I deny that the duty on silks and wines will materially diminish consumption. They are articles of vanity and pride, not of necessity. They are used by the wealthy, and the price which they bear is often the inducement to their purchase—not an objection—the real value, not the criterion of value. To whatever extent, however, the consumption of these articles is reduced, the vis medicatrix of commerce will supply their places by some other article; French muslins, for example. I will now present one other view of this matter, which does seem to me to close the argument. The report on commerce and navigation for 1839, shows that our importations from France exceeded our exports to that country between fourteen and fifteen millions. Now, forbid by law the landing of one yard of French silk on our shores, and we still take more from France than she does from us. Does any sane man think that a duty of five or six, or even twenty per cent. on silks and wines, would diminish the aggregate importations one-tenth? What, then, goes with the argument that the imposition of these duties would disable France from purchasing our commodities? I go further. In the present condition of commerce and exchanges, a diminution of importations from France, instead of an injury, would be a benefit. Of the whole balance of trade against us in 1839, more than one-half was from excessive importations of worthless French trumpery. One-sixth of all our importations were in 1839 from France, whilst she received from us less than one-tenth of our exports. These facts must have been unknown to the author, and to those who have adopted this hubbug, or they surely would not have ventured upon it. I have heard it gravely asserted that our cottons are admitted into France with a nominal duty. Now, sir, the fact is that this nominal duty is 11 francs on 50 kilogrammes, about 112 pounds, which, with a small additional duty, is a little more than two cents a pound, which is about 25 per cent. and, what is worse, this is a discriminating duty against American cotton. Egyptian and South American cotton, which is thirty per cent. more valuable, paying only 8 francs the 50 kilogrammes, a difference of 20 per cent. specifically, ad valorem at least thirty per cent. and yet we are told, with all possible confidence, that the duty is merely nominal. There is a class of men whose sanguine temper always leads them to look at facts not as they are, but as they wish them to be—men, like the French theorist, who was told that the facts did not support his theory: "So much the worse," said he, "for the facts." Others, sir, may follow these unsteady and delusive lights of a priori theories; for myself I prefer the less brilliant, though more safe guides of facts and experience.

So again of articles of linen—and silks and linens are two of the largest of our imports. If linen goods are, to any extent, excluded, cotton supplies the only imaginable substitute, and we should thus be compensated by the increased consumption of cotton. Yes, although I do not doubt this result, I would not vote for a prohibitory or even a protective duty on linens, because I believe such a vote would be in violation of the Constitution; and I would not, as a Southern man, be induced by a present benefit to recognise the protective principle at the certain cost hereafter of greater sacrifices from its general operation; nor would I as an American statesman look to the special benefit of one section, although that section was my own, in violation of the rights and interests of all other portions of the country. Such a course of selfish and sectional legislation I have too long denounced in others to pursue it myself. I would not lay a high duty on silks and wines—nor would I tax them alone—but all similar articles of luxury. A duty of five per cent. on a judiciously selected list of free articles would be all-sufficient to supply the public wants. Thus far I am willing now to go; and I see the most powerful reasons for legislating on the subject now. If it is not done at this session, it cannot be done before the ultimate reduction in 1842; and time should be given to the mercantile community to adjust their business to any increase of duties. It ought to have been done at the last session, and I have no doubt would have been pressed upon the consideration of Congress, but for reasons of a political character.

I think I have shown, as I promised to do, that there is a deficiency in the revenue; that it is provided in the compromise that any such deficiency shall be supplied by such duties as are now proposed on articles paying less than twenty per cent.; that this compromise is of binding obligation; that the taking off duties from luxuries was opposed by the anti-tariff party, and the provision to supply any future deficiency, as it is now proposed to supply it, was inserted in the compromise act at the instance of that party; and, lastly, that if the question were a new and an open one, a tax on luxuries is, on every principal of political economy, and on every consideration of sectional equality, the fairest tax. I do not doubt that I shall be assailed and misrepresented for my course on this subject by those who are not very scrupulous in that way; but I have no sort of apprehensions on that score. I represent a constituency who are not to be influenced by falsehood or misrepresentation, or I should not now be here. I owe them much too deep a debt of gratitude to sacrifice their interests rather than encounter the risk of being misrepresented. I know that it is a maxim with some politicians never to do any thing which requires an explanation. The rule of a virtuous politician should be to do right, disregarding consequences. If I do right, and have to explain it to a virtuous and enlightened constituency, I do not doubt that I can do it. If I knowingly do wrong, I never can explain it to my own conscience.

SPEECH OF MR. DAVIS,

OF KENTUCKY,

In the House of Representatives, January 27, 1841—On the Treasury Note Bill.

MR. CHAIRMAN: Neither the head of the Treasury, nor the honorable chairman who has reported the bill under consideration, proposes or considers it to be a measure to increase the means applicable to the service of the year. Both the communications from the Department that relate to it, and the argument of the member, assume the position that the other and ordinary resources of the Treasury will be sufficient to meet the whole estimate of demands upon it for the aggregate of the year; but that the receipts and expenditures will progress unequally, and these five millions of Treasury notes are only intended to be available for a short time, in settling balances against the receipts for the first months. They state, as facts, that the produce of the Treasury will, at the close of the year, be sufficient to meet the estimates of its whole service, including the redemption of these Treasury notes; and will, besides leave an unexpended balance of $824,273. I was gratified that these fiscal officers proposed an adequate provision, without making any charge upon the ensuing year, but this feeling has been dashed by the strongest conviction, after investigation, that their promises as to both points are illusory and deceptive. It was the duty of the Executive to suggest and request sufficient means for the administrative operations of the Government; and, if the resources by which they were to be supplied are inadequate, to ask Congress to provide others that would make good the deficiency. Now, I state that neither the public service is adequately provided for in the estimates and specifications of the Department, nor will the resources of revenue relied upon by the President produce the sum which he and his advisers inform us to be necessary.

The Administration that is about going out of power has the majority in both Houses of Congress, and upon it devolves the business of making a suitable provision for an adversary that has supplanted it, to execute this great governmental trust until the close of the year. Do not patriotism, justice, and honor require that the supply should be ample to enable General Harrison to discharge promptly and conveniently every duty devolving upon the Executive, and to preserve untarnished the public faith and the public honor? I then appeal to the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, if the general average surplus in the Treasury of $824,273, which they propose to create, is a sufficient guaranty against possible failures of supply, and against large, unforeseen, and irregular demands upon it? If power were to continue in their hands, would they think it prudent to risk so small a redundancy of means? The chairman tells us that the Secretary is high authority, and is entitled to our faith and confidence; let us hear him for a moment upon this point. In his communication to the honorable chairman, dated 29th December, in which he asks the aid of this very measure, he uses this language: "The amount of means might judiciously extend to the five or six millions which have been usually kept on hand in former years, as a balance to cover all contingencies and fluctuations." If to this it be replied that such a surplus is greater than is tolerated by "the policy of Congress," I would answer that it was usual, and was deemed both prudent and safe in our better days, and when the receipts and expenditures of the Government were millions less than they are now, or are ever again likely to be. Nor was the surplus ever intended to be reduced below that minimum, by the settled policy of Congress: it was the retrenching processes of this prodigal Administration, in its reckless and irresponsible wantfulness, in its wholesale plunder of the public Treasury, that exhausted it and brought down the surplus. But if gentlemen persist in maintaining that surplus to be too large, hear the Secretary again, for another moment, in terms precise and emphatic: "One mode, then, of obviating any difficulty from that circumstance will be to reduce the aggregate of new appropriations, by postponing some and lessening others, so that the means probably available will be sufficient to meet all calls upon the Treasury, and leave in it an average balance of about two millions." "It is believed, for reasons enumerated hereafter, that such a reduction is possible, without essential injury to any useful object; and that this balance is the smallest which is adequate to secure promptitude and good faith in public payments so heavy in amount as ours, so unexpected at times in the demands for them, and so dispersed over a wide territory." Previous to the last three or four years, the surplus was rarely ever below five millions of dollars; within that period, profligacy has kept it ranging between one and a half and two millions. Is not the honorable chairman convinced, by the force of the authority which he commends to us, and by his own enlightened consideration of the subject, that the proposed surplus will be too small? Then let him come forth like a magnanimous appointee and a just and true patriot, and propose such additional means as will secure a proper one—which cannot be less than $2,000,000.

But there are other claims upon the Treasury of a large amount, known to the Secretary when he made up his estimates, and not included in them, and to meet which, neither he nor the honorable chairman proposes any supplies whatever. Is this omission caused for the purpose of exhibiting to the country a seeming and deceptive economy in expenditure? Did the Secretary intend to conceal those heavy demands, and throw them upon the next Administration, without furnishing any means to discharge them; or was the Administration too pusillanimous to meet the responsibility of asking Congress to supply the ways? On the 17th of December, the Secretary of War forwarded to the honorable chairman his "estimates of appropriations for the Florida war," amounting to $2,388,579 75. Why this unusual proceeding? It is the duty of the head of the Treasury to furnish Congress with estimates for every branch of the public service, and such has been the uniform practice. Has Mr. Secretary Woodbury abandoned the Florida war, and left the head of the military department "alone in his glory" in its management? Well, Mr. Poinsett wants supplies for this war, for which he cannot get Mr. Woodbury's sanction, and he declines to approach this House through its official organ, the Speaker, but sends his estimates and his urgent request to the chairman in the committee-room for those supplies. Here is an anomaly, and a gross abuse which sprung up under the late Administration, and which has been frequently practised by the present one, that I hope, ere long, to see reached by the hand of reform. The Secretary of the Treasury, in conformity to all usage, sends to Congress his estimates of appropriations necessary for the current year. These accompany the President's message, are printed with it, and spread before the country. Afterwards, the Secretary, or some other member of the Administration, sends additional estimates and requests for millions to the chairman of the committee, which are reported and voted by Congress. The appropriations exceed the published estimates, but these private, informal ones induce the additional supply, and thus the whole responsibility of it is thrown upon Congress, when the larger share ought to rest upon the Executive. I have no doubt that this deceptive, stealthy mode of obtaining appropriations has been often adopted to heave the responsibility from the shoulders of the President. Besides, such communications evading this House through the medium of the Speaker, and seeking the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means directly, seem to claim a confidential, semi-official relationship between him and the Executive branch of the Government, against which I make my solemn protest. He is not, nor is the chairman of any of the committees of this House, an Executive functionary or agent. All are the organs of this House, belong absolutely and exclusively to it, and are subject wholly to its expressed will; and any formal and official communications between the Executive Department and these chairmen are innovatory and improper. Information officially communicated, and designed to influence our action, ought to reach us through the Speaker. I trust, whenever General Harrison's administration may desire money to be voted for any purpose of Government, that a frank, honest, old-fashioned communication, expressing precisely its object, will be addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, so that the nation may know and understand it. But this estimate of appropriations for the Florida war is to pay and supply troops that have been already mustered into the service of the United States by the President for terms of three months. The Secretary of War informs us that one of their terms has expired, and that they have been, some time since, enrolled for another; and he proposes to enlarge their number from 1,500 to 2,000. From his statement, more than a million of this money must now be due, and by the termination of this Administration half as much more must become payable.

Is it not, then, a bold and reckless disregard of duty for the Secretary to neglect, and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to refuse, to provide any supplies to meet these Florida estimates? It is true that these expenditures have grown out of the employment of what the head of the War Department calls the "sedentary militia;" and that, by the terms of their enrolment, they are not to be embodied, but by general order are directed to pursue actively their ordinary business, and have expressly stipulated that they are, under no circumstances, to be marched twenty miles from their residence. This force has been created by the extraordinary power of the President, and his war Secretary, without deigning to consult Congress; but because they abused, or were unequal to their official discretion, and have constituted a large corps in a form not only inefficient, but ludicrous and ridiculous, still the cost is a debt, and as such, good faith and the public credit require it to be met.

But there will be still other large claims upon the Treasury above and without the estimates of the Secretary. He computes that the sum necessary for pensions will be something upwards of half a million of dollars less than was required for the past year; to produce which result the poor pensioners would have to die at a rate exceeding 25 per cent. But the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] has shown that 10 per cent. per annum is largely above their diminution by death; so that at least $250,000 more should be supplied, that the plighted faith of the Government to these recipients of its justice and bounty may be preserved. Neither has the Secretary estimated one farthing to satisfy the claims of the States against the General Government, or to pay private claims, or to cover objects which, amidst such a vast variety, might escape his attention, or the necessity for which might arise during the session. Maine has claims, originating out of her military movements to repel British aggression upon her territory, amounting to between two and three hundred thousand dollars; and New Hampshire and Georgia both have their claims. A bill providing for the payment of those of New Hampshire has passed the Senate, and the House Committee on Military Affairs are prepared to report unanimously in favor of those of Maine. Now I demand to know of the gentleman representing those two States, how they can urge or vote for the payment of the claims of their respective States, whilst they stand opposed to raise enough of supplies to meet them, and to pay for the other necessary public service? It is neither just, patriotic, nor decorous. I have not been so much surprised at the cold neglect with which the private claimants have been treated. During the last session all their demands, just or unjust, were systematically and perseveringly opposed by this Administration and its majority in both Houses of Congress; and so successfully has this hostility been followed up, that I do not believe a dozen private bills will have passed by the 4th of March. Many of them are of the most just and meritorious character; and some of the individuals to whom they are due have been hanging around this Hall until they have grown old. From year to year, they have been sustained by the consciousness of the justice of their demands, and by the bright and glorious but receding illusions of an American Congress, impressed upon them by the lessons of their youth. They have been taught to connect it with the loftiest conceptions of ability, intelligence, virtue, justice, decorum, dignity, and business aptitudes. But they have seen it gradually sinking into degeneracy, rent and torn by contending parties, passively registering Executive edicts, abandoning its constitutional and appropriate duties, and giving itself up wholly to cabals to control a Presidential election, trampling upon the Constitution, disregarding the public good, and contemning the claims of private justice. When these individuals have seen our debates running into interminable vagaries on every subject but the one before the House, and the days allotted by our rules to an adjudication of their rights filched from them by an unscrupulous and tyrannical majority, and that time and money which justly belongs to them given up to faction and profligacy, who could be surprised that they should utter against us curses deep and bitter; that, smarting under a sense of slight and wrong, they should invoke some Cromwell to drive us from the seats we dishonor?

I submit it to the intelligence and candor of the honorable chairman whether for the appropriations to cover the claims of the States, the demands of individuals that ought reasonably to be pressed, and subjects that may have escaped the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury, or that may be provided for by the independent action of Congress, the sum of one million of dollars would be too large? Why, sir, if there should be an ordinary degree of vigilance and fidelity in superintending the public service, that amount would be greatly insufficient. In 1838 the expenditures exceeded the estimates more than four millions of dollars; in 1839 this excess was $1,360,578; and in 1840 it was $2,723,349; and in each year the excess was composed principally of items that had been omitted by the Secretary in his estimates. These facts, with a great many others, prove how prone to error is the head of the Treasury Department, and admonish my honorable friend to abate something of the high confidence which he is disposed to give to his estimates for the present year. But conceding for the present that they are accurate so far as they go—and still it is demonstrated that they are minus by millions, certainly not less than by the difference between his estimated surplus and the aggregate of the several items which I have here presented, and this difference cannot possibly be less than $4,564,306—how can the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means or Congress evade the duty to raise the requisite supplies to meet it?

But let us examine very cursorily the adequacy of the provision which the minister of finance proposes for the year's service. He estimates a less expenditure for this year than what was actually incurred during the last by $3,333,349; and if the items connected with the Florida war, which had actually accrued, and were then in arrears, be, as they ought to be, computed, this excess of expenditures for last year would be more than $4,000,000.

The difference between the expenses of the short and long sessions of Congress, and the diminished sums necessary for the public buildings, and to execute Indian treaties, made in the aggregate, in favor of this year, about $500,000; but in addition to the $250,000 which will be required for the payment of pensions, there are other large amounts which the Secretary has cut down in his estimate, and, as it seems to me, to the prejudice of the public interest. Last year there was appropriated for the Ordnance Department $963,000; this year but $766,000. In 1840, the appropriations for fortifications were $878,198; whilst for 1841 the Secretary estimates $415,500 for the same works. As they are all in an unfinished state, and more money must be expended on each before they are completed, the reasonable presumption is, that as large expenditures would have been required upon them in this, as during the past year. But then the Secretary of War informs us that, in consequence of these appropriations for the past year having been postponed by the President, little or nothing of them had been expended; there is an apparent necessity for enlarged operations, and sums exceeding those which were voted at the last session. This difference between the appropriations of the past, and the estimates of the present year, might be traced, but in a less striking degree, in a great many other items. But let me pursue, for a moment, this suspension or postponement (if the term suits better) by the President of certain appropriations made at the last session. In his annual message he uses this language: "Nor has it been found necessary, in order to produce this result, to resort to the power conferred by Congress, of postponing certain classes of the public works, except by deferring expenditures for a short period, upon a limited portion of them, and which postponement terminated some time since," &c. From the President's statement, every person would infer that this postponement had produced but an inconsiderable interruption to operations on these works, and which, slight as it was, had long since wholly ceased. But what is the information given us by the Secretary of War upon this subject? In his annual report he says, "In consequence of the suspension of the application of funds appropriated for the prosecution of the works under the supervision of the Quartermaster General's office, during the season for active operations, little progress has been made in them since my last report." The difference of statement between the two high functionaries in relation to the same matter produced some ambiguity; and to clear it up, this House called upon the President for the true state of the case. Well, Mr. Van Buren sends us his message, in which he admits that he had suspended the whole of the appropriations for fortifications, and large sums for other objects, amounting in the aggregate to $1,638,317; and this suspension continued at least as late as the 8th day of November. Congress was shortly to assemble, and might be a little curious about this matter; it was therefore deemed advisable that Mr. Secretary Woodbury should on that day send a communication to the President, informing him that the Treasury was in such condition that this suspension or postponement might be terminated, and we learn of no further official action upon the subject. The President had directed the suspension of these appropriations; and were the officers and agents charged with their disbursement, or any person out of his privy council, duly advertised that it had ceased? The member from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] on yesterday read us a letter from the Secretary of War, in which he concedes that the contractors upon the works at Old Point Comfort had not been paid for their labor; and that they could not receive payment until the 1st of April, in consequence of the President having postponed the appropriation for that fortification. Mr. Poinsett pushes the President still deeper into the morass. But this is only one of the instances of duplicity, concealment, and prevarication, with which the President's annual message teems. However, it is characteristic; for if ever he has written a single sentence that carried an honest purpose and meaning in plain straightforward language, I do not recollect to have read it. Among the reforms which I expect to see inroduced by his successor, will be State papers unambiguous, frank, and comprehensible; unsophisticated in argument, and in detail of facts presenting the naked and reliable truth. Yes, when President Harrison speaks to the American People and to Congress, it will be in language frank and intelligible, to which every body may confidently appeal, as the exponent of his principles, and as the vehicle of accurate information.

But the President's confidential officers have presented to him directly still stronger testimony of the insufficiency of these estimates. The Secretary of War, in his annual report, says: "The whole coast, from Passamaquoddy bay to the Sabine river, is exposed, on every point not defended by nature, to be invaded with impunity; and in the event of war, the expense of attempting to defend this long line by troops, for one year only, would cost more than to erect the works which have been planned, and which are deemed sufficient to defend the several points of attack along the whole coast." Again: "During your administration, nearly forty-one thousand Indians have been added to those already residing on the western boundary, while the additional securities to the border States have not been commensurate to the additional dangers to which such an increase of warlike and discontented neighbors exposes them." But Mr. Poinsett presents the paucity of our means in a still stronger point of view. "Whenever," says he, "the condition of the Treasury will permit, it is very desirable to erect new barracks at West Point. Those at present there are dilapidated buildings, originally badly constructed, and now in a state of decay, which renders them as unhealthy as they are inconvenient."

But do these gentlemen propose to be any more provident of the interests of our glorious Navy? The Secretary of this Department directs the Board of Navy Commissioners to make out their estimates for that arm of the public defence, not according to its wants, and with an enlightened regard to its vigor and efficiency, but allows them to select "objects and amounts of expenditures," within the scope of an inexorable restriction to $5,025,000. This arrangement meets the more pressing demands of the Navy, and leaves to be applied to its permanent increase the paltry sum of $100,000. Now, sir, upon this review, we, the friends of the coming in Administration, reproach those who are going out of power, that they are not making an adequate and proper provision for the public service; that they sacrifice patriotism and the lofty pride connected with national power and glory to a blind, despicable party attachment, and to the ignoble purpose of embarrassing the Government of their country, because it is about to be swayed by a President not of their choice. And for this we are taunted, that at the last session our song carried all the time the popular burden of retrenchment and economy; that we are suddenly metamorphosed by the acquisition of power, and are giving early indication of a propensity to run a career of large and extravagant expenditure. Those against whom we were lately hurling the heaviest thunders of denunciation for a reckless and profligate waste of the public treasure, are now attempting to turn this battery upon us. Let us look a little deeper into this matter. Mr. Van Buren and his minister of finance propose to allow General Harrison to expend, during the next year, in every branch of the public service, $19,250,000, provided they have not over-estimated the resources by which that sum is to be raised. And how is that to be realized and brought into the Treasury? Mr. Woodbury calculates the customs to furnish $19,000,000, and the sales of public lands $3,500,000. Last year the same resources yielded $17,120,103, of which the avails of the customs were about $14,000,000. Now, we have returns from the Treasury, which inform us that the first quarter will produce something more than three millions. This is not matter of conjecture, but one of the tests of time. In December next, by the operation of the compromise, the duties will fall off $2,500,000; and as that sum would amount to a pretty good profit upon the importation of dutiable articles, no more of them will be brought in for some considerable time before that date than will be required by the active demands of our market. We can only form opinions; but give to these two facts their proper consideration, and can any candid man come to any other conclusion than that the Secretary has greatly over-rated the produce of the customs? Can any reasonable expectation be indulged that the last three quarters will produce each upwards of five millions of dollars? No, sir; the customs cannot be relied upon for more than fifteen millions; and, from the aggravation of the general contraction in our monetary affairs that will be produced by the operation of the Sub Treasury, and a general attempt of the banks to resume specie payments, the amount arising from the sales of public lands will probably not exceed three millions of dollars. Then, a surplus in the Treasury of $2,000,000; the estimates of the Secretary of War for the Florida service being $2,388,579; the amount necessary to meet the claims of individuals and the States, and unexpended objects of expenditure, amounting at least to $1,000,000; and the excess of the Secretary's estimates of the receipts of the year, make an aggregate beyond his anticipated surplus of $9,064,306. I do not think any candid man would venture an opinion that the deficiency in the revenue would not be at least that amount, and in my judgment it will be considerably above it. But the condition of things will be much worse for the next and subsequent years, unless Congress adopts some remedial legislation. Mr. Woodbury informs us: "The progressive reduction of the present tariff, which has been going on since 1833, will, after December, 1841, take effect to a much larger extent than heretofore. Nearly two millions and a half of dollars will then be deducted at once." "On the first of July afterwards, at least two millions and a half more of duties will be removed; making an aggregate, in six months, of quite five millions. If the imports, then, should not differ much from those of 1838, this would leave an income from them not probably exceeding ten or eleven millions annually." The Secretary presents his side of the case as favorably as in any candor he could; and, I have no doubt, gives us a larger result than will be justified by experience. The average amount of imports will not equal those of 1838, and the revenue arising from them will generally be under ten millions. The sales of public lands will bring in about three millions yearly; and thus there will be thirteen millions annually to sustain this Government in all its multi-form and extensive operations—our large and ramified civil list, our Indian relations, our foreign intercourse with all the nations of the earth, our army, our navy, our vast internal polity. The Secretary knows that this cannot be done upon the scale which has so long prevailed, and reasons with himself a remedy for this state of things. He presents, in their order, issues of Treasury notes or loans—the distinctive panacea of this Administration; a recall of the surplus deposited with the States; direct taxation, and some extensive modification of the present tariff; all of which he repudiates; and he winds up by choosing "the large reduction of the expenditures," and recommends that "the reduction be pushed vigorously." As our resources would be only two-thirds of what he has admitted, in his meagre, stinted estimates, to be necessary for the service of this year, to bring down the expenditures to the receipts would require a reduction more vigorously than has ever yet been seen. A person uninformed of the fact would conclude that this Secretary, in his administration of his Department, must have been a great friend of economy, and have signalized himself by the extent and importance of his retrenchments. That, as he had expressed his opinion with so much confidence, that about thirteen millions annually would suffice his successors to sustain this Government and to foster and protect all the interests of this great nation, surely it could not have required more than fifteen millions to have enabled him to effect the same objects. But what would be his amazement in turning to the archives of the Treasury office, to find that this Secretary, who has been so ostentatiously reading lectures upon economy to those who are to follow him, had in the last four years expended an aggregate of $135,679,548? Be not startled, sir, 'tis true, 'tis passing true; though 'tis strange, it is wondrous strange; and thus this vast amount is distributed through that period. In the year 1837, were expended $35,281,361; in 1838, $37,150,118; in 1839, $36,604,413; and in 1840, $26,643,656; and this grand aggregate would have been swollen to $145,000,000, but for the vigorous assaults made by the Whigs upon the present party in power for its unprecedented wastefulness; and that the last session of Congress immediately preceded the Presidential election. But there are the unsatisfied balances against the Treasury, untold, unknown, but doubtless sufficient to eke out that mighty sum. Now, in the name of the American people, I demand to know of the Administration what has it done with this immense treasure? How has it been appropriated, and where are the commensurate results? Have our important harbors been cleared out, buoys erected to warn the mariner from dangers beneath the ocean buried, and light-houses peered high, with inspiring gleams shooting across the midnight watery waste, to guide him to his haven? Has our Navy been increased apace with our growth, and kept fully sufficient for the exigencies of a commerce spreading into every sea, and exploring every land? Have roads and canals been called into existence, to speed the interchanges of intelligence and commerce throughout this extended confederacy, and to concentrate its power at any point where danger may threaten on its four thousand miles of frontier, of ocean, lake, and forest? Have our Atlantic cities and commercial emporiums been secured against sudden invasion by impregnable fortifications, armed with great ordnance, whose deep intonations mimic Heaven's artillery? In this great and warlike nation, armed, in full coat of mail, resting in dread repose, but ready for the shock of battle, desiring friendly relations with the nations of the earth, asking of all nothing but "what is right," and determined and fully prepared "to submit to nothing that is wrong?" No, sir, no; all these questions, fraught with so much of momentous interest to the American people, must be answered in the negative. Any man not particularly informed would have supposed, that the leading and permanent objects, the repairs of the Navy, the gradual increase of our military marine, the construction of fortifications, the making of roads and canals, the improvement of harbors and rivers, the procurement of ordnance and the armament of our fortifications, would, in the aggregate, have claimed at least one-fourth of this total disbursement. How would he be shocked and outraged to learn that those nine great and essential interests had, altogether, shared less than twelve millions of dollars of that immense expenditure; and that, excluding $4,400,000 for the repairs of the Navy, all the others had had, in the last four years, but $7,553,123 appropriated to them, without deducting any thing from that amount for unexpended balances that have remained more than two years, and thereby fell back into the surplus fund. In the session of 1839, there was nothing appropriated for harbors and rivers; the last session, nothing; and the whole of the last appropriation for fortifications was virtually repealed by the President's exercise of the suspending power.

The Secretary of War tells us that our situation is so defenceless that we are exposed to be attacked with impunity at every point where nature has not interposed her protection, and that our very barracks are falling into dilapidation and ruin. But who can contemplate the condition of our Navy without feelings of indignation and humility? Years ago, Congress directed the building of the frigate Congress, and also of six small ships of war; but so pressing and important have been other demands upon the Treasury, that no money could be spared for the frigate and for one of the smaller ships. The few vessels we have in commission are barely kept afloat, in a state of great inefficiency; whilst those in ordinary and on the stocks have been slowly, but certainly, going to decay. Our commerce has been suffering for the want of a sufficient force to protect it, in almost every sea. About the time of the commencement of the commercial troubles at Canton our traders to that port petitioned the President to send a squadron into those distant regions to protect American interests. Such is the imbecility that administers our Navy Department, that though our great commercial rival had made a descent upon China with a heavy military and maritime force—though the British merchants, from feelings of rivalry, were torturing their ingenuity to cut up the American trade, and their commanders were perpetrating outrages upon our ships and lawful traffic by violations of the laws of nations and of blockade—still twelve months expired before the feebleness of the Administration could despatch a squadron to look after these interesting concerns. And what sort of an armament was it? Our smallest frigate and a single sloop sent out to protect our trade from China, in a state of quasi war between her and Great Britain; and so tardily, that they probably have not yet reached the theatre of their operations! A pretty demonstration of American power and greatness was this to make upon a semi-barbarian people, in the presence, too, of a wary and jealous rival, powerfully armed, and unscrupulously using every means to eject us from the trade, and to secure for herself an exclusive monopoly of it. Even now, the pusillanimity of the Chinese may be awed into submission by this imposing display of British force and prowess; and they may be negotiating a total change of the system of their commercial intercourse with the rest of the world, under England's military dictation, when there is not an American gun on all their seas, whose thunders shall awaken them from the stupor of their fright to the recollection that there is any such country as America.

It is, both to our injury and dishonor, notorious that our military marine, whether in commission or in ordinary, bears no proper proportion to our mercantile tonnage, and is greatly inadequate to its protection. France has one gun for every seventy tons of shipping—England has one for every hundred tons, whilst the United States has but one for every seven hundred tons. The application, too, of steam power to the propelling of ships is producing a great and radical change in naval warfare. In port attack and defence, and for celerity and certainty in coast descent, experienced seamen accord to steam ships vast efficiency over ordinary shipping. To a country having numerous ports and a great extent of coast, it is of vital importance to be strongly armed with this formidable means of offence and defence. England has thirty-two men-of-war steam ships, France has eighteen, and the United States has two on the stocks, and the miserable thing called "the Robert Fulton" afloat. Gentleman vaunt their friendship for our navy, and their pride in its glorious achievements; let them give a more satisfactory and solid testimony that they in truth possess those truly American and ennobling sentiments, let them vote enough of money to make it great as well as gallant. I, sir, am prepared now to vote three millions in addition to what has been proposed for the Navy; and I would sooner attempt to justify myself to my constituents for that vote, than for any I shall give during the session. They are an agricultural people, situate in the heart of this Union. Their position gives them comparative security from foreign aggression. They know that the first onset must be made upon our navy and upon our coast; and considerations coupled with their own security, as well as a desire to see danger warded off from their countrymen and brethren, prompt them to favor measures that will fully strengthen both. They understand that a strong and effective navy can never endanger public liberty, and is the only, and yet a powerful means of beating back from our shores the bloody tide of war. They look with fraternal feelings and with national pride to those States which have given to the stars and stripes the best and noblest tars that ever spread canvass to the battle or the breeze; and in the fulness of their hearts they desire to cover them with the ægis of the nation, and to draw them closer to their embrace. We hear gentlemen on this floor fulminating war against England, and rebuking our own Government for having borne so much from her pride, her arrogance, and her thirst for dominion. We certainly have a long and grave account to settle with her, and she perseveres in still running it up. She has violently held possession of a portion of our territory for a generation against the clearest right; and she answers our demonstration of her wrong by extending her claim to embrace another large portion of the State of Maine. An armed expedition from one of her provinces invaded the State of New York, cut a steamboat out of one of her ports, and perpetrated the crimes of arson and murder; and when one of the felons comes within our jurisdiction, and, having audaciously boasted of his deeds, is apprehended for his crimes, her Minister has the boldness to justify him, and demands his release because he was acting under the authority of his Government. She receives our runaway slaves into the Canadas, and immediately arms and forms them into regiments to keep ward over our frontier, denying to their owners both compensation and the right to reclaim them. When our ships put into her West India ports from stress of weather, having slaves on board, she seizes upon this property against the laws of nations, assuming the extraordinary position that the legislation of Parliament can change the principles of that universal code, and give freedom to the slave the moment he touches her possessions. Under color of suppressing the slave trade, and other pretexts, she takes forcible possession of our unarmed ships engaged in lawful traffic, and breaks up their voyages, to the ruin of their owners, when her real motive is jealousy of our growing commerce and to cripple it to her purpose. That man deludes himself who believes that she will retrace her steps, that we can reclaim our territory, or procure from her redress for those other wrongs, except at the cannon's mouth. When has she ever faltered in her career of encroachment and usurpation in which, stimulated by her avarice and rapacity, her love of power, and domination, she has been steadily marching for more than a century? At this time, beyond all former periods, fortune seems to favor her ambitious projects. In Syria, and Turkey, Northern India, and China, she is advancing covertly or openly with a giant's stride, and we are left in doubt whether the achievements of her arms or of her diplomacy are the most signal. Hers is far the greatest, past or present, of all earth's empires. It is spread and is spreading over its four quarters, and travels with the eternal circle of the sun around it. Power, the great corrupting principle of the heart of man, is acting with an energy without parallel upon her rulers, and, for the future, her leading national propensity will be, to plant her foot upon the nations. How can we, her greatest commercial rival, hope to elude it? Whenever she is engaged in a general war, she will not permit us to enjoy the rich and teeming harvest of the commerce of a world in arms. Her usurpation of the right of search, and of declaring subjects of lawful trade to be contraband of war, will force us to become parties to the conflict. Sooner or later, from some of these causes, the storm will burst upon us, and it is the duty of people and of rulers to be prepared for it. The way to protect ourselves and to make England feel the vigor of our arms, is to throw impregnable fortifications around our important commercial emporiums, and to build up a powerful navy.

But, sir, when a Secretary, who in the last four years has spent one hundred and forty millions of dollars, and yet left all our internal channels of communication unadvanced, our whole defences in such an unprepared and miserable condition, our military marine in dilapidation and ruin, and not a single great object of permanent national utility to note to the future that Mr. Van Buren's Administration has been, gravely lectures General Harrison that the Government of this great people can be properly administered, and their mighty interests adequately provided for, by an annual expenditure of thirteen millions of dollars, does it not strike every unprejudiced mind as a most unparalleled piece of impudence? Nothing but his adroitness in mystifying the national concerns over which he has presided could save him from the contempt and scorn of the great honest mass of his own party. He strongly reminds one of the description which Don Quixote gave of Sancho to the Duke—"that, to judge from his cunning, you would suppose he was a knave; but then his absurdity will incline you to believe he is a fool." This Secretary could not have recommended a smaller amount of expenditure, even if the present Administration had been so wise, so fruitful of great results, as to have left nothing for the next and its friends to do towards national improvement and national security, but simply to maintain our internal polity, and our relations with the Indian tribes and with foreign nations. It is not because the large sum of money has been expended, that the indignation of the people has been awakened against their incompetent and unfaithful agents, but that it has been all wasted, without producing any permanent good. It has gone as the spoils of victory; it has been plundered by defaulting officers and unfaithful employees in the Florida war, and squandered in a thousand ways, whilst the Government was totally regardless of its high and solemn trust in the disbursement. From the Presidency down, all have acted exclusively upon the spoils principle. The benefit, power, and glory of the nation; purity, fidelity, and wisdom in administration; the security and preservation of liberty, have been unheeded; and all, all have been animated by the sole, absorbing ignoble purpose of holding on to power. It would have been cheerfully conceded to them to have appointed their own friends to office had they given to the country good and true men.

But it was proclaimed by their official reports in the Senate chamber that the officers of Government were expected to take an active part in politics; and those who were daily deluding the people, by invoking the name of Jefferson and Democracy, poured contempt upon his memory by disregarding, wholly his great conservative principle of making an active interference, by any officer of Government, either in State or Federal elections, a cause of removal. The appointing power never asked "is he honest, is he faithful, is he capable," but is he influential, active, and noisy?—how much can his support add to, or his opposition abstract from, the popularity of Mr. Van Buren and the party? The incumbents who attended quietly and faithfully to their duties were ruthlessly and ignominiously dismissed, notwithstanding they voted in favor of the Administration. That was not enough; they were expected to give their time and their energies, their soul and sense, up to electioneering, to the manufacture of popular sentiment, to the corruption of the ballot-box. Their decent quiescence was treason against their party; they were dragged forth and immolated upon its foul altar; and their places filled by unscrupulous, mercenary trainbands, whose last care was to perform the duties of the stations they but nominally filled. After this system had been enforced in all its rigor, and the party leaders and apostles resisted registry laws; and every attempt to throw defences around popular suffrage, and to guard its purity—and one of their great principles of operation has been any fraud upon it—now it is the height of effrontery that they should set up as its especial guardians. When the people appealed to the Government—not as an independent concern, but as their agency, instituted solely for their convenience and good—they were sternly reproved, that they "expected too much of Government"—"that it was the duty of Government to take care of itself." Is it strange that, under such auspices, the Government should have become corrupt in all its ramifications; the Treasury should have been given up to plunder and bankruptcy; the national defences abandoned; our foreign intercourse neglected; the rights of our merchants trampled upon by our rivals, and our honor tarnished; our currency in hopeless disorder; our credit and commerce prostrate; and our system fast changing its character of a representative Democracy to an elective monarchy? Is it wonderful that the American people have given to the power that caused all this such a signal overthrow? Let its fate be a beacon-light for all future Administrations, warning them to keep afar from its principles and its measures.

But, sir, there are other large existing demands against the Treasury. The Administration chairman of the Committee on Finance in the Senate [Mr. WRIGHT] concedes that we owe by treaty stipulation with certain Indian tribes, $2,300,000. Our Government is bound to advance the money and vest it in annuities for their benefit; and the covenant we have made with these poor sons of the forest has long been in a state of infraction. The sums we owe other tribes augment our Indian debt largely above $3,000,000. The amount of unsatisfied balances, growing out of the Florida war, our contracts for fortifications, for army supplies, and for numerous other objects, who at present, can number the aggregate? The systematic concealment, the thick veil, which this Administration has always thrown over such "secrets of State," must be rent before it can be told; but the most intelligent members of Congress compute it at from seven to ten millions. So that, beyond the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, there are present urgent claims against the Government for debt due, and for the most essential public service, amounting to about $20,000,000. If it be even possible to drag on a miserable, dishonorable existence for another year, with the aid of Treasury notes, is it wise and statesman-like to do it, without creating other and permanent sources of revenue? This responsibility cannot be postponed much longer, and yet no legislation that can reasonably take place at the next regular session can provide for it, with any practical effect, short of eighteen months. By the provision of the compromise act, the credit of three and six months for the principal amount of duties will continue until July, 1842; any which might be imposed at the next session upon luxuries could not possibly be available sooner than the ensuing midsummer, and no considerable amount before the fall and winter following. Then, postpone the action of Congress upon this subject twelve months longer, and it will throw together upon the Treasury all existing unsatisfied balances, and the present heavy deficiency in the revenue for two years. The rates of duties will necessarily have to be higher than they might now be affixed, as they must be sufficient not only for the annual expenditure, but for the liquidation of all the debt that may in the mean time accumulate. But if we proceed at once to meet the difficulties of our position, we mitigate a cause that must necessarily produce some agitation and charge in trade and business; and there is time yet for reasonable notice to be allowed to our importing merchants, before any new law might be made to take effect. They could then exercise a provident forecast, and modify their importations according to the charge produced by our legislation—a matter of vital interest to them, and by no means of indifference to the country.

The necessity upon Congress to raise more revenue is indisputable, and is daily becoming more urgent; and now is the time, the appropriate time, to enter upon it. There cannot, in reason, be any question in relation to this matter, except as to the mode by which it is to be done. There is but a solitary gentleman in the House who has proposed direct taxation, and, notwithstanding it may have here a few more friends, it is not seriously to be considered. It is the most expensive, vexatious, and oppressive form of taxation. It is in conflict with all the habits and feelings of the American people, and they will not and ought not to submit to it, except in time of war, or some other extraordinary and pressing emergency. The withdrawal of the deposits from the States is, if possible, more objectionable; because that measure was intended and regarded at the time as but another mode of distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; and it was only prejudice against the measure designed expressly for that purpose, which had previously passed both Houses by the most decisive majorities, and its distinguished author, that prevented it from being so in form as well as in substance. The money had resulted from the sales of the lands; it of right belonged to the States, and they have so used it. If Congress were to reclaim these deposits, it would be requiring from the States that which is theirs, and which they could not return to the United States Treasury only by the most grievous direct taxation upon the people. The resort must be to the long approved and appropriate form of duties upon importations. By the terms of the compromise act, silks, wines, and other articles of luxury were nearly wholly exempted from duties, because none of them were manufactured or produced in the United States; and the chief amount of revenue raised by imposts was placed upon articles that come in competition with American manufactures. This arrangement was made to afford to our own manufacturers more protection than would have been provided for if the revenue by duties had been distributed among all our subjects of importation. The compromise further declared that the duties then in existence, (about twenty per cent.) should be reduced ten per cent. per annum until December next, when half of the remaining excess above that rate should abate; and on the 30th day of June, 1842, the other half should also come off. No additional duties were to be imposed upon luxuries, unless the revenue should prove deficient. The effect of this arrangement was, that the articles of import that pay the great mass of revenue are mostly necessities; and by its subsequent operation, in reducing the rates of duty by annual instalments, there has been, and will be from this time forth, a heavy deficiency in the revenue. Will Congress meet it by imposing duties upon luxuries equal to those that are now paid by protected articles, or will we spread it over all our importations, without regard to the existing tariff, or add it to the burden that now exists upon necessities? It seems to me to be only necessary to state these propositions to enable gentlemen to choose between them; and I am astonished that there is any diversity of judgment upon the subject. A tax upon luxuries will fall principally upon the wealthy and the prodigal; nor have they been cheapened to any person since they have been admitted almost free. The consumers of necessities may well object to any more burdens upon them until luxuries are made to pay at least equivalent duties; and this would seem to be more agreeable to the South, since they would fall equally upon every section of the United States according to its consumption. But put them upon articles similar to those made in our Northern manufactories, and you necessarily increase the price of the products of that portion of the people of the United States, and give them a profit not shared by those whose industry is not employed in the same pursuits.

But the North does not insist upon this. Its enlightened representatives on this floor, in a spirit of justice and good feeling, have most distinctly expressed their concurrence in the project of imposing upon all luxuries the same rate of duties as now exist upon protected articles; or they are willing for the additional burden to be thrown upon the latter, at the option of gentlemen from other sections of the Union. It is a principle of justice, and wise policy too, that all taxes ought, as far as practicable, to be paid according to the ability of those upon whom they are imposed. I avow myself in favor, then, of the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] which proposes to borrow ten millions of dollars by direct loan, and to lay duties upon luxuries, to meet the deficiency in our revenue. A direct loan is always the most honest, and would now be the cheapest mode of raising the money. It is a transaction without any concealment or mystification, and overtly informs the people of the true condition of the Treasury. The issue of Treasury notes is an indirect and insidious mode of borrowing money. It has been chosen during the last four years for the purpose, and is well calculated to evade responsibility, and to hide from the people the real condition of their affairs. How many American citizens, particularly friends of the present Administration, will credit the statement that, by the agency of Treasury notes, it has, since 1837, borrowed $25,000,000; and, by the bill now under consideration, is proposing $5,000,000 of additional loan. It ought only to be attempted when all the usual modes of borrowing money have failed. Instead of alleviating, it increases the burdens upon the Treasury, by charging it with the interest which the notes bear, and all the heavy incidental expenses of their issue. But when there has been a growing deficiency of the revenue for four years, and, in addition to its annual produce, Mr. Van Buren has expended twenty-five millions of Treasury notes, the fourth instalment of the deposits with the States, amounting to upwards of nine millions, the surplus of more than six millions which was in the Treasury when he came into office, the seven millions of Government stock in the late Bank of the United States, being an aggregate of extraordinary means of more than $47,000,000; and when the ordinary receipts of the Treasury are about to fall off $10,000,000 annually, and the condition of the country and its great interests are in such a deplorable condition—for the President and his finance Secretary to propose no remedy for this state of things but another issue of five millions of Treasury notes, and for the majority of Congress to refuse any other provision for it, prove an enormity of faction, a flagitious desertion of duty, a reckless disregard of consequences, that ought to draw upon them the unmitigated reprobation of the whole American people. When the friends of the next Administration became dominant in Congress, they will march steadily forward to meet every proper responsibility. Whilst they always have been, and never will cease to be, animated by true principles of economy, they are not to be frightened from their propriety by a senseless cry about it. They understand that governmental economy does not consist in expending the smallest sums of money, but in producing the greatest amount of necessary and useful results from the same means. They have seen this nation, with right hearty good will, pouring forth countless treasure to vindicate her rights and to redress her wrongs; and they are proudly conscious that their constituents will hold them now to the performance, within the Constitution, of every thing that shall be required by their safety, their prosperity, their honor; their glory. Whilst we avow our willingness to raise millions for those high and necessary purposes, we proclaim not one cent for spoils and plunder.

SPEECH OF MR. NISBET,

OF GEORGIA.

In the House of Representatives, January 22, 1841.
On the Treasury Note bill.

MR. CHAIRMAN: I voted during the last session of Congress for the issue of Treasury notes. I was then satisfied of the power of the Legislature to contract a loan upon this plan. I am still convinced of the power. I can now see no constitutional objection to it. Having then presented my views upon this subject, to that argument I have nothing to add, and from it nothing to subtract. I was willing then to exercise the power, avowing that, because of the seductive, easy, and deceptive character of this mode of raising money, it should be resorted to with great care, and only in cases of extreme necessity. Such a case, I believed, was then presented. The Government was, as was conceded on every hand, upon the verge of bankruptcy. She could not wait for any less rapid measure of extrication than the prompt one proposed. I was constrained to come to the rescue of the Treasury, and relieve it from monetary and political dishonor. The obligations of patriotism, irrespective of all party views, required it. In a like case of emergency, my conduct will be of like character. Whether, therefore, I shall vote for the bill now before the committee, depends upon the necessity which may be shown now to exist to raise five millions of dollars at once. It is not questioned that the Government will need this sum in addition to the revenues which will accrue from all ordinary sources during the year 1841. The chairman of the Ways and Means [Mr. JONES] admits that there will be a deficiency, but calls it temporary, and assures us that it will be reimbursed in the last quarter's income. The Secretary of the Treasury takes similar grounds. Indeed, the very proposition of the officers of finance to borrow money assumes both the want and the inability of the usual resources to supply it. To justify my support, however, I shall require the gentlemen to show that the exigencies of the Treasury are so imminent that they cannot await the process of a permanent and wise system of revenue. This they will scarcely be able to show: for, however deeply the Government may have been involved by the absurd and temporizing expedients and experiments of Mr. Van Buren and his friends, I believe it may be relieved without resort to a measure of always doubtful expediency.

Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to discuss the financial administration of the party now expiring. I do not intend to show up its errors of theory, and its infidelity in practice—to demonstrate the existence of a national debt—the amount or the mode of its origin and augmentation. I do not propose to analyze the mystic and oracular report of the Secretary, whose external aspect is so fair, and whose secret meanings are so various and pregnant. Other gentlemen have done all this. That the Government is in debt is a postulate—the only mooted points are the amounts and the mode of payment. The amount has been variously estimated from eight to sixteen millions of dollars. It is to the manner in which the money should be raised to discharge this debt, and also for the usual purposes of the Government, that I propose addressing myself. This inquiry is important, because it involves the permanent financial system of the coming Administration; and to Southern statesmen, the vital question, how far and in what form the revenue is to be raised by duties on imports. The tariff, the compromise act, the rights and feelings of the South, are therefore brought into the discussion. Upon the question of a revision of the tariff, nor as to the origin, effect, and maintenance of the act of 2d March, 1833, known as the compromise, would I have said one word, but for the course of argument and remark indulged in by my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. Rhetor.] To him I hope to be able to reply successfully.

Sir, as a member of the Harrison party, I would discard shifts and financial subterfuges. I am for adopting, in the very outset of the new Administration, a system which will pay the debt entailed upon the State, and keep her out of debt—a system that shall be equal to a supply in a uniform way of all the wants of an economical Administration. The reliance of this Government for revenue is upon, 1st, the public domain; 2d, direct taxation; and 3d, imposts. Should the usage of the Government for past years, in relation to the public lands, continue to be its policy for years to come, and they should be brought into market on the most favorable terms, reasoning from the past to the future, three million dollars must be the extent of income from that quarter. The expenditures of the Government cannot fall below twenty millions annually. A very small part, therefore, of the annual wants of the State can be realized from the public domain. But, sir, how long shall we receive this small revenue from lands? Who shall tell us the destiny of the vast territory of the Union? Who so seer-like as to predict its disposition? A few years may witness the total loss of this magnificent mine of wealth; scattered to the winds, dissipated to feed the aspirations of unhallowed ambition; a bone over which the mad zealots of party fight; an interest which we may live to see sold to buy the bauble, the Presidency, to amuse for a moment some spoiled child of power. The new States claim it even now as their own, and threaten to seize it with the strong arm of their outnumbering representation under the next census. And leaders of party—one at least—would conciliate this Warwick power of setting up and pulling down Presidents, by substantially giving what it asks, and transferring the title to these lands to the new States in which they lie, alleging as a reason that, if we do not give them the lands, they will soon have the power to take them; thus violating a trust to avoid a robbery. Or this rich legacy of the old States, either given in their munificence, or bought with their blood and treasure, may be squandered by a spendthrift trustee in pre-emption privileges to foreign immigrants, invited by Democratic cupidity for power to come and rule over us, and paid out of a fund not its own to stamp upon our system either the impulsiveness of revolutionary mobs; or the despotism of European dynasties. Or, it may be, the States, distrusting the fidelity of the Government in the management of this trust fund, all charges upon it having been paid, will divide its proceeds, as they have a right to do, equitably among themselves.

I will not now, Mr. Chairman, pause to discuss, as others have done, the distribution bill of Mr. CLAY. Sufficient to the day will be the duties it may bring with it. I advert to these measures, in relation to the public lands, for the sole purpose of showing that from them we have no certainty of deriving revenue to any amount whatever.*

The gentleman from South Carolina is the only statesman of the age who has approved direct taxation, in time of peace, as a mode of raising the public moneys. He stands alone in this regard. He, with his usual independence of thought and action, has ventured to recommend direct taxes instead of indirect taxation by duties on imports. But, sir, his system is revolting to the feelings of our free people. They abhor it with all its odious machinery and throng of gatherers; its Executive patronage, its expensive execution, and its cruel exactions. It is true that it may be plausibly said of it that it is the only plan of apportioning taxes with mathematical equality among the people; that it adjusts, rightly, the proportions of property and taxation. But, sir, however fair may appear the reasoning of its friends, when drawn out with all the aid of figures, it is still true that, in a political sense, the scheme has the effect of vastly augmenting the taxes of A and B against their consent, and of diminishing those of C and D, which, under a different system, they pay willingly. Taxation by imposts is a voluntary system to a great extent; by direct imposition, one of constraint. The former levies its contributions upon consumption, which is great or small, according to the means of the citizen, his whim or caprice, his luxurious excesses, or his necessary wants. All the tax which the citizen pays over and above his necessary consumption is paid voluntarily; whereas the tax which the law directly levies must be paid with or without consumption. If, indeed, direct taxation, in time of peace, were right in principle, it would be in vain to attempt its adoption. You might as well expect to stamp leprosy upon the body physical, as direct taxes upon the body politic of this nation.

Whenever, therefore, Mr. Chairman, we need more money to defray the necessary expenses of the Government, we must resort to imposts. This is the ancient, well-approved means, adopted by the wise fathers of the Commonwealth, and persevered in by every Administration from Washington to Van Buren. Gentlemen decry increased duties as at war with State rights. They cry tariff! tariff! and vainly, as I believe, strive to stir up the South upon this ancient alarm note. Sir, this unreasoning, illiberal panic device has lost its power at the South. Its day has gone by; we have become so accustomed to the "extraordinary crises" of certain political leaders, that they are held pretty much as periodical matters of course. For myself, I have thrown off the shell of my political immaturity, and haply feel able to run or fly on my own account. Nor is my State, sir, in the leading-strings of any self-constituted director. She is free in her opinions as the winds of her own mountains, and steadfast as their granite foundations.

I shall show, sir, I trust, that I advocate no tariff for protection; on the contrary, that the course I recommend is the best guaranty against it. The people who sent me here are, as they ever have been, utterly opposed to a tariff for protection.

*The public lands were either ceded by the States within whose limits they lay to the General Government, or purchased (as Florida and Louisiana) with the common funds. In most of the compacts of cession, it is stipulated that the lands are to be applied to the payment of the national debt; and when that is discharged, shall be held by the Government for the use of the United States. In the treaty of cession between Georgia and the Government of 1802, by which she relinquished the vast territory which constitutes the greater part of Alabama and Mississippi, it is provided that the lands shall be charged with the payment of $1,250,000, and the costs of a few grants, and shall then be held for the use of the United States, herself included. So that, according to these compacts, particularly that of Georgia, the charges on the land being satisfied, it is clearly the right of the Government, if thought advisable, to distribute its proceeds among the States. All controversy, however, as to the power of Congress over the territory of the United States is, to my mind, settled by the Constitution, which in words, clothes Congress with the power to dispose of the territory of the United States.

That opposition is stern, unflinching, and universal, and in times to come will know no abatement. No one from the South has advocated a tariff for protection. My able friend from South Carolina [Mr. Thompson] has yielded no anti tariff principle, and I am at a loss to perceive why all this talk about a new tariff. If it be to arouse in advance public indignation against duties on luxuries for revenue, and thus forestall the public judgment, I am sure that gentlemen will probably fail of their object. My constituents, at least, have the power to discriminate between low duties for revenue, and high duties for protection.

I am, sir, a strict constructionist—a very strict constructionist; a Pharisee of the Pharisees. The State right principles I profess have been brought into disrepute by the fierce extravagance of ultra leaders. As by some expounded, they become wholly impracticable, and, if at all available, make our system of Government too feeble. It is the habit of one distinguished name to bring almost every proposed power of the Federal Government within the range of a constitutional doubt, and thus nullify its indispensable action. No one sustains himself with more dialectical ability; he decks his sophistries in the beautiful robes of genius, and gives to them emphasis and impressiveness by the fiery zeal of his advocacy. He is still an unsafe leader, because the past has proven that, with the same masterly ability, he has sustained the most antagonist policy. He is a changeling; and has the infirmity of being unconscious of it, or the hardihood to deny it in the face of the most demonstrative proof. His course is still a blazing track in the firmament of politics; like the meteor, having no established orbit, but wheeling madly athwart the firmament.

My idea of State rights is to deny to the Government all powers not expressly granted, and to exercise fearlessly and freely those that are. Nor am I willing, with metaphysical subtleties, to refine upon the conceded powers until their utility is reasoned away. Then, sir, the power to lay imposts is expressly granted. I am now ready, under the restrictions I propose to suggest, to use it.

Before entering upon this branch of my argument, allow me to digress but for a moment, for the purpose of saying that the wasteful expenditures of this Administration are to be attributed, in part, to a careless or merely partisan selection of disbursing agents; and that this is fully proven in the vast sums expended in the conduct of the Seminole war. The proximity of my own State to the Florida line, and the part her citizens have borne in the sufferings of that disastrous and doomed conflict, conflict, constrain me to know and condemn its management. My own State has not been exempt from savage incursion, her villages have been in some instances burnt, and her households butchered. To us the parent Government has extended no protection. Our own chivalry has repelled the foe.

As to Florida, after years of suffering, she is still the victim of Indian craft and cruelty; of Federal incompetency or carelessness. Her lands are untitled, and her tropical fields yield no fruits. The war-whop wakes the slumber of infancy unto death; manhood and femininity are alike defenceless. The cottage of the woodman and the palace of the rich planter crumble before the torch of the incendiary. The blood of the bravest and best has mingled with her yet unconquered soil. And still the Yemasee warrior lingers in his lair. The Seminole herds still roam over her plains, or skulk in her everglades. The war still rages, and the people suffer. These sufferings are so common, that they seem of late to attract no attention, and command no sympathy. The complaints of Florida reach not the ear of power; her agonies touch not the hearts of her rulers. Money enough has been expended in conquering these marauding savages to clothe the Territory in the bloom and beauty of art, science, and religion—a richer bloom by far than that which a genial climate begets upon her woods and fields. I make these remarks, sir, not alone to record my condemnation of the past, but, if possible, also to enlist sympathy for the future.

Assuming that there is a debt of the Government to be paid, and that the income is not equal to the wants of the Government, it is my conviction that resort must be had to an increase of duties upon luxuries, which, by the compromise act, are free, or bear a less rate of duty than 20 per cent. Such an increase will not be in violation of that act, but in compliance with one of its express stipulations. I do not make void, but establish the compromise. And the great reason why I would thus early commence the imposition of duties is, that the act of 1833, not merely until its own limitations shall repeal it, but through generations to come, in all its conservative stipulations, may become the permanent policy of the country.

Before proceeding to show that an increase of duties is provided for in the act of 1833, I beg leave to say that I consider that act in the light of a compact, and that Southern interests, more if possible than Northern, require it to be so held, and as such religiously maintained. It is an agreement founded in concession. It provides guaranties in behalf of the free trade principles of the South. It originated in an imperious political necessity; it was devised in wise and patriotic counsels; and its result was the arrest of civil strife in its incipency. I need not recite its history, depict the evils it prevented, or aggravate the dangers to our Union which it avoided. The passions of that day have cooled down, and we may look back upon it with reason's unclouded eye. The then dense cloud of war; and the fogs and winds and lightnings which it engendered, have passed away, and we now see, not darkly, but truly, the political heavens and earth. That was in fact a crisis. All men felt it to be so. And in its moment of utmost and most fearful interest the master spirit of that day came to us, the bird of reconciliation, with the olive bough in his beak. The fiery and proud spirits of the South accepted the overture of harmony, and this act was the result. It is an agreement, sir, not to subsist for its term of legislative being only, but settling principles of perpetual obligation. The gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. RHETT] denies that it is obligatory upon us. He says, and says truly, that the Congress of 1833 could not bind that of 1841; and that the act is now subject to repeal. Sir, I know one Congress, by a mere act of legislation, cannot bind another. The gentleman is right technically; but, sir, the act of '33 is binding in a higher view of the subject. It is obligatory according to all the requirements of good faith, honor, and honesty. In what light did the men of that day view it? Did not the Nullifiers of South Carolina accept it as satisfactory? Did they not haul down their palmetto banner, rescind their ordinances, and disband their forces? Yes, sir, they did. And it was upon sufficient consideration; or otherwise they are open to the imputation of abandoning recreantly the lofty ground they had taken.

[Mr. RHETT here remarked that Mr. Calhoun avowed, at the time of its passage, that he did not hold the act of '33 so far obligatory as not to be subject to repeal or modification.]

It matters not, sir; he accepted it, and so did his friends; and they have acquiesced in its provisions from that day to this—all, sir, except my friend, [Mr. RHETT] He, I know, never did accept it. He, (to use a phrase peculiar to a man at the other end of this Capitol,) "solitary and alone," resisted, in the midst of his friends, the rescinding the celebrated Carolina ordinances. He is, therefore, now consistent.

Viewing it, then, as a compact, one of its stipulations is in the following words, to wit:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the passage of any act prior to the 30th day of June, 1842, in the contingency either of excess or deficiency of revenue, altering the rates of duties on articles which, by the aforesaid act of 14th July, 1832, are subject to a less rate of duty than 20 per cent. ad valorem, in such manner as not to exceed that rate, and so as to adjust the revenue to either of said contingencies."—See sec. 6, act 1833.

The 30th June, 1842, is the time at which the compromise act expires. Before that time, you perceive, sir, that provision is made for altering the rate of duties, in the contingency of excess or deficiency of revenue; that is, if before the 30th of June, 1842, the wants of the Government should require more money than would be raised under the act, provision is made for supplying that want by the imposition of additional duties. Not only so, but the act itself prescribes the articles upon which the duties shall be imposed, and limits the height of them. Such is the contract. The contingency anticipated has, in fact, occurred; there is a deficiency of revenue; the debts of the Government cannot be paid. Indeed, independent of any debt, the ordinary wants of an economical Administration cannot be supplied by the revenue which is forthcoming under the act. The income of the Government is still to be reduced by the necessary operation of that act, because it cuts down all duties, by 30th June, 1842, to 20 per cent. Each following year, the deficiency will increase, necessarily, until 1842. And, making all allowance for increased importations, I have no idea but that the deficiency in both 1841 and 1842 will be very great. Now, sir, it is to supply this deficiency, and pay the national debt, that I would lay new duties. Are we not permitted, nay, sir, is it not one of the imperative obligations of the compact, to do so? What becomes, then, of the idea of gentlemen, that we interfere with the compromise. These demonstrations, I apprehend, are designed only to excite a uniform opposition to what, I trust, will be the policy of the Harrison party in relation to revenue. That policy, I believe, ought and will be to raise the money necessary, by imposts upon luxuries that are unprotected, in addition to the amount that may come in, according to the minimum rates, under the act of 1833. It would seem, sir, that the manufacturers themselves, if any body, ought to complain of a disregard of the compromise; yet they complain not. The complaint comes from the alarmists of the South; that South which, I am prepared to show, holds a deeper stake in the solemn guaranties of the compromise than any other section of the Union.

By the section of the act of 1833 which I have read, you will perceive that the articles made dutiable by new legislation are such as, by the act of 1833, bear a less rate of duty than 20 per cent. ad valorem. Upon no other articles can you lay duties; and it is only upon them, or rather principally upon such articles as bear no duty, that a duty is proposed to be laid. Of course, no free article is protected, nor are such as bear a duty of less than twenty per cent.; for it is admitted that even twenty per cent. affords no protection. If, therefore, you this day readjust the duties on this class of articles, you pass no tariff act for protection; and such rate of duty as I am willing to lay, such as would raise ample revenue, would not at all affect even the importation.

Those articles upon which it is proposed to lay duties are silks and wines, and some others, being luxuries. The importation of silks from France is very great. The average imports from France and her West India dependencies annually amount to about $11,000,000. This enormous trade pays no tax. It would seem but reasonable from this source to realize revenue. But it is said by the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. RHETT) that a duty upon silks would injure the South. His argument is briefly this: A duty upon goods imported from a foreign State affects our own exports to that State, by reducing them. France is a market for the cotton of the South, which she pays for by sending us her silks and wines; if we tax her silks and wines, it will operate as a tax upon the export of cotton, and thereby reduce the amount of it.

Let us look into this argument, and see how far the principle assumed be true, and how far it is applicable to the trade between the United States and France. The position, I conceive, sir, is just in two contingencies. If the duties upon the imports are so large as to amount to a prohibition, it may be conceded at once that it will, in ordinary cases, prevent exportation; or, if the exports and imports are equal to the extent that the duty diminishes the importation by lessening the consumption, will usually, though by no means necessarily, reduce the export. Now, the argument of the gentleman seemed to assume that we propose to lay such a duty on silks as would amount to a prohibition, and upon that assumption there might be force in it. But not so; no one has dreamed of such a duty. The highest rate of duty suggested by any one is twenty per cent.; and I believe half that amount would be sufficient. The gentleman has wholly failed to show that such duties would affect at all the consumption of silks in the United States. No, sir; a moderate duty would not at all affect the import, because the consumption would be undiminished. Our belles and beauties, our dames and their daughters, will still flourish in flounces, fur-belowes and silks. The wealthy, who are the consumers mainly of silk goods, would not regard a small increase of price. Pride, fashion, and vanity, would still ask their supplies, and take no denial.

If the gentleman will lay duty on no article that is paid for in whole or in part by American cottons, why then he will never lay one; his position will drive him necessarily from imposts to direct taxation; for he knows well that cotton, in our commerce with the world, pays, in some degree, and indeed in great part, for all our imports. When asked by his colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] to name an article that was not so paid for, my friend was wisely silent.

Nor, sir, are the imports from and exports to France so nearly equal as to endanger our cotton trade. On the contrary, the balance of trade is largely against us. And this fact must demolish wholly the argument of the gentleman. The entire export from the United States to France, composed principally of cotton, rice, and tobacco, amounts to about $19,000,000; and the importations from France and her West India dependencies to about $33,000,000—leaving a balance against us of $14,000,000; which balance is paid by an export of specie. Now, sir, before it is possible to affect our cotton trade with France, the consumption, and, consequently, the importation, of her silks and wines, &c. must be reduced more than $14,000,000. No rate of duty that I shall ever consent to impose, and none that an economical Administration may demand, can ever thus lessen the importation of French goods.

Again, sir, the cotton which we send to France is consumed by her own people principally, and that demand must continue irrespective of any foreign demand for her silks and wines. And conceding, only for the sake of the argument, that a duty as proposed would lessen the consumption of silks, I believe in the same ratio would it increase the consumption of cotton fabrics. If silks are excluded, cotton will become the apparel of the rich as well as the poor. We are under no obligation, either, sir, of commercial courtesy to France; for she levies a duty at her own ports upon American cottons—and that a discriminating duty, it being more than she levies upon Egyptian cotton.

Now, sir, inasmuch as the Government is in debt, you must either pay its obligations honestly or continue them by loans; to pay them, the present and prospective income is inadequate. You must, therefore, open up new sources of income. What will be your resort? Doubtless new duties upon imports; and, if driven to this, you are to determine whether you will impose them upon luxuries, which are free, or increase them upon necessities, already heavily burdened; that is, whether you will tax the rich or the poor. Will you grind the poor man's face by your legislation, and mollify the sleek cheek of wealth with the oil of exemption? Sir, I never have raised shouts to poverty, enlisting its honest zeal in behalf of either men or measures—decrying its imaginary oppressions and alienating the different orders of society. I have never labored to arm the poor against the rich, to array vice against virtue, and ignorance against knowledge. I have considered a diversity of estate an unavoidable condition of all social organization, and that one of the highest obligations of patriotism is to improve all grades, and, if possible, to harmonize all orders of men. I have ever claimed, and shall always claim, that American citizens shall be equal under the law. It was said in triumph in France, at the adoption of her amended constitution, "all Frenchmen are equal under the law." It was not the fact. I doubt if France ever realizes so almost divine a consummation. We, sir, with more propriety, claim for all our people political equality. We practise, with nearer approaches to truthfulness, the sublime doctrines of civil equality; and yet we have not attained to this high state of political perfectibility. Our people are unequally taxed.

The burdens of Government are not equal, nor are the benefits. The luxuries of the rich, many of them, pay no duty, whilst the necessities of the poor are all taxed. By the tariff laws of this Union, the silken drapery which envelopes the gorgeous couch of the rich man pays no tax; whilst the cold thin mattress and scant blankets of the poor bear a heavy duty. Strange, sir, yet true. I have always considered the exemption of luxuries as one of the anomalies of Republican legislation; and have wondered, often wondered, how so much of practical oppression could have been so long tolerated. It is now time to amend, if not atone for, the errors of the past.

Gentlemen may talk of reform; we invite them to the work here. They are the friends of the poor, now is the time most gloriously to signalize their regard. We ask the poor man's friend to attest the sincerity of his professions by his deeds. The wine that gladdens the heart of wealth, and maketh merriment the board of his festivity; the silks which high-bred women wear; and the spices which stimulate the sated palate of the luxurious gourmand, are now proposed to be moderately taxed. Sir, you must do this, or raise your money from the overwrought muscles, the blood and bones of laborious poverty. We shall see, sir, who are in truth the friends of the poor.

The rate of duty will be regulated by the amount of money required. I have already stated that I am opposed to all duties but for revenue; and I now say I will vote only for so much revenue to be raised as will pay the expenses of an economical administration. The expenditures of the Government ought and I hope will be reduced. We are not now called upon to vote any specific amount of duties; the proposition is, that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report what amount may be required. Sir, whenever this bill is brought forward, I shall not support it if it raises one dollar more than will pay the national debt and sustain the Government. The public debt must be first ascertained, and the estimates of the expenditure furnished. I am, therefore, pledged to support no bill which does not fall within the position I now assume.

The member from South Carolina remarked that he was at a loss to know the reason why duties were now proposed to be laid, until he heard it alleged in the Senate that more revenue would be necessary to supply the deficit in the public income, occasioned by the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. For myself, I am influenced by no such reason. I am aware that it is said, and reiterated daily, that high tariffs and profuse expenditures, each begetting the other, will be among the leading measures of the new Administration. For one, I do not believe it. Whether the distribution measure prevails or not, it is apparent to all that the Government must have more means. That necessity ought to be, by candid men, considered as sufficient reason for a revision of our import laws.

Mr. Chairman, I have been greatly surprised to find leading Southern statesmen so willing to relax the obligations of the compromise; obligations so essential to Southern interests. I remarked before that, in that agreement, are to be found the strongest guarantees against protective duties. In it are stipulations conservative of Southern principles. Whether it was originally just to the South or not, it is useless now to acquire. She has acquiesced in it, and so have the manufacturers. Interests have grown up under it which we may not now rightfully disturb; the benefits provided for the North have been secured. The manufacturing interests, I am induced to believe, are satisfied with the protection it affords them; they desire no change. And the time has arrived when the conditions favorable to the South are beginning to be operative. Our guarantees are now to be available; and shall we cast them off, by annulling the compact? No, sir; rather let us ratify it anew, by now acting under its provisions. What are some of those conservative guarantees? I call your attention to one, sir, of vast moment, which, if faithfully observed, will quiet forever the exciting and topic of protective duties. One of the covenants of the contract is, that "until the 30th June, 1842, the duties imposed by existing laws, as modified by this act, shall remain and continue to be collected; and from and after the day aforesaid, such duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government."—See 3d sec. act 1833.

Now, sir, you perceive that, by virtue of the compromise act, it is the solemn pledge of the parties thereto, that, from and after the 30th June, 1842, no duties shall be laid but for revenue. Not only so; but that the amount of such revenue shall be limited to the wants of an economical administration.

The principle of protection is discarded. No one can rise up after '42 and ask for protection. The North is estopped. The South can point to the agreement, and demand that duties shall be limited to purposes of revenue; not only so, but that the revenue shall not exceed the limits of a just economy. A power to lay duties for revenue never has been denied to Congress. It was against a perversion of this power, sir, that my own State and all the South rebelled. It was the doctrine of protection, as held by the manufacturers and those who represented them, that stirred the ire of my constituents and awakened the burning eloquence of such men as Cobb and Crawford, McDuffie and Hayne.

Suppose, sir, that these principles shall prevail; that the compromise is observed; that duties in times to come shall be laid only for revenue; where is the politician so fastidious as to complain? Will not peace rule in our councils, and fraternal feeling pervade all sections? If, sir, economy in public affairs, which shall confine appropriations to constitutional objects, and revenue only for the public wants, are the guiding stars of the Harrison Administration, let no man fear that the ship of State will not sail over prosperous seas beneath benignant skies. Are gentlemen prepared to yield the obligatory power of the act of '33? To yield in the moment of victory the fruits of the war; to open again the fountains of strife; to loose the elements of commotion, now happily tied up; and invite the storm and court the tempest? Now is the time for the Harrison party to identify itself with the principles of that act. They should be now affirmed; we ought to be committed upon them. And the most effectual mode of identification is, to start our revenue system according to its provisions, by laying duties now on unprotected articles. Now is the time to stereotype the compromise.

To avoid a protective tariff, it is necessary to condemn it before the compromise expires. I would proclaim it to the people of my own State. I desire it to be known all over that sunny land, from her mountains to the sea, that now is the time to act upon this great question. It was said in the late canvass, that Harrison, the honest, valiant, and successful Whig candidate, was a tariff man. The reply we made, sir, was, that he was in favor of the principles settled in the compromise. Upon this explanation we triumphed. And now who shall object, when he confirms what we then said of him? Of his friends, no one; of his enemies, of course all.

We should not wait until after June, '42, to arrange the revenue, because then it will be said, the compromise having ceased by its own limitations, the whole subject of protection is open. Attempt, then, to lay imposts, and you encounter the conflicting interests of the whole Union. Every article of domestic manufacture will demand protection; capital will wield its might against free trade; selfishness will clamor for legislative bounties. Discriminate, then, you must. Angry passions will again mingle in your councils; State authority may again array itself against Federal law; the cannon of the Union may again be pointed against some Southern city, and there may be none so potent as to command the jarring elements into peace.

REMARKS OF MR. LANE,

OF INDIANA.

In the House of Representatives, January 25, 1841.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I had not intended to have participated in this debate, when it commenced; but, from the wide range which it has taken, bringing within its scope, as it does, all the great and momentous questions, either directly or remotely connected with it, I have been forced by a sense of duty to those whom I have the honor to represent on this floor, to give to the committee and to the country the reasons which shall govern my action on the measure now under discussion. But, sir, I do not rise to address you with the vain expectation of influencing, in any great degree, the action of the honorable members of this House; my only object is to give my views in relation to the various and important measures which now engage the attention of this committee and the whole country. I shall not debate this question as a Van Buren or a Harrison man, but as an American and a freeman. Sir, we have now before us higher and far more important duties to discharge than simply to labor for the petty triumphs of a party. We should remember that, if we have a party to serve, we have also a common glorious country to love. Then, Mr. Chairman, I hope we shall proceed fairly and candidly to the investigation of the condition of the National Treasury, without any party bias, and with the most ardent desire to preserve inviolate the plighted faith of the Government. This can only be done by providing, and providing speedily, the means for the payment of our just debts; for that there is at this time a deficiency in the Treasury all parties admit. The only grounds upon which a diversity of opinion exists are, in relation, 1st, to the character of the deficiency, whether it be permanent or temporary; 2dly, in relation to the amount of that deficiency; and, 3dly, as to the best means of supplying the deficit, whether by the issue of Treasury notes, or by a direct loan. We are told, Mr. Chairman, that the deficiency in the revenue is only temporary, and that the accruing revenue during the present year "will relieve the Treasury of all embarrassment." This we have been told, from time to time, ever since the present Administration resorted to the miserable and dangerous expedient of issuing Treasury notes. When the Secretary of the Treasury, in October, 1837, at the extra session, asked of Congress the power to issue ten millions of Treasury notes, we were then told that this issue was to supply a temporary deficit; and during the next session of Congress, the Secretary again asked permission to issue ten millions more of Treasury notes, under the same false and specious pretext that the issue was only intended to meet a temporary deficit; and again in 1839 the same law was extended under the same siren song of temporary deficit; and yet again in 1840 Congress was called upon to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue five millions of Treasury notes to supply a temporary deficiency in the revenue; and now we are called on to authorize the issuing of five millions of Treasury notes, and still the cry is, a temporary deficit. Sir, this deficit smacks too strongly of eternal duration to be very transient or temporary in its character. If the present deficiency may be called temporary, every debt which this Government has ever contracted might, with the same propriety, be called a temporary debt. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means tells us that the Treasury cannot, during the first quarter of the present year, discharge obligations resting upon it; but that, during the year, we shall collect enough revenue to pay our debts. So, Mr. Chairman, of the debt incurred during the Revolution, and of the debt entailed upon the country on account of the late war, we could not pay those debts at the time they were contracted; yet no one doubted our ultimate ability to pay them. Hence, from the argument of gentlemen, we are to infer that those debts were only temporary. We may call this a temporary or permanent debt, but no one doubts its present existence, or that it will continue to exist until Congress shall provide some method for its payment. But, Mr. Chairman, the evidence of indebtedness, shown by the issue of Treasury notes, is not the only indebtedness on the part of the General Government of which we have knowledge, and of which I shall take occasion to speak before I resume my seat. It will be recollected that the President, in his annual message to Congress, dated

December 24th, 1839, held the following language: "If the debts due from banks during the next year be punctually paid, and if Congress keep the appropriations within the estimates, there is every reason to believe that all the outstanding Treasury notes can be redeemed, and the ordinary expenses defrayed, without imposing on the people any additional burden, either of loans or taxes." That, sir, was the prophecy; and what was the fulfilment? The banks have paid to within a trifle all that was expected, and Congress only exceeded the appropriations about three hundred thousand dollars, and still there is now outstanding four millions and a half of Treasury notes, and we are asked to grant permission to issue five millions more; making in all nine millions and a half of dollars! The committee will recollect that the President, in his last message to Congress, holds this language: "Our Government, as is believed, is the only Government which, having fully and faithfully paid all its creditors, has relieved itself entirely from debt." Let us, Mr. Chairman, for a few moments examine this high sounding though empty boast of the President, that the Treasury has been relieved from debt. How stands this matter? You have already had an able expose of this matter from the honorable member from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] and the honorable member from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] and I shall detain you but a few moments on this part of the subject.

There are now Treasury notes outstanding to the amount of . . .	$4,650,000
Interest due and to fall due on them . . .	250,000
Balance of funded debt, and debt of the District of Columbia, amounting to the sum of . . .	1,835,000
Amount payable to Indians, and to be invested for them, and amount due the Navy pension fund, making . . .	4,780,000
Indian annuities, part payable for a term of years, and part in perpetuity, estimated at . . .	5,000,000

Present debt, probably . . . $16,515,000

To which may be added the claim of the States for the 4th instalment of the surplus revenue, which is theirs, and which they would have received but for the profligacy and wasteful extravagance of the present Administration. This claim is nine millions of dollars. We should also add the private claims of individuals and States, not on the bounty but on the justice of Congress. How much they may amount to no one can now tell. A large amount of claims growing out of the Florida war is now due and unsettled: so that we set down the debt now owing by the United States at at least thirty millions of dollars. So much, then, for the candor and fairness of our Democratic President.

And now, Mr. Chairman, before we proceed to examine the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year 1841, let us inquire what reliance can be safely placed upon those estimates. Is there any thing in his former reports which should induce us to trust implicitly to his statement upon this occasion? What were his estimates for the expenditures for the last year? About twenty millions of dollars. What did those expenditures amount to? Nearly twenty-four millions of dollars; a difference of about four millions of dollars. And again: he, the Secretary, estimated the receipts of revenue, from the import duties of last year, at fifteen millions of dollars. What amount was realized? About twelve millions and a half; and, for the last six years, since Mr. Woodbury has been at the head of the Treasury Department, his annual estimates for the accruing revenue for each respective year have, taken in the aggregate, shown mistakes to the amount of over sixty millions of dollars. You recollect, Mr. Chairman, the confident tone of the President and his Secretary of the Treasury, at the commencement of the last session of Congress, in relation to the ability of the Treasury to relieve itself from debt during the last year, and yet we find the same Secretary of the Treasury asking for Treasury notes in February, 1840, and again in July, 1840. What reliance can be placed in such a Secretary? Sir, during the whole time that he has been at the head of the financial department of this Government, we have had nothing but such gross and glaring inaccuracies and mistakes as would have disgraced a counting-house clerk of six months' experience; and yet we are called on by honorable gentlemen to rely on his statements. But what are his estimates for the current year? He estimates the whole receipts for the year to be $24,723,473. Let us look to some of the items from which this amount is expected to be received. Take, for instance, the estimated receipts from customs: he calculates that, during the present year, the revenue derived from customs will be nineteen millions of dollars; upon what data no one can tell. To realize nineteen millions of dollars from imports, during the present year, we must import goods to the value of forty-six millions of dollars more this year than we shall during the next, by his own showing; for his estimates for the value of importations during the next year are about one hundred and fifteen millions of dollars. How comes it that we last year imported about one hundred and ten millions of dollars worth of foreign goods, and in the year 1842 we are to import very little, if any, over that amount; and yet, during the present year, according to this most wise and candid Secretary, we are to import foreign goods to the amount of one hundred and fifty-eight millions? These things cannot be. We have a foreign debt owing to Europe by the States, and corporations, and individuals, which will require any annual exportation to the amount of ten or twelve million of dollars, and to that amount the duties will be diminished; that is, we shall not receive duties upon a return importation to the amount necessary to meet the foreign debt. Other causes, as the Secretary tells us, will have a tendency to lessen the amount of importations during the present year; but, Mr. Chairman, see you not that it would be most ruinous to the country to import during the present year goods to the value of one hundred and fifty-eight millions of dollars? But it is idle to talk of it. Instead of nineteen millions of dollars being received from customs during the present year, in view of all these facts, is it safe to count on the receipt of more than fifteen millions of dollars to be derived from our custom house? Sir, with all deference to the President and his Secretary, I cannot think that we shall receive more than fifteen millions of dollars from importations this year. There, Mr. Chairman, is a deficit of $4,000,000.

So much, Mr. Chairman, for the Secretary's estimates for receipts during the present year. Now let us test his estimates for expenditures. He puts down the expenditures at $19,250,000, exclusive of payments on account of the funded debt and for the redemption of Treasury notes; which, taken together, amount to the sum of $4,649,200. The gross expenditures he makes $23,899,000; which, deducted from the estimated receipts, leaves a balance of $820,000. This is not, according to the Secretary himself, a suitable balance to be left in the Treasury by a million and a quarter of dollars. But, Mr. Chairman, does any gentleman believe that General Harrison and his friends can administer this Government for the sum of nineteen millions and a quarter of dollars, and out of that sum pay an ascertained debt now due of over seven millions of dollars, which must be met and discharged this year? Sir, the same charges and objects of appropriation exist now that did last year; it then required $24,000,000; we are now required to administer the same Government for a much less sum, and in addition to pay the debt now due! That General Harrison will administer the Government better and far more economically, I most earnestly desire and believe; but can he strike off more than $10,000,000 from the list of expenditures during the first nine months of his administration? I fear not. Now, Mr. Chairman, one of two things is true: either that the gentlemen are not candid in supposing that General Harrison will not need more money than they estimate, or that they believe that the administration of Martin Van Buren has been most wasteful, profligate, and extravagant. Which horn of the dilemma will gentlemen take? They are welcome to all the consolation which they can derive from either.

I shall now address myself for a few moments to the calculations of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. JONES.] He estimates the receipts of the first quarter of the fiscal year from importations to be $3,000,000, and from other sources at one half million of dollars more, making three millions and a half. He makes, you see, the duties in the first quarter to be only three millions, and in the other three quarters he makes them $16,000,000, notwithstanding the Secretary of the Treasury assures us that the receipts from importations must fall off largely during the last quarter. For the first quarter, he makes the expenditures overrun the receipts about $2,000,000; and yet, at the end of the year, strange to tell, he leaves a balance in the Treasury of over $800,000. Sir, does it require any argument to refute these calculations? I have greatly misconceived the good sense of the committee if it does. From all these facts, I can come to no other conclusions than, first, that the revenue will be inadequate during the present year to meet the demands necessary upon it, by at least $10,000,000; second, that this deficiency is not temporary, but permanent. Now, sir, is it not our duty, as honest men and as patriots, to provide means, ample means, for the speedy liquidation of this national debt? What, now, is the honest, the appropriate, and the constitutional method for discharging this debt? Why, surely, by borrowing money sufficient to pay it, and then providing the means for the payment of the loan; for whatever is right to be done in this matter, we should do directly, and not indirectly—openly, and not secretly.

I desire, for one, that the people should no longer be deceived as to the true condition of the finances by the deceptive issues of Treasury notes, but that they should know the truth; that they should know that the present Administration has entailed upon them a national debt, and that it is necessary to provide for its payment. I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, to the bill before us, because, in the first place, I believe it to be unconstitutional. These Treasury notes are nothing more nor less than bills of credit. What is a bill of credit? It is a paper issued by the sovereign authority, intended to circulate as money, and for the payment of which the credit of the State is alone pledged. Sir, do not Treasury notes come within this description? They surely do. At the time of the formation of our present Constitution, the convention which formed that sacred instrument positively restricted the several States from issuing bills of credit. This was necessary; for, without this restriction, the States would have had the right to have issued bills of credit in their sovereign capacity. But the Federal Government has no power except that which is expressly granted in the Constitution, and that which is necessary to carry out the powers expressly granted. No power to issue Treasury notes is found in the Constitution. Under the Articles of Confederation, this power was in the General Government, and it was inserted in the original draught in the Constitution, and stricken out by the convention. This shows most indubitably the opinion of the convention. If the power to issue bills of credit exists in the General Government, it must exist as auxiliary to the express power of Congress to borrow money, or as an incident to the war-making power. Now, Mr. Chairman, is this measure a borrowing of money? Surely not. It is the using of the credit of the Government, by extending the time of payment, and giving these promissory notes as evidence of debt, and not as payment. And can this measure be justified as incident to the war-making power? Surely not. I grant you that these notes might be issued during a war, when it was necessary for our protection or self-preservation that we should have money, and we had no other means of obtaining it. Treasury notes were issued during the late war, but means were provided for their redemption at the same time they were issued. Does the same necessity for their issue now exist? Can the present exercise of this power be now claimed as auxiliary to the power to declare and carry on war? No gentleman will contend for a doctrine so absurd. But, Mr. Chairman, granting the constitutionality of the measure, I should oppose it on the ground that it is not the best means of supplying a deficiency in the revenue: it is temporary in its duration, deceptive in its character, and can only result in sinking us deeper and deeper in debt. Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that the remedy proposed falls very far short of the evil intended to be remedied. We should not only provide for the deficit in revenue for the present year, but we should, as prudent and patriotic representatives, provide for the deficit which must exist during the next, unless speedily provided for. The Secretary of the Treasury tells us that, during the year 1842, under the operations of the compromise act, there will be a diminution of duties to the amount of $5,000,000. Sir, we must provide for that deficiency also; and we should now provide for a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, to which it justly belongs, and of which I shall presently take occasion to speak. Let us now see how the Secretary of the Treasury proposes to remedy the deficiency in the Treasury. He proposes these different methods: First, he hints that a portion of the surplus revenue heretofore deposited with the States might be recalled; but he seems to abandon that project himself. And, sir, who believes that any portion of that deposit will ever be recalled? Who is bold enough to rise here in his place and propose it? No one. Another plan named by the Secretary is to resort to direct taxes. Is this to be the end of that system of financial quackery which has so long cursed the country? Let the party now in power propose it if they dare, and they will find that, even though they are labelled with the time-honored and glorious word Democracy, they could not stand before their constituents long enough to be knocked down.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to show how a direct tax would operate upon the people of Indiana. The deficit for the year 1842, as I have shown from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, will be from ten to twelve millions of dollars; add to that the proceeds of the public lands, which will be distributed among the States as soon as public opinion is properly reflected and truly represented on this floor; the deficit will then be swelled to the amount of perhaps fifteen millions of dollars, certainly as much as fourteen millions of dollars. But for the argument, put the deficiency at ten millions of dollars, and then Indiana, according to her population, will have to raise four hundred thousand dollars to meet this deficit by a direct tax; and in order to sustain our State Government, and to pay the accruing interest on our internal improvement debt, we shall have to raise at least six hundred thousand dollars by a tax. Add this sum to the four hundred thousand dollars, and you see the State of Indiana would have to collect annually, by a direct tax, one million of dollars! Indiana, with all her vast and increasing resources, could not collect this immense and startling amount of revenue.

The Secretary also proposes to meet this deficiency by reducing the appropriations below the estimates, with what candor, let the facts answer. My colleague [Mr. PROFFIT] introduced, some time since, a resolution of inquiry, directed to the Secretary of the Treasury, asking him to inform Congress in what particulars the appropriations might be reduced below the estimates; that resolution of inquiry was promptly voted down by a party vote.

I now come, Mr. Chairman, to the only practicable mode of meeting this deficiency in the revenue which is suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury; and that is, an extensive modification of the tariff laws. Public expediency and public justice alike require that those laws should be modified. We should at once lay a sufficient tariff on foreign luxuries to meet the deficiency in the Treasury now existing; and to enable Congress to distribute among the States the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, the true course of policy to be pursued is, I think, to lay a duty on French wines and silks, and fine linens and spices, and upon all other articles of luxury which are now admitted duty free. What is now the operation of your tariff laws? They operate mainly upon articles of necessity—articles consumed alike by the rich and the poor, and upon which all pay the same duty on the amount consumed; but the wealthy pay no duty on their fine silks and costly wines. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. THOMPSON] and his political associates have heretofore claimed to be the exclusive friends of the poor man; and we find them ready to vote against raising revenue by a duty upon the luxurious indulgencies of the rich, when the only alternative is to raise the amount by a direct tax upon the rich and the poor. Sir, this is, to my mind, a very equivocal manifestation of friendship for the poor, and one for which the gentleman and his friends will receive no thanks from them, for I believe, as I believe in my own existence, that if this question were now put to the American people, ninety-nine of them out of every hundred would prefer to raise revenue by a duty on foreign luxuries, instead of a direct tax. Let the honorable gentleman and his friends go and tell the people that they are their best friends, because they refuse to lay a duty on foreign luxuries consumed only by the rich, in order that the tax-gatherer may have an occasion to pay them a friendly visit, to assess their lands, their houses, and all their personal property, to raise revenue to support the General Government: think you that the hard-handed and noble-hearted pioneers of the West will be deceived by a pretext so shallow? No, sir, no. They will treat this pretended friendship as they did the doctrine recently promulgated, that the poor man was to be relieved by reducing the miserable pittance which rewards his daily toil.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are other and vastly important reasons why this tariff on French wines and silks should be laid by us, and now. Sir, look to the history of our trade with France for the last five years. During that time we have, upon an average, imported from France goods to the amount of twenty-eight millions and a half of dollars per annum; and of that amount seventeen millions have been admitted free of duty. For the same period, we have annually exported to France, of our productions, only to the amount of about fifteen millions of dollars; and upon the articles of our exportation we have paid a heavy, and on many articles a most oppressive duty. From this trade between this country and France, there is an annual balance against us of about fourteen millions of dollars. This balance must be mainly paid by an annual exportation of gold and silver from this country to France.

But the honorable gentleman tells us that this scheme to tax French wines and silks is a shot aimed at French interests. And has it come to this, that we cannot manage our own legislation as we please, without being taunted with enmity to France, or with British influence? This duty can be laid without violating either the letter or spirit of the compromise bill of 1833. Sir, I am, I trust, the last man who would be willing to violate the provisions of that bill. I remember too well the circumstances under which it was passed. A sovereign State had assumed an attitude at war alike with the laws and Constitution of the Republic. Disunion and civil war was threatened. The gallant vessel of State, which had for half a century withstood "the tempest's shock and battle's rage," was about to be engulfed beneath the mountain waves of political commotion. Then it was that the thrilling and commanding eloquence of Henry Clay was heard above the fury of the storm, proclaiming peace to all, without compromising the honor of any! I am not disposed to disturb that noble peace-offering upon the altar of my country. It was then, as now, regarded as the bow of peace and of promise, overarching the storms which threatened our beloved country; and may God perpetuate that sentiment forever!

I have no doubt of the constitutional power of Congress to pass a protective tariff law; but I think that its exercise is not now called for, further than our present duties for revenue operate as a protection to American manufactures. I have said that the provisions of the compromise bill should not be disturbed; but a state of things may arise when some modification of that act may be proper and necessary: for instance, if we should be involved in a war, or if the present rate of duties would not yield a revenue sufficient to meet the wants of the Treasury, under an economical administration of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, the subject of the public lands has been referred to by the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, and, it seems to me, with great propriety, inasmuch as the public land is one great source of our national revenue. The honorable gentleman seems to think that the measure of distribution is unconstitutional, and complains that it is now considered almost out of order to quote from that sacred instrument. I grant you, Mr. Chairman, that, for the last few years, that sacred chart of a nation's freedom does seem to have been almost forgotten; but, sir, who should complain of this? The gentleman and his friends?—the party now in power? Sir, it but ill becomes that party, whose triumphant march for the last twelve years has been over the broken fragments of the Constitution, to talk of its infraction; that party whose ruthless action mutilated the journals of the Senate, and, at the mandate of one man, prostrated the proudest deliberative assembly upon earth at the footstool of Executive power; that party which so recently disfranchised a sovereign State, for the purpose of fixing the odious and anti-American Sub-Treasury system upon the country; they, forsooth, are now the friends of the country. I hope that the late overwhelming and unprecedented defeat of the party in power will bring about a wholesome change of measures and change of practice; and that hereafter the Constitution shall again become the text-book of national legislation. We find that Congress, by the express terms of the Constitution, has the unlimited power to dispose of the public lands and other property of the United States as they may deem fit, being governed only by a sound discretion. This power to dispose of the public lands does not depend upon construction or implication, but is most explicitly granted. There is surely nothing in the deeds of cession limiting the power of Congress over this subject. The public lands were ceded by Virginia, New York, Georgia, and all the other States that made cessions, for the mutual benefit of all the States then composing the United States, and all other States which should afterwards be admitted into the Union. These grants of cession embrace all the public lands within our territorial limits, as defined by the treaty of peace of 1783, and over that portion of our public domain which we acquired by the purchase from France of Louisiana, and from Spain of Florida. No one, it seems to me, can doubt our full and unlimited constitutional power. The whole action of the Government, from its commencement, has proceeded on the ground that she has the entire control of the public lands. If Congress has not such power, what becomes of the title to the immense grants of land which we have to the States, to corporations, and to individuals? I take it for granted, then, from the Constitution? from the deeds of cession, from the very nature of the subject, that we have the right to dispose of the public lands. The question is, then, presented, What is the most just and equitable mode of disposition? The cession of the lands to the States in which they lie has been proposed. Are there any constitutional objections against distribution which do not hold with greater force against cession? The argument is, that we cannot distribute the proceeds of the lands equitably among all the States entitled to them; but that we can give the land exclusively to a part of the States. This is bad logic, and worse morals.

Sir, the noble old Commonwealth of Virginia, by her munificent and patriotic grant of all that immense tract of country northwest of the Ohio river, for the common benefit of all the States, Virginia inclusive, evinced a liberality and patriotism having no parallel in the history of nations. And shall we defeat the object of that grant by diverting the revenue derived from that source from its proper objects, or by giving the lands to a few of the States? I trust not. The other grants of cession were substantially the same as the grant from Virginia, and on the same terms, and subject to the same conditions. I desire briefly to show the committee how the State, a part of whose citizens I have the honor to represent, would be affected by cession. If the proposition made by a distinguished Senator on this subject should pass, what would Indiana receive? It is estimated that there are now about four millions of acres of public lands remaining unsold in Indiana. Upon the proceeds of these lands, we should receive thirty-five per cent. and then our equal share of sixty-five per cent. upon the whole sales of public lands. Indiana, with a population of seven hundred thousand souls, with thirty-five per cent. on the sales of four millions of refuse lands, while Arkansas, with a population about one-fourth as large as ours, would receive thirty-five per cent. on the sales of about twenty millions of acres, and then divide equally with us the balance of the sales; and in order to get our thirty-five per cent. upon four millions of refuse lands, what would Indiana give? Sir, she would abandon her undivided right to ten hundred and eighty millions of acres of public domain; the proportion to which the State of Indiana would be entitled out of this amount of public lands is over fifty millions of acres. And, sir, do gentlemen expect us to abandon the fifty millions of acres for the paltry consideration of thirty-five per cent. upon the sales of four millions, or even less, of refuse lands? If the land bill of Mr. Clay had become a law when it passed both Houses of Congress by such decided majorities, the State of Indiana would have received, under its operation to this time, over four millions of dollars. And what, let me ask, have we received? Nothing, comparatively nothing. The party in power told the people of the new States, from time to time, that they were to have cession and graduation. We have been induced to forego the certain advantages of distribution, and are now no nearer cession or graduation than we were when these specious humbugs were first proposed. The gentleman from Mississippi and his friends have had all power under the Government for twelve years, and why have they not made good their promises of graduation and cession? Sir, I am forced to believe that they had not the will, inasmuch as they had the power and did not exercise it. If the State of Indiana had received the four millions of dollars to which she would have been entitled under the provisions of the land bill, what might she not have accomplished with it? The interest, without touching the principal, would have constituted a fund large enough to have educated every child within her borders for all time to come. It would now pay one half of her internal improvement debt, or, if invested in profitable stocks, it would pay the interest upon her State debt without a resort to taxation. And if the distribution bill were to pass now, we should annually receive about $200,000. Now, what are the objections to this measure, so just in itself, and calculated to confer equal, great, and lasting benefits upon every State in this Union, and calculated to put to rest forever all legislation upon this embarrassing subject? First, it is said that the proceeds of the public lands are to be held out to the States as a bribe to purchase political influence at the sacrifice of the independence of action among the States. Sir, the people whom I represent, and the party with whom I act, are not to be bribed by "filthy lucre." I dread not its influence upon the proud-spirited, fearless, and generous sons of Indiana. The gentleman best knows whether his constituents and his party are above temptation. I hope they are. But there is a strange inconsistency in this objection; they propose to give the States in which the lands lie all the lands, and there is, they tell us, no danger of that corrupting them; yet when we propose to give them their fair proportion of the proceeds of those lands, that is highly dangerous. Another objection is, that this measure would be an assumption of the State debts. I cannot, I confess, see the force of this argument; for, if it is right to distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States, it cannot be rendered wrong because the States are in debt; that only furnishes an additional reason why Congress should now do its duty and pay this honest debt to the States. The States, in their sovereign capacity, have a right to contract debts, and there is no power in this Congress or upon earth to restrain them. No one has ever dreamed of asking the General Government to assume the payment of the State debts. All that the States ask or expect is, that they shall be left to manage their own legislation in their own way. Sir, the State of Indiana, crushed and paralyzed as she has been by the present Administration, is, thank God, still willing and able to pay her honest debts. But what right have gentlemen to attack State stocks and State credit, under the idea of combating the assumption of State debts by Congress? No American ever has proposed this assumption, and I trust none ever will. Sir, this attack is anti-American, anti-national in its character, for, although we are divided into different States, we still are the same great people, holding in common the same history of the past, bound together by the same interests in the present, and looking forward to the consummation of the same high destiny in the future. Who, then, that has an American heart in his bosom, would mar the prosperity or destroy the credit of any State in this Union? Who would dim the brightness of one single star which adorns the emblem banner of a nation's sovereignty and glory? Sir, the man who could do it is unworthy of his country, and unworthy of that liberty which its Constitution bestows upon him. Whilst upon the subject of the public lands, suffer me to say that I agree with the honorable gentleman from Mississippi in the support of a well-guarded pre-emption law, and shall certainly vote for such a law. But, Mr. Chairman, I have already detained you too long on the subject of the public lands; the importance of the subject must plead my excuse.

I will now, for a few moments, examine with the honorable gentleman the claims of this Administration on the score of economy alluded to by him. How stands the account? The Administration has, during the four years of its continuance, expended $30,000,000, over and above its ordinary revenues. It has expended in four years $135,000,000, being an average of $33,750,000 per annum. What has been effected for the public good by this immense expenditure of public treasure? Out of this $135,000,000, there has been appropriated to the increase of the Navy, to fortifications, harbors, light-houses, roads, dry docks, arsenals, armories, and to every other work of permanent national importance, only about $11,000,000. Every branch of the public service has been most shamelessly neglected.

The Secretary of War tells us that there is not one harbor or seaport town along the whole range of our Atlantic seaboard, from Passamaquoddy bay to the Sabine river, which is in a defensible condition, or in a condition to protect our commerce; and our chain of frontier fortresses, stretching from the Northern lakes to Louisiana, constituting our defence against that horde of savages which the policy of the Government has thrown upon our Western frontier, is in a most ruinous condition. Very little has been done to increase our navy; and for this year the estimate for that purpose is $100,000 only. I am no alarmist; but he must be blind to the plainest indications of passing events who does not see cause of apprehension in our present relations with Great Britain. The Northeastern boundary question is yet unsettled, and daily becoming more difficult to adjust amicably. The burning of the Caroline, which has been avowed by the British minister as an authorized act of the British Government; the right claimed and exercised by Great Britain to search our merchant ships upon the ocean; all these difficult questions, growing out of our relations with Great Britain, threaten, if not speedily adjusted, to involve us in a war with that formidable power. The present condition of Europe is not at all favorable to a lasting peace. Numerous causes of discontent exist in the relations of France and England. These great and rival powers must ever be the first and principal parties in any general war in Europe. The causes are now in being which, at no distant day, will shake the Gothic framework of European society to its deepest foundation; and the torch is now blazing which, ere long, will light the flame of war throughout the length and breadth of that great continent. And, in the event of a general war in Europe, this Government, in all human probability, will be forced to become a party. Sir, notwithstanding the glowing descriptions of national prosperity depicted in the President's message, are we ready for that great emergency? We are ready, so far as the bravery and patriotism of our citizens are concerned; but are our army and navy and our national defences suitable to the condition of war?

One word, Mr. Chairman, on the subject of national improvement. The harbors of our Northern lakes seem to have been forgotten or entirely overlooked. Many of them, after having been commenced at great expense, are now suffered to fall into ruin for want of a small appropriation to finish them. These harbors are of the utmost importance, whether we consider them as the security of our lake commerce in peace, or its protection and the protection of the Northern frontiers in time of war. During the last year we had no appropriation on the harbor at Michigan city, although an appropriation was necessary to prevent its falling into ruin; but the Government issued an Executive order to sell the apparatus and furniture provided for its improvement to sustain the sinking credit of a bankrupt Treasury; and so of the Cumberland road—the only two works of national improvement within the State of Indiana. All the lake harbors, I believe, shared the same fate. And yet we are told by the President that the Government has promptly met all the obligations devolving upon it.

The honorable gentleman from Mississippi has talked of the unconstitutionality of a United States Bank. I shall not now enter upon the discussion of that question. I consider it a settled question—settled by the decisions of the highest judicial tribunal known to the Constitution, settled by the legislation of Congress, and settled by the voice of the American people. And, as a necessary fiscal agent of the National Government, I shall be prepared to vote for it when the proper time arrives, and the people require it, if I shall then have a seat in this body.

The gentleman prophesies that Gen. Harrison will have an extra session of Congress. If he and his friends wish to avoid it, let them vote to raise a sufficient revenue to support the Government during the present year, and thereby obviate the necessity for a called session. If an extra session of Congress can be avoided, I am as much opposed to it as he can be. But if gentlemen are determined to force General Harrison to have a called session, I hope that much good to the country may result from it. I hope that the wishes of the people, so plainly indicated in the late elections, will be carried out; that we shall have a thorough, searching, and entire reform of abuses in the Government, and that the Sub-Treasury—drawn from the rotten, corrupt, and crumbling monarchies of Europe—will no longer remain a stain upon your statute book and a curse upon the country.

Mr. Chairman the charge has been made here, and has gone forth to the world, that British gold had its influence upon our elections; that the Administration was not tried for, and condemned on account of, its ruinous measures. It is not enough that the pensioned presses of the country should have made this charge; but here, even here in the halls of National Legislation, those who represent freemen are found to endorse it. The influence of British gold, indeed! The people are governed by other motives and considerations. Tell them of danger from abroad, or of the establishment of domestic tyranny at home, and at once you command their warmest sympathies and their mightiest energies. Sir, the late signal triumph of the people over their oppressors was the result of that pure end elevated love of country, of that unyielding and quenchless love of liberty, which ever has, and I trust ever will govern the actions of freemen. They saw their currency deranged, their commerce destroyed, their enterprise crushed, their industry unrewarded, the Government of their fathers, though nominally the same, fast degenerating into an uncontrolled and uncontrollable despotism. Is it, then, any cause of wonder that they should rise in their might and majesty, and hurl from place and power those who had so long and so grievously abused the trust confided to them?

Sir, they would have been unworthy of their noble parentage if they had done less.

The honorable member from Mississippi is now able to foretell what will be the measures of the next Administration, and to state what will be its principles. How long has it been since the friends of the party in power could not tell any thing about General Harrison's principles? But now, before he has entered upon the discharge of his official duties, they can tell all about his measures, and are ready to condemn them in advance, and to prophesy their overthrow. True and constitutional Democracy is now in the ascendant, and I hope always may continue so. But gentlemen need not "lay the flattering unction to their souls" that the spoilsmen will again come into power. Locofocoism, agrarianism, subtreasuryism are buried, now and forever, and the light of no resurrection morning shall ever dawn upon the grave which covers their ignoble remains.

Mr. Chairman, I thank you and the committee for the kindness and attention with which you have heard me, and shall show my thankfulness by not longer trespassing on your patience or the time of the House.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

SPEECH OF MR. DUNCAN, OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives, January 26, 1841.

The following remarks of Mr. DUNCAN, of Ohio, in favor of an amendment of the naturalization laws, were made in Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the issue of Treasury notes, but were not included in his speech as published heretofore for want of room.

Mr. DUNCAN exhibited the bill to amend the naturalization laws, and said it was his intention to introduce it, but lest he should not have an opportunity to introduce it, and express his views upon its merits, he would claim the time and attention of the committee while he would submit a few remarks. Mr. D. proceeded and remarked:

What are the objects of this bill? Why, sir, they are no more nor less than to secure to those who flee from despotism, and civil and religious oppression, the same rights, and a participation in the same privileges, which our ancestors secured by their flight, and which they have transmitted to us, and which, too, they have transmitted to us free of the trammels and pretended obligations that bound them in obedience to the mandates of a British throne, and the dictates of a haughty aristocracy called "the mother country."

But what is the Government which our ancestors have transmitted to us? In a word, it is a Government of the people. Our Government is called emphatically "the asylum of the oppressed." Ours is a Government of free institutions, and we have ever regarded the elective as the most valuable of all our free institutions. It is the freedom of our elective franchise that makes us a free people, and our Government a free Government. The elective franchise is an institution which forms the principal ingredient of every free Government, and just in proportion to the extent to which that franchise is enjoyed in a Government, so is that Government free.

I have ever thought, from my earliest attention to the principles of Government, that the elective franchise of this country, as it related to foreigners, has been unnecessarily limited and trammelled. Our naturalization laws have been, and are now, complicated, and the time required for foreigners to become citizens unnecessarily prolonged. The difficulty and expense attending naturalization, are incompatible with the name of our Government, and the nature of our free institutions. It has ever been my intention, since I have had the honor of a stand on this floor, at the proper time, not only to express my decided hostility to the naturalization laws as they now exist, but also to exert my feeble abilities to have them amended, so as to make them conform to the character and nature of our Government, and the spirit of our Constitutions. It affords me inexpressible satisfaction to have on this occasion the privilege to take part in the commencement of a work which has long been near my heart.

When our Government was formed, it was, to some extent, an experiment. It was formed with a trembling hand, and with fearful apprehensions. It was the subject of contemptuous derision and malevolent ridicule to the crowned heads, and the aristocracy of all Europe, and there were not wanting many able statesmen and experienced politicians in our own country, who predicted its downfall in less than half a century—who predicted that ours would go the way of all Republics that had gone before it. Hence it is that some of our institutions are trammelled with restrictions, others enlarged with powers and privileges which do not comport with the free principles of a simple Republican Government, and the spirit and general character of our free institutions. Among those are to be found a Federal judiciary for life, and the limitation of the elective franchise, as applied to foreigners, or the restraints interwoven in the naturalization laws; though these last proceed rather from legal restrictions than constitutional prohibition. The sincere caution and patriotic motives which governed and guided the greater number of our ancestors, will prohibit every grateful American from reflecting upon the framers of our Government for what he may now think an unnecessary restraint, or a dangerous power imposed or bestowed upon any of our institutions. Some of our institutions were framed with an eye to those of a similar character in the country from which we were emancipated. Many of our customs, maxims, and rules of action, as well judicial as political, common to our country, were retained, as well from an attachment to precedent as a confidence in their utility, and a belief of their intrinsic worth; and it is due in gratitude to the services and memory of our ancestors, to say that all our institutions were made as free as the experience of the age and the nature of circumstances at that time would permit. But it is now more than "half a century" since the organization of our Government, and the harmony and regularity which has distinguished all its movements, independent of the agency of the restrictions and embarrassments which this bill is intended to remove, (and some powers and privileges which I hope to see soon abolished) must convince every one that many of the apprehensions entertained that our Government might be "too free" were unfounded. An experience of more than fifty years of the practical and successful operation of our Republican Government must serve to convince the most doubting and incredulous, that the people have every requisite for self-government, viz: wisdom, power, and honesty. Hence there is no longer any apology for retaining restrictions, powers or privileges, incompatible with our free institutions or personal rights, which originally had their foundation in the want of a full confidence in the intelligence, capacity, and stability of the people for self-government.

There is no man now living who is imbued with pure Republican principles, who can desire to see that provision of the United States Constitution perpetuated or longer continued, which secures to the Federal judiciary their offices for life. There is surely no advocate of equal rights and pure Republican principles at this day, who will not cheerfully lend his aid and voice to so amend the Constitution as to limit the time for which our Federal judges shall hold their offices.

The idea of an office for life in a Republican Government, a fundamental principle of which is "rotation in office," is so revolting to every patriotic feeling, that one cannot think of it without horror, who is not tainted with an attachment to the principles of aristocracy. The existence of an office for life in a Republican Government, is a contradiction in terms, which nothing but an unprincipled sophist and a political hypocrite can reconcile at this day, and with our experience of the virtues of a Republican Government. The moment an office for life in a Republican Government is bestowed on any one individual, a gloom and despondency, to a certain extent, is cast over the prospects of every other individual in the community, whose qualifications and virtues entitle him equally to the same office. To admit the necessity of a life office in our Government, is to admit the preposterous supposition that no person but he who fills it is qualified; or the truth of the anti-republican principle, that the people, by themselves or their representatives, are incapable of filling offices with those who are qualified.

A life office in a Republican Government is a blight and a political mildew. It is a sapping, sucking vampire upon all free institutions. It is a blasting, freezing curse upon every human political prospect. The secret prayer of a freedom-loving community for an early death, is the lot of him who holds an office for life in a republican Government. If I have one wish above another, it is that I may live to see our Constitution so amended that no man shall hold an office for life in our Government. I hope to live to see the day when our Constitution shall be so amended that our Federal Judiciary, like other men, shall hold their offices for a limited time. I have no notion that one class of officers in this country shall ride upon the storm of party in constitutional security, and themselves be partisans, while all others are liable to perish and sink. If the tempest of party is to perpetually howl through this country, as it will, and does, in all Governments not purely despotic, then let those who are partisans be placed on the same footing. If the political ocean, long and wide as this Union, is to heave from its foundation, and rock and shake, and toss the ship of State, let all who ride in her be made equally liable to be swallowed in the vortex of party. I contend that the principles of justice, of equality, the nature of our free institutions, and the name and character of our Government, all unite in demanding that the Federal Constitution be so amended that no office can be held for life in this country. But, sir, I did not rise to talk about the Federal jurisdiction, I rose to talk about the naturalization laws.

Sir, the objections I have to the naturalization laws, consist in the time they require a foreigner to reside in this country before he can become a citizen; the complication in the laws themselves and the expense and trouble they impose to become a citizen. I wish to see it put in the power of a foreigner to become a citizen with a shorter residence in this country, with as little trouble and expense as possible, and when he takes the oath of allegiance, I wish him to enjoy all the rights and privileges of a native born citizen, which the Federal Constitution does not deny him. So thought Thomas Jefferson, as is evinced in the following extract from one of his messages:

"I cannot omit recommending a revival of the laws on the subject of naturalization, considering the ordinary chances of human life, a denial of citizenship under a residence of fourteen years, is a denial to a great proportion of those who ask it; and controls a policy pursued from their first settlement by many of those States, and still believed of consequence to their prosperity. And shall we refuse to the unhappy fugitives from distress that hospitality which the savages of the wilderness extended to our fathers arriving in this land? Shall oppressed humanity find no asylum on this globe? The Constitution, indeed, has wisely provided that for admission to certain offices of important trusts a residence shall be required sufficient to develop character and design. But might not the general character and capabilities of a citizen be safely communicated to every one manifesting a bona fide purpose of embarking his life and fortune permanently with us?"

Why has he heretofore not enjoyed such benefits? We have had two parties in this country from the commencement of our Government to this time, and we are likely to continue to have. A Federal party and a Democratic party. A Federal party, so called from their attachment to Federal principles, or a strong and powerful Federal Government concentrating in it the sovereignty and independence of the States; and, to a great extent, the liberties of the people; and also in favor of all measures and all institutions which will foster, secure, and perpetuate those objects. A Democratic party, so called from their attachments to the principles of Democracy—to a Federal Government of limited powers—to the sovereignty or independence of the States, or so much as has not been surrendered to the Federal Government by the letter of the Constitution—the broadest freedom to the people, whether natives or foreigners.

The Democratic party, in accordance with the principles which give them name, have always been in favor of the broadest liberty of speech, the freedom of debate, and the freedom of the press—the most liberal exercise of the elective franchise, and the least possible restraint upon the privileges of naturalization, which the safety of the country would admit. The Federal party have ever exerted themselves to limit the freedom of speech, of debate, and of the press, to circumscribe the elective franchise within the narrowest possible bounds, and to throw all the restrictions and embarrassments possible in the way of naturalization, and are now endeavoring, in violation of the Constitution, to deprive foreigners of the rights of citizenship. I make no assertions here but what I can prove, so I proceed to prove these.

I will not trace our political history for this purpose further than the administration of the elder Adams. The Federal party had the ascendancy in both branches of the National Legislature, as well as in the Executive Department; and here are some of the fruits of that Administration.

I hold in my hand volume third of the United States Laws, page sixty-one, which contains an act supplementary to and to amend the act entitled, "An act to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal the act heretofore passed on that subject." This act was passed during the Federal administration of the elder Adams, and was approved by him, June 18th, 1898. The first section of this act provides that foreigners shall not be naturalized short of a residence of fourteen years in this country next preceding their application. This act was a Federal measure, was introduced by Federalists, was sustained by Federalists, passed by Federalists, and approved by a Federal President. It was opposed by the Democratic party in Congress, as the journals show which I hold in my hand, and by the Democratic party out of Congress, as the political history of the country shows. I hold in my hand the act which is now in force, and which repeals the fourteen year act, and reduces the residence of foreigners necessary to naturalization to five years. This act was opposed by the Federal party then in Congress, as the journals which I hold in my hand show. It was passed by the Democratic party; but it was passed as the surgeon draws the tooth—it was passed by the hardest effort. But I wish to be brief: I will come up to modern times.

Last winter, a Democratic member (Mr. HAND of New York) introduced a bill, at an early period of the session, to shorten the residence required by the act now in force. That bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. A majority of that committee were Federalists (modern Whigs) but no power on this earth was able to rescue it from their hands. It slept the sleep of death. The same gentleman introduced a similar bill at the commencement of this session. A motion was made to refer it to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; that motion failed by a party vote, the Federalists voting against it. A motion was made to refer it to the standing Committee on the Judiciary; that motion was carried by a party vote—every Federalist in the House voting for it, and the Democracy against it; and there that bill now is safe for an eternal sleep. But I shall not pursue the history—this is enough for my purpose. I could make a book of the party struggles on the subject of naturalization; in every instance of which, the Democracy have been on the side of liberality, and the Federalists on the side of restriction. Here is proof—historical proof—documentary proof, of the fact, that it is a cardinal principle with the Federal party to throw every possible restriction and embarrassment in the way of naturalization. But the Federalists do not stop at restrictions and embarrassments; they seek to overthrow the privilege and constitutional rights of naturalization; they seek to deprive the foreigner of the right of citizenship at present, and in all time to come; they seek to make the foreigner a vassal—"a hewer of wood and a drawer of water." The country is, at this time, overspread with "Native American Associations." Native American Associations! I will remark upon that term before I take my seat. Yes, sir, our country is overspread with Native American Associations! And what is their object? I hold in my hand a memorial which answers the question. Here it is:

"To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:
"FELLOW-CITIZENS: The petition of the undersigned citizens of the United States, and of the State of Illinois, respectfully shows their belief, that time has fulfilled the object had in view by our fathers at the period of adopting the Constitution, when they gave the Congress the power of passing laws for the naturalization of foreigners; and your petitioners also show their belief, that the farther admission of foreigners to a participation in the political rights of native Americans, would be hurtful to the interests of our country, and if continued will, sooner or later, prove destructive to our Republican institutions. Your petitioners, therefore, ask the attention of your honorable body to the various petitions for a repeal of the naturalization laws which have been formerly presented to your honorable body; and they farther ask your honorable body to repeal entirely the laws which now exist in regard to the naturalization of foreigners."

What do you think of that, sir? Your Clerk's desk groans with such petitions from "Native American Associations," and Federalists not associated under that name. And of whom and of what are those Native American Associations composed? Federalists; I answer, without the fear of successful contradiction, Federalists. There is not a pure Republican in the United States, who has ever favored at heart the principles of Democracy, who has initiated himself in one of those infamous associations. Infamous, did I say? Is that too hard a term? No, not when we contemplate the object. The name is good—it is honorable. It is not the first time we have known a name to be assumed for a purpose foreign to the purpose which the name would imply. We have frequently known a name to be used to cover the basest frauds. We have seen, within the last twenty-five years, the political vocabulary exhausted of names to cover the dangerous and subverting principles of Federalism; and such is the object of both the name and the association in question.

The true interpretation of "Native American Association" will be understood by every patriot when things shall be called by their right names. The translation of "Native American Association" will be, base demagogues; violators of the Constitution; corrupt minions of Federalism; polluters of the pure fountains of Republicanism; infamous despoilers of the elective franchise; myrmidons of despotism on the soil of our free institutions; calumniators and foul detractors of the American character and Republican principles; reckless political swindlers, who would sacrifice their country, and sink to eternity her free institutions, to live a day themselves on their ruins; high-handed political rascals at the rewards due to the immortal memories and patriotic services of Lafayette, DeKalb, Pulaski, Montgomery, Kosciuszko, and a host of other foreigners, whose names will be sung when those who compose your "Native American Association" will be lost in forgetfulness. Native American Association! Sir, the name, in connection with the object, sickens me.

Such an Association, for such a purpose, disgraces the American escutcheon, and merits the indignant scorn of every lover of human liberty and republican freedom. Such an institution, for such a purpose, is worthy, with its members, to be the ready instruments, the tools, and the corrupt minions of a swindling, shinplaster, rotten borough, stockjobbing aristocracy, and of which, too, they are a part. And yet, strange to say, and almost incredible, I am told there are foreigners who have enrolled themselves in those associations. If there be such a foreigner, that man is prepared to open his jaws for the bit, bend his back for the saddle, and, like Balaam's ass, receive the kicks of his master, without even the right to say, "My lord, my lord, why smitest thou me?"

Sir, I could compile a book of Federal memorials, resolutions, orders, sayings, &c. that have for their object the disfranchisement of foreigners; but time will not permit: I will have to confine myself to two or three more exposures. I hold in my hand an address of one of those associations called "Native American," from which I will read an extract: "We do solemnly resolve to oppose the election or appointment of any but American citizens to office, and henceforward use our united efforts and unsparring zeal to procure such an alteration in the naturalization law as shall exclude from the right of suffrage all foreigners who come into the country after such law has passed."

In the opinion of a Federalist of high standing, among other things, we find the following:

"Of the Irish foreigners, most of them are paupers, strangers, sojourners, loafers, and other cattle, who contribute not one cent to the maintenance of the Government, and are not found save on the days of election, and are never seen afterwards. They swear falsely with perfect impunity as respects punishment in this world, and according to whose faith, perhaps, the price of a day's labor gives them [the Roman Catholics] absolution for the next."

I am no Roman Catholic; but I believe this a base slander upon the Irish, worthy of a demagogue and a liar; and, I believe a foul detraction from the principles of the Roman Catholic religion, worthy of a polluted heart or a benighted mind.

The present Executive of the State of New York, Governor Seward, in his inaugural message, says:

"There is another resource which is ours, neither by inheritance nor by purchase, nor by violence nor by fraud. It is the LABOR, the incalculable LABOR of the European States. The truth of this statement every native American is proud to admit; it is, indeed, by their labor, AND BY THAT ONLY, that foreigners render ANY SERVICE to the United States; and it is the duty, as it is the just prerogative of the American people, TO CONFINE THEM TO THIS THEIR ONLY PROPER VOCATION IN OUR COUNTRY."

This sentiment is worthy of the edict of a heartless despot. But it is now time that I should introduce the alien and sedition laws as a part of my expose of Federal hostility to foreigners, as well as the liberty of speech, the enjoyment of debate, and the freedom of the press; and first of the Alien law, I read from vol. 34, United States Laws, page 66:

"AN ACT CONCERNING ALIENS.
"And be it enacted, &c. That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, at any time during the continuance of this act, to order all such aliens as he shall judge dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States, or shall have reasonable grounds to suspect are concerned in any treasonable or secret machinations against the Government thereof, to depart out of the territory of the United States, within such time as shall be expressed in such order; which order shall be served on such alien by delivering him a copy thereof, or leaving the same at his usual abode, and returned to the office of the Secretary of State, by the marshal, or other persons to whom the same shall be directed. And in case any alien so ordered to depart, shall be found at large within the United States after the time limited in such order for his departure, and not having obtained a licence from the President to reside therein; or having obtained such licence, shall not have conformed thereto, every such alien shall, on conviction thereof, be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three years, and shall never after be admitted to become a citizen of the United States."

"Approved, June 25, 1798."
I will read no more from this law—this is enough for my purpose. And now for the sedition law. In the volume 3, United States Laws, page 98, second section of an act entitled an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, we find the following:

"That if any person shall write, print, utter or publish, or shall cause or procure to be written, printed, uttered or published, or shall knowingly and willingly assist or aid in writing, printing or publishing any false, scandalous or malicious writing or writings against the Government of the United States or either House of the Congress of the United States, or the President of the United States, with intent to defame the said Government, or either House of the said Congress, or the said President, or to bring them or either of them into contempt or disrepute, or to excite against them or either or any of them the hatred of the good people of the United States, such person being convicted thereof, before any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, and by imprisonment not exceeding two years."

These two extracts constitute all that is necessary for me to expose of these laws. They would have been better fitted for a place in the codes of Caligula or Nero than in the American statute book. I might ask the foreigner, I care not from what despotism he may have fled, whether or not his condition would be much improved under the existence of such laws as these. I have exposed them, and I intend to make them a part of my printed remarks, because I think they cannot be too frequently exposed. I think the safety of our free institutions and our personal liberty require their frequent exposition. True, they have been repealed, still they occupy a place in the American statute book to its disgrace and infamy. But I would not let them remain on the statute book, but I would have them translated into every tongue, and posted upon the high ways at public corners—upon the church pillars and in every forum. They would serve as warnings and beacons to the unwary, that even here liberty is only to be perpetuated by a vigilance and an unceasing watchfulness, which can only be surpassed by the bravery and patriotism which rescued it from the grasp of despotism.

To understand the motives which gave birth to those legal monsters, it is necessary to refer to the history of the times of their passage.

The Federal party, in 1796, triumphed in the election of the elder Adams, and not only in his election, but in the election of both branches of Congress. That was their first triumph. Having gained the ascendancy, the next object was to retain it. The sedition law was intended to operate on native born citizens, as well as foreigners. It was intended to benumb the tongue, palsify the hand, and suppress the press. It was intended to secure the re-election of the Presidential incumbent and the Federal members of Congress, by preventing any and all exposes of their Federal principles and their subverting corruptions, by making heavy fines, forfeitures, and imprisonment the penalty of the exercise of rights which the Constitution secures, and which is the prerogative of freemen at all times and in all places; and perhaps no law was ever more faithfully executed than was that infamous law. Presentments, indictments, prosecutions, judgments, convictions, imprisonments, and forfeitures, were the order of the day. The prisons groaned and the public newspapers teemed with sheriffs' and marshals' advertisements for the sale of forfeited estates and confiscated goods and chattels, to satisfy the "crimes against the United States;" and the crimes consisted in the exercise of the rights of freemen, and an expose of a corrupt, a worthless, and a despotic Administration.

The alien law was intended to operate on foreigners. This act, it will be seen, authorized the President of the United States to order any foreigner whom he might think dangerous to the country to depart therefrom. It is to be understood, from the fact that both the alien and sedition laws were only to be in force for two years, that they were intended for the sole purpose of securing the re-election of the Federal Administration, and securing it in the full and unchecked exercise of its corrupt and despotic measures which so justly designated it "the reign of terror." The safety of "the good people of the United States," and the preservation of the country from the influence of foreigners, formed no part of the consideration for the passage of either the alien or sedition laws. I repeat, it was to perpetuate in power the Federal party; hence it was, that power was given to the President to order any foreigner to depart the country. It was enough for him to know that the foreigner was opposed to the Federal party, their principles, and his re-election: that being known, the Executive mandate could issue. He who had the misfortune to be born without the United States, by that mandate could be cast upon the widespread deep, without preservation or support, to be landed wherever the tempests and waves might land him, for no other crime than that of being a Democrat. For the exercise of this high and arbitrary prerogative, no presentment to a grand jury was necessary—no trial by a petit jury—no judgment of a court was necessary—all forms of trial and of justice were dispensed with; and if the unfortunate victim of Executive Federal vengeance failed to comply with and obey the mandate, his fate was still harder; for, without presentment, trial, or judgment, a mandate from the same authority cast him into a loathsome prison, to linger and languish and waste away three years of a life which had periled every thing that life and fortune could peril, to secure a home and an asylum here.

No time I have now will permit me to enumerate the prosecutions under and by those odious laws. I will allude, however, to one case, though involving no other principle or hardship than any or all others. I name it because the victim was distinguished for his talents, his integrity, his purity of principle, and his fearless patriotism. The individual to whom I allude was Matthew Lyon. He was an Irishman by birth, but a naturalized citizen, consequently without the pale and power of the alien law. He was the editor of a Democratic newspaper in the State of Vermont, and a member of Congress elect. He was indicted, tried, and found guilty, for publishing a political article against John Adams, the President of the United States. He was fined one thousand dollars, and costs of suit, and sentenced to four months' imprisonment. The fine to the last cent was collected, and the imprisonment inflicted and endured. But Federalism, not satisfied with prosecuting him to insolvency and the prison, sought to persecute him to political disgrace, with no less avidity and bitterness. Here is the resolution which was introduced for his expulsion from the House of Representatives. I read this resolution, and shall make it a part of my printed remarks, not only to show it to the present generation as a precious reminiscence of Federalism as it then was, but also to show the depraved and malignant spirit with which the party sought to prostrate the man who dare maintain the rights of a freeman. Here is the resolution:

"Resolved, That Matthew Lyon, a member of this House, having been convicted of being a malicious and seditious person, and of a depraved mind and wicked and diabolical disposition, and of wickedly and maliciously contriving to defame the Government of the United States; and of having, with intent and design, defamed the Government of the United States, and John Adams, the President of the United States, and to bring the said Government and President into disrepute and contempt; and with intent and design to excite against the said Government and President the hatred of the good people of the United States, and to stir up sedition in the United States, hath written and published certain scandalous writings or libels, be therefore expelled from this House."

This is the resolution, and here is the list of Federalists who voted for it, beginning with John Allen, and ending with R. Wain, forty-nine in number, the whole Federal pack then in Congress, (of the House.) Here are the names of the Democratic members, all of whom voted against the resolution, beginning with G. Bain, and ending with R. Williams. Now, sir, to give you and the country indisputable evidence that the Democracy of this day are contending against the same Federal party, governed by the same principles and spirit, so far as the disposition to restrain by law the exercise of individual political rights is concerned, I ask to read a bill, which was introduced in the Senate not long since by a high-toned modern Federalist, [Mr. CRITTENDEN, of Kentucky.] Here is the bill: it is called the modern sedition bill:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the first day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine, no marshal or deputy marshal, no postmaster or deputy postmaster, no receiver or register of a land office, or any of their deputies or clerks, no surveyor general of the public lands, or any of his deputies or assistants, no collector, surveyor, naval officer, weigher, gauger, appraiser, or other officer or person whatsoever concerned or employed in the charging, collecting, levying, or managing the customs, or any branch or part thereof, no engineer, officer, or agent employed or concerned in the execution or superintendence of any of the public works, shall by word, message, or writing, or in any other manner whatsoever, endeavor to persuade any elector to give, or dissuade any elector from giving, his vote for the choice of any person to be elector of President and Vice President of these United States, or for the choice of any person to be a Senator or Representative in the Congress of the said United States, or for the choice of any person to be Governor or Lieutenant Governor of any State, or of any person to be a Representative or member in the legislative department of any State of this Union, or for the choice of any person to serve in any public office established by the law of any said State; nor shall any such officer or person interfere in any of the elections above mentioned, or use any means with intent to influence or control the same, otherwise than by giving his own vote; and every person offending therein shall forfeit the sum of five hundred dollars, one moiety thereof to the informer, and the other moiety thereof to the United States aforesaid, to be recovered, with costs of suit, by any person that shall sue for the same, by action of debt, bill, or plaint in any of the district or circuit courts of the United States; and every person convicted, on any such suit, of the said offence, shall thereby become disabled and incapable of ever bearing or executing any office or place of trust whatsoever under the said United States."

This bill involves the same principle of the sedition law of "black-cockade memory." Mr. BELL (true blue) of Tennessee, of the House, introduced another of the same character, and so nearly in the same words that I shall not ask your time to read it. Those bills were opposed by every Democrat in the Senate and House, and were sustained by most of the Federalists, I believe, who did not skulk the vote. There is an insidious attempt to make the impression that those bills were intended to prevent the interference of Federal officers in elections, but that was a mean hypocritical sham: so we will find it when the power elect comes into office. We will hear of no complaint then of the interference of Federal officers in elections. Interference in elections will be made part of their official duty. The Federal banner will bear the inscription, "Federalism expects every man to do his duty at the polls." I trust I have displayed sufficient political history to illustrate the fact that the Federal party have been what they are now, and that they are now what they have been, enemies to the free exercise of the elective franchise, opposed to the constitutional rights of foreign emigrants, and in favor of prohibiting the freedom of speech, of debate, and of the press. I now ask your attention while I present some of the evidences) with which our political history abounds) to prove that the Democratic party, whether in or out of office, have uniformly opposed all political measures calculated to suppress freedom in any case, within the meaning of the Constitution or the spirit of our free institutions, in addition to the fact that the Democratic party to a man opposed the alien and sedition laws, as well their passage as their execution. In every instance when the question of making the naturalization laws more favorable to foreign emigrants has been presented, the Democracy have exerted themselves in their behalf, as the journals which I hold in my hands show, and such is the well known history of the country and of the parties. Here are two or three extracts from the Kentucky and Virginia Resolutions, so called. They speak the Democratic feeling which prevailed in the country at the time that the alien and sedition laws were in force:

First extract:

"That the General Assembly doth particularly protest against the palpable and alarming infractions of the Constitution, in the two late cases of the 'Alien and Sedition Acts,' passed at the last session of Congress: the first of which exercises a power nowhere delegated to the Federal Government; and which, by uniting Legislative and Judicial powers to those of Executive, subverts the general principles of a free Government, as well as the particular organization and positive provisions of the Federal Constitution; and the other of which act exercises, in like manner, a power not delegated by the Constitution; but, on the contrary, expressly and positively forbidden by one of the amendments thereto; a power which, more than any other, ought to produce universal alarm; because it is leveled against that right of freely examining public characters and measures, and of free communication among the people thereon, which has ever been justly deemed the only effectual guardian of every other right."

Second extract:

"That the friendless alien has indeed been selected as the safest subject of a first experiment; but the citizen will soon follow, or rather has already followed, for already has a sedition act marked him as its prey: that these and successive acts of the same character, unless arrested on the threshold, may tend to drive these States into revolution and blood, and will furnish new calumnies against Republican Governments, and new pretexes for those who wished it to be believed that man cannot be governed but by a rod of iron; that it would be a dangerous delusion, were a confidence in the men of our choice to silence our fears for the safety of our rights; that confidence is every where the parent of despotism; that free Government is founded in jealousy and not in confidence; it is jealousy, not confidence, which prescribes limited Constitutions to bind down those whom we are obliged to trust with power; that our Constitution has accordingly fixed the limits to which, and no further, our confidence may go."

Third extract:

"It can never be admitted that the removal of aliens, authorized by the act, is to be considered, not as a punishment for an offence, but as a measure of precaution and prevention. If the banishment of an alien from the country into which he has been invited, as the asylum most auspicious to his happiness; a country where he may have formed the most tender connections; where he may have invested his entire property, and acquired property of the real and permanent as well as of the moveable and temporary kind; where he enjoys under the laws a greater share of the blessings of personal security, and personal liberty, than he can elsewhere hope for, and where he may have nearly completed his probationary title to citizenship; if, moreover, in the execution of the sentence against him, he is to be exposed, not only to the ordinary dangers of the sea, but to the peculiar casualties incident to a crisis of war, and of unusual licentiousness on that element, and possibly to vindictive purposes which his emigration itself may have provoked; if a banishment of this sort be not a punishment, and among the severest of punishments, it will be difficult to imagine a doom to which the name can be applied."

I will trouble you with no more extracts from this source. The Kentucky and Virginia resolutions abound with Democratic principles and patriotic sentiments, worthy the Democracy, and the friends of human liberty at all times. But I only exhibit these extracts to show that the Democratic party was then what it is now. I will read a short resolution to show that the Democratic party is now what it was then. It is a resolution unanimously adopted by the late Democratic National Convention held at Baltimore. Here is the resolution:

"9. Resolved, That the liberal principles embodied by Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence, and sanctioned in the Constitution, which make ours the land of liberty and the asylum of the oppressed of every nation, have ever been cardinal principles in the Democratic faith; and every attempt to abridge the present privilege of becoming citizens, and the owners of soil among us, ought to be resisted with the same spirit which swept the alien and sedition laws from our statute book."

I have other evidence and demonstrations expressive of the liberality which have characterized the whole course of the Democratic party; but my time and the limits of a speech will not permit me to make farther displays of them at this time.

Who are foreigners, and why should the name be a reproach and a word of taunt, as it is here and elsewhere? Who are foreigners, and why should they be deprived of the benefits of our free institutions, of which the Constitution does not deprive them? Were our ancestors, who first settled the country, felled the forest, and subdued the savage, in defiance of every terror and of every danger, not foreigners? Who were the patriots of the Revolution? Who periled their lives, spilled their blood, and pledged their fortunes in a nation's redemption? Were they not foreigners, or the descendants of foreigners? Who were they who stood forth so nobly, so gallantly, and so successfully in our second struggle for independence? Were they not foreigners, and the descendants of foreigners. And who are they who make up the entire population of the United States and the Territories thereof? who maintain the country in peace, and who, it is to be hoped, will again stand forth in her defence, without distinction or regard to their land of nativity—are they not foreigners, or the descendants of foreigners?

Sir, I have stated that the restrictions interwoven in some of our political institutions by our ancestors, were the result of patriotic caution. But from the success of the Federal party in 1796, to this time very different motives have governed that party in relation to foreigners. It was well known then, as it is now, that the German and Irish constitute a majority of all the foreign population in this country. It was well known then, as it is now, that a large majority of those classes of our foreign population are Democrats in principle, as they are in practice. The Federal hostility, which has always been manifested towards foreigners, has reference to the Irish and Germans, not to foreigners in general; nor does that hostility proceed from any apprehension of danger to the liberties of our country, or the overthrow of our Government by those classes of our population, but from the fact that Federalism cannot be what it would or might be but for the German and Irish political influence. If the German and Irish population could be cut off from their political and constitutional privileges, we would hear no more of "Native American Associations," nor would we hear any thing more of Federal legislation on the subject of naturalization, except to remove all restrictions upon foreigners. All would then be right; Federalism could then be just what its advocates desire; that is to say, always in power.

Sir, I have the candor to acknowledge that a leading object with me, in advocating an amendment of the naturalization laws, is to secure our Irish and German population (as well that in esse as that in futuro) the broadest possible privileges which our Constitution will admit; yet I would not vote for the passage of any law that would not extend equal privileges to all foreigners, without distinction of birth, country, or the party to which they might belong. The charter of our liberties was sealed by the blood of almost every nation. The blood of the foreigner mingled with that of the native American in every battle which was fought in our glorious Revolution. Had our patriotic sires of the Revolution no object beyond their own emancipation and the freedom of their posterity? They looked to the oppressed of the countries from which they fled. Was it not something more than mere colonial emancipation that forced the gallant Lafayette from his family, his friends, and the "blushing wine hills of his native France," "to crusade for freedom?" He was actuated by a love of liberty which had no restraint—a love of liberty which was neither limited to the colonial citizens nor their posterity. His love of liberty grasped the world. It extended to all then living, and to all who were to live. He periled the ocean, shed his blood, and sacrificed his fortune, in America's cause, not merely that the foreigner who fled the iron rod of despotism and the excommunications of bigotry and superstition, should find peace of conscience and civil protection, but that, in addition, he should walk erect as a freeman, and participate in all the political rights of a citizen, which he shed his blood to purchase. Who but an ungrateful despot at heart, or a base minion of aristocracy, would deny to the countrymen of Lafayette the rights of an American citizen?

Sir, the blood of every foreign patriot which was shed in the Revolution, as well as in our second struggle for independence, cries aloud from the ground that drank it, and demands, as a matter of right, that his countrymen shall be admitted to the rights of an American citizen. The common principles of reciprocal justice, patriotism, and gratitude, demand that that call should be implicitly obeyed. But, sir, while it is a principal object with the Federalists to abolish or prohibit the political franchise of our Irish and German population, because they are opposed to Federal principles and Federal institutions, I would maintain and extend their franchise because they favor Democratic principles and Democratic institutions. I look upon the support which our free institutions receive from our Irish and German population as a high guarantee for their duration. I look upon every Irishman and every German who comes to this country in health, or with abilities or means to maintain themselves, whether by labor or other honest means, as an acquisition to our national strength and wealth.

I believe I have used the name of DeKalb. That is a sacred name with every grateful American. I cannot consent to pass it without notice. It is ungrateful to select from the band of patriots who shed their blood on liberty's altar the name of any one as the subject of eulogy. But, as it is the rights of Germans I am maintaining, I must be permitted to speak of that distinguished patriot. The name of DeKalb stands prominent on the sacred history that records the noble and daring deeds of the brave; his memory entwines the heart of every lover of his country; his name is the host and pride of all who delight to recount the services of those who achieved our Independence; his services live immortal, to welcome to the land of his redemption every German who seeks a refuge from his home of oppression. DeKalb was a son of Germany. He was born to battle with despotism. He was one of Heaven's decrees, to rescue the oppressed from the grasp of the tyrant. His noble daring corresponded with the noble purpose of his destiny. He forsook as if by divine intuition the land of his birth, and the home of his relatives, the endearments and associations founded in youthful friendships, to battle in the gloom and clouds of war for a people who had no claims on him. He came in the Revolution, when want and calamity were the darkest, and when the devastations of war were spreading the widest, and when the "torch of the enemy was in the midst of destruction." His sacred regard for the cause of human rights allowed him no time for reflection. He at once sought the most dangerous post and the hottest fight. Soon after his arrival he was appointed to the command of the regulars in the Southern division of the army, and gloriously fell in the battle of Camden, a martyr to the cause of liberty. Who, I ask, that is now basking in the sunshine of liberty, purchased by the blood of DeKalb, will refuse the rights of an American citizen to the German?

I have no time to specify the signal services of the American Irish, either in the Revolution or our second struggle. I will say, however, that the American historian has but poorly discharged his duty, who has failed to give the Irish a high place in the historical temple of fame, in his description of our glorious and successful struggles. But I have used the name of Montgomery. That too is a sacred name, and should not be uttered but in affection and patriotic reverence. I dare not pass that name without recounting briefly the gallant deeds of him who honored it, and the glorious part he took in a nation's emancipation. Montgomery was an Irishman. He distinguished himself as an officer and a soldier under Wolfe, at the taking of Quebec by the British, by which he acquired a high military reputation. Previous to the American Revolution he settled in the State of New York. He took a decided stand with the Colonies against the "mother country." In 1775 he was appointed to the command of the northern department of the Continental army, in conjunction with General Schuyler; but the declining health of the latter threw the whole of the command on him. He captured Fort Chamble, St. John, and Montreal; after which he proceeded to besiege Quebec. The siege continued a month, when he attempted to storm the place; but, in the act of doing all that courage, bravery, and skill could do, he gloriously fell, with two of his aids by his side.

Who would deny to the countrymen of Montgomery the rights of an American citizen? None, sir, but he who is unworthy of such rights himself. Where was the time, or where the peril, that the Irish were not at the post of danger? So it always will be. A love of freedom, and a sacred and unconquerable attachment to the principles of liberty, constitute the Irishman's nature. No hand, however oppressive, no time however long, no laws however tyrannical, while they permit him to breathe, and wear his manly form, can bend him from his attachments to human liberty, nor paralyze his efforts to sustain and defend it, nor cower his burning and indignant brow from frowning upon the despot. That manly hatred, that just revenge, that patriotic and uncompromising hostility which have a just residence in the breast of every honest Irishman, whether in this country or in his native Erin, towards England for the oppression and tyranny to his injured and oppressed land, is a high and valuable security to American liberty at all times, and against all invaders, but more especially against British invasion to which we are more exposed, and from which we have more to fear, than from all others besides. But he who wishes properly to appreciate the Irish character, must not limit his research, either to the noble resistance to British oppression, or to the displays of Irish patriotism and courage in our national struggles. The Irish nation claim an ancestry superior to the Anglo Saxon race. They are the descendants of the Carthaginians, who were a family of Phœnicia. No people on the face of the earth were more distinguished for all the requisitions that form a brave a persevering people than were the Phœnicians. Their noble daring, and fearless bravery, gave them the control of the seas, and the command of the commercial world. No sea or ocean in the known world, in their day, was too broad, too deep, or too tempestuous, for them to encounter. No country was too distant for them to reach and penetrate. Phœnicia enriched herself by the commerce of all nations. Carthage was a colony of Tyre, and partook of her bravery and daring, as well as of her skill in the art of navigation, and perseverance in commerce; and, in turn, enriched herself at the expense of all nations. I say the Irish were a colony from Carthage, and such is their pride of ancestry, and such their love of country, their laws, their customs, and their institutions, that even the subverting arm of Great Britain has been unable to overthrow or extinguish them. Even to this day, though three thousand years have elapsed, they speak the Carthaginian language almost in its purity. He who wishes to know the Irish history, and the Irish character, must avoid the English historian as he would the book of slander and detraction. It has always been an object of national policy, as well as national pride, with the English historian, to present the Irish people to the world as a wild, reckless, and an ungovernable people. English historians pass off their patriotism, and their struggles for liberty, as the result of a wild and unconquerable hatred to the rules and restraints of civil government, with a view to cover the iniquities and violence of British oppression. It is a vile slander of the Irish nation and the Irish character, as the fact of the duration of their national customs and language proves. Nothing goes so far to prove the stability and regularity of a nation as an attachment to the support of customs, maxims, institutions, laws, and language which have been found convenient and promotive of human happiness. I say there is no nation on the face of the earth that can boast of such certain and remote antiquity, none can trace instances of such early civilization, nor do any possess such irrefragable proofs of their origin, lineage, and duration of language and government.

Before the introduction of Christianity, no people of the globe better or more orderly maintained their civil institutions, under Paganism, than did the Irish. I believe the first minister of the cross who visited Ireland was St. Patrick, who was sent by Celestine, Bishop of Rome, with twenty assistants, eminent for their piety, virtue, and learning. Those divines applied themselves, with faithful assiduity, to the work of their mission, and their success exceeded all human calculation at that time. In no land did the Gospel spread with such rapid progress—in no land was it so slightly opposed at its first introduction. The people, says a distinguished historian, received the doctrines of Christianity with a sort of spiritual violence, and no people, from that day to this, adhere to the principles of Christianity, as taught them, with more firmness and resolute perseverance, than do the Irish. But with all their attachment to the Christian religion, no people ever more resolutely and successfully resisted the attempt of religious innovation upon their civil rights. But here a field of Irish history opens which I have no time to traverse. I can only say that Ireland was betrayed to Henry II of England by the infamy of Dermot, though she has never been conquered to this day.

Ireland has never kissed the English rod. She withstood the arms, the bribes, and the oppressions of England, from the nominal subjection to Henry II, till the union of the two Kingdoms—a period of near four hundred years. Prior to that, every attempt at reduction or subjection was met on the field of blood. The farthest innovation of the British arms or color of subjection, did not extend beyond the pale—which was limited to the counties of Dublin, Kildare, and Meath, with the cities of Waterford, Cork, and Limerick; over the other parts of the Kingdom which were without the pale, neither Henry II, nor any of his successors, until the reign of James I, either had, or pretended to claim, more than a naked sovereignty, marked alone by a formal homage, a trifling tribute, and an empty title. And what now is the union, or what is it worth? To be sure, it is a political union that serves to oppress Ireland, but it is no union of friendship, feeling, or national ties. The true and patriotic Irishman bears, in every feeling he possesses, the same hostility to the English nation, her Government, and her laws, which burned in the bosoms of his ancestors, when their country was treacherously surrendered by the infamous Dermot. Every true Irishman transmits to his posterity the seeds of that hostility, which will, some day, overwhelm the oppressor, and redeem Ireland. The arm of British oppression, under which Ireland now groans, will be paralyzed by the abuse of the corrupt means by which it gained its power. The Irish mind is like spring steel—it may be borne down by the weight of oppression, but no time nor no tyranny can destroy its nature. The Irish spirit may, for a time, be smothered, but it will, eventually, burst into flames. It is impossible for a land like that of Ireland, destined by its Creator to be the abode of freedom and happiness, always to remain the land of oppression and misery. Fear not, Irishmen! the sleeping lion will one day awake; Ireland will one day be free.

Sir, there is no people for whom I entertain a higher feeling of personal and national respect, than for the Irish; and I feel that that respect is well founded—I have high and undoubted authority for it. The history of the Irish nation, and the qualities of the Irishman, unite in fixing that opinion with me. Their attachments to the principles of Democracy, which no influence can shake, or bribery seduce, must fix upon them the confidence of every friend to our free institutions; and so thought our ancestors. I hold in my hand the journals of the Continental Congress. From them I will read a short extract of an address to Ireland, by a committee of Congress for that purpose. I read it, and shall make it a part of my printed remarks, in order to place the views and feelings of our gallant ancestors towards the Irish, in contrast with the stand now taken against them and the Germans by the Federal popinjay shinplaster aristocracy of this day. Here is the extract:

"Permit me to assure you that it was with the utmost reluctance we could prevail ourselves to cease our commercial connection with your island. Your parliament had done us no wrong. You had ever been friendly to the rights of mankind; and we acknowledge with pleasure and gratitude that your nation has produced patriots who have nobly distinguished themselves in the cause of humanity and America. On the other hand, we were not ignorant that the labor and manufactures of Ireland, like those of the silk worm, were of little moment to herself; but served only to give luxury to those who neither toil nor spin. We perceived that, if we continued our commerce with you, our agreement not to import from Britain would be fruitless, and were, therefore, compelled to adopt a measure to which nothing but absolute necessity could have reconciled us. It gave us, however, some consolation to reflect, that should it occasion you much distress, the fertile regions of America would afford you a safe asylum from poverty, and, in time, from oppression also: an asylum in which thousands of your countrymen have found hospitality, peace, and affluence, and become united to us by all the ties of consanguinity, mutual interest and affection."

What objects had the venerable patriots of the Revolution when they expressed this high opinion of the Irish, and extended this pressing invitation to them to flee from that oppression which was crushing them to the dust, and sinking them to the grave? Was it their intention that they should be made beasts of burthen to do the "labor," as Gov. Seward says, and as Federalism says, or was it their intention that they should be freemen and American citizens? Was it their intention to seduce the Irish here to spill their blood in the Revolution, and when liberty should be secured, cast them and their countrymen after them off as unworthy of the benefits and blessings which that blood should purchase? The thought is monstrous, and to name it is infamous slander.

But, sir, there is a question of policy, independent of the motives of patriotism and gratitude, which makes it important to extend to our Irish and German population at an early period and at a cheap rate the rights of citizenship. I repeat that the support which our Democratic principles and our free institutions receive at their hand, constitutes a high guarantee for their duration. It is the dictate of good policy, without any other consideration, to admit them to the full benefits of our free institutions; while a denial of them would mark us as a people of a selfish and jealous disposition, unworthy of a great and growing Republic. That national jealousy and selfishness which prohibits foreigners from a participation in legal and political benefits is worthy of despotism, or of narrow and petty Republics, and rarely ever fails to produce their evils. It is ever so with restrictions, when carried beyond the bounds of good or liberal policy. For the truth of which, we may refer to the history of many national disasters, and from which the wise and the experienced may draw many useful lessons.

The Assyrians repudiated the Babylonians, refused them the protection of their laws, and even admission into their empire; by which they deprived themselves of many useful maxims, as well as the improvement in arms of national defence and their practical use. The Babylonians rejected the improvements, learning, and language of the Medes and Persians; and the Medes and Persians those of the Macedonians; and the Macedonians those of the Romans. And yet the empire of Assyria made way for the Babylonians; the Babylonians were conquered and subdued by the Medes and Persians; the Medes and Persians were overthrown by the Macedonians; and the Macedonians by the Romans. There is little doubt but that the overthrow of each of those empires may be traced, to some extent, to causes which had their foundation in that jealousy and selfishness which induced the one to prohibit the other from a participation in its political institutions.

It was the same miserable, narrow policy which was marked, too, by a haughty pride, that induced the citizens and policy of Carthage in her degenerate day, to reject not only the Grecian manners, customs, language, and arts of war from being taught in their dominions, but even to prohibit a Grecian from settling on their soil: for want of the benefits and advantages of all which, Carthage sunk a victim to the Roman arms; but Rome herself, in her degenerate days, fell into the same fatal error. When Rome was in the zenith of her prosperity, and the height of her real grandeur, it was her general policy to admit the nations she conquered to the rights of Roman citizens, or to extend her laws, her maxims, and her political institutions over dominions that gave way to her arms. It was not until after she had sunk into Eastern effeminacy and Eastern vices, produced by unrestrained indulgence in Eastern luxuries, purchased at the sacrifice of her revenue which should have supported and maintained her national defences on her frontiers, that she substituted the amphitheatre of sport and unbridled licentiousness for the forum of virtue, political science, and national intelligence. Then it was that she treated the subdued and conquered victims of her arms as barbarous, unworthy of her protection, sacrificed them to the sport of mental depravity, by casting them into the pit to be torn to pieces by wild and ferocious beasts, and trained them as gladiators for the destruction of each other to gratify the degenerate and corrupted appetite of assembled thousands. Then it was that Rome, whose standard had borne her eagles over the civilized globe; whose arms and whose laws and maxims had supplanted the nations of the earth, fell a prey to and became the pillage, the plunder and the spoils of a few half naked untaught bands of barbarians. So we may trace among the causes to which Rome owed her overthrow, that of the barbarous and worse than brutal treatment of those whom it was her policy and her duty to have protected and defended, and made Roman citizens.

I have stated that in the formation of our Government some of our institutions were framed with reference to some of the political institutions of the country from which we were emancipated. The legal prohibitions against foreigners in England had their influence. I believe it was in the reign of Henry the Eighth that the Pope's bulls and ecclesiastical processions were prohibited the realm of England, and the Protestant church made independent of the church of Rome. At the same time the King was made head of the church in place of the Pope. But perhaps this stroke at the Pope did not so much proceed from hostility to the Roman Catholic faith, as from a determination to abolish his influence, and the power of the Roman church, over the civil institutions of England. At that time the arms of Charles the Fifth, Emperor of Germany, was shaking every throne in Europe. Charles himself was wedded, in principle and policy, to the Roman church, and it was not more his object to subject all Europe to the imperial crown, than it was to make the Roman Catholic faith the national religion wherever his arms extended. It is, therefore, neither unfair nor unreasonable to suppose that a leading object with Henry the Eighth, in overthrowing the Catholic faith and abolishing the Pope's power in the realm of England, was to unite to his own power the influence of the Lutheran reformation against the combination of the arms of Charles and the ecclesiastical influence, as well as the arms, of the Pope. But the stand taken by Henry did not stop with denouncing the Pope, and rejecting his ecclesiastical supremacy, and the Roman Catholic faith as the national religion. It became for a time the policy, not only of Henry, but many of his successors, to deny to the Roman Catholic citizen not only the right to hold office, to acquire and hold property, but even the benefit of the laws, to some extent, for his personal security. Not very creditable prohibitions, we would say, at this day. But it was not merely the Roman Catholic and the Roman Catholic faith that met with a repulse in England; other religious denominations, through whom nothing fatal to the interests of the State was to be feared, met with treatment but little more favorable. For many ages the Jews were compelled to purchase religious privileges at an enormous expense. Under the reign of Henry the Second, and the beginning of the reign of Edward the Third, the Jews paid to those monarchs in less than seven years the almost incredible (at that time) sum of more than four hundred and twenty thousand pounds sterling for no other consideration than the rights of conscience in the island of Great Britain. Notwithstanding the exaction and the payment of that oppressive tribute, the Jews, in the reign of the same Edward, to the number of upwards of fifteen thousand, were banished the realm, and were never permitted to return until Oliver Cromwell admitted them.

The tragedy attending their banishment was a disgraceful stain upon the reign in which it was ordered, a brutal violence, unworthy of any age, and a black and damning spot on England's character, which time can never efface.

On their banishment, the richest of them, having put themselves, with their treasure, in a ship of large burden; when the ship was under sail, and got down the Thames towards the mouth of the river, and below Juinsborough, the master of the ship confederating and conspiring with the mariners, invented a stratagem to destroy them. The master commanded anchor to be cast, which was done, and the ship kept riding at anchor until at the ebb of the sea, she laid on the sand. The master and his criminal confederates enticed the Jews to walk with them on the sand for their health and recreation, which they did. When the master had understood the tide had risen, he and his associates stole away from them, and got back to the ship. The Jews made no haste, for they were not sensible of their danger, nor the plot which was laid for their destruction. But when they perceived the peril they were in, they cried aloud for help. The master, in taunt and provocation, answered that now was the time to try the power and truth of their religion; they ought rather to cry to Moses, by whose conduct their fathers passed through the Red sea: in a short time they were swallowed up and drowned.

It may be said that the extravagant and oppressive exactions made upon the Jews, their banishment, and the tragedy which I have related was more the result of religious persecution than the exercise of civil power in England. That might have been the case to some extent, but the Church and State were united. The whole proceeded from the principle and spirit which would proscrib[e] foreigners from the enjoyment of political rights in this country. I believe that legal and constitutional disqualifications in all the States or kingdoms of Europe exist against the admission of foreigners to the enjoyment of political, and, to some extent, to legal rights. I am not prepared to say but but what that may be necessary to a certain extent, owing to the contiguity of one kingdom to another, and to the facility with which treasonable plots may be conducted through the medium of speedy intercourse, and the rapidity with which they may overspread a whole kingdom. No such reasons exist with us, our remote distance from all powers, the wide spread of our country and Government, to say nothing of the independence of our several State Governments, which are checks on each other, and the whole a check upon the Federal Government, must ever prevent any individual influence from foreigners dangerous to the stability of our Government. The attempt is hardly possible; or, if ever made, will be nugatory. If, in Europe, a citizen moves from one State to another, he moves but from one land of oppression to another; and the only object he could have to engage in a treasonable plot, or conspiracy, would be to restore liberty; but when he comes to our country, he gains the object which in Europe might incite him to treason.

I repeat, that the restraints thrown around the elective franchise to deprive foreigners of the right of citizenship, and the efforts now making by the Federalists and the "Native American Associations," are directed against the German and Irish emigrants who seek a home with us. Such is the secret understanding and the open declaration, when declarations are made. And here let me ask, what would induce a German or an Irishman to enter into a conspiracy to overthrow a Government of free institutions, to which he has fled for safety and protection? What would induce either to enter into a secret negotiation with the Government from which he has fled because of its tyranny, oppression, and despotism? Sir, the thing is impossible, and not more impossible than fruitless, if attempted. But when was the time, or where the place, or what the emergency, that the Germans and the Irish have not shown themselves worthy of the rights of American citizens? When have they not, in time of peace, done all that has been required of them in support of the Government? When has been the occasion they have not been foremost in danger and peril when called on by their country? In peace they are the most industrious, hardy, honest, and virtuous citizens we have, take them as a body. Firm to their adopted country, and faithful to her free institutions, as they periled a tempestuous ocean, and encountered the afflictions of a separation from a native home, and the graves of their fathers, for a strange land, in search of freedom, so have they ever manifested a ready willingness to spill their blood, and risk their lives, in defence of that freedom which they have found here. Can you point to the standard of liberty which the Germans and the Irish have not mingled their blood to erect?

Sir, if it is urged as a reason by the Federalists and the Native American Associations, that the stability of our free institutions require that the Germans and the Irish should be disfranchised, I could refer them to some other classes of our foreign population, from whom there is much more danger to be apprehended. I could also refer them to some other influences, subjections, and connections, still more dangerous to the liberties of this people, and the free institutions of this country. I mean the moneyed influence of a British aristocracy, to which we are now unfortunately connected, and by which we are subjected to the payment of an interest on about two hundred millions of dollars, called State debts, and about thirty or forty millions of British bank capital. This is an unhappy and an unfortunate connection, because it is an oppressive tax and a drain upon the honest labor of this country. That is bad, but it is not the worst. The worst is, that it brings a foreign moneyed aristocratic influence, through the medium of our banking, commercial, and mechanical institutions to bear, not only to the corruption of our elective franchise and the ballot-box; but upon every political and civil institution in our country. Not only has the ermine been sullied, and the judgment seat been contaminated, but the sacred desk and the pulpit have been polluted with that influence. Yes, sir, by that corrupt influence some of those who claim to be ministers of the Gospel, ambassadors of our Saviour, and Heaven's bearers of despatches and glad tidings, standard bearers of the holy cross, and those who minister the holy sacraments, have prostrated themselves from that high and lofty station to which none but Apostles, and ministers ordained by Heaven's sanction, should presume to ascend—even some of them, I say, by that influence, have prostrated themselves at the shrine of British Bank corruptions and political iniquity. In place of obeying the commands of their Divine Master, in teaching the way of salvation to a dying world, they have been playing the political missionary! In place of leaving witness of the truth of his holy religion, they have been endorsing all the base, false, and infamous slander and detraction which was propagated to the overthrow of this Administration—slander and detraction worthy of the distempered brain of the reckless, political, desperado, the heart of corruption and the tongue of poison.

I cheerfully recognise the right of every individual in the community to exercise the rights of a freeman. But while I hold sacred the names of Christian minister and apostle, I deem it a duty I owe to the holy religion by which I hope for redemption and salvation in the world to come, to denounce the man who will abuse it as unworthy to be its professional advocate. Yes, sir; some of them have even been found participating with, and mingling in, the miserable, drunken Federal orgies, that would have disgraced a bacchanalian feast in the most degraded days of Greece. Such men are made for the tables of money-changers, not for casting out devils. They may grace a gambler's board, but they would pollute a temple. For the honor of the holy religion of our fathers, and the sacred names of minister and apostle, I hope there were not many who so disgraced themselves, their name, and the religion which it is their profession to teach; but there were some. They will be marked, and made the subject of moral and religious condemnation while they live, and wherever they go. But more of this some other time. Yes, that is the influence our Government and our free institutions have to fear. It is the influence of a British moneyed aristocracy, united with the worthless, penniless, Federal drones in our own country, who live upon the sweat and toil of those they seek to disfranchise. That, I repeat, is the influence we have to fear. It is an influence which is now undermining our free institutions, prostrating our Republican principles, sapping the foundations of our Government, subverting our liberties and establishing among us a rotten borough British bank policy, overspreading our country with irresponsible corporations, and erecting among us a rag baron aristocracy. Sir, it is to foster such a policy and to perpetuate such influences, that the honest and faithful German and Irishman must be disfranchised and forever cut off from the rights of American citizens. But, sir, independent of the obligations that the foreign blood which was poured out in the Revolution brings us under to admit foreigners to the rights of citizenship, there is an intrinsic value and worth in our German and Irish population, which entitle them to our confidence and to full political privileges. Where are our public works, which we call the proud monuments of our country's enterprise, which have not been almost exclusively erected or constructed by Irish and German toil? It is by their patience, their sweat, and their industry, that our Union is linked and bound by the indissoluble ties of turnpikes, railroads, canals, and other State and national improvements. But to the disgrace of our country, and the dishonor of our national character and reputation how often have the patient labor and the honest toil of the German and the Irishman met a reward in the filthy and worthless rags of our swindling banking institutions, which could serve them no purpose beyond the day's maintenance. And let me here acknowledge, that one object I have in amending the naturalization laws, is to procure the whole and the united influence of our German and Irish Democracy, to assist in overthrowing that miserable, fraudulent, and corrupt paper system which rewards honest toil with the ragged promises of bankrupt banks and rotten and irresponsible corporations, which hang upon the prospects of this country, and the industry of every honest man, like a millstone. I desire to put it in the power of every German and every Irishman to do his part to overthrow a system of policy and of institutions which now enables swarms and herds of lazy, lounging, hungry Federal wolves to sap the life blood of honest and industrious society—to overthrow a system which enables the few to array themselves more gaudily than Solomon, in all his glory, though they toil not, neither do they spin; while the many are compelled to toil in sweat and labor in dust, from the time they enter the stage of human action until their exit, for a scanty maintenance. I seek to establish and confirm the political rights of our German and Irish population now and in all time to come, that we may have the benefit of their political aid, to establish a system by which they shall meet an honest and valuable reward, in a sound currency, for their honest and valuable toil.

I need not state a fact that is universally known, and that is, that a large majority of our English population are opposed, and always have been, to the Democratic party. (There are many worthy exceptions. There are many who are an honor to the Democratic party. I speak with reference to those exceptions.) They have, in all our political struggles, been found in the ranks of the Federal party, for reasons which they best understand, and which are, no doubt, satisfactory to them. Their countrymen took a share in the Revolution. They also took a share in the formation of our political system. It is the benefit of our simple Republican institutions which our English population have sought, because, under them, liberty can be enjoyed to more certainty, and to a greater extent, than in the country which they have left. Why they so universally unite themselves with a party whose cardinal object is to overthrow our equal institutions, and prostrate the rights of all foreigners, they can best answer. I have been unable to account for it. I hope some day they will learn who their friends are. I hope some day they will learn the importance of supporting the party who support them, and the purity of the institutions which they have sought, and to which they look for equal protection. I hope they will find out that it is their interest which the Democracy seek to secure, by sustaining a policy calculated to secure the greatest good to the greatest number; and whatever that policy may be worth, they will have an equal share of it. If, however, they cannot unite with the Democracy, perhaps they may find safety with the "Native American Associations," whose principles and political motives, and the materials of which they are composed, I would respectfully recommend them to examine.

But what is still more extraordinary in politics our Scotch population are generally opposed to the Democracy. I regret this not only from political but from personal and national considerations. I am from a full blooded Scotch stock; and if I have my pedigree correct, I am of the pure Highland blood. There is no one of the race of man that I more delight to meet than an intelligent Scotchman. I delight to hear his rapturous strains of eulogy in honor of his country, her wisdom, her learning, and her morality, for which she is so renowned. I delight to hear him bestow the praise due to the Scotch clans, and the bravery of their chiefs. I delight to hear him praise the gallantry and noble daring by which Scotland's Wallace and Scotland's Bruce, so long and so successfully repelled Britain's invasions and Britain's oppressions, by acts of noble daring, of which none can boast but Scotland. Wallace with a small band, (but of braver men than ever did, before, or since march against an enemy), routed forty thousand of Britain's troops, and slew their leader on one occasion. I delight to see indignation bloom upon the brow, and blush from every feature of the Scotchman, while he relates the treacherous surrender of Wallace to Edward, and the worse than brutal manner in which he was executed, and his quartered body exposed and hung up in the four principal towns of England to gratify a brutal malignity towards Scotland, worthy alone of barbarity in its most degraded form. But why is it, Mr. Scotchman, that no sooner do you land here than you throw yourself in the arms of a party who seek not only to deprive you of the rights of freemen, but are exerting themselves to establish a system of policy and of institutions as fatal to liberty and as destructive of equal rights, as that from which you have fled. Why is it that you, or a large majority of your countrymen, like our English population, are found in all our political struggles arrayed against the Democracy. If it would not be considered temerity in me, I would, in the name, and as the representative of my Scotch fathers, admonish you as you appreciate the freedom you have sought, to rally to the support of the party who ever have, and who are now, exerting themselves to secure to you the rights of freemen and American citizens. While alluding to the politics of foreigners in this country, permit me to advert to the late gallant though unsuccessful efforts of the Canadian patriots to shake off the British yoke in those Provinces, and I only do it to illustrate the fact that the Democracy in this country were united in a favorable feeling towards the patriots, and in an ardent desire that they might succeed in establishing their independence, while the Federal party were as united in feeling against them, and were unsparing in their abuse of them. I have Federal journals in my possession to show the fact. The patriots in Canada are called Whigs. The Scotch in Canada belong to the patriots. The Federal party in this country call themselves Whigs. The Scotch in this country belong (or a large majority of them) to the Federal party. The term Whig in Canada has a different meaning from the same term in this country, and if names are the representatives of things, the term Whig will be found in Canada to represent one thing, and in this country to represent another.

The term Whig in Canada means one who is desirous of abolishing British bondage. In this country the term Whig means one who is in favor of perpetuating British bondage. It is strange that the same word should have a meaning so different with those who speak the same language. And it is strange, too, that Scotch patriotism should mean one thing in Canada, and another thing, the very reverse, in this country. For my part, I prefer the Canadian definitions of Whig and Scotch patriotism. I go for the Whigs and Scotch patriots of Canada. I am much attached to the term Whig; but I think the term as applied to the Federalists of this country is a misnomer. From what intelligence I can gather from the history of parties in this country, I think the Federal principles smack more of Toryism, as understood in the days of the Revolution, and as now understood in Canada, than they do of the ancient, the revered, and patriotic term Whig. I hope the patriots will renew their efforts whenever a prospect of success is presented. They will succeed with half a chance. Go on, then, I say: Justice and patriotism is on your side; and though the odds may seem to be fearful against you, the strength you must gain in a good and a just cause, having for its object the omnipotence of human liberty, the highest object of human aspiration, will eventually redeem you. The laws of nations, the stipulations of treaties, and perhaps national policy, may prevent the American Democracy from taking an open part with you; but you have their feelings and their ardent wishes. I have but little regard myself for the restraints which may prevent American interference in behalf of the patriots. If I possessed the power of Midas, to turn every thing I touched to gold, I would soon furnish the patriots with the means of emancipation; or if I had the power of ancient Jove, with Vulcan at my command to forge thunder bolts, I would demolish every British institution, every British authority, and every British Tory in Canada, in one hour. But, sir, I did not rise to talk about Canadian wars, or English and Scotch politics—I rose to advocate an amendment of the naturalization laws, with a view to secure, at a cheap rate, and with a shorter residence, the rights of American citizens, and the full benefits of our free institutions to all foreigners, without regard to country, or distinction of party.

This is neither the time, the place, nor the occasion, to discuss party principles, nor is it the time or place to solicit party influence. If it were, I would like to indulge in an appeal to our foreign population, to rally, now, henceforth, and forever, to the standard of Democracy and equal rights. I would advise them to turn upon their enemies, who are endeavoring to crush them to the dust. A spirit of resentment, and the means of defence, are principles of nature, and attributes of Creation's family—from man, who was made in the image of his maker, to the insect that crawls in the dust. It is a principle of nature, too, by which each order and class of created animation resists, to the extent of its means, injuries that threaten its peace and safety. Shall man, then, be less spirited than the worm, that turns upon the foot that treads it?

It is now the united effort of the Federal party and of the Native American associations (twin brothers and worthy of each other) to sink the foreigner into contempt and political infamy. But they do not stop at political proscription; they seek to deprive them of other rights. It was but the other day, in the Senate, when the pre-emption bill was under consideration, that a motion was made by a Federalist to deprive the foreigner of the benefit which the pre-emption policy has ever secured to those who settle on our wild lands. That motion was sustained by the Federal members of the Senate, but was successfully resisted by the Democratic members. I would call upon the foreigner in the name of that spirit of resentment, and by the use of those means which the free institutions of our country have made his, to turn upon those who are endeavoring to make him a beast of burden, not only by stripping him of all the political privileges which characterize the freeman, but also by the establishment of institutions which, if successfully persisted in, must one day subvert American liberty, and sink the hardy and industrious freemen of this country into submissive vassalage to a bank aristocracy. I would appeal to them (the foreigners) as they value that liberty they have sought, and as they fear and abhor that oppression, tyranny and despotism from which they have fled, to rally to the standard of Democracy; in the name of the foreign blood which mingled in the Revolutionary struggle, I would appeal to them to be found at all times in our political battles under the flag of Democracy; for there is no other by which they can secure to themselves—to their posterity and their countrymen who are to come after them—the liberties which that Revolution purchased.

But, sir, if party attachments and political confidence were to have their sway with me in an appeal to foreigners, and that appeal were proper, I would say to the German, as he reveres the memory of DeKalb, and as he appreciates his gallant services in the cause of human liberty, and as he holds sacred his blood, which was drank by the soil he has adopted for his home—as he values the freedom which was the consideration of that blood and those services—to stand by the Democracy as the only security, the only hope, the only sheet anchor of safety by which that freedom is to be perpetuated.

I would say to the Irishman, as he too holds sacred the blood of his countrymen, which was shed in the Revolution—as he holds sacred the memory of Emmett, who was sacrificed on his country's altar for Irish liberty—as he abhors and detests the oppression which crushes his country under the foot of British despotism—and as he values the liberty which he has sought, that he too should be in our political battles, under the banner and in the ranks of Democracy. The blood of Montgomery, spilt upon the heights of Quebec, demand for the Irishman American liberty. The spirit of Emmett, which walks abroad in midday, though unseen, secretly admonishes the Irishman to maintain with his life our Democratic institutions in their pristine purity. The voice and admonitions of O'Connell, that glide with every breeze across the Atlantic, warn the Irishman that he should stand by the party and the principles that stand by him; that he should be found whenever and wherever his vote and his influence may be required to overthrow a party who are exerting themselves to overthrow him and to sink his countrymen into political degradation.

I have used the names of Pulaski and Kosciusko. They are sacred names, and are identified with human liberty and human bravery. Pulaski was a native of Poland, and a soldier who had distinguished himself by brave but unsuccessful efforts to restore liberty and independence to his native country. He came to this country during the Revolution, bearing with him a high and meritorious character. He was appointed Brigadier General in the American army. He was mortally wounded in the attack on Savannah, of which he soon after died. Congress voted to erect a monument to the memory of that brave officer; but I believe it never was done.

Kosciusko was a Pole by birth, and was educated at the military school at Warsaw. He came to the United States with a recommendation to Gen. Washington from Benjamin Franklin, with whom he had formed an acquaintance in France. He was appointed an aid by Gen. Washington. He was afterwards appointed an Engineer, with the rank of Colonel. He fortified the camp of Gen. Gates in his campaign against Burgoyne. He performed many high and valuable services, for which he received the thanks of Congress. At the close of the Revolution he returned to his native country, bearing with him a nation's gratitude. Poland was in revolution. He was appointed a Major General. He fought many battles with great skill and bravery, but Poland then failed, owing to the mismanagement of her Diet. On the breaking out of a new revolution in 1794, he was appointed Generalissimo, with the power of Dictator. He conducted with courage, ability and adroitness, but was finally overpowered by the Russian troops, made prisoner, and carried to St. Petersburg, where he was confined until the death of Catharine. When Paul came to the throne he was released, and loded with honors. He was offered an office in the Russian service; that he declined. The Emperor offered him his own sword; but Kosciusko said "No, I no longer need a sword, since I have no country." Such an answer was worthy of a Pole, worthy of a patriot, worthy of Kosciusko. But Kosciusko was not the only Pole who could give such an answer. Colonel Klimkiewicz, in a subsequent revolution was made pioneer, and confined in the dungeon at Kamienice Podolski. He was visited by the policeman, who had orders to offer him a bribe of freedom and imperial honors, if he would reveal the names of those who belonged to the secret societies called the "Patriotic Societies." The gallant Pole met the base proposition with a retort becoming a patriot, and one who is worthy of the blood of Kosciusko.

"Retire, miscreant! Thou who grovellest at the feet of thy Ministers! How dar'st thou present thyself before an honest patriot? Thou base-born wretch! forget not that in my veins flows the blood of the illustrious Thadæus Kosciusko; and know that an approving conscience is dearer to me than all else in this world. Retire, I say; I love my country—I love and appreciate the rights of man; and remember, I am not of thy damnable profession, that I should betray either. Leave me, then, to groan in this dungeon, and mourn over the recollection of the wailings and lamentations of those unhappy mothers, under the reign of your modern Nero. Retire forever, thou vile slave of a tyrant! I was examined and condemned by my judges. Thou had'st no right to present thyself, with such base proposals, opposed as they are, not only to virtue, but also to the laws of the Russian empire. Sir, I am a free citizen of Volhynia, and know the laws of thine own country better than thou dost, a vile servant of it, as thou art. Retire, I say!"

Sir, I have read this noble and patriotic retort. I will make it a part of my printed remarks, with a hope that it may be taught with the first lessons of youth; because, as the child is taught to lisp the name of his Heavenly Father in hallowed reverence, so should he be taught to lisp such sentiments in patriotic devotion, honor, and love to his country. That gallant Pole is now a resident of this country. Who is not proud to have him with us? Who does not greet him a welcome guest? His presence is a national honor, worthy of national boast. He is here, ready to march with the American standard when peril may invite him or invasion call him. Such is his noble nature, and such is his promise. At one of our festivals he was called to his feet by a sentiment. He responded, and said, among other things, in thrilling eloquence: "My heart is for Poland, but my arms are for America." What American will deny to the Pole the rights and franchise of an American citizen? Is there one, that man should be stripped of the name of an American, and consigned to Russian despotism. Such a man is only fit himself for a slave.

Sir, the well known history of Baron Steuben, and the services he rendered in the Revolutionary struggle, supercedes the necessity of my naming him. It is sufficient to say he was a Prussian by birth. He was a pilgrim in the cause of liberty. He was a distinguished officer of the Revolution. He fought in the battle of Monmouth, and was commander in the trenches in Yorktown on the day that concluded the contest with Great Britain. The countrymen of Steuben have a claim to the rights of American freemen. But why do I select and call particular nations. The glorious principles of Democracy makes no distinction with the homeless exile. It recognizes the rights of all who have the human form, who seek protection among us. It repudiates, in the broadest manner that intolérant spirit which now marks the Federal party and the "Native American Associations." Democracy meets at our shores the exiled pilgrim; greets, hail, and welcomes him to her hospitality, and a full participation in her free institutions. Mr. Speaker, let me conclude by saying that human rights, the spirit of liberty, the character of our Government, the meaning of our Constitution, the nature of our free principles, and I believe the stability and duration of our Democratic institutions, all unite in requiring that as liberal and as generous a policy should be exercised towards foreign emigrants as that which this bill provides. It extends no privileges which can endanger our country. It contains no provisions but what a generous policy will at all times recognise as just—none but what a liberal and highminded patriotic community will approve and sustain—none but what the foreign blood spilt in the Revolution, and consecrated to human liberty, demands.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. TRIPLETT,

OF KENTUCKY,

In the House of Representatives, February 2, 1841—
On the bill providing for an issue of Treasury notes.

MR. TRIPLETT rose and said: Mr. Chairman, the best return I can make for any attention which the committee may give to me during the remarks I have to submit upon this momentous subject will be to consume as small a portion of its time as the duty which I owe to my constituents and to myself will permit. This I promise to do. I shall, therefore, decline following the gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] in his dissertations upon log cabins and Whig principles. I am rather inclined to think that the gentleman knows as little about Whig principles as he does of log cabins. If he would visit the latter a little oftener, possibly he might learn what Whig principles are, and learn to love them. If, however, Gen. Harrison, when he arrives here, should think proper to adopt the advice of that gentleman, and, instead of taking possession of the White House at the other end of the avenue, should take up his abode in the log cabin at the foot of the hill, (pointing to the West,) I would advise the gentleman to visit him there; and he might then possibly learn, through the rough, rude metre of a log cabin song, something of those maxims which, I hope and believe, will guide General Harrison in his administration of the affairs of this Government. One of these metres, I recollect, reads in this way:

"No Prices, or Swartwouts, or such deceivers, Shall be appointed Cash Receivers;
And no man what is given to grubbin,
Shall ever enter this Log Cabin."

If Kinderhook, senior, who now inhabits the White House, had practised some of these log cabin principles, it is possible that he might have been re-elected to the Presidency; and then it might have been possible that my friend from New York would have consented to be a candidate for election. I understand that he declines to be so. He will, therefore, have two years' leisure before him. I advise him in the interim to visit some of the log cabins of the West; where, perchance, he might meet with a stern reply to some of his insinuations about British bank-bought Whigs, and the influence of British gold in the "recent election." That is also reduced to metre—rough, it is true, but as strong as it is rough. It is as follows:

"A Kentuckian's vote can never be bought,
Try it who may, or can;
All the British gold that ever was told,
Can't buy one honest man."

If one hundred and sixty thousand voters were purchased by British gold to vote for General Harrison, or, to use the gentleman's own classical expression, for "Tip and Ty," I take it for granted that those voters could not have been Whigs. The Whigs intended to vote for those names without British gold; and if British gold has been employed in buying up Democratic votes, the gentleman from New York must blame his Democratic friends for being so easily purchased.

But, Mr. Chairman, the brief space of time I have before me warns me that I must not follow the gentleman from New York, through his "poetry in prose." By the by, it appeared, from some of the observations of the gentleman, that he cherishes an extraordinary hatred against poetry. He says that his colleague [Mr. BARNARD] wrote a book of poetry; and that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] wrote another. Now, there is this difference between the poetry and prose of these two gentlemen, and the "poetry in prose" of the gentleman from New York; they put their poetry in a book by itself: it does not appear in their speeches. But the gentleman from New York puts his poetry and prose so promiscuously together, that it is beyond the power of the poor alembic of my wits to separate them. Yes, and the log cabin men of the West could not understand his poetry any more than they could his Latin. His insinuations, however, some of them might understand and repel in a way not much to his liking. But, let me now come to his facts, figures, and arguments, for it is with them that my business lies.

The first fact with which the gentleman sets out is a most extraordinary one; it is, that a cry of a national debt has been raised by the Whig party, in order to justify an extra session of Congress. Now, I have never seen so much misrepresentation crammed into so short a sentence. There are in it two remarkable misstatements. First, he begs the question that the Whig party wish an extra session; and upon that gratuitous assumption he grounds the position that there is no national debt. It is a sort of negative pregnant. I deny for myself; I deny in behalf of the Whig members of this House; I deny in behalf of a large portion of the Whig members of the other branch of Congress with whom I have conversed; I say, I deny that there is one solitary member in or out of this House who desires that there should be an extra session, unless it be demanded by imperious necessity. We may be driven to that alternative to prevent other and greater evils. An extra session is an evil to be deprecated; we all acknowledge that. But there are other and still greater evils to be apprehended, and it may be necessary to adopt the lesser evil that we may avoid the greater. One of these greater evils I now come to speak of. It is this: that it is absolutely necessary for this Government to preserve our national honor and protect our national faith by paying our national debts. I ask gentlemen of the opposite party to lend me their aid for the accomplishment of this great object; I require it of them; I know some of them are sincere in their desire to do so. I know that the very respectable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. JONES] is sincere; and that he does not wish Gen. Harrison to be driven to the necessity of calling an extra session; for it is upon the President the responsibility is thrown by the Constitution, of convening both Houses of Congress, when, in his opinion, the public exigencies require it; and I ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and his friends, to attend to me for a few moments, whilst I point out the means by which that necessity can be avoided.

I have prepared a short table, to which I beg leave to call the especial attention of the committee, by which I think I shall be able to demonstrate, that unless the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and the party with which he is acting interpose promptly, an extra session will be inevitable.

What is the state of your Treasury? That is the first matter which will naturally attract the attention of the new President. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, transmitted on the tenth day of December last, stated that there would be found in the Treasury on the first day of January, 1841, a surplus of $1,580,855. That was the estimate; that was the prophecy. Now let us ascertain to what extent this estimate or this prophecy has been verified by the event. Why are we now in committee? Is it not for the very purpose of raising the ways and means to pay off part of the debts contracted previous to that time, and which the Treasury has no means of paying, notwithstanding the balance estimated to be in the Treasury on that day? What has become of that balance? The truth is, it never was there. But let me go back. I have prepared a table, showing the present state of the Treasury, taking every word of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to be true, for the purpose of showing that, taking the extraordinary receipts and extraordinary expenditures of the years 1840 and 1811, the extraordinary means which will be required in 1841 to meet appropriations already made by Congress will be upwards of $9,000,000 greater than the extraordinary expenditures of 1840; thus:

Ordinary receipts of 1840 -	$17,197,763 00
Balance in Treasury
1st January .	$2,246,749 00
Extraordinary receipts .	8,790,000 00
	$11,036,749 00

26TH CONG....2ND SESS.

Treasury Note Bill—Mr. Triplett.

H. of Reps.

Total receipts of 1840	28,234,512 00
Ordinary expenditures for 1840	22,489,349 51
Extraordinary expenditures for 1840	4,154,306 62
Total expenditures of 1840	26,643,656 12
From extraordinary receipts in 1840 of	11,036,749 00
Deduct extraordinary expenditures in 1840	4,154,306 62
Leaving a balance in favor of the Treasury in 1840, of	6,882,442 38
Ordinary receipts of 1841 estimated at	22,580,000 00
Extraordinary receipts	662,618 00
Estimated balance in the Treasury 1st January, 1841	1,580,855 00
	$2,243,473 00
Total receipts of 1841 estimated at	24,823,473 00
Ordinary expenditures for 1841 estimated at	19,250,000 00
Extraordinary expenditures for 1841 estimated, but created by acts of 1840	4,692,800 00
Deduct extraordinary receipts in 1841	2,243,473 00
Leaving a balance against the Treasury in 1841 of	2,253,373 06
Add the balance in favor of the Treasury in 1849	6,882,442 38

Making a difference of $9,135,815 38 in favor of 1840; that is to say, taking the extraordinary expenditures thrown upon 1841, and the extraordinary means furnished to pay them by Congress, and the expenditures thrown upon 1840, and the means furnished to pay them by Congress, and there is a difference between the extraordinary receipts and expenditures of 1840 and 1841 of the sum of $9,135,815 38; and if the ordinary receipts and ordinary expenditures of the two years are the same, there must eventually be a deficiency in the revenue to that amount.

[While Mr. TRIPLETT was commenting on the item of $1,580,855, estimated as the balance which the Secretary of the Treasury supposed would be in the Treasury—

Mr. JONES rose and said, Mr. Chairman, with the leave of the gentleman from Kentucky, I will explain.

Mr. JONES's remarks were indistinctly heard by the Reporter; but he was understood to say that $1,580,855 was only an estimate by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the data on which that estimate was founded were given in another part of the document, &c.]

Mr. TRIPLETT. I will come to that part of the document by and by, and I will show, if I understand the matter, that those $1,580,855 consisted in Treasury notes, subsequently issued. I have, however, construed this table upon that report, but I have also constructed another, which shows that things are even worse.

One of the reductions of five per cent. on the amount of duties levied on imports takes place in 1841. Yet the Secretary of the Treasury estimates the amount to be received from customs in that year at $19,000,000, while the actual receipts of the first three quarters of 1840 were only $10,687,884 79, to which, if you add one-fourth more for the fourth quarter, you have the sum of $13,362,365 98. Would it not have been fair for the present Secretary of the Treasury, when making an estimate for his successor, to have supposed that the increased prosperity of the country, and other favorable causes, would not have been greater than sufficient to counterbalance the reduction of five per cent. in the revenue provided for by the compromise act? I have taken that as the basis on which I have constructed this second table, thus: The ordinary revenue of 1840, from all sources, was $17,179,763

The ordinary expenditures of every kind were 22,489,349
Showing that the revenues or receipts did not meet the expenses by 2,291,586
Add the difference, as shown by the first table, of the extraordinary expenditures above the extraordinary receipts thrown upon 1841 . 2,253,373

And you have the sum of $4,544,959

Which you must provide for, (unless you intend to go on adding to your national debt,) in addition to the $10,549,955 of outstanding appropriations, which you are now creating a debt of $5,000,000 Treasury notes to pay in part.

This brings me to reply briefly to the argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] who, I think, has totally misapprehended the Secretary of the Treasury in his estimates. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he said that only the sum of $3,749,904 of the $10,549,955 of the outstanding appropriations would be required to be expended in 1841. This was his assertion; and, at the time he made it, I turned my head back and told him he was mistaken. He then repeated the assertion, but it is most assuredly wrong, for both the sums of $6,661,123 and $3,749,904 will be required for the service of the year 1841. To show this, I call the attention of the committee to the construction of the sentence in the report. The true meaning of the Secretary can only be ascertained by distinctly tracing out to what the word "them," which occurs three times in the sentence, has reference. The sentence reads as follows:

"The Departments calculate that $6,661,123 of the old appropriations will be required to complete the purposes originally contemplated by them."

"They propose to apply about $3,749,904 of them to the service of the ensuing year, without re-appropriation; and the residue, amounting to $138,576, it is expected, will go to the surplus fund. They estimate the whole of them, at the close of the year, to be $10,549,955."

What do those three *them*s refer to? Certainly to appropriations already made by Congress; and, to pay them, money must be placed in the Treasury by Congress, or they must go unpaid. The construction I have given to the sentence is most certainly correct, as any gentleman may see who will turn to the table at the back of the Secretary's report. The left hand column commences thus:

"Amounts required to complete the service of the present and former years, though they may not be called for until after the close of the year 1840."

"Not being called for," (continued Mr. T.) that is to say, the drafts not being presented until after 1840, the money must be in the Treasury after 1840 to meet these drafts, or else the Treasury is bankrupt. Gentlemen, I suppose, will acknowledge that. And what is the amount? Instead of being $3,749,000, it is $6,661,123 52 in addition, making $10,411,027, appropriated in 1840 and in previous years, but which has to be paid in 1841.

Now, let us turn back for a moment and see of what the item of $3,749,000 is composed. It is composed of amounts which will "not be required for the service of the present year, and which may therefore be applied in aid of the service of 1841." In aid! Appropriations applied in aid of the Treasury in 1841! It is not necessary that the money should be re-appropriated, but it is necessary that the money should be in the Treasury to pay these appropriations. Therefore, this sum of $3,749,000 is as necessary to be in the Treasury as the sum of $6,000,000 and odd. Is not this palpable? Will it not be called for in 1841? Certainly. And what are your means to pay it? I, for one, taking this document furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury as true, do not see how the means are to be in the Treasury to pay the drafts drawn upon it under laws already passed by Congress. Suppose that, immediately after General Harrison enters upon the administration of the Government, not possessing this cabalistic power "to postpone, by subsidiary contracts," payments for work done or services rendered, as we are informed has been heretofore done at Old Point Comfort—not desiring to exercise the power which we are told has been exercised at Boston under the present Administration, where you are building a custom-house without paying your hands, but postponing those payments also to the first day of January or first day of April, 1841; suppose, I say, that a draft for these six millions and odd dollars, and for the three millions and odd, should be presented at the Treasury, what means have you provided to pay them? Will the five millions which you propose to raise by this bill meet them? If not, I ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] and his party whether they do not thus compel General Harrison to call an extra session, in order to prevent the faith of the nation from being prostrated both at home and abroad? It is as necessary to pay our debts at home as it is to pay them abroad. And this deficiency in the Treasury is permanent. It is in vain to tell me, when we have now Treasury notes outstanding to the amount of upwards of four millions and a half; when you come here and ask for five millions more by this bill, and when your revenue is annually, regularly, and from natural causes diminishing—I say it is in vain to tell me that this deficiency in the Treasury is not permanent.

How, then, will you remedy it? There is a mode pointed out by the Secretary of the Treasury, (as to which I have a few remarks to make,) and a most extraordinary mode it is. At page 10 of his annual report he says:

"It has already been shown that the whole amount of receipts in 1841 will probably be sufficient to discharge all ordinary expenditures, and those parts of the outstanding debt, funded or unfunded, which may become due. But the preservation of a suitable balance in the Treasury may require more, than what will probably be left after satisfying other purposes."

And then he points out a mode by which this end can be accomplished, as follows:

"The raising of any sum for that object in 1841 could, however, be obviated by authorizing a contract to be made, under proper restrictions, extending the period of payment for a portion of the temporary liabilities falling due in that year."

This (continued Mr. T.) is practising on the Old Point Comfort doctrines again—doctrines which will thus become notorious in the fiscal annals of this nation.

Now, I call upon any candid man to answer this question: Are not all these extensions of payment, in fact, a creation of a national debt? Is it not manifest that, when money is due for work done and material furnished, and you postpone the payment to another year, to that extent you have contracted a debt? The remedy of the Secretary of the Treasury, then, is a national debt. To be sure, he baptizes his child by a different name; but that is an art which may be learned and has been practised in this House, as well as by the Secretary of the Treasury. Names are most significant things now-a-days. The creation of a national debt is called a postponement to a more convenient season of the payment of the public dues.

I now ask attention to the following passage, which immediately follows that I have just read:

"Yet, in the opinion of the undersigned, the best mode of providing for this case would be, without either an extension of this kind, or a loan, or a further issue of Treasury notes, or a change in the tariff, but merely by lessening the appropriations for the service of 1841 below the estimates, or by passing such declaratory clauses as to the present tariff, and such acts as to the public lands, as have heretofore been urged on the consideration of Congress."

Who made these estimates, continued Mr. T.? Did not the Secretary of the Treasury himself make them out according to law? And what did the law require him to do? To make out such estimates as were necessary for the public good, and no more. Is not this an acknowledgment that his own estimates are not absolutely necessary for the public good?

[Mr. JONES here explained, that the estimates for the other Departments were not made out by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that he was not answerable for them, they being made out by the Secretaries of the Navy, War, &c.]

Mr. TRIPLETT. If the gentleman from Virginia is correct, how does he account for this most unexplainable sentence, at page 2 of the Secretary of the Treasury's report? In speaking of the estimates for the fourth quarter of the year 1840, he says:

"Estimates by this Department (though higher by the others) for all expenses during the fourth quarter, $5,000,000."

Here we have the positive admission of the Secretary of the Treasury that the estimates of the other departments have been diminished by him down to his own standard. This, I think, is a complete answer to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. JONES.] The heads of the other Departments said in their estimates what they believed the public service required. The Secretary of the Treasury razes them down to what he says are indispensably necessary for the public service. And yet, in another part of his report, he points out as one of the means which his successors may use to pay off the debt he has created, that they may diminish their appropriations below his estimates. I may, by possibility, be mistaken; I know that the gentleman from Virginia understands these things better than I do. I am but a young member of Congress, and it is only lately that I have turned my attention to this department of our business. But I felt it to be my duty to look into these matters, and I shall do it. I cannot admit that the Secretary of the Treasury is not bound to supervise these estimates, or that he is at liberty to send them here unless he thinks them reasonable and proper.

But to his remedies—and that is a subject in which I feel a deep interest. What is his remedy for the payment of a national debt of four millions and a half of outstanding Treasury notes, in addition to the five millions we are now about to create, and the amount created by the postponement of payments on contracts until some more convenient season? which has already been done in the district of my friend who sits before me, [Mr. MALLORY,] and who, probably, can tell you more of the manner than I can.

The remedy is to reduce the estimates. I have shown that this is a matter of impossibility as regards the coming Administration, because they will not have had time to enter upon such an investigation as will enable them to act understandingly, as the present Secretary of the Treasury might. Why did not he point out the particulars in which the "appropriations could be lessened?" I will point out some particulars in which his estimates ought to have been increased. His sedentary militia in Florida has to be clothed, and fed, and paid, and furnished with ammunition; yet, for all this, no estimates were sent in: yet this, I suppose, is one of the objects in which reduction may be made. Added, then, to those outstanding Treasury notes of four and a half millions, and to the five millions proposed to be raised by this bill, (and for which, I suppose, most of us will vote,) you have the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars for the sedentary militia; and you must add to that the sum of nearly two hundred thousand dollars, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MALLORY] tells us, for due bills issued and payable on the 1st day of January, or 1st day of April, at Old Point Comfort, which have not yet been paid, and for which no estimates have been sent in. Are not these due bills debts which you have succeeded in throwing upon the coming Administration, and which that Administration will be compelled to pay? They must either do so, or they must dishonor your drafts, and say that you have not acted according to law. You must take either one horn of the dilemma or the other. The Secretary of War has already asked an appropriation of two and a half millions, of which this $800,000 is a part, I suppose. Add this, and then you have a debt made up of something like eighteen or twenty millions of dollars, which the next Administration will have to pay. To be sure, some of this debt may not fall on the year 1841; it may fall on the year 1842. But here is the difference; when the heavy item of unappropriated balances fell last year upon 1840, there was a balance in the Treasury of nearly three millions of dollars to commence with; whereas this balance falls upon the year 1841, which finds us with an empty and exhausted Treasury.

What, then, is the remedy? We must fall back on the second plan prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury. There is a permanent national debt. I now seize upon this as an argument in support of the point to which I am now coming, and which is, to show that we must in some measure regulate the tariff. This brings me to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.]

I am in favor—and I think a majority of the Whig party of this House, of the Whig party throughout the Union, and, in fact, a majority of four-fifths of all the people are in favor—of laying upon wines, silks, brandies, laces, and other articles of luxury, at least as high a duty as will raise the revenue sufficient to meet the economical wants of the Government.

I may be told that this is tariff doctrine. Well, to some extent, I am a tariff man. But justice requires that, in raising revenue, the duties be so laid as to be the least felt by the people themselves. I am not going into an argument (for it is unnecessary) to show that a tariff upon wines, silks, laces, and the like articles—things which are not used by one family in a hundred to the extent of a single dollar—can be better borne, and will be more willingly paid, and less felt by the great mass of the people, than a tariff laid, as it is now, upon what are, to some extent, necessities of life.

I am willing and anxious to continue our present tariff of 20 per cent. on protected articles; but I go one step further. Luckily for a particular interest, which is represented on this floor, so far as Kentucky is concerned, by myself and some three or four of my colleagues, and by some twenty members from other States, the present situation of the Treasury and of the tariff laws seems to present a favorable opportunity to remedy the evils under which that interest labors, without coming in conflict with the views of other gentlemen representing the other great interests of the country. The particular interest, to which I have alluded, is the tobacco interest of the United States; the essential interest of five States of this Union, with a population of at least a million and a half. And here I come to reply to a few of the arguments of the gentleman representing the Accomack district, in Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and whom I am glad to see in his seat.

I call his attention now to this question of the tobacco interest, which I in part represent. I say it is oppressed to an extent of which no man in this House has the most distant idea. When I demonstrate to you, as I shall, what that extent is, will you fold your arms in silence? Will you say to us, ground as we are to the dust, "you must still bear your burdens?" Well, I can bear them; my constituents can bear them; but they will gnash their teeth whilst they do so.

What is the situation of the tobacco interest? Let me say to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] that I do not think he has studied this subject as he is wont to study those great national questions which he is compelled to discuss here. He does not represent a tobacco region. He, therefore, has not been compelled, as I have been, to study the subject in all its bearings; he has taken it up incidentally, as a part of his national duties. But it has been the object of my especial inquiry. Let me tell him all the facts, and if his American blood does not stir within him—if his chivalric character is not called into action—if the ire even of the statesman is not aroused, I can only say that I have mistaken the man himself.

The tobacco of the United States, when landed in England, is taxed seventy-five cents per pound, being upwards of eight hundred per cent. on the original cost. Will the gentleman point out to me what other product of the United States is taxed to the same extent in any nation in Europe? I have been asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, why does this tobacco interest stand prominently distinguished from the grain growing or the cotton interest? Let me reply, that cotton, worth twelve cents per pound here, is taxed only four cents in England; while tobacco, worth eight cents per pound here, is taxed seventy-five cents: in other words, the one is taxed 33½ per cent. the other 800 per cent. And my grain-growing and cotton-growing friends can look with great equanimity on the misfortunes of their neighbors. The shoe does not pinch them; and, therefore, they ask why we come here with our complaints—why we held a convention—and why we wish to make this particular interest prominent? The reason is this: if, under the safety-valve tariff of Great Britain, which taxes wheat flour at forty per cent. the grain-growing districts grumble, how much more cause have we to complain when our staple is taxed to the amount of 800 per cent.? Is not the simple statement of this fact sufficient to rouse us into action?

Let us take a look at the other side of this picture. One of the advantages which we expected to derive first from our Confederation, and afterwards from the union of the States, was protection to the commercial interests of every State. Kentucky gave up to the General Government, as did Virginia and all the other States, the power of protecting her agricultural interests abroad. We are, therefore, compelled to appeal to Congress for that protection which we cannot afford to ourselves. Let us see how far this protection is extended to us. What is the amount of our tariff on English imports? Great Britain, as I have shown, receives from us our tobacco at a tax of 75 cents per pound, or 800 per cent. We receive from her fifty-six millions of imports per year, and we tax them at 12½ per cent.; that is to say, she taxes our tobacco sixty times as high as we tax the products of her labor here. Is this fair? Will any high-minded man, whose blood is drawn from the veins of Revolutionary ancestors, submit tamely to this oppression, or say that we ought to do so? I honestly believe that the evil needs only to be understood in this House to be remedied.

But France has served this tobacco interest even worse than England. And here I ask the especial attention of the committee to another fact. France monopolizes the whole of our tobacco trade in the hands of the King, or of those to whom he sells the privilege: this document (House Doc. No. 229, 1st Sess. 26th Cong.) tells us that it is in the hands of Mr. Rogers and six or seven others. How much do they import? In 1839, they imported into France about seven thousand hogsheads. Make the calculation for yourselves. At fifty millions of francs, (something less than ten millions of dollars,) it is a tariff of $1,428 on every hogshead of tobacco; that is to say, these gentlemen pay to the King that sum as a tax on each hogshead.

The gentleman from Virginia says, if we tax French wines and silks, in retaliation for their high tax on our tobacco, we thereby diminish the consumption of these articles, and lessen the means of France to purchase our cotton, rice, and tobacco. It would be a sufficient reply to this argument for me to say that France, by her high taxes and restrictions on our tobacco, diminishes the consumption of that article in France, and lessens our means to purchase her wines and silks; that she commenced this warfare, and continued it for fifty years on her part, against our repeated remonstrances, before we lifted a hand in our own defence. But a full answer to this and all similar objections is furnished by the fact stated by the gentleman himself, that a tax on French wines, brandies, and silks, will diminish their consumption here, notwithstanding his argument, in an earlier part of his speech, to prove that the high tax levied by France on our tobacco did not diminish its consumption there, and was no injury to the American tobacco planter.

When the producers of French wines, brandies, and silks, find the demand for these products of their industry diminishing, they will naturally inquire into the cause, and will learn that, while heretofore their wines were admitted into America at a duty of five cents a gallon, or ten per cent. on their first cost, and their silks duty free, which caused a large amount of these articles to be consumed here, their king taxed American tobacco one dollar a pound, or one thousand per cent. which caused a very small quantity of that article, comparatively speaking, to be consumed in France; that the Americans, to countervail this duty, and cause it to be taken off, had taxed the wines, silks, and brandies of France, which caused a smaller quantity of them to be used there now. What is the next question the French producer of wines and silks would ask, Mr. Chairman? It is this, sir; it is this: What remedy is there for this evil? Is there no honorable method of getting these burdensome duties taken off of these products of our industry? And they will be told it is a part of American policy—a part of the law which put on these duties—that whenever the King of France diminished or took off his duties on American tobacco, the duties are to be diminished in the same proportion, or taken off of French wines, brandies, and silks. And you will quickly hear of conventions similar to ours, and petitions and memorials from the wine and silk-growers of France, calling upon their Chamber of Deputies to abolish the Regie, or monopoly of the tobacco trade, and reduce the duty on that article to a reasonable standard. And here let me remark, Mr. Chairman, that nowhere, not even in this Hall, is public sentiment more quickly felt and answered to than in the French Chamber of Deputies: a million and a half of their constituents never asked in vain for a redress of any grievance.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) read the other day, from a document furnished to him by a friend, some statistics, facts, and arguments, of a different character from what I am in the habit of using, and I called on him then to say from whence that document came, but he declined doing it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I state, upon the authority furnished by our Treasury Department, that our imports from France are much greater than our exports to that country. For example: Taking an average of three years, from October 1, 1835, to September 30, 1838, the annual average of the total amount of importations from France was $25,490,276, while the annual average of the total exports of the United States to France was only $18,804,398, being only three-fourths of the amount of our imports.

But I have other evidence besides this. I yesterday received from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a letter addressed to him by me, the following statement of the amount of imports from and exports to France during the years ending 1838-'9, which I will now read for the information of the gentleman from Virginia and of the committee.

Statement of the amount of imports from and exports to France during the years ending on the 30th September, 1838 and 1839.

Years ending	Value of imports.	Value of exports.
		Domestic produce.	Foreign produce.	Total.
Sep. 30, 1838	$17,771,797	$14,523,414	$1,260,102	$15,783,516

NOTE.—The accounts for 1840 are not complete.
TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Register's office, Jan. 29, 1841.

T. L. SMITH, Register.

I do not know (continued Mr. T.) who furnished the facts and statements relied upon by the gentleman from Virginia; but I do know from whence the arguments came which he read to this committee. And here, for the purpose of making the matter more intelligible, I must go back a little. Strange as it may appear to some gentlemen, this subject of the protection of the American tobacco trade in France early attracted the attention of the American Government. Previous to the formation of the present Constitution, Mr. Jefferson, when Minister to France in the year 1783, brought up this question with a power and earnestness which proved him to be as true an American as he was a great statesman. He pressed it upon the consideration of the French Government until he ultimately compelled it, to some extent, to mitigate the monopoly. And what were the benefits resulting from his efforts? In a single year, so advantageous did this mitigation prove, the importation of tobacco into France increased from eight to thirty-five thousand hogsheads. And yet we are told that no advantage would be gained by doing away with this monopoly. The negotiations between our Minister and the Minister of France on this point ceased with the commencement of the French Revolution. From the year 1791, from which that revolution may be said to date, up to the time when the present dynasty of Bourbons were reinstated on the throne, this question was never agitated; but the very first Minister who was sent to France after that event was instructed to urge on the French Government the absolute and imperious necessity of doing justice to the tobacco trade. That Minister, (Mr. Rives,) in a most powerful document, dictated to some extent, I have no doubt, by our authorities here, urged the matter strenuously upon the French Minister, at that time the Duc de Dalmatia. I will here read a short extract from a communication addressed by the Duc de Dalmatia to the American Minister in 1839; probably the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Wise) may recognise an old acquaintance in it. The gentleman who furnished him (Mr. W.) with his argument extracted it, word for word, from this very communication of the French Minister; and we have here the strange anomaly of an argument made by the French Minister against the interest of the United States being read as an American argument by an American Representative on the floor of this House. I am aware that the gentleman from Virginia, when he read it, did not know the source from which his correspondent had drawn it. He (Mr. Wise) thought it was plausible—and it was, to be sure, the strongest argument which a French Minister could lay his hands upon. I suppose, also, it was the strongest which the correspondent of the gentleman from Virginia could lay his hands upon. It is, however, the translation of a letter written by the Duc de Dalmatia to General Cass. I will read it. It is dated Paris, September 26, 1839, and is as follows:

"You will also observe, General, (and it is an important consideration,) that not only are the tobaccoes of the United States admitted into our ports without being subjected to any duty, but that they are brought there exclusively under the flag of the Union, which thus receives all the advantages in the way of navigation. As for ourselves, we appear in the markets of the Union with the purchasers from all other countries; we pay the same prices which they pay; and our competition combats the more toward keeping up the price in the markets, as our wants (which may always be calculated beforehand) increase every year in a sensible proportion."

I have (continued Mr. T.) taken some trouble to find this document. I thought, when the gentleman from Virginia was speaking, that I remembered the argument; I thought that I had to reply to it before. Whilst the gentleman was yet speaking, I found it, word for word, and letter for letter, in the House document before referred to. And here let me remark, that a part of this argument is founded upon a fact which I acknowledge to be true, but which is wholly deceitful and deceiving. It says that tobacco from America is introduced into France without paying duty. Most wise discovery! The discovery is also made that the King of the French does not tax his own tobacco! True; but he sells to a company the privilege of importing it free of duty for the sum of ten millions of francs, and he suffers them to make all the profit they can. If, therefore, the King were to tax our tobacco, he would lay a tariff upon his own property; but he sells out to seven monopolists the right of selling, importing, and manufacturing tobacco throughout his entire kingdom. In what a position, then, Mr. Chairman, [Mr. BANKS, of Virginia, was in the chair pro tem.] does it place your constituents and mine, when they land this product of our labor in ports abroad? Formerly they carried it there themselves; but they found, when they arrived there, that only one man was permitted to purchase it, and they were compelled to sell it to him at whatever price he chose to purchase it, or reship it to some other port, at the loss of freight and charges. The consequence has been, that, for the space of two or three years past, not one hogshead of American tobacco has been shipped by an American citizen to any port in France, unless you call Mr. Rogers an American citizen. Sometimes, in his communications in the newspapers, he says he is a tobacco planter; probably he may have a farm in Virginia, but it must be a very small portion of his interest.

But the gentleman from Virginia seems to have taken a particular antipathy against this whole subject-matter of tobacco, because he fears we are going for a protective tariff. One word on that point. I wish to see the tobacco interest disconnected from all others; that it may stand prominent here; that the House and the country may see the position it occupies, and the burdens and restrictions which it endures, taxed as it is more than sixty times higher than any other product of our labor. There may be, and probably are, thousands of tobacco planters who are protective tariff men; but, as tobacco planters, we have no connection with that subject, nor do we want a protective tariff for the protection of American interests at home from foreign competition.

We want countervailing duties to force European Kings to do justice to American citizens. And this is the remedy recommended by some of the wisest statesmen of this country, from Thomas Jefferson down to our present Secretary of the Treasury—many of whose opinions I could read to the committee if time would permit. Mr. Jefferson says, emphatically, "When a nation imposes high duties on our productions, or prohibits them altogether, it may be proper for us to do the same by theirs." And in the very document from which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] read long extracts, and praised so highly as the most sensible communication he had ever seen from its author, (Mr. Woodbury,) this doctrine of countervailing duties is acknowledged as legitimate, and recommended. As the gentleman from Virginia did not read this part of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I will supply his omission.

[A gentleman near inquired of Mr. T. What document is that?]

Mr. T. It is a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a plan or permanent change in the tariff, dated January 19, 1841. On the 5th page Mr. Woodbury says:

"And another discrimination, sometimes useful, might be to select those articles in certain cases for an increased impost, not usually exceeding the same limitation which may be proper for countervailing injurious imposts placed on our own productions by any foreign power."

And, some few sentences further, he says:

"Nor can any other country complain with justice, if we counteract their high taxation on any of our products by imposing some corresponding imposts on theirs, and, however unprofitable such conflicts usually prove to all concerned, yet, when such a measure becomes convenient for our own fiscal purposes, or is required by proper self-respect, and is kept within due restrictions as to the amount of duty, it is believed to be entirely justifiable."

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] had seen and read this portion of this document, he must either have changed his opinion as to the correctness of its doctrines, or lost some of his horror of countervailing duties.

Mr. Chairman, several gentlemen around me ask me to define the difference between a protective tariff and countervailing duties. I will do it satisfactorily. A protective tariff is intended for the protection of American industry at home from foreign competition. Is not that a fair definition? Countervailing duties are intended for the protection of American produce abroad from foreign aggression. A protective tariff and countervailing duties are not only not the same thing, but they are to a great extent diametrically opposite things. The one operates at home for the protection of American industry here from foreign competition. Every American statesman may vote for that or not, as his judgment may dictate. The other, countervailing duties, is intended for the protection of American industry abroad from foreign aggression; and I hold that every American statesman, let him come from where he may, is bound to come to the rescue of this and of every other American interest, when unjustly oppressed by foreign Governments. All Greece, from her main land and her hundred islands, poured her armies upon Troy to revenge the injuries of a single individual. All Rome was roused like a lion to take revenge for the death of one of her citizens; and here is an aggravated injury inflicted on a million and a half of American citizens, and we stand here calmly debating whether or not we will extend protection to them. It is a shame. I am compelled, Mr. Chairman, to argue this question thus zealously, in order to obtain the attention of the House to it. What is the spectacle we now present. Look at your own State, because that is deeply interested; your State sends about six out of eighteen thousand hogsheads of this staple to Great Britain. When you land your tobacco there, can you sell it? No. The lion of Great Britain takes a lion's share of the labor of your hands and the sweat of your brow; and he says, You shall give me sixteen thousand hogsheads out of eighteen thousand before I permit you to sell the other two thousand at all in my dominions. This may appear a startling fact to some gentlemen; but it is as true as strange. If we carry four thousand hogsheads from Maryland, the lion of Great Britain lays his huge paw upon them, and says, You shall not sell them till you have given me four-fifths. Will you submit to this? I trust not. This may be an inauspicious moment at which to moot this question. I know that, it being now near the end of Congress, and when it is understood that the tariff of 1832 will have to be revised at the ensuing session, it may be said, Wait, bring your grievances then, and we will hear you. If I could only hear a consoling voice—if I could only be assured that next year, when, from necessity, the tariff must be revised, you would hear us, I would promise, if I could, to meet you here, and claim your attention then. I would demand your attention as a matter of justice, not of favor, to my constituents, and to the constituents of some twenty-eight or twenty-nine other members of this House.

Mr. Chairman, the clock warns me that I have but a few moments remaining. I regret to be thus circumscribed, although I voluntarily imposed a limit upon myself, in order that I might not interfere with the wishes of other members. I regret that it is not in my power to lay before the House some other facts that are in my possession.

[Mr. CARY here rose and said that the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. TRIPLETT) had stated that a duty of 40 per cent. was laid upon wheat in England. He (Mr. C.) wished to know by what rate the gentleman arrived at that conclusion?]

Mr. TRIPLETT. By reference to documents from the Departments. The tariff of Great Britain on wheat and flour rises and falls with the prices of those articles in that country. The object, as apparent from the law, is to keep the price of wheat at 72 shillings per quarter; as it rises above that price, the tariff is reduced; as it falls below it, the tariff is increased. Indeed, the tariff is varied almost every month; therefore, to come to any correct conclusion, you must take a series of months—say 12 months. For a series of three years, the average duty in England upon wheat imported from America was about 40 per cent.; sometimes it rises to 60 or 70 per cent.; sometimes it falls as low as ten; sometimes as low as one shilling per quarter—but can never get lower. But their tariff upon tobacco is a continuing and abiding oppression, without modification, without relief, or the prospect of relief. I call upon this House, I call upon this country, to say whether, when the revision of the tariff laws shall take place, this evil shall not be looked into. We have borne our burdens with a patience which would have done honor to Job himself; and, practised as he was in that virtue, I believe, if he had been a tobacco-planter, he would not have submitted as long as we have done.

Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for the patient hearing they have given me on this occasion. I see that there are many other gentlemen anxious to obtain the floor, and I will therefore yield it now. It is probable that I may avail myself of some future occasion to add something to the remarks I have already submitted on this most interesting topic.

SPEECH OF MR. BRACKENRIDGE. OF PENNSYLVANIA.

House of Representatives, February 3, 1841.—On the bill providing for the issue of Treasury Notes.

Mr. Chairman: No person can feel less desire than I do to throw difficulty in the way of the present Administration, in providing the means for carrying on the Government during the present year. A very small portion of that time, however, belongs to it, and it will not require any great amount of money to enable it to retire with decency, no matter what may become of the Administration which will follow. But, sir, I have very serious objections to the mode of raising money proposed by this bill. The manner of doing a thing may be more important than the thing itself. I regret, therefore, that it is not in my power to vote for the bill on your table.

In the first place, I cannot, consistently with the opinions I have heretofore expressed, vote for the issue of Treasury notes under the present circumstances. They are in truth a loan, a debt, and yet they do not profess to be so. They are not only loans, but loans in the worst form, even if they were not loans in disguise. During the late war, when contending under great disadvantage with a powerful enemy, already oppressed with the heavy debt of the Revolution, and with feeble resources compared to our present ability, the issue of Treasury notes was resorted to. But this was from dire necessity, because we could not effect loans on reasonable terms or in time to meet our pressing wants. And can it be possible that, after more than twenty years of peace, without a public debt, (as the President tells us in his message,) and with national resources augmented beyond any example in history, we are now reduced to the same severe necessity that we experienced during that gloomy period? If it be so, the present Administration must bear the blame. But, sir, although our finances are deranged, our Treasury empty, yet our credit is still sound; we can have no difficulty in borrowing what money we may need, and on better terms, and at less expense, than by the issue of Treasury notes. This latter mode may suit the policy of the Administration which has so studiously labored to disguise the fact of our being in debt, and being obliged to borrow, because this would instantly induce the people to inquire, and lead them to the painful conclusion that their affairs have been most abominably mismanaged.

The President, in his message, gives us a most agreeable picture of our finances. He tells us that there will be a million and a half in the Treasury on the first of January; that the receipts of the year will be sufficient to meet all the current expenses, and leave a balance of a million and a half of dollars in the Treasury at the end of the year. He is fortified by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, although on a close inspection of this report some misgivings may be discovered. Now, is this view of our finance correct? It is admitted on all hands not to be. And yet here are documents coming from the highest authority, printed at the public expense by tens of thousands, multiplied by the press every where, reaching every log cabin in the most secluded valley of the mountains, and travelling to the farthest West, and yet these documents are only calculated to deceive! For years past this deception has been practised. The people have lost confidence in these State papers, which ought to be stamped with the highest authority. The opinion now very generally prevails that they are only regarded as the means of slurring over and concealing the faults of those who have been entrusted with the management of our affairs, and not to give plain, intelligible, correct, and satisfactory information to the people, in order that they may be enabled to determine whether their public servants have done well or ill, and whether it may not be advisable to make a change. This machiavellian character of our public documents is, perhaps, one of the principal causes of that dissatisfaction which they have so decidedly manifested. Suppose, sir, that the minister of a European monarch were to lay before his master a false and deceptive budget, would it not be regarded as a high offence, as a sort of treason? It would certainly be visited by the just displeasure of the offended sovereign. Here the people are sovereign, and have a right to know the truth, and the exact truth. And yet the President in his message, and the Secretary in his report, documents intended for the widest circulation, tell one story, and immediately after, as if for the private ear of this House, and out of hearing of the people, the Secretary comes and tells a very different story. We are told, in a side whisper, that the Treasury is empty, and that an issue of Treasury notes to the amount of five millions is absolutely necessary to meet the demands on it during the first quarter of the year. After that, money will come in plentifully; and, if it does not, to them it will be a matter of indifference, as by that time they will have been relieved from the cares and anxieties of State affairs.

This story of five millions of Treasury notes for the first quarter has now been regularly repeated for the last three sessions. So fearful was the Secretary of disclosing the real nature of this demand, that, in the first instance, it was ingeniously called the exchanging the notes of the Government for specie! It was thought that this would serve as an effectual mask to conceal its ugly and unpopular features. It was not the creation of a debt; it was simply procuring specie, by giving for it a piece of paper, with a promise to pay written on it. Was that paper any thing more than evidence of debt, like the note of a private individual? Its value would depend upon the ability to pay back the amount for which it was given, and not upon its intrinsic value. But these notes are not only equivalent to specie, but superior, because they bear interest! They are not only good bona fide bread and butter, but have a little sugar sprinkled over them besides.

Now, sir, I think it proper and necessary that the people should know the true situation of their Treasury. They should at least know whether they are in debt, or free from debt. This is necessary, in order that their Representatives may be required to retrench expenses, if it can be done without injury to the public service, and, if not, that suitable means may be adopted to procure a certain and sufficient supply. Attempts have been made during this debate to defend the Administration from the charge of extravagance, and perhaps it has been proved that the last year was not quite as extravagant as the preceding years. But it has been demonstrated by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] who has investigated this subject with great ability, and also by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD,] and the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] who have gone into details and analyzed the Secretary's report, that the necessary and usual expenditures for national defences have either been suspended, or remain a charge to be met by the new Administration. Instead of meeting this and explaining it, several gentlemen on the side of the Administration have attempted to give an unfair representation of the ground thus taken. They cry out that the Whigs are now for lavish expenditure, and charge the late Administration with parsimony, while before the election the charge of extravagance was continually rung in the ears of the people. This manoeuvre is too obvious to deceive any one. The Whigs are consistent—they want no lavish expenditure; they want no increase of expense in furnishing the President's house. Gen. Harrison will think it good enough for him; and I have no doubt he would rejoice if the money which was laid out in its splendid curtains, and golden spoons and dishes, were now in the Treasury.

The Whigs go for economy and reform, but have no wish to see a false economy in providing for the safety and welfare of our country, for the improvement of our navy, the completion of our fortifications, and for national works undertaken at the public expense. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] who labored so much in the defence of this condemned Administration, referred, among other items of extraordinary and unavoidable expenditure, to our Indian relations. I might refer him to the electioneering relations, equally expensive, and equally as fruitless as the Florida war. One thing is undeniable: the expenses of the Government within the last six years have all at once doubled the expenses of the preceding twenty years, without any national debt to pay, while at the same time there has been a great reduction in the expenditures for national purposes. These are facts which are not easily explained. The burden of this explanation lies on the Administration. A proportional increase in our expenses was to be expected; but, after making this allowance, and for the Florida war and Indian relations, still the increase is to me "perfectly unaccountable." They have not explained to us why the expenses of the Government under Monroe and Adams were but twenty-three millions, with an annual debt of ten millions to be paid out of this sum, while under the present and late Administrations they were from thirty to thirty-nine millions, after the debt was paid off! The weight of this explanation lay upon the late Administration; it could not bear it, but was crushed under it, never to rise again, unless in some new form, or some new combination, which will conceal its identity.

Even at the last session, the true character of these Treasury notes was attempted to be concealed. They were not a loan, it was said—they were only Treasury notes. Instead of being exchanged for specie, they were taken at the banks, which gave their own notes in exchange, even after they had stopped specie payments. It was one of those humbugs which characterized the late Administration. But the necessity for disguise has ceased, and it is admitted that they are loans, but not quite a debt. The mask is partially removed, half concealing and half disclosing the features behind it. They are a temporary loan! Mr. Van Buren, by way of casting the shadow before the coming event, has bestowed upon us a very impressive parental admonition against the creation of a permanent national debt. And who ever thought of doing this? Great Britain may be said to have a permanent national debt; and the saying has been attributed to Alexander Hamilton, "that a national debt is a national blessing." If he did use such an expression, it was condemned as soon as uttered, and has never been received into the creed of any party in this country. It was never supposed by us for a moment that any of our loans were permanent. The debt of the Revolution, and that of the late war, awakened the deepest solicitude for their speedy extinguishment. What, then, is a temporary loan? A loan for one year is as much a loan as one for five years, and both are temporary.

On the passage of the bill there will be five millions of Treasury notes out, as soon as the notes now called for shall be issued. And this has been renewed from year to year, and it is called a temporary loan, to distinguish it from a loan for a longer time than a year. The debt is renewed like a note in bank, which may be renewed for seven years, and still be called a note of ninety days. Let things, then, be called by their right names; call a spade a spade, and the issue of Treasury notes the creation of a debt. If the nation is in debt, let the nation know that it is in debt. Let it be known that we are obliged to borrow, and if it be necessary to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate a loan, let him be allowed to have recourse to the issue of Treasury notes in the last resort. There could be no difficulty, I repeat, in effecting a loan at a lower rate of interest than six per cent. the amount payable on the Treasury notes. The credit of the nation is still good as to its ability to pay, and its character for integrity will, of course, rise under the new Administration. From every indication which I see, the public confidence in it will not be surpassed by that reposed in any Administration since the days of Washington.

It has been shown by those gentlemen who have so ably analyzed the Secretary's report, that the sum of five millions, in addition to the current revenue, will not be sufficient for the present year. They have shown a large amount of debt which must be provided for now, or at no remote period hereafter. It must have struck every one as very strange that there should be a difference between the gentlemen to whom I have just alluded, in their respective understandings of the report, to so large an amount as six millions. No one will question the acuteness of their perception. The Secretary must be either remarkable for his talent for mystification, or very unfortunate in the manner of expressing his ideas. But no one can speak with certainty of the amount of outstanding claims which will be presented at the Treasury during the present year. I approve the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JENIFER,] authorizing the loan of ten millions of dollars, if required, for the use of the Government. The first quarter of the next year should be provided for, not to speak of the prudent precaution heretofore pursued, but of late years discontinued, of always having at least five millions in the Treasury to meet unexpected contingencies—that is, of always having enough and little more. The Secretary estimates the probable receipts from the customs at sixteen millions of dollars, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. VANDERPOEL] declares that it will exceed that amount; that he is assured, by private letters from the city of New York, that there will be very large importations. But this, after all is but conjecture: for many circumstances may occur to check importations. The further reduction of the amount of duties on some article towards the end of the year, together with specie-payments, may lessen the receipts. The severe lessons taught by excessive importations will have an effect both at home and abroad. The banks will be cramped by their effort to resume and maintain specie payments, and it will not be in their power to extend their discounts. The business of the coming year may be a sound and safe business, but necessarily limited. It is not in a year, you may rest assured, sir, that this country can regain the full tide of its prosperity. It is very possible that the receipts from customs may fall considerably below those of the last year.

I will ask, Mr. Chairman, whether it is fair for the outgoing Administration to leave their successors without ample funds to carry on the Government, and to meet all the appropriations of Congress? The power is still in their hands, and surely the intimations coming from those who will share the confidence of the new Administration ought to have some weight.

The supporters of the Administration have charged upon us the desire to call a special session of Congress, and the charge is thrown back, on account of the apparent unwillingness to provide sufficient means for the new Administration. I do not suppose it is the wish of any one to call an extra session; but it may be the desire of each party to shift from itself the responsibility of such a measure, should it become indispensable. I hope it will not be necessary; it will be expensive and inconvenient, and nothing but the most urgent necessity will justify it. But it is not the province of this House to determine upon that necessity. The Constitution has assigned this duty to the discretion of the Executive, and we have no right to forestall or dictate to that branch of the Government in its appropriate action. Until the President shall enter upon the duties of his office, and the heads of Departments shall have examined into their situation, it is impossible for him to know what necessity there may be for such a measure. Unforeseen events may happen to render it wise and prudent. The public voice may demand it in order to draw the exact line of distinction between the last and the present Administrations. At all events, the necessity and propriety lies with the Executive, and not with this body.

And why should not General Harrison have the same privilege as Mr. Van Buren? Soon after that gentleman came into office, he was induced, reluctantly, to call an extra session. He was not blamed for this, but it was supposed that something would be done for the country. The nation was disappointed; instead of proposing any measure to relieve the distresses of the People, the President made the novel and ominous declaration, which has stuck to him like the garment of Nessus, that the people are in the habit of expecting too much from the Government; that it is enough for the Government to take care of itself, and the people must take care of themselves! This Congress extraordinary did nothing but pass a Treasury note bill, although the follower in the footsteps had received a letter from General Jackson, after the explosion of the pet bank bubble, telling him, above all things, to beware of Treasury notes. Thus the mountain was in labor and brought forth a mouse. The people expected too much from the Government! When the Executive called itself the Government, and controlled the action of the Legislature, it was natural for the people to look up to it for more than it could perform. The Executive could lead the people into difficulty, but could not lead them out again. It was a different matter with Congress, which was the people represented by their immediate agents. The law-making branch of the Government, through which they express their will, is, or ought to be, in the hands of the people; and to tell them that they expect too much of the Government, is to tell them that they expect too much from themselves. The Executive had assumed powers which did not belong to it; it had attempted to interfere where it had no right to interfere, and mischief and misfortune had followed, and then it suddenly discovered that the powers which it had usurped are to be found nowhere. It was most unfortunate that this discovery had not been made before the commencement of those experiments, which have thrown our country into almost irretrievable disorder. Happily, they have put an end to that centralizing, despotic, unit-power grasped by General Jackson, but which his successor could not retain.

And if Mr. Van Buren was justified in calling an extra session, how much more will be General Harrison? The disasters which rendered it necessary for Mr. Van Buren to resort to this measure, were brought about by the conduct of the preceding Administration, of which he was particeps, while, if General Harrison be compelled to resort to this measure, it will be in consequence of the misfortunes brought on the country by his predecessor, whose measures he had condemned. What were the causes, proximate and remote, which led to the call of an extra session by Mr. Van Buren? It was the stoppage of specie payments by all the banks in the Union, the failure of the pet bank system, the danger of losing the public money placed in their keeping by General Jackson on his own responsibility, contrary to the will of Congress, and in violation of the Constitution. If this was afterwards involuntarily sanctioned by Congress, it was but an aggravation of the offence. The consequences of these arbitrary acts had been foretold again and again, but the warning was despised. The public documents, the message of the President, the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, who had become his officer, and no longer the officer of Congress, as in the olden time, continued to deceive the people to the last moment, by false representations of the operation of the pet bank system. At the very moment of his retiring from office, the General, in imitation of Washington, sent forth his farewell address, in which he proclaimed, like a sentinel on the watch tower, "all's well," when, in truth, all was not well. Instead of furnishing a better currency than the Bank of the United States, instead of preventing the expansions and contractions of the currency, it did nothing but expand. The number of banks increased from three hundred to six hundred, and their issues were enlarged in proportion. There was nothing but expansion and expansion, until the bubble became so thin that men of common sagacity must have seen that it would burst. Speculations in the public lands, as well as every kind of speculation, and the importation of foreign goods, were stimulated to phrenzy. Surely this was the work of the party which placed Mr. Van Buren in power! By the means of that party discipline which had been established, the executive and legislative power had become almost consolidated in the hands of Mr. Van Buren; and if the party is not responsible, or at least its leaders, I know not who is responsible. They had the making of the laws, and the execution of them; and if Government be potent for good, it is also potent for evil. If General Harrison shall be compelled to call a special session, the necessity for it must be traced to the present Administration, as the immediate as well as the remote cause of the difficulties in which our country has been unhappily involved. I hope the measure may not be deemed necessary, and something may be done by placing ample means in the hands of the new Administration.

This debate has taken a wide range, far beyond the limits of the topics immediately connected with the bill. Gentlemen have taken the occasion to express their opinions upon a variety of subjects, probably from a belief that no other opportunity may offer, and because they may as well be expressed on this occasion as on any other, as they are intended for effect elsewhere rather than here. To some extent I mean to use the same privilege.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] whom I perceive now about to occupy his place, has said some things in which I heartily concur, and others in which I differ from him. But every difference of opinion, with respect to measures and policy, is not a difference of principle. I take pleasure in expressing my acknowledgments for the undaunted and courageous stand he has taken against this Administration, and for his untiring efforts to lay open its abuses. Those who are faithless to the country in proportion to their fidelity to party have no difficulty in following a common leader, because they are not actuated by principle, but by the interests of party. On the contrary, those who seek the public good must often differ, although they have the same great objects in view. This agreement on all occasions, and referring every thing to a party vote, to say the least of it, is suspicious, as much so as the exact coincidence of half a dozen witnesses in a court of justice.

I differ from the gentleman from Virginia on the subject of this bill, as a mode of raising money to supply an empty Treasury. I differ from him on the subject of the compromise act; on the subject of the distribution of the public lands; and on some other subjects which I do not mean to discuss; but it is an honest difference of opinion on both sides. I did not expect him to surrender his opinions, and those of his constituents, nor does he expect me to do so as to mine. I regard this difference as the first favorable symptom of returning health and soundness in our public councils. The venal courtiers of a monarchy may hold their necks awry, because the King is compelled to do so from disease, but among freemen; among genuine Democrats, every one stands erect, and disdains a slavish surrender of his opinions; he is willing to obey the clearly expressed will of his constituents, but no further. At the same time, I am aware that parties are unavoidable in a Republic, and within certain bounds are, perhaps, salutary and necessary. If it be necessary to make some sacrifice of opinions and predilections, it should be for the sake of our country, and not for the success of party. Concert in action for the attainment of great objects may render it necessary to suspend the assertion of minor opinions. What I condemn is, that excessive devotion to party which is ready to make a sacrifice of country, and every interest, for that of party, and nothing but party. That kind of vicious party spirit has become too common, both in our General and State Governments. It began with the administration of General Jackson, and continued to increase to the very close of the present. In marking its progress, we are struck with the contrast between the present improvement in party discipline and subserviency, and that which was seen in the first period of General Jackson's administration, when party was still in its raw militia state. When he put forth his denunciation of the Bank of the United States for refusing to become a party engine, his denunciation, instead of being received with Eastern servility, "to hear is to obey," was flatly contradicted and rebuked without disguise, by committees of both Houses, composed of his warmest supporters. The Bank was rechartered by the votes of his supporters; Mr. Clay's land bill would have passed in spite of his veto, and he could not obtain the sanction of Congress to the removal of the deposits. For the last few years we have seen no such instances of stern Republican independence—rather the Administration has been abandoned by every one who possessed this virtue. If any one now dare show symptoms of desertion, the suspected is whipped into the ranks by those two hideous fiends* who stand brandishing their whips of scorpions.

I therefore cordially agree with the gentleman from Virginia, that one of the fruits of the recent victory has been to restore freedom of opinion, and to break loose the shackles of party. That tyranny and discipline of an Administration party, for the indiscriminate support of all Administration measures, I hope is forever at an end. I am confident that the Democratic Whigs will shun the pernicious example which has been placed before them. I could cite melancholy examples of that nature, and where the welfare of the country has been sacrificed to the interests of party. In my own State, it is not long since a conspicuous member of the Legislature, having voted for a certain law, a few days after it had passed, voted for its repeal, merely because the leader of the party had given the word to face about. On that occasion, the member declared on the floor that he was conscious at the time that the law which he voted for would spread ruin and destruction from the centre to the circumference, but that he could not vote against the Democratic party.

Mr. LEET. The gentleman will permit me to explain. The gentleman to whom that language was imputed solemnly denied ever having used it.

Mr. BRACKENRIDGE. He did so on the very spot where it was uttered; but was instantly contradicted, and not a single voice was raised to support him. There are gentlemen behind me who reassert the fact. If this be the spirit of modern pseudo Democracy, which has repudiated the Democracy of James Madison, of Albert Gallatin, and Alexander J. Dallas, a most happy escape has been made from it. I will give an instance of this blind devotion to party, which has been witnessed within the walls of this Capitol. A few years ago, the distribution bill of Mr. CLAY passed, by large majorities, through both Houses of Congress. Party discipline had not then attained its perfection; the centralization of power in the hands of the Executive, through the instrumentality of party, was not yet complete. The bill was retained by the President; he did not dare to trust it to the Senate and House of Representatives, not yet sufficiently broken to submission. He knew that it would pass by two-thirds, and, in violation of the Constitution, refused to afford them an opportunity to act upon it. The principle of that bill has, within a few days been voted down in the Senate, and there is danger that it will share the same fate, by a party vote, in this House. The delegation from my own State is divided; and although we have received instructions from our State Legislature to go for the principle of distribution, a portion of the delegation refuse to obey, because their allegiance to party is stronger than to their State. They are willing to make a sacrifice of one of the most important interests of Pennsylvania—one in which her citizens of all parties agree—they are willing to make this great sacrifice to the centralized party arrangements here, so that it may be used for the purpose of preserving some of the new States, almost the only political stock they now possess, and almost the only hold they have upon those States.

A MEMBER FROM PENNSYLVANIA. The Legislature of Pennsylvania has only requested the members from Pennsylvania to vote for the distribution.

Mr. BRACKENRIDGE. True; and when I ask this little boy for a tumbler of water, I do not say bring it, but please to bring it. The people of Pennsylvania, without regard to party, are in favor of distribution, because it is not only for the benefit of the State, but no more than strict justice. At whose instance, I will ask, do those gentlemen refuse to comply with the request of the people of Pennsylvania, as expressed through their representatives in the State Legislature? Is it not in obedience to the tactics of the party, which is, from the mere force of habit, endeavoring to prop up its falling wall? Or has the policy of throwing away a portion of the common patrimony been declared a new article of the Democratic creed? If so, it agrees well with those other preposterous articles which have operated so unhappily on our State and national prosperity. But there are two other subjects far transcending anything we have heretofore witnessed, or are likely to witness again, as respects open disregard of justice, and in the determination to carry into effect party arrangements in defiance of the people. The party is now ashamed of the New Jersey election case; it was alluded to and condemned, in energetic language, in the course of this session, by a gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MASON,] and not a single individual rose to say a word in its defence. The climax was the passage of the Sub-Treasury bill, in which we discover the last lingering spark of independence of the centralized power of party—it was but touch and go, it just rubbed through, and that was all. Yet this very project, when first introduced into Congress, was denounced by the Administration press as revolutionary and ruinous; it afterwards, on the bursting of the pet-bank bubble, was taken into favor by the Administration, was twice recommended to Congress and twice rejected, in consequence of its well known unpopularity. Party can do much, but it cannot do every thing, or it would have re-elected Mr. Van Buren. The Sub-Treasury, however, passed in defiance of the great majority of the nation, and from that moment the downfall of the Administration was rendered certain. A new swarm of Conservatives joined the Whig hive, the third or fourth which had swelled its numbers, and the self-styled Democratic party was left in a lean minority.

* It was my intention to have omitted this part of my speech in the publication, the case having been referred to merely by way of illustration; but, on mentioning it to some of my Pennsylvania friends, who were present while I was speaking, they insisted on my retaining it, as the passage was too marked and public to be passed in silence.

Sectional feeling is, in my mind, praiseworthy, compared to this unbounded and unscrupulous support of party. Perhaps it is the duty of a faithful Representative to look first to the interests and wishes of his immediate constituents before he extends his view to the wider circle; and, perhaps, whether it be his duty or not, a zealous Representative will do so. Such a course may lead to compromise or conciliation—each surrendering something in order that the common good may be secured. But this discipline of party, especially a "spoils party," strides over every thing; it sacrifices both sectional and general interests; all, save those of party, must fall down before it, as before the African Simoom, whose hot breath withers, scorches, and kills, as it sweeps over the interminable sands of the desert. The interests of the whole will, however, be found, in general, that of the parts. A sound and healthy trunk can alone nourish sound and healthy branches. And where shall we look for the trunk of that tree? Where is the great body of the nation—the seat of empire, for whose prosperity a wise legislation must be chiefly directed? It is in the West, sir; in the great valley of the Mississippi, and in the valleys of its tributary waters; in western Pennsylvania, western Virginia, Maryland, western Carolinas, and in the States of the West and South-west. In twenty years more this nation, unless checked by some great calamity, will number thirty millions of souls. In that short period another nation, equal to that which now occupies our soil and fills our towns, will rise up in the midst of us; and this increase will be nearly all in the West, which, from its situation and relative position, is one and indivisible. The navigation of the Mississippi is a common bond, as well as indispensable to its safety. New York, connected with the lakes, and the lakes with the Ohio, with the New England States, may form the top of the tree; but it is chiefly to the interests of the great trunk of this Republic that legislation ought to look now, and to which it must look before many years shall go round. The statesman who looks a little beyond the present hour ought to know that, if the time shall come when the Republic thus defined shall consider protection by legislative enactments necessary to its commerce and manufactures, it will not be withheld; that if a National Bank be required as a fiscal agent, and as a regulator of the currency, it will be established.

I agree with the gentleman from Virginia on another subject, as one of the happy results of the late election. It will bring back the Executive branch to its proper place under the Constitution. It is made the duty of that branch to communicate information to Congress, and to recommend such measures as it may judge necessary and expedient; but there its duty ends, and that of Congress begins; and until their deliberations shall assume the form of law in the matters recommended, or in matters originating with either House, the Executive has nothing more to say. It has no right to interfere, and, by intrigue and management, and party drill, attempt to carry those recommendations into effect. According to the principle avowed by General Harrison, legislation belongs to the Representatives of the People, who are the interpreters of their wishes. We are no longer to inquire what the Administration is going to do when we refer to the great measures of the Government, but what measures will Congress adopt. Some gentlemen, from a bad habit acquired under the late Administrations, speak of the measures of the President elect, and condemn them in advance, when these are measures of legislation which do not fall within his province. He may think it prudent to be sparing even of his mere recommendation, so as not to lessen the perfect freedom which ought to be enjoyed by Congress in the performance of the duties confided to it, and for which this body is responsible. If, hereafter, the country should be injured by bad legislation, let the blame rest where it ought to rest, on the people themselves and on their Representatives. The people will thus be thrown upon their own energies, and they will call their Representatives to a more strict account. What measures may be adopted by the new Congress it is not for this Congress to discuss; neither can it be known to the President elect until after it shall have assembled. We must endeavor to unlearn the bad habit we have acquired under the two last Administrations, of looking upon the President of the United States and the heads of departments as the Government, and as the arbiters of the fate of the country. We must learn once more to look up to our Representatives and at the same time to depend upon ourselves. If the next Congress, representing the wishes of the people as it does, and as this does not, shall determine to touch the tariff, and at once modify it, so as to secure a sufficient revenue, it will do so. If it shall determine to charter a National Bank, or distribute the public lands, it will do so. We are but agents here, not assembled to consult our petty interest of party, but to obey the will of those who sent us, and to adopt such measures as will promote the general welfare. We come here to carry into effect the will of the people, and not that of the President and his Cabinet; and I have no doubt we shall hear the same thing from General Harrison himself. The tampering with the duties exclusively belonging to Congress was the great sin of the late Administration, which had gradually acquired an ascendancy over it, entirely incompatible with the spirit and letter of the Constitution.

But the great point gained by the late election is, in my opinion, the establishment of what has been called the ONE TERM principle. This was coming up at once to the line of true Democracy. Is there any one on this floor who will now openly declare himself against it? On this subject, at least, it must be admitted that public opinion has declared itself. General Jackson was elected on this principle. I appeal to the records of Tammany Hall.* He disregarded it, and it has recently been declared on the highest authority, that he and his kitchen cabinet were desirous of a third term, but the party could not be brought to it. One of the mottoes of the Van Buren party was, "the Constitution as it is," and there is nothing there to limit the number of terms to two or three. During the late contest, this one-term principle took the lead of all other topics of discussion. The people were convinced that their free institutions have been endangered by the re-eligibility of the Chief Magistrate, and by the political intrigues and corruptions attending the struggle for re-election. They believed that the first term was regarded as the stepping-stone to the second; that the time of the President, and that of his subordinates, instead of being devoted to the duties of their stations, would be occupied by plans and political arrangements and exertions to secure that re-election, and at the same time to establish the succession, and preserve the offices to those who occupied them. Our past history may furnish some exceptions. I believe that of Mr. Adams was an exception; but the future presented a dreary prospect.

Doubts have already been expressed of the sincerity of those who have contended for this principle at the late election. For myself, I repel the charge of insincerity; and I will take upon me to say that those who really entertain such doubts know but little of the individual who has been chosen to fill the office of Chief Magistrate. I do not so much confide in his solemn pledge as in his unsullied public and private integrity. But public opinion has settled the question. Hereafter, no President, without braving that opinion, will present himself for re-election, and the people will require that it be made a part of the Constitution, as a recorded as well as a practical amendment.

When Washington was called to the office of President, he was re-eligible without limitation. It might have been held for life; at least, there was nothing in the Constitution which forbade it. But he was not one of those who loved power for its own sake; he earnestly wished to retire after serving one term, and only yielded to the solicitations of the friends of the new Government when he was, for the second time, elected by a unanimous vote. Mr. Madison and Mr. Jefferson joined in those solicitations. The example set by him, of declining a third term, has been a law to his successors, and effected a practical amendment on the Democratic side. The people themselves have now infused into the Constitution a further portion of Democracy, by declaring in favor of one term. The one term principle, in the abstract, has received the sober and dispassionate approval of the great majority of the American people of all parties. The first suggestion may be traced to Mr. Jefferson, in his letter to Mr. Adams, written from Paris in 1787, in which he declares the want of such a limitation to be one of the most serious objections to the new Constitution. The one-term principle was recommended by Gen. Jackson—to commence in future with his successors! It would have been as easy for him to have set an example of one term as it was for Washington of two, especially as he was considered pledged to this Democratic principle announced by the "Republican party," as it was called—for Democracy, as well as Federalism, had gone to sleep. The practical amendment effected by Washington's example is a reduction of power by shortening its duration in the hands of any one set of men and restoring it to the people, and thus preventing the consolidation in the hands of a faction or junta. And here, in my opinion, is the first cause for rejoicing in the victory the people have achieved at the ballot-box over a party which sought to perpetuate itself by the very means placed in their hands for the purpose of administering the Government. The odds against which they had to contend were fearful. Against a hundred thousand office holders, with the vast circle of their influence; the disbursement of the revenue; the press, in the pay of the Government—against all this host the people had to struggle. And the effort was a mighty one. They rose up peacefully, but in masses of from five thousand to fifty thousand. They succeeded. Power is once more in their own hands, to be transferred to new agents, executive as well as legislative, at the end of the next four years; and I hope they will never again lose sight of the maxim "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

Henceforward there will be no motive "to bring the public offices in conflict with the freedom of elections." The Administration will have ample time and leisure to attend to the business of the country instead of neglecting it, and Congress itself will feel the effect of this salutary example. The Executive branch, sir, was fast verifying the predictions of the immortal Patrick Henry—it was grasping at all power—the sword, the purse, legislation; and even the judiciary was not entirely safe. It had almost succeeded in overturning the freedom of elections by means of its organized, disciplined army of office holders spread throughout the country. General Harrison has pledged himself that hereafter the office holders shall apply themselves exclusively to their duties, and abstain from interference in elections. They now know the conditions on which they take office; there will be no tax upon their salaries to raise an electioneering fund; no salaries will be augmented, and no new offices will be created, in order to increase that tax, and thus, in point of fact, apply the money of the nation to secure their offices. In short, I repeat, sir, the people have once more got the power in their hands, and have become the masters of their own Government.

Mr. Chairman, the wide range which this debate has taken, will be my excuse for giving my opinions on some subjects which are but remotely connected with it. I will say something respecting the tariff, which has been so frequently referred to. I represent a district deeply interested in the subject. I differ from the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] as to the obligatory nature of the compromise act. If a compact, who were the parties to it? What authority had the agents to make it? Have any rights, individual, corporate, or State, been vested under that act? These questions cannot be answered without taking away the foundation on which it stands. It differs in no respect, legally considered, from an act of ordinary legislation. To say that it cannot be touched now, and that after '42 it becomes perpetual, is to give it a higher force than the Constitution, which provides within itself the mode of amendment. The compromise act would be as irrevocable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, and bind the generations "yet unborn." The expediency of the arrangement at the time to patch up an unfortunate family quarrel, and the propriety of leaving it to run its course undisturbed, are different questions. I am desirous to leave it untouched until the experiment be fully tried. This must be left to others, and not for us to decide. But I am of opinion that, for the purpose of revenue, without infringing the compromise act, duties may be imposed on silks, wines, and some other articles which pay only a nominal duty. It is not likely, however, that any thing can be done at this session: it must be left to the next Congress.

If, at the expiration of the compromise act, two years hence, the people, through their Representatives, shall require a revision of the tariff, for the purpose of revenue as well as of protection, we may rely upon it that revision will take place. I consider that the principle of protection, instead of being surrendered, has been recognised by that act. It is, in general, impossible to distinguish, practically, what portion of the duty on any specific article may be set down for revenue exclusively, and what for protection; because a very small duty may, in many instances, in addition to the mere expense of importation, act as a protection. A fixed per cent. according to the value, applied to all articles alike, instead of specific duties, may either produce too much for revenue or too little. If the maximum of the full twenty per cent. be laid on a number of selected articles, and others suffered to come in free, this will act as a bounty on the importation of the free articles; and this is proved by the excessive importations of free articles since the compromise began to take effect. It is impossible to foresee the practical effect of disturbing a tariff, which has for a long period of time regulated our foreign trade, and to which that trade has adapted itself. Some of the articles admitted duty free do not come cheaper to the consumer, and, at the same time, the duty is lost to the revenue. The duty is either levied by the foreign power, or is pocketed by the importer, or divided between them. I am not, in general, a friend to high duties; because they encourage evasion. I am no advocate of protective duties at all, which require to be permanently continued merely in aid of the manufacturers; and in this I think my opinion is not different from those who have been most zealous for protection. It has only been asked for as temporary aid to infant establishments, to new investments of capital, whose first efforts are feeble, and easily repressed by the overgrown establishments of Europe. When these establishments are completed, and the necessary skill and instinct of art attained, the nation is compensated by a cheaper article, from the effect of competition, and better than the imported; at the same time that its wealth and its independence are increased by the acquisition of a new branch of industry. The practicability of accomplishing this object should be taken into consideration in imposing duties for protection. Other nations go much further than we have ever done; they exclude, by duties, and by prohibition, articles which they can never produce to advantage, or produce at all, such as sassafras and tobacco, because they will not encourage the establishment of a class of imports which may turn the scale of commerce against them, and which may be dispensed with. In this instance, it is the community, the general commerce and general prosperity, that is protected.

Our tariff requires revision, in order to ascertain what articles have completely established themselves, and no longer require protection. Gentlemen unfriendly to protection are much mistaken on this head. They look at the tariff, and see what they consider high duties on particular articles, and suppose the whole of that duty enters into the price paid by the consumers, while it forms no part of it; because importations of similar foreign articles have ceased, and could not be revived by a removal of the duties. We are in a very different situation now from that in which it was declared to us, as colonies of Great Britain, that we should not be allowed to manufacture a hob-nail! We now enter into successful competition with Britain in her own West India Islands, when admitted there, and in foreign markets, especially those of South America. To Cuba alone we export nearly five millions, chiefly American manufactures, and bring home a balance in our favor, in specie, to the amount of a million annually. The products of our manufactures and our farms enable us to carry on a profitable commerce with Mexico and South America, from California to Chiloe, and from La Plata to Matamoras and Santa Fe. No doubt many foreign articles also enter this trade. But, in passing, let me ask, what would be the foundation for the golden humbug without this trade, based on the manufactures of the North and provisions of the West, which furnish the means of purchasing our supply of the precious metals? Cotton—cotton, is the reply. But even now cotton does not suffice to pay for the manufactures we import from Britain! And if our manufactures were destroyed, what would become of the golden stream which flows in from this source, and flows out again, to settle our balances with those nations on whom we are dependent? Our little trade with Cuba alone procures us double the amount of gold that we obtain from all our gold mines, from Virginia to Georgia.

*"Experience has satisfied us that one term of office is sufficient to repay any services, or gratify any ambition! At present, the first four years of an Administration are passed in efforts to confirm the bargains and pledges as to the right of succession. It is thus that the great interests of the country are sacrificed at the shrine of personal ambition."—Resolution passed at Tammany Hall, April, 1828.

In the revision of the tariff, it will be necessary to select those articles which need protection, and they will be found fewer in number than is generally supposed. The maximum of twenty per cent. with cash payments, the home valuation, and the more accurate estimate of the Spanish dollar, will, in the opinion of many well-informed persons, afford a sufficient protection. We hear the words high tariff, high tariff, continually repeated on this floor, while there is no one proposing it; not a single memorial from any quarter has been presented to Congress in favor of such a measure. The cash duties will be a protection, not only to our manufactures, but a protection to the country against excessive importations. It will incidentally operate as a kind of sumptuary law; and it will prevent the British manufacturers from throwing into this country accumulated stocks, which they are compelled, from time to time, to sacrifice. We can derive no benefit, as a nation, from these gambling irregularities of trade, any more than from dealing in stocks and bank notes—the harvest of brokers and exchange dealers, whose interest it is to keep up this uncertainty and disorder. The objection to the protective principle, on constitutional grounds, is, that duties must be raised for revenue and nothing else; that they must be so arranged as to exclude every incidental effect, whether it be its incidental operation in favor of manufactures, or as a protection to the nation at large. Now, I think I have shown that this is impossible. Every duty on the same article we manufacture at home is, as far as it goes, an incidental protection, because it lessens by so much the ability of the foreign article to compete with it. The cash payments—the home valuation, operate as protection.

I have said that I was not in favor of high protection; yet, there are two articles which, possibly, might form exceptions, but this would require mature reflection—these are, iron and woollens, which we ought to produce for ourselves, at least for the great bulk of our consumption. Without these, and especially the first, our nation can hardly be said to be a nation. So important does Great Britain regard her woollen manufactures, that, in order to counteract the duties of other nations on her woollen fabrics, she reduced the duty on foreign wool from eight pence to one penny, thus sacrificing a large amount of revenue, and, of course, affecting the home production for the sake of more important advantages. Three years ago the value of wool produced in the United States was estimated at $30,000,000; nearly equal to one half of the cotton crop of the South; the last year it fell to seventeen millions. And yet no complaints have been made by those who have thus suffered. It may be, in part, owing to the want of protection that our woollen factories have declined, and it may become necessary to institute an inquiry; but, in my opinion, the great cause of injury to every branch of internal trade is the derangement of the currency produced by the sad experiments of the late Administrations. The day will come when the article of wool will be regarded as one of the most important items of our national wealth; more important even than that of cotton. A large proportion of the vast region beyond the Mississippi is well adapted to the rearing of sheep, and but poorly adapted to any thing else.

I cannot suppose that the enlightened statesmen from the South who complain of the injurious effects of the tariff have no cause whatever for dissatisfaction. It is impossible to enact laws which will not bear unequally on different parts of a country so extensive as ours. I consider it the duty of those who possess the power—the majority—to use their power with prudence and moderation. The principle of the greatest good to the greatest number should be qualified in such a way as not to oppress the minority. Although I have too much respect for the statesmen of the South to say that their complaints against the tariff are entirely groundless, yet I cannot but think there has been great exaggeration. It is natural it should be so. I am a native of western Pennsylvania, and can recollect the pitch of extravagance to which the people were carried in consequence of the oppressions of the excise law. There were no roads across the mountains, the navigation of the Mississippi was closed, and they were obliged to transport kegs of whiskey on the backs of horses, to purchase a little salt and iron, together with other articles of the first necessity. We rose up in bloody insurrection, and were called "whiskey boys," and no doubt were very bad boys. We had, perhaps, just cause to complain; the law was, it is true, a good law for the rest of the State, but partial and oppressive to us. I might mention the embargo, which bore so severely on the shipping interests of the Northern States, where it was denounced in the most violent and intemperate manner. The unoffending word itself became an object of vengeance, was put to the torture, and, being spelt backwards, was pronounced ograbme; a sort of revenge quite as rational as that of a celebrated despot of manufactures, who declared that he never saw a sheep without feeling inclined to go out of his way to kick it. A member on this floor, the other day, after speaking with great energy against the tariff, declared that he never heard the word but he felt as if the cry of mad dog was raised near him; and, indeed, it does seem to me to have a magical effect on some gentlemen, for it is no sooner mentioned than they leap and dance as if they had been stung by the tarantula. If I am not mistaken, that undefined horror associated with the word, which so generally pervaded the South, has very much diminished, and the topic is now oftener used for the purpose of declamation and oratory than from any serious alarm. Some years ago, it was the general bugbear. I was told of a young lady in Georgia, who was asked concerning the health of her mother. "She is very ill." "And what is the matter?" "I don't know, unless it is that odious tariff." It seems to me, as it does to others, who view the subject dispassionately, that the fall in the price of cotton, the grievance at the bottom of the complaints against the tariff, is most plainly to be attributed to the over production, which runs ahead of the demand. It has fallen in price in all parts of the world, tariff or no tariff; and but for the home market originally created by the tariff, it would be still lower in Great Britain; for certainly no one will contend that, if the whole of these States depended on Great Britain entirely for their cotton fabrics, we should consume as much cotton as we do now. It is equally evident that the demand for cotton in Great Britain would be affected by the falling off in the demand for her manufactures in the United States. Britain is, moreover, making great efforts to introduce the culture of the short staple cotton in her East India possessions; her hostility to our manufacturing and commercial enterprise, and to our institutions, is well known; her power and perseverance in carrying into effect a favorite policy are equally well known. It would, therefore, be wise in the South to foster the home market, which they can enjoy exclusively, to encourage American consumption, and American manufactures of their great staple, which will make the States, in the end, better customers to Britain, and Britain a greater consumer of cotton. To a certain extent, they should use the natural advantages they possess, and manufacture for themselves.

I differ entirely from the statistics of the gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. Thompson), who attempts to show that the whole of the duties are paid by the cotton-growing States. His idea is not original; it is of the same class with the forty-bale theory. He tells us that Mississippi exports to the amount of $16,000,000 a year, and consequently must import to that amount, and if she were to retain the revenue derived from that importation there would be $4,000,000 paid into her treasury. Now, the duties collected in the whole of the United States are estimated at about $16,000,000, and, however ingeniously and correctly gentlemen may place their figures, it is rather imposing too great a tax on our credulity to tell us that Mississippi pays one-fourth of the duties on the importations into the United States. It is no less difficult to believe that she consumes one-fourth of all those importations—which must be the case if she consumes to the amount of sixteen millions. Instead of consuming sixteen millions, two millions will come much nearer her proportion, and about half a million her part of the revenue. These two millions are, perhaps, the whole of the crop she can call her own. The other fourteen millions must be set down in favor of the other States, North, West, and South. The North furnishes American manufactures, capital, transportation, and foreign articles at second-hand; the West, provisions; the Southern States not engaged in planting furnish slaves. Now, deduct the annual expenses from the gross amount, and then we shall be able to see the portion which, in point of fact, belongs to Mississippi. This great staple is, for the greater part, purchased as a remittance towards paying for the general consumption of foreign articles. It is a joint production; the mere labor of the cultivator of the soil forms but one item. Suppose, says the gentleman from Mississippi, she were an island in the ocean, and produced her sixteen millions worth of cotton. This would not vary the case. She must either, in addition to the production of cotton, supply herself with all those articles she now procures from the Northern and Western States, or she must be dependent as she is now. It is very possible she may consume an amount equal to the value of her cotton crop, and more too, but not of foreign importations. The whole system is no doubt wrong—Southern gentlemen are well aware of it. It is impossible to remedy it entirely, but the evil might be lessened if it were possible for each planter to raise less cotton, and apply a part of his land to the raising of provisions, and employ a part of his laborers in domestic manufactures.

Having lived many years in the South, I feel a sincere interest in the prosperity of that portion of the Union, and an affection for many of its citizens. The opinions which I have expressed on the subject of the tariff, I have long entertained, and have been confirmed in them by my residence in the South. I have often disputed the policy of going altogether for cotton, and nothing but cotton. I was of opinion that their agricultural occupations should be more varied, and that they should endeavor to introduce new staples. The article of silk, for instance, is well adapted to the greater part of the South. Virginia and the Carolinas may become the Italy of America in respect to this valuable production. The silk of Italy may be found in the marts of England and France, and at the fairs of Germany, commanding a regular and steady price, the supply always below the demand; and this, perhaps, of all the products of human economy, approaches nearest in its permanent and intrinsic value to gold and silver. I have been long convinced that the Southern States do not make use of their natural advantages. They have water-power, raw materials, and other advantages, and yet they have been slow in developing the great natural resources of the fine region they occupy. I believe, however, that the day is approaching when they will turn their attention to their true interest—and to see it, will be to pursue it. I unite with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. POPE,] whose experience and mature judgment entitle him to great respect, and request the gentlemen of the South not to be too implacable on the subject of protection. The time may come when they may need it, and the Northern States be indifferent about it. There is one great Southern interest which now calls for the fostering care of the Government—I allude to the article of tobacco. If there be a reasonable hope of compelling foreign nations, by means of countervailing duties, to adopt a more liberal policy, I am for trying the experiment. According to my opinion, it is the duty of the Government to foster and protect every branch of industry, commercial, manufacturing, or agricultural, where it can be done by wise legislation, taught by our own experience and that of other nations. It is not because the South is the South, that it disdains protection; Louisiana, for instance, has always been a tariff State, on account of the protection to her sugars. I contend that even the article of cotton is indirectly protected by the indirect advantages it derives from the extension of the market here and elsewhere.

We have heard much of late years of the theory of free trade, which no nation practises, as it exists between the different States of this Union. It is the doctrine of the Swiss school of abstract political economists, and it is the fashionable doctrine. Foreign nations are continually preaching it to each other, but none set the example; on the contrary, their practice is directly opposite. England is willing to open her ports, where the foreign article cannot compete with the same article produced there, where even the cost of transportation is a protection, together with the excise levied on her own manufacture, from which the foreign article would not be exempted. She does this with twenty per cent. higher wages than the manufacturers on the continent, by means of her immense capital, the superior skill and intelligence of her workmen; and that superior skill is the offspring of liberty. In the latter respect we have the advantage over Britain, and can compete with her with higher wages; and but for her great advantage in respect of capital, we could go ahead of her. The smaller the capital, the larger must be the profit, as we see from the huckster with a hundred per cent. to the wholesale dealer who is content with five or ten. It is this vast capital which makes the power of Britain, and from which protection is necessary on our part, as much for the sake of the country as of the manufacturers. Lord Brougham declared in the House of Commons that it was the policy of England to break down our manufactures at any sacrifice, in order, as he was pleased to say, to preserve the natural course of things; that is, to keep us dependent on England, which, to my mind, is a very unnatural course of things. Switzerland, which is cited as an example for us, is in a situation entirely different. Her superior intelligence and skill render the surrounding nations tributary to her, notwithstanding the poverty of her soil, and the bleakness of her mountains. All her people are engaged in manufactures, more or less, as they are in our New England States. Instead of attempting to tariff out the productions of France, Germany, Austria, and Sardinia, it is the policy of those States to tariff in those of Switzerland. A Swiss statistical writer* thus expresses himself, and complains of the hard fate of his country, because the surrounding nations are unwilling to be overrun with their watches, ribands, toys, and a thousand articles, which throw the balance on the side of Switzerland: "The prohibitive systems, adopted by a great number of the neighboring Powers, injure and interfere with her essentially." This, no doubt, is felt as very unnatural by the Swiss; but it is considered quite natural by her neighbors.

Mr. Chairman, there is a principle of political economy which, if not found in any system, deserves to be. I have not met with it in Adam Smith, in Say, Professor Wayland, or in any other writer, and yet I do not lay claim to originality. It is simply this: that, as a general rule, labor commands a compensation in proportion to the degree or amount of mind combined with it. This may be referred to the self-evident proposition, that mind is superior to matter. Take, for instance, the article of cotton itself, and compare the share of it which is earned by the gin, and then take the amount of mere manual labor employed at the gin, compared to that of raising and preparing the cotton for the mechanical operation. The case of sugar is still stronger. The mere culture of the cane, the cutting and transporting it, are among the simplest kinds of labor, requiring little more than mere animal strength; but the process of manufacturing the sugar calls for science and art. There are the machinery for expressing the juice, the kettles for boiling, the employment of the steam-engine, and the distillation of the liquid poison from the molasses; these require mind and the exercise of judgment. The driver of the cart receives four times the wages of the horse, without one-tenth of the physical strength, because mind is required for his labor, which the other does not possess. The work of the mechanic is better paid than that of the common laborer; the merchant, the professional man, better than the mechanic. This is the reason why the mere products of the soil, where no extraordinary skill is required, are more poorly paid, in proportion to the labor bestowed, than any other. We may rely upon it, that that nation which combines the highest degree of mind in her operations will hold others dependent upon it; and if we desire to lessen our dependence on England or France, we can only do so by keeping pace with them in the march of mind.

When gentlemen declaim so earnestly against the protective legislation of the United States, they seem to forget with whom it originated. Permit me to take a short review of its history. From the time of the passage of the first act of Congress for revenue and protection, so expressed in its title, until the administration of Mr. Jefferson, our manufactures had made considerable progress, compared to the state of things before that time. A variety of manufactures had been firmly established; still they fell far below the wants of the country. Our enterprise was chiefly directed to foreign commerce, and especially the carrying trade, which would cease with the return of peace. But when the rival nations vied with each other in spoils on our commerce, we began to look out for safe employment for our capital accumulated in trade. The non-intercourse, embargo, and war, taught us to see our weakness, and dependence on foreign countries for the most necessary and common articles of manufacture. Necessity compelled us to establish manufactures, and capital was invested in them which could find no other employment. And, permit me to ask, in whose hands was the Government at this time? In the hands of Southern statesmen, who carried their measures by the votes of the Western and Middle States. They were the authors of the war; it was their policy which drove the Northern people to manufactures. At the close of the war, it was found that an astonishing progress had been made in manufactures, and that a large amount, withdrawn from trade, had been invested in them. These establishments were in their infancy, however, and unable to stand the shock of an attack upon them by the powerful British establishments, backed by the British Government. The Southern statesmen, under Mr. Madison's administration, stood up in their defence: it was their policy which had called them into being; it would have been cruel to abandon their own offspring. The tariff of 1816 was the result, and it was so regulated as to afford incidental protection as well as revenue. I cannot erase from my mind the lessons of wisdom I received in listening to the speeches of Mr. Clay, of Mr. Lowndes, and of Mr. Calhoun, when engaged, as it were, in settling the future policy of the nation on what was afterwards called the American System. The report of Alexander Hamilton on manufactures, republished by the House of Representatives in 1809, the report of Mr. Gallatin, explaining his splendid system of internal improvements at the national expense, the recent powerful report of Mr. Dallas in favor of a National Bank, were the text-books of the day in the hands of Southern politicians, with very few exceptions. The war administration of Mr. Madison was still predominant, and it was this Administration which adopted the American system. This phrase has been associated with the name of Mr. Clay. I am sorry to be obliged to pluck a single leaf from the honors which cluster around his brow, but this belongs to another, who is hailed as the apostle of Southern Democracy. Mr. Jefferson thus speaks, in his letter to the "American Society for the Encouragement of Manufactures," and dated June 26, 1817:

"The history of the last twenty years has been a sufficient lesson for us all to depend for necessities on ourselves alone; and I hope that twenty years more will place the American hemisphere under a system of its own, essentially peaceable and industrious, and not needing to extract its comforts out of the eternal fires raging in the old world."

This was addressed to a New England association. In consequence of the act of 1816, capital had been vested in manufactures to a great extent in Maryland, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, as well as in the Northern States. This now seemed to be the settled policy of the nation. And was Mr. Jefferson a false prophet in relation to the effect of the American system during the succeeding twenty years? No, sir, he was not. It paid off two hundred millions of national debt; it applied large sums to the gradual increase of the navy; it laid the foundation of an immense line of fortifications, and completed many of them, along our Atlantic coast, and around our borders; it extinguished the title to a vast amount of the Indian lands; it contributed large sums to internal improvements. And what has the nation done since this system has been abandoned and cried down? Look around upon our whole country and behold its consequences.

Mr. Chairman, the ruinous condition of the country is no longer denied by any one. But we are told by the friends of this Administration that it will be for those coming in to remedy these evils. They say they have promised to do so, and we be to them if they do not keep their promise! Sir, the brand of an idiot boy may destroy in an hour the edifice which called forth the labor of thousands, and required half a century to rear. General Harrison and his Cabinet will do all they can, but they cannot work miracles.* But it is for the people themselves, through their representatives, to apply the best remedy the case will admit. It will be the work of time, and we know not half its difficulty; but, in the language of the Roman patriot, let us never despair of the Republic.

When gentlemen speak of high duties, high tariff, and refer to the tariff of 1828, I must remind them that even that was the work of the South. The high duties were introduced by its enemies, in order to defeat the bill. It was not satisfactory to any party: it was a compound made up both by friends and foes. I must remind those with whom the name of General Jackson still retains some share of popularity, that he was in favor of a protective tariff. He so expressed himself previous to his election; he afterwards spoke of a "judicious tariff," with reference to this subject, and, in one of his Messages, he expressed the opinion that we ought to encourage the manufactures of those articles which would render us independent in time of war. And how shall we determine what those articles are? He could not mean merely the manufacture of gunpowder! Perhaps, without intending it, the passage covers the whole ground of protective duties.

We must go back to the days of James Madison, and endeavor to follow in the footsteps of the great Democratic statesmen of that period, who set

* J. Picot, of Geneva, p. 53.

* Shortly after the election, a Quaker was met by a Locofoco in the street at Philadelphia, and was thus accosted: "Well, friend, I suppose you think General Harrison is going to work miracles." "As to that friend I cannot tell thee, but I incline to think he will have power given unto him to cast out devils."

to work honestly and earnestly to repair the ravages of war, and to place the nation on a solid ground of future prosperity. I have retained the lessons of national wisdom and policy I then imbibed. The experience of the last six years, especially, has not served to change my opinions. What a triumph for Alexander Hamilton, could he have risen from his grave, and have seen his report on manufactures the text-book during the Administration of his great political rival! What a triumph to see the failure of the attempt to destroy that American system which had been sanctioned by Jefferson, by Lowndes, by Clay, by Gallatin, by Dallas, by Calhoun, as well as by others of opposite politics! I was what is called a Jeffersonian Democrat, a supporter of the embargo and the war, and by no means free from prejudice against Alexander Hamilton. I have carefully studied the rival productions of those two great men—the report of Mr. Jefferson on commerce, and that of Hamilton on manufactures; and these, with the report of Mr. Gallatin on internal improvements, and that of Mr. Dallas on a National Bank, are, in my opinion, among the best works that can be placed in the hands of a young American statistic. I by no means give the praise of superior foresight and sagacity to Hamilton over Jefferson. These two great men regarded the same subject from different points of view. If Jefferson had been a New Yorker, he might have written the report on manufactures; and if Hamilton had been a Virginian, he might have produced the report on commerce. Hamilton regarded manufactures as the true basis of commerce. The very instrument of commerce before his eyes, the ship, was itself the most important of all manufactures—the master-piece of the arts, and the ne plus ultra of science. Mr. Jefferson lived in a country depending entirely on foreign commerce, and with only two great staples to support it—wheat and tobacco. It was natural for him to suppose that the exports would command the imports, and where these would centre there would be the great mart of trade. I am informed he at an early period entertained the opinion that Norfolk would be what New York has since become. And if his theory had been correct, such would have been the result. But it was erroneous; Norfolk was not, like New Orleans, the sole depot of a vast interior. Beyond the local exports and imports, commerce on a large scale requires ships, seamen, accumulated active capital; and these are not likely to be found in communities who devote their energies to the cultivation of the soil, and have no manufactures, fisheries, or internal trade.

I have taken much of the time of the House in discussing the subject of the tariff; my excuse is, that it is one of deep interest to my constituents. They believe that it is in some way owing to a want of a proper adjustment of the tariff, for the purpose of protection, that their manufactures have declined, and many of them have been prostrated. The details of this protection are by no means settled. Many individuals, and I am of the number, attach more importance to the derangement of the currency than to the operation of the tariff, although I am convinced it requires to be revised. Of what avail is it to the manufacturer that he has his warehouse full of manufactured articles, if those who are anxious to purchase are unable to procure a proper currency? Some of our manufacturers pay annually from a thousand to three thousand dollars in exchanges. They depend on the internal trade, and that cannot be carried on without a currency. There is a falling off in every kind of business, for the same reason. The amount of specie is admitted to be insufficient for the wants of a new and growing country and an enterprising people. A mixed currency of specie and sound paper is indispensable. The State banks cannot furnish a currency for general circulation. Since the Administration began its tinkering with the currency, and its partisans have been engaged in crying down banking institutions, specie has been regularly exported, and the paper currency has been growing less and less safe. In the general demoralization, it is highly probable, also, that many abuses may have crept into the management of these banks. But it is impossible, where there are so many States creating banks, and the character and solvency of those banks so various, to furnish any thing like a uniform currency. It would be the same thing if they were so many different mints, with different coinage and alloy. The effect on internal trade and on every branch of business during this disordered state of the currency, is well described in the masterly work of Mr. Prescott, the History of Ferdinand and Isabella.

"Under Henry IV of Castile, it is computed there were no less than one hundred and fifty mints openly licensed by the Crown, in addition to many others erected by private authority. The abuse came to such a height, that the people at length refused to receive, in payment of their debts, the debased coin, whose value depreciated more and more every day; and the little trade which remained at Castile, WAS CARRIED ON BY BARTER AS IN THE PRIMITIVE AGES."—Prescott, 1 vol. 224

The remedy for this was making a monopoly of the coinage in the Crown, just as we made it a monopoly under our Federal Constitution. In the Swiss cantons, the same inconvenience would be experienced, with their twenty or thirty different kinds of money, but for the circumstance of their having an ideal money, and also using bills of exchange and paper of various kinds. If bank notes will still continue to be regarded as money by us, it must, like the coinage, be in some mode a monopoly in order to give it uniformity and certainty of value. This has been twice accomplished successfully without an absolute monopoly, by creating an institution under the authority of the General Government, which has controlled and regulated those established by the States. This institution has been found the only safe and convenient fiscal agent. One kind of money for the Government and another for the ordinary transactions of the community, you may rely upon it, will never answer. It was the last desperate resort of the present Administration, because it had failed in its other projects, and knew not what else to do. It cut itself loose from the people, and with its empty Sub-Treasury chest is now moving in one direction, while the Democracy is moving in another.

When the late Administrations were told that their measures would ruin the currency, they indignantly repelled the idea, and boldly declared that they would preserve it in a state as sound as they found it, and even make it better. When it was actually deranged, they were the last to admit the fact; and when, at length, it was felt and lamented by every man engaged in honest and regular business, they suddenly became the loudest in crying out that the currency was ruined. But who ruined it? They say, the money power. According to them, this is some foul and ugly fiend, which walks abroad in the dim twilight, with its settled abode, without defined shape or form, but busy in working mischief to the sons of men. It is a sort of money goblin. But, according to others, it has its seat and residence in Wall street: it is that speculating, heartless money power, which fattens upon the embarrassments and distresses of sober industry, and on the destruction of all regular business and sound credit. It causes the disease, and then renders itself necessary to the diseased. It is in the hands of the brokers, the stock-jobbers, and exchange dealers, who have instigated the ruinous measures of the General Government. There is the real money power, the greater part foreign, too, rejoicing in the downfall of our prosperity, and glutting themselves on the spoils of a ruined currency. For years has this power been systematically working its way, like some foul disease in the human constitution. Twelve years ago, I travelled in company with an agent of one of the Wall street establishments from Charleston to Norfolk. He inveighed bitterly against the United States Bank, which surprised me, because I had heard no one else speak against it. The reasons which appeared to influence him had a different effect on my mind; the currency was not lamentably healthy; the field for money brokers was almost closed! And then the Southern banks were hostile also, because their issues returned upon them every six months; the far South could not establish real estate banks, instead of specie banks; the West was checked in the establishment of new banks! From that time I carefully marked every step in the progress of the war on the National Bank, and knew its source. A being, whom

I hold in such detestation that I will not name him, was in my opinion the instrument, the pensioned instrument, employed to win the ear and kindle and feed the ire of that unhappy old man, who, for our sins, was placed at the head of this Government. Under that influence, the legislation of this once prosperous and growing country was forced out of its natural and well defined channel, and lost among shallows and quicksands. The safe barriers were broken down; the country has been flooded by unsafe stock institutions, and disorder and confusion now reign supreme. And what a harvest, what a field for that moneyed power of brokers and shavers! And yet we hear both those who are the victims, and those who are the accomplices of this power, cry out, The currency is ruined, the currency is ruined—the money power has ruined us! Yes, but I repeat the question, Who are the authors of this ruin? The Wall street brokers are the principal authors of it. The nation must open its eyes to the truth at last, and turn its attention to the real authors of this ruin—the money brokers, and the corrupt party politicians.

DEBATE ON THE TREASURY NOTE BILL.

REMARKS OF MR. PRENTISS,

OF VERMONT,

IN SENATE, FEBRUARY 12, 1841.

The following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. PRENTISS, coming up for consideration, viz.

Resolved, That the act entitled An act granting half-pay and pensions to certain widows, approved July 7, 1838, ought not to be construed to derive any widow its benefits in consequence of her having married after the decease of the husband for whose services she may claim to be allowed a pension or annuity under said act, provided she was a widow at the time the same was passed; and that the Committee on Pensions be instructed to report a bill to that effect.

Mr. PRENTISS said that he had been induced to present the subject in the general and compendious form of a resolution, in order to obtain the sense of the Senate upon it in a more summary and expeditious way than he could otherwise do, and to save the necessity, which he was always desirous to do, of special legislation in particular cases. There were several cases before the Committee on Pensions, depending on the construction of the act of 1838, granting annuities of pensions to certain widows whose marriage took place before the year 1794, but not early enough to bring their cases within the pension act of 1836. The cases to which he referred, were cases where the applicants were widows at the time of the passage of the act, and were still so, but had been married a second time, and on that account their applications had been rejected at the Pension office. It seemed that, according to the construction which had been given to the act, if the widow of an officer or soldier of the Revolution had married a second time she did not come within the act, and was not entitled to its benefits, although she was a widow at the time the act was passed. The subsequent intervening marriage, though long since dissolved, was held to deprive her of all right under the act. It was this construction which was complained of in the petitions before the committee, and to bring the matter before the Senate for its consideration and speedy action was the specific purpose of the resolution.

The doctrine which had obtained at the Pension Office, Mr. P. said, appeared to him to be clearly erroneous, and wholly unsustainable. He was at a loss to know on what reasoning, or upon what principle or rule of interpretation, it had been adopted. Was it that by the second marriage the woman ceased to be a widow and became a wife, and that, on the death of the second husband, she became his widow, and could not be regarded or treated as the widow of the first and so did not come within the letter of the law? A wife he supposed, was a woman who had a husband; and a widow he took it, was a woman whose husband was dead. The same woman might be a wife many times, and of course might be a widow many times; but however often she might marry and become a widow, she lost none of the rights belonging to her in any instance in that character, or attached to or growing out of that relation at any time it may have existed. A second marriage did not take away her right of dower as widow of the first husband. Her right in his estate still continued; and though the control of it might be vested in the second husband during the marriage, yet, when that ceased, she had the sole dominion over it as at first. Her choses in action, her rights of action, and all her former rights, left unappropriated by the husband, survived to her. The marriage did not extinguish, but operated merely as a suspension of these and other rights during its continuance. In cases arising under pauper laws, on the dissolution of the marriage, the settlement derived from the husband ceased, and the maiden settlement revived and returned to the widow. If she had been married twice, and both husbands had died, she was the widow of each of them, and might claim as the widow and in the right of either. It did not follow from this that, under the pension laws, she could claim and have two pensions. The laws did not allow a double pension to one and the same person. If she came within the act of 1836, she could not claim under the act of 1838; for the latter law provided only for such cases as were not embraced in the former. But if it was otherwise, and she might claim in the right of the first husband under one act, and in the right of the second husband under the other act, such result, if the legitimate effect of the laws themselves, could not authorize or excuse a construction at variance with the express terms and plain meaning of the acts. The general rules of law applicable to the subject were therefore clearly against the construction which had been adopted. But the question, after all, depended upon the act itself. And what did the act say?

"That if any person who served in the war of the Revolution in the manner specified in the act passed the seventh day of June, 1832, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution,' have died, leaving a widow, whose marriage took place after the expiration of the last period of his service, and before the first day of January, 1794, such widow shall be entitled to receive, for and during the term of five years from the fourth day of March, 1836, the annuity or pension which might have been allowed to her husband, in virtue of said act, if living at the time it was passed: Provided, That, in the event of the marriage of such widow, such annuity or pension shall be discontinued."

Now, what facts, Mr. P. would ask, were necessary to bring a case within the terms and meaning of the act? Why, 1. That the officer or soldier for whose services the annuity was claimed served in the war of the Revolution in the manner prescribed in the act; 2. That he died leaving a widow; and, 3. That the applicant was the person so left a widow—her marriage having taken place within the time specified, and she being a widow at the time of passing the act, and still remaining so. These were the essential requisites of the act; and, when they were made out, a clear case was made out, within the very terms of the law.

What (Mr. P. would ask again) did the act say? Why "that, if any person who served in the war of the Revolution, &c. have died, leaving a widow, whose marriage took place, &c. such widow," that is the person so left a widow, "shall be entitled," &c. The expression "such widow" was descriptive of person, and denoted the woman who was the wife of the officer or soldier who had served as required, and was left by him a widow. Apply the same phraseology to other subjects, and how would it be understood? Suppose it should be enacted, and Mr. P. believed the statutes of some of the States did so enact in terms, that if any person should die intestate, leaving a widow, such widow should be entitled to dower in her deceased husband's estate: no one, it would seem, would be at a loss to know what was meant by such an enactment, or would allow himself to think for a moment that the right of dower, although it was a right resting in action only, would be lost by a second marriage, or that the woman would be incapable of asserting her right in the first husband's estate as his widow, because she had married again and become the widow of a second husband. It was further to be observed, that the widow was to have "the annuity or pension which might have been allowed to her husband, if living;" that is, which might have been allowed to the person who served in the war of the Revolution, and died leaving her a widow. The husband's services were the meritorious cause or consideration of the annuity, and it was intended to give to the person who had been his wife, and become his widow, the same annuity or pension he would have been entitled to if he had not survived him.

Such (Mr. P. said) would appear to be the only exposition which the act was capable of receiving. The right to the annuity was given in absolute terms, to be held and enjoyed for the term of five years, subject only to the condition "that, in the event of the marriage of such widow, such annuity or pension shall be discontinued." The condition was a condition subsequent, depending on a contingency afterwards to happen. In the event of a future marriage, the annuity was to be discontinued: in other words, it was not to go to the future husband, but to cease. This was the only condition the act contained; and it was a rule of interpretation that the expression of one condition or exception was an exclusion of all other conditions or exceptions. The maxim, expressio unius est exclusio alterius, applied to things as well as to persons. To deprive an applicant, then, of the annuity, on account of her having married a second time, she being a widow at the time the act was passed, and still continuing unmarried, was nothing short of an arbitrary and unwarrantable introduction, by way of construction of a new condition, or rather exception, into the act.

The act of 1838 was a literal transcript of the act of 1836, with this difference only, that the act of 1836 required the marriage to have taken place before the expiration of the last period of the husband's service, and gave the pension to the widow during the time she should remain unmarried. In no other particular whatever, except these two, was there even the slightest verbal variance between the two acts. The form of expression throughout both was otherwise exactly the same; and it was worthy of special notice, that it having been held by the Executive officers, under the act of 1836, that an intervening second marriage deprived the widow of the pension given by it, Congress, in 1837, passed an explanatory act, declaring that the benefits of the act of 1836 should not be withheld from any widow in consequence of her having married after the decease of the husband for whose services she might claim to be allowed a pension, provided she was a widow at the time the act was passed. It could hardly have been expected, after this declaratory act, this legislative expression of the sense and meaning of the act of 1836, that the act of 1838 would receive a construction which had been repudiated by Congress in reference to an act in language identically the same.

The question (Mr. P. said) was not whether the act of 1838 was founded in justice or policy, whether it was expedient or inexpedient, or whether it ought to have been passed or not. The act was the law of the land, and the question was, whether the law should be administered fairly and impartially, and be executed in good faith, according to its plain meaning and intention.

SPEECH OF MR. MONROE,

(OF NEW YORK.)

In the House of Representatives, February 3, 1841.—On the bill providing for an issue of Treasury notes. The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, [Mr. CASEY, of Illinois, in the chair.] on the bill to authorize an issue of Treasury notes; and the question being on the motion to strike out the enacting clause:

Mr. MONROE rose and said: Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to debate this bill. I had hoped it would have been suffered to pass with such discussion as had been given to it by the Committee of Ways and Means. But, contrary to my expectations and my hopes, the debate has taken a very great latitude. Gentlemen have discussed the Florida war; they have discussed the tobacco trade; they have discussed the policy of General Harrison's administration in advance, without pretending to know what that policy will be; in short, topics of all kinds have been brought to bear upon the consideration of this bill, many of them having not the slightest legitimate connection with it. I am not myself disposed to take up more than twenty or thirty minutes of the time of the committee. I find, from the statements made by the regular organ of the Administration in this House, the Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. JONES,] that the Government is without the necessary funds to carry on its operations; and much as I am opposed to this plan of issuing Treasury notes, (to which I am in principle opposed,) yet we seem reduced to the alternative either of suffering the wheels of Government to stand still, without the means to pay its honest debts, or of resorting to this plan of raising immediate funds for its support.

The Administration party in this House tell us that you cannot raise money by any other mode in time to meet the exigency. I deny it. If you would issue Government bonds, bearing interest at 5 per cent. I have no doubt that they could be disposed of freely at any moment in the money markets of the United States. I do not question that you could raise twenty millions of dollars, if you needed it, within thirty days. But that would not answer the object of the Administration party in this House. They desire no national debt; you must not give this thing the name of a loan—for that, they tell you, would be creating a national debt; whereas, by issuing Treasury notes, you are but using the faith of the Government for the purpose of anticipating its resources a short time. I will not detain the committee with any disquisitions on that point. I find that the Government is without the means of paying its just debts. I am desirous to grant those means in some form or other, and I am not inclined to make war upon an Administration now about to resign its power. We have had enough of that; for the last eight or ten years, denunciations have been dealt out with an unsparing hand. They may retire, so far as I am concerned, without denunciation. I make none; I have disapproved their measures; I have opposed them to the best of my ability; the people have rendered a verdict against them, and I, for one, am willing that they should go in peace. I do not approve the course which has been adopted towards that party. I think they should have been permitted to go out of power with all the quietness and decency possible. I have no wish to assail them. I know that there are many honest men of that party, in this House and this nation, who differ honestly with me, and who, I believe, would not remain a single hour in the ranks of that party if they did not believe its motives to be pure and its intentions honest. If I believed that a majority of the two great parties now so nearly balanced, in opposing each other, must necessarily oppose the institutions and the welfare of our country, I would not live in the land. Pride of opinion, we know, induces men to go further in their support of measures and men than their candid judgment will sanction. They go along, step by step, until at last it is impossible for them to proceed with their own approbation, or to retrace their steps without incurring reproach and denunciation. I have no desire to touch the acts of this Administration until General Harrison shall take the place to which the people have called him. If there is the corruption in the several departments which we believe to exist, let us wait only a short time and we shall know its extent; and I believe that the Whig party will carry out in sincerity and good faith the reforms to which it has pledged itself before the whole people.

Gentlemen have thought proper to take up the time of the committee for several days past in "defining their positions." I wish they had not done so, because the business of the country might have gone on more rapidly; but, as the example has been set, I must consume a few minutes in "defining my position" also. In doing this, I shall speak for myself alone—I shall not speak for General Harrison. Of his opinions and intentions I know no more than any other individual here; and I shall leave his acts and his measure to be passed upon when they shall be laid before the country. Of one thing, however, I am satisfied—that, be those acts or measures what they may, General Harrison can do nothing worse than has already been done by those who are about to resign their power into his hands. Those who have had any acquaintance with my public career, know that I did not enter the ranks of the Opposition from the mere love of opposition. I should have been glad to have seen the last (as well as the present) Administration go on successfully in a course of policy calculated to promote the great interests of this nation, and to have given my feeble support to them. Towards its head I have always maintained personal good feeling, coupled to an unfeigned solicitude that he might so administer the Government as to secure the great purposes for which it was designed. Believing that he had not done so, I early threw myself into the Opposition against General Jackson's administration. I believed that he was usurping all the doubtful powers of the Constitution, and I went against him. And when the present Administration came into power, had they done what was right, I would have gone with them. I have, therefore, gone with General Harrison; I will support his administration just so long as I think it is right, and no longer. I am under no obligation to him or any other man who may be called to the helm of this Government, to support him one hour longer than I can approve his measures and believe that they will promote the interest and the welfare of our common country; no, not a moment. And I care not whether he is in favor of a Bank of the United States—of a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands—or of a tariff; I shall look at his measures as a whole, and, as such, I shall pass my judgment upon them. If I believe that there is enough of good in those measures, I shall support them—if I believe they are fraught with evil, I will oppose them. This has been my uniform course, and I pledge myself to men of all parties that I shall not depart from it for the time to come. I am not going to talk about my patriotism, nor am I willing to judge in advance what are to be the measures of General Harrison; I leave his policy to him, simply remarking that, whatever it may be, I shall watch it narrowly.

The question of the tariff has been brought up during the discussion on this Treasury note bill. I have been a close observer of the course of Southern gentlemen on this floor and elsewhere; and I now say, with all respect, that it is my honest conviction that you cannot get any one Southern man, giving him a week to do it, to bring in a tariff bill which any other Southern man will approve. In other words, I do not believe you can get any two Southern men to agree upon a tariff for this country. Nay, I go further, and say that if, perchance, they should agree upon a bill and should both vote for it, one or the other would, at the very next meeting of Congress, move its repeal or modification. There is a total want of affinity in all their views. The gentleman from South Carolina, near me, [Mr. PICKENS,] asks me whether Northern men can agree? I say, yes; and the reason is to be traced directly to the common school system—to that practical, sound, common sense derived from these schools. And with all the pride which I feel at the recollection that I was born in the South, though at very early years I went to the North, I will say that, notwithstanding all the professions we hear, I do not think that there is any more individual honesty in the South than in the North; I am disposed, however, to give to the South a little more credit for liking constitutional abstractions and for dealing in technicalities, about which, as I have stated, no two men amongst them can agree. They tell you here that they will not go for a duty on silks and wines. Why? "Gentlemen of the South (say they) watch this thing well; these men from the North, who understand their interests better than you do, may commence with a pin, but they will secure a large entering wedge before they have done; be on your guard, therefore." Now, sir, I say that, so far as I know and believe, there is no intention in the North to attempt such a violation of the rights of the South as is here indicated. The simple question is, what will Southern gentlemen on this floor tell us they are willing to tax in order to create a revenue? I want none of their abstractions. I do not want them to tell me that we do not require money. I know as much about that as they do. But, let them tell me what they are willing to tax in order to raise revenue? Let them name the articles; and I will undertake to say that my friends will meet their views, if even they should partially militate against the interests of the North. Let gentlemen from the South name any fair thing, and adhere to it, and we will make a compromise with them! Some years ago they came here and demanded a modification of the tariff, which resulted in the act commonly known as the compromise act. At that time it was urged in the South that luxuries ought to be taxed. Well; the North said, if necessary, tax them. The compromise bill passed, and now the South tells the North, you shall not tax these luxuries, because, though you may commence with a pin, you will make a large entering wedge before you have done. Sir, that is not our mode of proceeding. The North asks the South to adhere to the compromise act; they do not desire to disturb it. But the South comes now and takes a direct issue with the North upon Northern principles, on the score of what? Of the great watchfulness of the South on the tariff question.

There are two subjects which Southern gentlemen on this floor seem extremely tenacious of keeping up. Why, I know not. I admit the generosity, the talent, and the high mindedness of the South; but it would be well, I think, if they could discover some other objects on which to test their abstractions. They have taken up abolition with a great noise, and that matter being about used up, they have gone back and taken Northern ground on the tariff, and assumed that as high-toned Southern ground. We are without revenue; and now the simple question which arises is this: Will the Congress of the United States tax certain articles of luxury (or, if you choose to say manufactures, be it so) for the purpose of raising revenue? We only ask you to name the articles from which revenue shall be derived, because we must have it; no man doubts that, let him read the Secretary's report as much as he pleases. What the amount may be, is not so certain—gentlemen differ about it. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLACK] has proved to the entire satisfaction of himself, and, I suppose, of his political friends, if of no one else, that his object is to avoid increasing the revenue, because, he says, we shall have, in the course of two years, by an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent, a revenue of thirty-two millions of dollars; and he fears, if it is increased, that there will be a scrambling for the loaves and fishes. I have no such fear; at all events, I can assure him that his distinguished friend in the other wing of the Capitol [Mr. CALHOUN] will look warily to that matter at the proper time.

It is not my intention to speak to Southern gentlemen in a disrespectful manner; and had I not myself been born in the South, I would not have spoken so plainly as I have done. But I feel authorized to take great latitude in these matters. I do not come here forgetting that I was born in the South, although I am a representative from a Northern State; nor do I wish to claim any thing from the South beyond what I am willing the South should claim from me. But in telling them that our common schools of the North have enlightened our citizens—that the plain common sense education which we give to our youth has fitted them for the business of the world, and has enabled them to jump over the abstractions with which my friends of the South are eternally annoying themselves and us, I tell them no more than the truth. It was well enough to discuss these things under the colonial system. [Mr. M. here adverted to the course of education pursued under the colonial system, and its effects on the character and minds of the young men of the country, but he was not heard distinctly by the reporter. Mr. M. then proceeded as follows:]

We have all learned that this is a better Government now than it was supposed to be at the time of its formation; and every man of us will rally in its defence, no matter what his education may have been.

There is another thing to be taken into consideration. With all their national feelings, Southern gentlemen may be better read in the Constitution than we are—they watch it with a closer vigilance than we do—as the weaker man will watch the movements of his stronger adversary with a keen and fixed contemplation. The balance of power we know is not exactly even. But let us alone in the North—our eyes are upon you—and we regard your rights much more than you suppose. And although you may understand constitutional questions better than we do in the North, yet, let me say, the North is not less patriotic or less national; and though the men of the North may be very careful of their own interests, yet that they will show as ready a hand, and as good a sword in the common defence as ever the South can boast; that they will give their blood as freely and come up to the line, if need be, in the day of battle, with as little dodging as the South or any portion of it.

One word in relation to protection. In am not in favor of protecting manufactures; but I will take the trouble to show what Mr. Madison thought of that as a question of right. I am not going to discuss the subject. I want nothing of that kind beyond what the compromise act gives us. I have not a dollar in the manufacturing interests. But simply for the purpose of showing what was Mr. Madison's view of the constitutional power, I will read the preamble of the second law passed by Congress in 1789, and which was draughted by him. It is in the following words:

"Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufacturers, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandises imported.

Now, Mr. Madison thought that the right to protect did exist, or he would not have stated so in this law. My friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE] will not gainsay any thing that was ever proclaimed by that illustrious man. And let me say that I myself defer to his authority the more willingly because he did not deal quite so much in abstractions as some gentlemen, professing to be his followers, do.

Mr. WISE here rose, and desired to know whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. MONROE] had been educated in one of the common schools of the North?

Mr. MONROE said he had received precious little education any where, but he knew one thing, that he had lived too long in the South in his early years to have received any thing like a practical education.

Mr. WISE. Then I have had the advantage of the gentleman; for I was educated in the schools of the North.

Mr. MONROE. Then you have had a great advantage over me in having been educated any where. And this accounts for the removal of local prejudices, the liberal feeling, practical deductions and illustrations of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. WISE.] Though I do not concur in whole with his remarks the other day, I confess that I listened with pleasure to them, and that I accorded my approbation to much that fell from him. And here let me say that the honorable gentleman has publicly expressed that which I and many of our friends on this floor in private have declared.

I hope that I shall not be understood as intending, by any remarks I may make in relation to the common schools of the North, to cast any reflection upon my friends of the South. However much my friend from Virginia and myself may differ as to national policy, no one will question his patriotism and purity of intention; and I take pleasure, and it is due to him, to say, that, whatever may be his difference of opinion with political friends, there is no member on this floor who has more the personal confidence, respect, and good feelings of this House, without regard to party, than the gentleman himself.

I have one word to say in reply to my colleague from New York, [Mr. BARNARD.] He has laid down rather a broader basis of action, in the remarks he made, than I am willing to sanction. But he was dealing only in generalities; and I do not doubt that, when he comes to particulars, he and I shall agree perfectly well. There was not much of abstraction, however, in what he said—there was a straightforward candor about it that rather alarmed me. I was a little afraid that he was letting out rather more than General Harrison would venture to confirm. But my colleague can make a speech for himself. We shall be here, I suppose, as we are in New York—we shall have much to do to keep ourselves in power—and all we can say is, that we will sustain General Harrison so long as he is right. New York will not support him if he is in the wrong. She repudiated her own son—notwithstanding State pride and personal good feeling could not have rallied far short of twenty thousand votes in his favor. I cast mine against him with much reluctance. If I could have got from him any thing like the shadow of a promise that he would put away from him the corrupt men (I speak not of his Cabinet) who have been brought into office, and who have introduced into this Government the abuses and iniquities which have so long prevailed it, I would still have gone with him. I do at the same time believe that, had the President known the character of these men, there are nine out of every ten of them whom he would never have appointed. The ratio of qualification has been reduced within ten or twelve years more than 80 per cent.—almost as heavy a ratio as that in which my friend's tobacco [Mr. TRIPLETT] is taxed in France. And I went against Mr. Van Buren because I believed that the great moral principles upon which this Government was based could not be sustained unless our offices were filled with men of talent, capacity, and honesty. Sometimes, to be sure, he has appointed men of talents; in other instances he has jumped over every the ordinary requisites of a common school education; and, in others, he has appointed men to take charge of public concerns whom he would not have entrusted with his own private affairs—men who could not do that which was honest; for my experience teaches me that if men will cheat you before they get into office, they are not apt to let a chance for doing so escape them after.

My Colleague from New York [Mr. BARNARD] has not attempted to compromise any portion of this House, but he has laid down his plans pretty broadly; and I have a word to say as to some of them.

Mr. BARNARD asked the gentleman to specify when, or in what particular, he had laid down too broadly.

Mr. MONROE. I will go into particulars soon; for instance as to internal improvements.

Mr. BARNARD. I know that in various quarters of the House some portion, and probably this portion, of my remarks has been objected to, upon the ground that they were too broad—that I go for too much—for too much expenditure. Now, if the remarks I made here should be written out and published, and gentlemen will do me the justice to look at them, they will find that, from the beginning to the end, I recommended no system of internal improvement whatever. I do complain that this Administration has abandoned a system of works, partly executed, in the midst, and suffered them to run into dilapidation and decay. I do not contend that all the works which have been undertaken should be carried on; probably some of them should be abandoned. But none of us suppose that all should be abandoned, and I am in favor of finishing those which should not. I go for the improvement of harbors and rivers; and whenever the improvement of a harbor or river is conceded by the good sense of the Government, as well as of the whole country, to be proper, I say it should be made. That is my position. But I took no particular ground. I do not specify what the particular improvements are, nor how much money should be expended, nor any thing about them.

I will add that I do not think my friend and colleague will ever find me voting for a single harbor or river which he would not himself go for.

Mr. MONROE. The allusion I made to my colleague [Mr. BARNARD] has answered one good purpose, at least, in bringing him to the floor to explain his own position; and I trust that his explanation will quiet the conscience of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLACK.] I hope it may have that effect, for he really manifested much solicitude on the subject.

[Mr. ALFORD, of Georgia, here addressed the inquiry to Mr. MONROE: What effect do you think a tariff on silks and wines would have on the cotton of my region of country?]

Mr. MONROE. I will answer the inquiry promptly. My friend from Georgia [Mr. ALFORD] endeavored yesterday to get the floor, but did not succeed. I was sorry he did not, because I think, if he had, it would have saved me the necessity of taking it to-day. But as regards the effect which a tax on silks and wines would have on his cotton, I am satisfied that, with all the ingenuity which Southern gentlemen can bring to bear on the subject, and with all the arguments they can possibly advance, they cannot show that it will have any effect in reducing the price of their cotton the smallest part of a farthing; nor do I know that it would have the effect of increasing the price. I cannot see how the thing is possible. Yet this I will say, that if the gentleman from Georgia should succeed in obtaining the floor, and should convince me that such a tax would militate against the South or any of its interests, I will go against it here and elsewhere. But I cannot discover how it can be. I know that, not having the kind of education peculiar to my friends of the South, I may be at fault in these things. But I do say, here in my place, that a tax on luxuries seems to me to be the most equitable that can be devised. I speak of luxuries which the working-classes do not use, and which the wealthy (I will not say the superior classes, for there is no such distinction made by an American) do use. I say luxuries ought to be taxed. Does a laboring man on my farm drink wine habitually? No. Well, I do not want to put a tax upon silks to prevent his wife wearing a silk gown; but where his wife does not buy more than one in a year, and my family buy ten or a dozen to that one, I tax myself; I put that tax where it ought to be. So with wines. When the laboring man drinks no wine, and I drink wine as freely as I desire, I am willing to pay for it—not merely such an amount as will pay the importer, but such an additional amount as will bring revenue into the Treasury, and in some degree relieve the laboring class from taxation. If you want no more money—if your tariff is all right—leave it so. But if you do require money—if your tariff is not adequate to all the indispensable purposes of the Government, then I say I am willing to tax any thing that the South will name; let it be my carriage or my horses, or what it may, I will go with them. But I think they do not treat us with entire fairness in declining to name any one thing on which they are willing a tax should be imposed.

One word further. If your revenue is exactly what it should be now, if you really do not want another dollar, I, for one, would relieve the tax upon certain articles that are now taxed and used by the laboring classes, and I would lay it, where it ought to be laid, upon luxuries, even if I wanted to derive precisely the same revenue we have now, and no more. We have no intention of interfering with the compromise act; no man at the North entertains such an idea—I, at least, never heard of one who did. Every dictate of honor, every principle of justice, every feeling that should exist in the heart of an American, forbids it. But, at the same time, I say to my friends from all parts of the country, if you have deficient funds at the present to answer the current wants of the present year, your duty is not yet ended; you must not stop there. You have other objects to accomplish; you cannot suffer your country to remain in the defenceless condition in which she now is. You are not in a state to meet a foreign foe. If you do that which, I believe, your duty as statesman requires you to do, you will not abandon this Hall without appropriating at least three millions of dollars for the increase of your Navy, and three millions for your fortifications and your harbors. If you have enough for the present moment, be assured you have not enough for the future. You have been fast asleep in all matters connected with your Navy, your Army, your fortifications, and every thing else—as if we never again were to have a war.

I have seen enough of the politics of the world for the last ten years to satisfy me that there are yet enough of bad passions, selfish motives, and restless ambition to bring a war upon us at any moment. I say its flames may be kindled in a moment; that we ought to put our country in a state of preparation for it; and that we are bound to do so. I see, indeed, no prospect of war to-morrow, nor the next day, nor within the year, if you please; but there may be soon—there may be in less than five years. There is no wisdom, there is no policy, in this slipshod mode of legislating for the country—nor is there any necessity for it. It is disreputable, it is unworthy the Representatives of a free people; and I will go for an increase of the revenue for the purpose of putting our country in a state of defence, whenever we can do so without a violation of the compromise act. I have no predilection for being whipped by a foreign foe; but whipped we certainly shall be one of these days if a war should come and find us in the defenceless condition in which we now are. I am no alarmist. If a war comes, I shall take my chance; but I say that we ought to raise a revenue from some source for the purpose of placing our Army or Navy, and our coast defences in a proper condition. I am not in favor of an unnecessary increase of the Army, but I wish to see it in a proper condition; I wish to put our forts in a state of defence; I wish to build steam-ships, to be ready in case of need; and, if not needed, and they rot, why, supply their places with others.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to consume more of the time of the Committee. I have already said much more than I intended. I will not now say any thing as to a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, nor will I enter into any discussion upon the Florida war, and all such matters. I will conclude by saying that, though I know nothing of the policy which General Harrison intends to pursue, yet I shall support him and his measures so long as I believe them to be conducive to the public good. I hope he will take his course firmly, and with a single eye to the welfare of his country. I believe that, if Mr. Van Buren had done so—if he had directed his attention more to the discharge of his duty to the Constitution and the laws, and less to his own political prospects—if he had looked more to our foreign policy and less to his own domestic policy—I say I believe he would not now have been called upon, by the overwhelming voice of the freemen of this land, so soon to descend from his high political station. I trust his example may serve as a beacon to all who may succeed him.

DEBATE ON THE TREASURY NOTE BILL.

[SPEECH OF MR. WISE,

OF VIRGINIA.

In the House of Representatives, January 27, 1841—
On the bill providing for an issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. WISE, having obtained the floor on the question to strike out the enacting clause of the bill to authorize an issue of Treasury notes, in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, rose and said—

Mr. Chairman: Before I proceed to discuss the question before the committee, I beg leave to prove a fact which I stated the other day, by the permission of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] when he had the floor, and which, I am informed, was contradicted by a member from Ohio, [Mr. DUNCAN,] when I was not in my seat.

The gentleman from New York was speaking of facts in his possession going to show that there is an unknown, unliquidated amount of public debt now outstanding, and the payment of which has probably been postponed by the present Administration, to fall upon those who are to succeed. As corroborating and establishing this fact, I obtained the gentleman's permission to state that, during the last fall's political campaign, I had put into my hands two circulars, signed by the superintendent of works at Old Point Comfort and the Rip Raps, notifying the owners of slaves who were laborers on those works that these laborers would not be paid until the first day of January thereafter, or, perhaps, not until the first day of April next; and further, that the pay of the laborers, after a given day, would be reduced from sixty to fifty cents per diem. In verification of this statement I now produce, from the Richmond Whig of the 25th inst. the following as a true copy of the circulars I saw addressed to different individuals:

"ENGINEER'S OFFICE,
"OLD POINT COMFORT, August 18, 1840.

"SIR: You are hereby informed that the laborers employed on the fortifications in Hampton Roads will not be paid until the 1st day of January, or, should the Government prefer it, until the 1st day of April next.

"You are also informed that, under the present circumstances, the pay of the laborers, after the 1st day of September next, will be fixed at fifty cents per day, instead of sixty cents, which is now paid for them.

"I am, with respect, sir, your obedient servant,

"R. E. DE RUSSY, Lieut. Col. Engineers.
"To Mr. Wm. JENNINGS, Hampton."

Two circulars like this, in every word and figure, were placed in my hands at Hampton, and I have one now, in manuscript, signed by this same officer, Lieut. Col. R. E. De Russy, who, I am confident, would not have issued such circulars without authority from the War Department. In vindication, sir, of that officer, I now ask my honorable colleague [Mr. JONES] whether he knows that the Secretary of War did cause to be issued authority for this circular?

[Mr. JONES of Virginia said that, after a conversation with his colleague, [Mr. WISE,] he [Mr. JONES] had called on the Secretary of War to ascertain the facts of the case; he had expected that he should, ere this, have received a written communication on the subject; he had, however, understood the Secretary of War to state that, under the power conferred upon the President by the act of the last session, to postpone the appropriations for fortifications, &c. written instructions were given to the superintendents of the works from which it was proposed to withhold the appropriations, to discharge the laborers employed on them; retaining as many as might be necessary to preserve and take care of a large amount of perishable property belonging to the United States. That this course was rendered necessary in consequence of an apprehended deficiency in the Treasury, which would put it out of the power of the Department to advance funds for these objects, until the 1st of January, 1841, or the 1st of April; and that the laborers employed should have notice of these instructions, as well as the owners of slaves, where slaves were employed, and that it was at the earnest request of the laborers themselves, that they were allowed to go on, with a distinct understanding that they would not be paid until either the 1st of January or the 1st of April, at the pleasure of the Government. As to the reduction of wages, of which his colleague spoke, he had called the attention of the Secretary to that subject also; and his answer was, that there existed no good reason, in his opinion, why the persons employed on the public works should be paid higher wages than were received by those doing like service in other places; and that the wages paid were a full equivalent for the services performed.]

Mr. WISE. I thank my colleague for his frank answer, which confirms my statement, and shows that Lt. Col. R. E. De Russy had authority for issuing this circular. My object was to show by the statement that there is an outstanding public debt—unknown, unliquidated, unmeasured. But I now go further, and say that payment for work and labor done and performed and for goods furnished for Government has been postponed without notice to creditors before the work was done, or the goods furnished. I have a witness on this floor who, I believe, is himself a public creditor, without notice before the debt was contracted, to whom payment has, in like manner, been postponed. I refer to my colleague from the Norfolk district, [Mr. MALLORY,] and ask him to state whether such be not the fact.

[Mr. MALLORY, in answer to the call of his colleague, observed that the statement made by Mr. WISE, save in one particular, was substantially correct. The Government was not indebted to Mr. M. for any thing, whatever it might be to his neighbors. The circular just read to the House he could vouch for, having seen several last summer in the hands of his constituents, who were not a little surprised at the notice, but who, having received their slaves for the purpose of working on these fortifications, had no choice left but to keep them at home in idleness, or to trust the United States for their wages. The officer superintending these works, he well knew, had not acted without instructions from headquarters, and he felt assured that his neighbors had made no such application as that alluded to in the letter of the Secretary of War read at the Clerk's desk a few days ago. This postponement proceeded, doubtless, from the "tightness in the Treasury," to use the words of his colleague, [Mr. JONES] and to show how great was this "tightness," Mr. M. stated that he had been informed by those in whom he placed every reliance, that the bread and meat furnished on Government account to the laborers on these works was not even paid for, to say nothing of the wages of these men, which remained unpaid since August last. But the "tightness in the Treasury" went even further than this postponement of the price of labor and bread. A bill of $9 for surveying a small piece of land, purchased by the United States for the use of Fort Monroe, was presented, and payment deferred for the want of funds. This he had from the surveyor himself, a few days before leaving home. Mr. M. said he had been wont to charge the honorable Secretary of the Treasury with permitting a habit of "looseness" (as Mr. V. M. Garreche would say) to work on the Treasury, but he regretted this running into another extreme, which had occasioned a tightness that greatly incommoded and injured those in Government employ.]

Mr. WISE. It matters not, sir, whether the postponement of payment was for work done, or to be done; the work is done by this time, and the payment is postponed. I have proved more than all I stated. I do not usually attempt to prove my assertions. I have taken the trouble to do it in this instance, because I am informed that a communication directed to the member from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] from the Secretary of War seemed to contradict my statement.

[Here several gentlemen said to Mr. WISE, "No, it is only substantially the same as what Mr. JONES says, which confirms your statement."

Mr. WISE continued. I have never seen or heard it, nor do I care what it contains. I should not be surprised if it contradicted not only my statement, but the Hon. Secretary's own statement to my colleague, [Mr. JONES,] as well as the files of the Department itself. No matter what is its character for veracity, I like not the mode in which it comes before this committee. This is not the first time that, whilst a debate has been pending here or in the House, the practice has been pursued of running off to the Heads of Departments to get written, unofficial communications to contradict or to puzzle members. These Secretaries had much better come at once, like royal Ministers, into the Commons, budget in hand, where they can be catechised and cross-examined upon the evidence in their possession, which they may now hold back or reveal at will, as may suit their purposes to conceal or disclose. We have had, during the last summer, an example of how this power has been abused by this same Secretary. This is a bad practice, and ought to be abolished. I am also informed that, in my absence from my seat, the member from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] made some personal allusion to me: that he said, after telling some gentleman he had "gone off half cocked," that I had perhaps "fired before my time." Sir, it matters not what that member says of me. I notice no personalities from that quarter. Some gentlemen know, and it is well they do, that I fire quick, and that I hit, too, when I fire. At all events, I am not one of those old rusty fire-locks which, without flint, or 'steel in the firzen,' are everlastingly snapping, and never fire!

Having cleared the decks of this matter of fact, I now proceed to the regular debate.

Sir, I freely pardon my friend from Kentucky [Mr. PERKINS] for depriving me of the floor. I am sure he intended no injustice or disrespect, and would not have insisted on his claim to the floor if he had understood the case as I did. He was, indeed, from age, experience, and ability, entitled to the precedence of me or almost any other gentleman in the House. I am glad that he preceded me in debate, and that I obtained the benefit of his enlightened views. It is true, as he says, that I am in debt to him for his attention to me on a former occasion—at the called session, near midnight, when, before I commenced a four hours' speech, I invited gentlemen to go home and go to bed. Nearly all accepted my invitation except the gentleman from Kentucky, who, as he says, "sat me out." And, sir, from that time to this, I have always made it my duty and my pleasure, as it was to-day, to "sit him out." He always reminds me of this obligation, and I am always fully repaid by faithfully observing it. Are we now even in compliments? The gentleman nods assent, and I am satisfied.

Sir, though now indisputably entitled to the floor, I know not whether I ought to occupy it. I am physically unfit to talk in this hall for two or three hours. If my own friends had been content to vote in silence, I would have been silent too. I should much have preferred to meet them like brothers apart in caucus, to conciliate our differences, rather than to bring these differences into the collision of debate here.

I regret to take the floor, too, because I am pained to differ from any of my friends. But they have chosen to advance and defend their votes and their views, and have rendered it necessary for me to advance and to defend mine. If they would not remain silent, they must not complain if I speak. If they will attempt to give impression to public opinion, so must I. If they will attempt to manufacture public sentiment here to affect those coming into power, I must in time undeceive those who are soon to become the Executive. If they differ from me, they must not murmur at my differing from them, especially, when no two of them have as yet agreed with each other. If they will debate here, here I am ready to meet them.

I regret, moreover, that I am now compelled to vote for this bill to issue Treasury notes. I shall try to make it as perfect as possible before I do vote for it, by an amendment which I shall offer as soon as the pending motion is disposed of; but, though my amendment should fail, I will vote for the bill as it is. I have always voted against the various bills heretofore to issue Treasury notes. These notes are objectionable on two important grounds. They are too convenient an issue for the economy and republican simplicity of a Government like ours. A Treasury note bill converts the Government into a factory of paper issues, and makes it a spendthrift by too readily facilitating the credit operation of giving a note, instead of paying the debt. Again, by the aid of this machinery to engrave these images of bank notes, the eyes of the people are blinded to the reality of a public debt. I believe, as was said by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. PERKINS,) that many honest, ignorant people, of late, took these notes to be only so much paper money coined by the sub-Treasury; and they could not be persuaded that this Administration, which has been so hypocritically denouncing credit and a public debt, has been all the time it has been in power issuing only evidences of debt, promises to pay, instead of that gold which was promised. Treasury notes are a perfect blind to a public debt. In ordinary times I would prefer always to negotiate a loan, and to appraise the people honestly of a public debt by advertising for a contract of loan. Such a publication in the newspapers would call attention to the condition of the finances, and would wake up the tax payers to the extravagance of Government. But at this time, and under the present emergency, I shall vote for this bill, for three very vital considerations. I shall vote for it—

1st. As the friend of the coming Administration, to provide it with the means immediately necessary to carry on the Government until the next regular session of Congress in December.

2d. To prevent a called session of Congress.

3d. To prevent, during the present year, a premature revision of the compromise tariff act, a premature agitation of the National Bank question, and to prevent the passage of a law at any time to empty an empty Treasury of the revenue derived from the public lands to make a pretext for increasing the tariff, or to increase the tariff to make a pretext for distributing the revenue from lands.

These several reasons I propose to discuss in limine. To discuss them as I have considered them, on mature deliberation.

I say, sir, first, "as a friend of the coming Administration."

Would any one have supposed three months ago, when I was seen bearing the heat and burden of the late election campaign—six years ago, when, from that time to this, I have been bearing the brunt of the colossal tyranny of the two last Administrations—that I—I should have, two months before the next Administration comes in—when all the energies I exerted to bring it in are not yet relaxed—to defend myself against the imputation of not being its friend?

[Here Mr. STANLY said across, "There is no necessity for you to do that."]

Mr. WISE. One of my friends says there is no necessity for such a defence. I know there is not with those who know me. But there are many who do not know me. Some foe-friend or friend-foe may know perhaps that General Harrison himself does not know me; and I will show that there is a necessity for this defence.

In the Richmond Enquirer of the 19th instant, containing a letter from Washington, dated the 14th instant, is the following significant query:

"Would you be surprised to find Wisconsin amongst the opponents of the new Administration? Things more improbable than this have occurred. He is in a terrible rage at the prospect of Rives's election."

This, sir, is the insidious and false dealing of the foe. This was to be expected from this quarter, and to show how little this source of slander knew about me or my acts, I have only to appeal to my friends in the Virginia Legislature, who did me the honor to consult with me on the subject, to prove that, so far from my being "in a terrible rage at the prospect of Mr. Rives's election," I advised those who had ever once voted for him to vote for his election again; and that, too, upon the express ground that it would be seeming treachery in the Whig party now not to elect him, at the same time declaring, however, that, never having voted for his election myself, I never would, if I were in the Legislature; no, not "until the cows came home."

But this imputation of my being a renegade did not originate with my old political foes alone. My real friends have told me that some Whigs had begun to feign to feel a suspicion. That some "busy bodies," no doubt with the deepest interest in me, have been whispering the innuendo, "He is erratic, and delights in opposition; no wonder if he is soon against us!" Sir, let me inform such friends that they are seen and known. Once for all, I pronounce the charge that I am not a sincere and devoted friend of the coming Administration—no matter whether it be made by a Loco Foco, from motives of policy to drive me into his own minority for vengeance sake on account of the past, or by a malicious Whig hypocrite, to destroy an influence, much or little, in the way of his own preferment in future—a base and unfounded slander.

This much I feel constrained to say—not to secure a personal benefit or to prevent a personal injury, but to relieve my arguments, my counsel, and my course with my party from an unjust prejudice. Let him who doubts whether I am a friend of the Whig cause and of a Whig Administration, stand up and show his face! Let me see whether he is one who has, during an eight years' war, been side by side with me in the forlorn hope against the hosts of spoilers, or whether he is one of those "eleventh hour" men who have come into the Whig ranks just in time to share the spoils. Let me see his stripes, his persecutions, his toils, and his sufferings and sacrifices, and compare them with mine, and then I can tell whether he be a better Whig than I am.

Sir, who has the right to question my being a Whig? Who—what one man is it who claims to be the Whig party, with power to excommunicate me? I think I have the right to claim to be the Whig party as much as any other one man in the ranks; and gentlemen had better beware lest they be unchurched themselves before they unchurch me.

One of the richest fruits of our late triumph is, I hope, the restoration of perfect freedom of thought and independence of action. I do not admit that I am acting contrary to my party; but if gentlemen opposed to me are the party, let me tell them at once that I will submit to no party dictation. If the "screws" are to be applied so soon, they will find one Saul "kicking against the pricks"—especially at this time, before the President elect has even reached the metropolis, and before I know that he will approve of a single line of policy which seems so anxious to prescribe for him. Who here undertakes to speak for him? He will speak for himself, sir, and may agree with me, and differ with gentlemen. In what sort of a predicament will they be then? Who, then, will be the party? With those very gentlemen themselves, sir, I will be apt to be the party then, and nine out of ten of them will acknowledge that I am right, and they are wrong.

Sir, that there was a great variety of opinions in the Whig party was known before the election. That party was the opposition, and the opposition always unites discordant materials. The party in power alone can amalgamate its friends into one mass of sentiment and feeling. A party coming into power usually, in taking its direction of policy, dissatisfies a portion of those who brought it in, sloughs them off, and forms new allies from old opponents to supply the defection. This was the case with the party which brought General Jackson into power. He gained friends from among old Federalists faster than he lost Republicans, who placed him in the Presidency. This is not the first time I have been in a large majority, and it was not until the fifth year of the reign of Andrew Jackson that I departed from him, after the bad company had increased too strong for my taste around the throne. During the late contest I urged "a union of the Whigs." I do so still. I desire nothing so much as general and frequent consultation—caucus consultation, if you will, among ourselves, to settle the points upon which we agree, and to "agree to disagree" on those vexed questions which we ought to avoid. Before the election it made no difference with me, sir, whether you were a Republican Whig, a National Republican, or a Nullifier. To each I gave the hand of fellowship cordially, and united heartily with all to pull down a rotten dynasty, worse than any which can be established. We knew our differences beforehand, and each took the chance of his faith and his policy becoming the prevailing faith and policy with the new Administration. Believing General Harrison to be a Republican of the old school, as I believe still, and shall not believe otherwise until he himself undeceives me, I united with all my energy and all my zeal to put him into place and power. Indeed, if I had known he was not of my faith—if I had expected to oppose his Administration the moment after he goes into power, still I would have supported him against the present "powers that be," because "the country might be benefited and could not be worsed." But, sir, I knew that, after he came in, there would be a race between his different supporters as to whose faith and policy should be pursued. I did not expect that race to start before the inauguration, but it has begun. I would have avoided it so soon, forever if I could, but it is on the track, and the contest must be encountered. If one set of friends are busy to engraft their creed upon the Administration stock, so must the others be, unless they mean to desert their principles and to be merged in what will soon get to be called—"the party." I will not desert my principles, sir, and will do all in my power to advance their pre-eminence over all others. Gentlemen must pardon me for this position, when I have caught them first in precisely the same act. Neither of us can say as yet which is "THE PARTY" until the President himself arrives and decides between us.

I am myself, sir, in favor of the Republican policy. There is no prefix to my political name—it has neither "National" or "State Rights" attached, but is simply "Republican." Mr. Madison has ever been the model of statesmen with me, and I am content to follow his examples of wisdom and virtue. And, sir, I will proceed to tell you what I conceive one of the Republican tenets to be. One especially which I shall expect the President to observe is, that he will not be ruled by a party. I repeat it, that I shall expect him not to be ruled by a party! If he is, the country will be misruled, as it has been for twelve years past.

Sir, the late contest resulted precisely as I desired it. One of the greatest achievements of the victory is, that it was not a party triumph. It was a great and glorious national triumph. Gentlemen of the party in power wonder how they were defeated. They are astonished at the number of votes polled—at the increase of votes approaching nearly one million. Sir, I can tell them the reason of this: there is in this country a corps de reserve of wisdom, virtue, and sterling worth and patriotism, who do not usually mingle in the excitement of politics—who avoid the dust of the electioneering arena, and who only come up to the help of the nation, to the rescue of the country, when there is a crisis of real danger. That crisis had come, and this corps of moral power stepped forth and decided the struggle. Old men, whether aristocrats or poor, who had not been seen at the polls for twenty years, came forth—the old, young, lame, halt, blind, rich and poor, of all classes and conditions—who had been merely looking on at the politicians, and taking no part with them, but observing the events and the tendencies of causes only, heretofore—all alike feeling the pressure of necessity, the call for action—all by the impulse of patriotism, not of party, sprang forward to save, to preserve, and relieve our people and their institutions. This, sir, this was the grace and gladness and glory of the late contest for the Presidency. What then is the duty of the President elect? It is to be President of the nation, not of a party! Yes, sir, to be President of the Loco Focos themselves—to be their servant as well as the servant of Whigs—a benefactor and blessing to all, to the whole country. So to be President that even those who voted against him shall exclaim—"It is good for us to have such a man elected, and for the Republicans to succeed!"

Some gentleman whispers that I "expect too much from the President."

[Here Mr. MASON of Ohio rose and said, "No, too much from Government!"]

Mr. WISE. No; I reverse the maxim of "the Government." I will expect every thing, and the nation must never imagine that we can expect too much from the wisdom and virtue of their rulers. The very expectation, sir, will exalt and qualify them to meet our highest hopes. Now the experiment is to be tried, and I hope it will be the only experiment of the new Administration, whether a pure and virtuous and enlightened Administration—looking alone to the country and its business, not its politics—will be sustained by popular favor. Sir, I hope to see that experiment made, and to see it successful. Nothing short of its success can save this country from the fatal end of all Republics. I desire to see General Harrison, above all things, imitate that godlike virtue of Washington, which advised, and consulted with, and took counsel from good men of all parties and all creeds—which heard and compared the opinions of all the good and the great in the land—which had a Hamilton and Jefferson both in the Cabinet, and consulted both—and which, after weighing and reflecting profoundly, decided firmly and without shrinking from responsibility. Believing that he will hear all, govern all, be the President of all—that he possesses the virtues which qualify him to govern and to fill the office for which I was and am his friend—I shall vote to entrust him with the means immediately and absolutely necessary to carry on the Government, after the 4th of March, until the next regular session of Congress.

And now, sir, I have a word to say to the friends of the Administration yet in power. You should do as you have been done by. You should in good faith assist in providing those means for the coming Administration which you have for years been providing for yourselves. It is policy in you to do so, or the blame, if any, will fall on your majority in both Houses of the present Congress. You have, since September, 1837, passed no less than four, and this will be five, Treasury note bills to enable you from time to time to get along, and you ought to leave your opponents no excuse for any extraordinary measures to meet emergencies, by extending liberally the provisions of this act to your successors.

Treasury Note Bill—Mr. Wise.

H. of Reps.

By the act of October, 1837, you authorized President Van Buren to cause to be issued ten millions of Treasury notes, as the exigencies of the Government required, of denominations not less than fifty dollars, with a limitation of one year. This power ceased on the 31st December, 1838.

By the act of May, 1838, you authorized the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approbation of the President, to issue Treasury notes, according to the terms of the act of October, 1837, in place of such notes as had been, under said act, paid into the Treasury and cancelled.

By the act of March, 1839, you extended the two former acts, as to the remainder of Treasury notes, &c. to June, 1839.

By the act of March, 1840, you renewed the act of October, 1837, and the subsequent acts, and gave authority to issue Treasury notes in lieu of others thereafter or before redeemed, but not to exceed in the amount outstanding at any one time the aggregate of five millions. And this act continues until March 31st next.

And you now propose by the pending act, in addition to the power to keep five millions outstanding under the act of 1840, to issue five millions more at any one time for one year after the passage of the bill.

Now, suppose this act to pass to-day, what will be its effect? Why, sir, from now until the 31st day of March, this act being cumulative upon the act of 1840, there will be a power to keep outstanding, under the two acts, at any one time, the sum of ten millions of dollars. After that period, the 31st of March, five millions only can be kept outstanding at one time. The effect is, that you will have, for the remnant of your days in power, the double power, or the power under two acts, to issue five millions; the power, in a word, to issue ten millions, and the coming Administration will have the same power only to the 31st, from the 4th of March; and may not, indeed, have any power at all to issue a Treasury note before the act of 1840 expires, in case you choose to issue the full ten millions, and to leave that amount outstanding when you go out.

The law, then, as proposed, is unequal. It does not do as you would be done by. I therefore propose, when the pending question is disposed of, to submit an amendment, providing that, if the sum of five millions, or less, be issued under this act prior to the 4th day of March, 1841, in addition to the sum of five millions, or less, authorized to be issued under the act of 1840 and prior acts, then the President may, after the 31st day of March, 1841, cause to be issued a like sum of five millions or less, in addition to the sum authorized to be outstanding at any one time under this act.

This will place both Administrations, as to means, on precisely the same footing. I have submitted this amendment to the consideration of my colleague, [Mr. Jones,] and at the proper time I shall propose it. I hope it will not meet with any opposition from him.

[Mr. Jones of Virginia said he would take the occasion to state that it was not expected by the Secretary of the Treasury that more than one million of dollars would be used before the 4th of March; the greater proportion of which would be required to pay pensions which will fall due after the 3d of March. It will not, therefore, be required to meet liabilities falling upon this Administration, but upon that which is to succeed it; so that General Harrison's Administration will have the full benefit of five millions of dollars for one year after the 3d of March. A similar bill was deemed necessary for the present Administration, under like circumstances, at the commencement of the last year; and Mr. J. considered it just and proper now to make a similar provision.]

MR. WISE. I fear there will be outstanding debts, not now estimated, which will more than make up for all that this Administration will have to pay for the next. At all events, sir, with my amendment to the bill, I am quite confident that this bill will provide means sufficient to meet all immediate wants and demands, and to supply for a time the deficiency in the Treasury. We are told that this deficiency is very great. I have no doubt, sir, it is fully as great, if not greater, than gentlemen calculate. But we can never know what this deficiency is until we get into power and have surveyed the wreck. Then we shall see. Now we have not the data upon which to contradict the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I shall not now attend to discuss either the causes or the extent of this deficiency. There is a deficiency, though, to some extent; and we cannot resort to a loan—we cannot resort to a tariff—and certainly gentlemen will not resort to distribution of the revenue for supplies immediately needed. I know of no other plan of immediate supply besides an ample issue of Treasury notes, as proposed by this bill.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 28, 1841.

After alluding to some matters touching the election of a Virginia Senator, now inserted at the proper place in the first day's remarks, Mr. Wise proceeded.

MR. CHAIRMAN: I wound up yesterday one branch of discussion, or, rather, concluded one reason for supporting this bill. I told the committee I should vote for this bill as a friend of the coming Administration, to provide it with the means to get along, and I would place it, as to means, on the same footing with those now in power. I admitted there is a deficiency, and contended that Treasury notes are the only means of immediately supplying it.

I now proceed to my second reason for supporting this bill.

2d. To prevent an extra session.—The effect of this bill, if it pass with proper amendments, must be to obviate all necessity, and to strip gentlemen of all excuses and pretences for that, to me, dreadful called session!

Sir, I have an instinctive dread, inspired by experience, of an extra—a called session. I venture to assert—and I appeal to the sagacious of the party to confirm the opinion—that the called session of 1837 did more than any other ten acts to overthrow the present dynasty. [Here several members of the Van Buren party nodded assent.] I believe, I am certain, that, if tried again, it will be fraught with mischief to the Whig party from disappointment to the whole country. As a Whig, and as a friend to General Harrison, I deprecate it as a fruitful source of agitation, contention, confusion, error, and ruin. Mr. Van Buren struck on this unwise expedient with the most calamitous results. He found the public mind, after the suspension of specie payments, in a restless and dissatisfied state, the finances in a wretched condition, commerce decaying or dead, and, instead of breasting the storm, he yielded to his fears, and called Congress to relieve him. What was the result? Congress did nothing, and he lost public confidence; when, if he had shown nerve; if he had taken upon himself due responsibility; if he had summoned caution and courage, instead of Congress, to his relief, he would have gone through with all the difficulties which surrounded him.

Why is a called session always dangerous? Because, sir, your very proclamation admits your weakness, and that weakness is ever increased by the fears and alarm it creates in some, and by the too high expectations, which are sure to be disappointed, it excites in others. No captain must, as long as he can possibly avoid it, admit a doubt or a danger to his crew or his passengers. If he trembles, or throws up his command to any other man, in the midst of difficulty or danger, he disqualifies himself, and justly throws away the confidence in him upon which alone he can rely in any emergency for success. Mr. Van Buren's called session did nothing and lost all; and so it will be with us if we "follow in his footsteps."

Sir, the state of the public mind and the state of the times are both inauspicious to a called session. What are they?

I remarked yesterday, sir, that the country could not expect too much from the wisdom, virtue, and patriotism of rulers; that we ought to expect every thing from men placed in the highest seats of public trust and confidence. But, sir, there is such a thing as expecting too much from measures. We may expect too much relief, or relief too impatiently and too soon, from the wisest policy of Government.

The expectations of the people for immediate, sudden relief are too high already. They cannot be realized by the wisdom of man. Years are the days of nations. Soon in the history of Government is long remote in the life of an individual, and there is not one individual in a thousand who reflects upon this truth so essentially necessary to be well understood and impressed, to fortify confidence in any policy, and to secure it a patient waiting for its results to be developed before it either be condemned or approved. No remedy on earth is worth a farthing without the aid of the great renovator—Nature's own physician—the vis medicatrix nature! The quack, sir, always relies upon the nostrum—the pill or powder is every thing with empiricism; but the regular faculty, the secundum artem doctor, sir, expects most from Nature's own power to restore herself, and nothing without her aid—or rather expects to give no relief but from aiding the laws of Nature. If you violate these laws, counteract or exceed them, or hasten them beyond their own course, you kill the patient, sir. The public expectation is already doing that dangerous thing; the stimulus is too high. The people are for the cautery, the knife, the severest drastics, or astringents. I, sir, am for time—time for Nature to restore a weak patient too delicate to be tampered with, and for good nursing. Any sort of violent treatment will now throw this country again into spasms, after being much, very much weakened too by previous convulsions. Instead of soothing and allaying excitement as we ought, gentlemen propose to raise expectations, already too high, still higher, and to add fuel to a fire which threatens to consume us. The feverishness of the public mind ought to be allayed. Neither stimulus nor depletion is required; either will be deadly, the nation needs repose. Time—a pause is required for a safe and radical change of policy. The affairs of a nation cannot be managed in a day, like the affairs of the nursery.

If there be a special session, it will be looked to for a cure of all evils. Every thing will be expected from it. And what, if nothing should be done? Is it not certain that nothing could be done to meet the general expectation for immediate and almost miraculous relief? Sir, the state of the times is obviously opposed to an operation of the wisest measures, even if they be adopted at a called session this year. What is our present condition? The present Administration goes out leaving a perfect wreck behind. The commerce of the country is wrecked—the finances of the Government are deranged and bankrupt—the whole monetary affairs of the nation in dilapidation and ruin—a large balance of foreign debt unpaid—the States groaning under two hundred millions of debt—the Federal Government issuing Treasury notes—domestic debts unsafe and difficult of collecting—distress pervading all classes—confidence in trade destroyed—the capitalists hoarding—the debtor classes under the hammer—exchanges high and unequal—no uniform currency—and the banks attempting, in the midst of danger, distress, and distrust, to resume specie payments, many of them under very doubtful circumstances of solvency! Such is our condition. And yet gentlemen, without waiting for further developments of new causes or effects, are for rushing upon measures the very nature of which must increase the pressure of the times. An increase of the tariff must immediately add to the derangement of commerce—a distribution must add to the deficiency of the Treasury—a national bank must cause a still greater and more caustic contraction. There never was a time when the resumption of specie payments or the creation of a national bank did not produce contraction and pressure, and there never will be. What would both at once not do?

Gentlemen must reflect that all of their measure are to be set in operation at once—they are all à fieri—all to begin de novo. Is it not likely that some of them would fail to pass, or, if passed, would fail of their ends? Then, if nothing, o wrong, be done, or disaster be the first effect of right measures, even of a called session, who of those now contending for the authorship of measures would then contend for the authorship of the mischief to the party or the country? Who would assume so boldly to be answerable to the bitter disappointment of the people? Sir, that is the worst of all popular feelings to contend with—the disappointment of the people! You cannot reason with it—must overthrow you, sir, if you incur and encounter it. It wreaks vengeance, sir, as biting as it is bitter, no matter whether it be just or unjust. The Government, sir, is a mammoth concern, and should move slowly in developing its measures—the development of measures should wait while the development of events. You should see whether these banks can maintain their efforts to resume.* You should wait and see how many of them will fail. You should wait until a restoration of confidence revives trade, and credit, and currency. If you do nothing at a called session, there will be disappointment. If you do something, and distress continues, as it likely will, there will be disappointment. If you do nothing, or something, good or bad, and disasters follow, you will be destroyed. Then you must, for a called session to be successful, be certain—there must be no doubt—you must be certain to do the right thing, to adopt exactly the right measure, whatever it be, which must be followed immediately by the right and desirable effects, or you will egregiously fail to satisfy the expectations for relief. How many chances there are against you the insurance offices might possibly solve.

Some gentlemen seem to apprehend that, so far from the pressure continuing, relief will come of itself. They dread that—such are the mighty resources of this country, and the irrepressible energies of our people—the national prosperity will revive too soon for them to be considered its authors, and to get the credit of relief. Is this a proper motive for a called session? But they need not dream that prosperity and relief will come of themselves, or too soon. I trust in God they may come of themselves, and that right soon, that our wounds may heal “by the first intention,” as surgeons say, without lint or plaster; but there are too many wounds to be cicatrized, and Nature is slow in her operations. The pressure of resumption must run through this year, and my only fear is that it will extend far beyond it. But what, I repeat, if disasters should follow a called session? I tell you, sir, you will have committed suicide.

But these instincts, sir, alone, are not what governs me in opposition to a called session. Sir, I wish to avoid the agitation this year—first of the tariff; secondly of the distribution bill; thirdly of the bank.

Sir, this is not the time for the anti-tariff minority to take up the revision of the tariff compromise. If they take up that question now, they will do it with all the odds against them. They will do it at the most inauspicious period to themselves, and at the most favorable time for the protective party. There is a deficiency of revenue from the stoppage of trade. Wait for commerce to come back, and that deficiency will be supplied. Gentlemen will not violate the compromise. Oh no! they will not violate the compromise as they understand it; yet they can do all the mischief I dread within the terms of their comprehension! All sorts of projects have already been gotten up to raise the duties for revenue, and not one of them pretends to violate the compromise!

Sir, I fear this time will be seized on to raise the tariff to supply deficiency, and the tariff will be seized on to make a surplus for distribution—that most fatal scheme ever devised by the wit of man. What! must we call a session of Congress to distribute a deficiency of revenue? Distribute a deficiency? Who before ever heard of distributing a deficiency? Will any party dare to distribute that which we have not, and which we can raise only by adopting that unconstitutional, irritating, and long-ago exploded policy—the protective tariff? Mind you, any tariff on any articles is protective which is not for revenue.

Sir, I yield to no man in friendship to a properly organized, properly located, and well-managed national bank. And as a friend to that measure, I inveigh especially against urging it prematurely and in the midst of pressure. If you press it too eagerly, too hastily, at the wrong time, you will lose the question for twenty years to come.

Sir, I have no idea that either of these measures shall be presented to a called session, and be pushed through in the hic hæc hoc hurry of political jugglery. They all require time and reflection.

My advice to the Whig party, then, is, to adjourn and go home. Let the present majority leave us they please; let us go home. Wait a little—from March to December is a short time—and consult the people. Let all the elections be held, and our full strength or full weakness be ascertained. Let us especially submit to our constituents the question of distribution in its new light. Heretofore the question has been the issue of distributing a surplus. Mr. Clay's land bill, which was pocketed by General Jackson, and would have been passed by both Houses in spite of the veto, was a bill to distribute a surplus; and the bill itself provided, I believe, that there was to be no distribution unless there was a surplus of at least five millions. A surplus was then dreaded as a corruption fund. Again: the deposit act of 1836 was a deposit of forty millions of surplus; and the very policy of it was to take it away from the petty larceny of defaulters, and of a corrupt political party in power. Now there is no surplus; it is a deficiency in the Treasury, and I am for submitting the new issue under the sun to the people: Whether they are for distributing a deficiency among the States? No State Legislature yet has ever passed resolutions to distribute a deficiency. I know several of them have to distribute a surplus; but none—no, not one—to distribute a deficiency! No man in his senses ever heard of such a proposition before.

And, sir, “the cat may look at the king.” I have a word to say to General Harrison himself, and as I desire others to hear it. I choose to say it here. My heart's desire and prayer for him is, that he will be President himself, and that he will fulfil to the letter that pledge which bound me to him more than any thing else he ever said, to let no man know on whom he desired his mantle to fall—to have nothing to do with appointing his successor—to leave that to the people themselves. I would exhort him to be the President, not of a party, but of the nation, and to see that every man under him, from his Cabinet down to the lowest postmaster, attends to the business of his office, and not to politics. I would suggest to him that the best mode of perpetuating the Whig strength and Whig popularity is to make every officer look to the success of his administration, instead of looking to the succession of another to the administration—especially to allow no man under him to electioneer for himself or against another for the succession. And, sir, how is he to be expected to act for himself, if he is to be suddenly called on to perform that constitutional duty—the most important he will have to discharge—to recommend to Congress such measures as he deems proper? He has been absent from the national affairs more than twenty years. He is unacquainted, personally, with the actual condition of things in this metropolis of misrule. If he acts, then, as soon as he comes here, he must act from the information of others, who are themselves “new hands at the bellows;” some of whom have never been in before, and may never be again. Will he be recommending his own measures, then, or theirs? Is it the object of the called session to have the measures of others palmed upon the country as his? No, sir, no. I beseech him to look thoroughly with his own eyes into the condition of Government; to survey well the wreck, to see for himself what ought to be done in all the Departments, and then to recommend his own measures. If he will look into the Navy Department, I am sure he will see that we are in no condition, compared with foreign powers, to give away the proceeds of the public lands from an empty Treasury. Suppose a call be made upon the new heads, too, at a called session—who would be ready to give the information desired by Congress? No member of the Cabinet could be prepared in three months to give information of the condition of the Departments.

Again: The Administration party—the Van Buren party—have been incessantly insisting upon trying the Sub-Treasury. The fact is, that they have found it so impracticable since it passed, that they have not tried it themselves. They have never, to this day, complied with its provisions—they cannot, if they would. Now, ought not Gen. Harrison to try it, to show its utter impracticability, before he recommends its repeal? Ought he not to understand fully its enormous defects, and to make them apparent by an attempted application of it to actual use by Government? Will this not be the best argument for its repeal? Will it not be the best argument for the charter of another National Bank when the Sub-Treasury shall have proved a grand failure, as well as the deposit bank system? Is this demonstration not worth making, and is the time from March to December too long for it?

Again: He ought not to act precipitately without knowing his men. It is with politicians as with the rhetorician—

“Half the rhetorician's rules
Teach him but how to name his tools.”

General Harrison is not personally acquainted with but few men now on the public stage. He cannot, a thousand miles off, have guessed who are fit for the offices, high and low. I wish him, sir, to know his men well before he takes their counsel or gives them his confidence, or acts on their advice. When, then, he has seen for himself—surveyed all—understood men and means, and the condition of things about him—he will be prepared to recommend and to act first for the honor and welfare of his country, and, last, for the glory and success of the party which brought him into power.

Sir, the Whig party should not be intoxicated by its success. We should do nothing in the flushed feelings of victory. Whom have we conquered? Our own countrymen and fellow-citizens, who are to be governed by the same laws, and who have equal rights as ourselves, who differ with us as to opinions merely about men and measures, and who will, if we follow their bad examples of Government, conquer us in turn. I do not know how other gentlemen feel, but for myself, I must say that my feelings the day after the victory were very different from those of the day before. On the stump of the canvass, I felt and spoke and really thought as if government was a very easy task; that to be in power was all that was necessary to reform the evils of which we complained, and to accomplish the good and patriotic ends we desired. When I realized the fact that we were in, the next feeling with me was, as I presume it was with every reflecting patriotic friend of our cause—a deep and humble conviction of our own finite wisdom, of our own weakness, and, it might be, folly, and a solemn sense of the heavy responsibility which had fallen on me and my political friends, and of the dread obligations which the country had devolved upon us. Before the election, it was easy to find fault; since the election, and after the inauguration, it might be hard to redeem the many fruitful promises we had lavishly made during the canvass. I feel, sir, that the man who goes into the Presidential chair, during the days of purification like these, should go there as one shaven for the priesthood! I am not, therefore, for rushing forward and grasping the sceptre of power with an ambitious avidity, and, with the shout of victors, dashing on without a pause to extreme revolutions of policy. I am for adopting and pursuing moderate and cautious counsels. It is by no sudden and brilliant stroke of policy that the country can be relieved. Sudden and immediate relief to this country can be given only by the miraculous interposition of wisdom and power from on high. An extra session, I fear, would be a help any thing else but divine. But so much for it.

I proceed to the third and last reason for voting for this bill—to prevent a premature revision of the Compromise Act and the laying of duties at all for the purpose of distributing the revenue from public lands.

Gentlemen ask why I discuss this reason now. I

* The Philadelphia banks were driven back to suspension the next week after these words were uttered, from the very prospect, probably, that the United States Bank might again be made or attempted to be made a depository of Government funds, or rather from New York jealousy of such a prospect.

26TH CONG....2ND SESS.

Treasury Note Bill—Mr. Wise.

H. of Reps.

answer, because I see now a disposition to agitate the subject in order to prepare public sentiment for the future.

This branch of my subject is by far the most important, and, sir, I wish to discuss it in detail.

I say I see a disposition now to prepare the way for a future tariff and distribution; and, if an extra session is to be called, that future is not far distant. Sir, I see the signs—they are in number not quite twelve—they do not fill up the Zodiac—Leo and Scorpio are missing—but I have ten out of the twelve signs for the almanac of the coming year.

1st. The first sign of the tariff bill of the last session—the fourteen sections which were added in the Senate to a bill which originated in this House ostensibly to prevent frauds upon the revenue. Under this specious title, “To prevent frauds upon the revenue,” fourteen sections were introduced and added by Mr. Wright, the chairman of the Finance Committee in the Senate, to tax bleached and unbleached linens, silks, and worsted goods, chiefly free articles, from 5 to 50 per cent.—in many cases exceeding the rate expressly limited by the Compromise Act, and involving protection directly to Kentucky bagging. Yet gentlemen then told us, “Oh, we have no idea of violating the compromise;” and some Whigs and Southern gentlemen voted for that bill—as they are aiding measures now—“God forgive them,” because they knew not what they did!

2d. The second sign is, the great Tobacco Convention, which was held lately in this city; which, under the guise of retaliation for French burdens upon Maryland kite foot, was another tariff movement to increase duties for no purpose of revenue.

3. The third sign was the reference of the bill already mentioned as passed by the Senate last session, again this session to the Committee on Manufactures instead of referring it to the Committee of Ways and Means; when the test question has always been heretofore a question of reference—those who advocated a protective tariff always going for referring to Manufactures, and those who went for a revenue tariff only, always going for referring to Ways and Means. And this bill, “to prevent frauds on the revenue,” which is again reported, though without the fourteen sections, is itself an odious tariff of protection, by its unnecessary and hard restrictions upon trade in all foreign articles, and its almost prohibitory provisions against the introduction of foreign articles at the custom-house. It is a custom-house protective tariff.

4th. The fourth sign is, another bill to tax certain unprotected articles already reported by the Committee on Manufactures, and now on the table.

5th. The fifth sign is, the resolutions offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. GREEN.)

6th. The notice given by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. BARNARD,) to offer his resolutions or amendments in case his motion to strike out the enacting clause of this bill succeeds.

7th. The amendment intended to be offered by the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. STANLY.)

8th. The speeches in both Houses of Congress, particularly those in this House, of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. BARNARD,) of the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. EVANS,) of the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. BELLI,) of South Carolina, (Mr. THOMPSON,) of Georgia, (Mr. NISBET,) and of the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. POPE.) The last gentleman's speech, sir, was more open and plainly intelligible than any. He contended, in the first place, that you will have a large deficiency in the Treasury. In the next place, he assumed that you will be compelled to resort to a large increase of duties on imports; that the compromise act was no compact; that the protective principle was not abandoned by it; that the tariff was no burden upon the South; that Arkansas pays more than Virginia, or North Carolina, or South Carolina, in proportion to population; and he insisted that the whole South will eventually be the advocates of protective duties. So far the gentleman was consistent; but in the next breath he magnified the necessity for expenditures upon splendid internal improvements, and went still further for emptying the Treasury, already requiring the increase of duties to supply its immense deficiency contended for by him, by distributing the proceeds of the public lands to supply the large deficiencies in the Treasuries of the several States. Yes, sir, he summed up the whole scheme of distributing a deficiency of the Treasury here to supply deficiencies of twenty-six Treasuries elsewhere! Did you ever hear of distributing a deficiency to supply deficiencies? The meaning of this paradox is—the raising of the tariff directly to pay State debts indirectly! Have we not an odd way of getting at the meaning of measures? Who would ever have thought of thus defining that odd phrase—“distributing a deficiency to supply deficiencies?” I will show you directly, sir, that any duties upon any articles are protective duties, if they be not for the purpose of federal revenue. Who will submit to a protective tariff to pay State debts? In this way, sir, the General Government will not only be paying the cost of State internal improvements and common schools, but all their municipal expenses. Thus it will be laying duties, imposts, and excises, not to pay its own debts and provide for the common defence, but to carry into effect actually the powers which are expressly reserved to the States. Who will bear this new and improved latitudinarianism, going far beyond any absolute federalism ever before heard of? But, sir, I am only showing the signs. The speech of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. POPE) very ingeniously exposes the whole scheme. Ex pede Herculem.

9th. The resolution offered by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] to inquire of the Secretary of the Treasury concerning the rate of duties on articles taxed less than 20 per cent. &c. was the beginning of the second chapter of this tariff movement. I objected to the introduction of this resolution, and must now apologize to the gentleman [Mr. EVERETT] for having done so. It was from no unkind feeling to that gentleman personally, I assure him, for I esteem him as highly as any gentleman on this floor. But I was unwilling, sir, to encourage any gentleman's attempt to procure materials with which to agitate this tariff question; and the gentleman's resolution went a little beyond the other which had been offered, in looking to many articles which belong to the protected class. I did not wish them disturbed.

10th. The second paragraph of the 2d chapter of this movement, and the last sign I have observed, sir, is a small statute lying on your table, reported by the Committee on Manufactures, which I shall for brevity call the pin bill. Yes, sir, the pin bill. It is a little hedge hog or porcupine bill, which I am afraid to handle.

[Here Mr. TILLINGHAST rose and said, “It is hard for the gentleman to kick against the pricks!”]

Mr. WISE. I ask the Clerk to read that bill. [The Clerk read it.] Sir, I do not know whether our pin manufacturers have learned to put up their pins nicely or not. I know that you may take a paper of French or English pins, and squeeze it in your hand, without danger of being pricked. But lest these papers of Yankee pins be put up loosely, I will not, with the gentleman's permission, handle them this session; I will kick against handling them now, for fear of the lockjaw. For fear, sir, that you will begin with pin bills—ay, sir, the least little, tiny lady pin bills, and get, before we know what you are at, into coarse woolsens—all the heavy protected articles, which would require bodkins or darning needles to stitch them. No, sir, no. If the wolf gets his head in, he will his whole body—the door shall not be left ajar with my consent—I am an anti-tariff man, and that party is in the minority. I begin at the beginning, sir. I will not, if I can help it, entertain even so much as a pin bill. If the tariff majority will let me alone, I will gladly let them alone. I abide by the compromise, the very first principle of which is, that the tariff is not to be disturbed at all, except, as it points out, for the purposes of revenue for “an economical administration of the Government.” Let the South remember that, for it is their only ark of safety. They are the weaker party, and these signs are ominous. Let the compromise act alone, is my policy on the tariff.

But, sir, gentlemen all tell us now, as heretofore, that they are for carrying out the compromise; that they—oh, no! they will not disturb the compromise act.

What is the compromise act? Let us see whether we all understand it alike. What are its terms? What its extent and limitation of operation? Sir, in answer to these questions, I have, from a sense of justice, to do what I thought I never should be called on by any sense to do—to praise a report of the honorable Levi Woodbury! Truly the sweetest notes of this swan are his dying notes!! See Senate document, 26th Congress, 2d session: “Report from the Secretary of the Treasury communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a plan of a permanent change in the tariff, January 19, 1841.” In this report gentlemen will find my sentiments precisely; and I forgive Mr. Secretary for much of his usual obtuseness of intellect, and obscurity of style, on account of this clear and able report upon the exact spirit and letter of the compromise act. He truly says:

“That act is supposed to have been not an ordinary measure of legislation, but the result of a compromise between certain great and conflicting interests on the difficulty when involved in the agitating matter of the tariff. Hence, though the act was in the form of a law, and therefore liable, in a proper case, to any future modification or repeal of its provisions, it is understood that the parties most concerned contemplated thereby a permanent arrangement of the leading principles that should afterwards control the whole subject. The importance of the emergency which occasioned the passage of the law, the distinguished individuals who participated more immediately in adjusting its provisions, and the salutary influence of their operation up to the present time, in imparting a degree of stability to our manufacturing enterprise, sought in vain through the previous fluctuations of legislation, have probably contributed to strengthen this impression.

“But, however that fact may have been, and subject to subsequent alterations, as all laws must properly be considered; yet, to change the limitations in this one, so peculiarly situated, and to do it against the wishes of persons most interested, or without the apology of some public exigency or necessity of state, would surely seem to be unnecessary, and, at least, of doubtful propriety.”

This view is my view of the binding obligation of faith and interest not to disturb this important act of legislation which once settled the harmony of this Union, and to disturb which would be again to disturb that harmony. Gentlemen say it is not a compact, but I say it is stronger than a compact, it is a compromise, and is sacred. A compact, sir, might be regarded as a bond or covenant in some sections, where, if either be given, the debtor thinks he may, if he can, avoid payment or discharge of the obligation because it is a writing obligatory; but if he promises to pay only, his honor is pledged and the debt is safe. So here, sir, if this was constitutional law, gentlemen who plead it is not a compact might conscientiously claim the power to violate it as they usually, in my opinion, do violate that fundamental instrument which we have called a Constitution; but as it is merely statute law, not the bond which may not be denied, I put their consciences aside and rely upon their honor to observe its faith.

Whence sprang this act? From danger to the Union—out of resistance to unequal and oppressive taxation. The bill of abominations, the tariff of 1823, had consummated the protective policy. In 1832, the question was one of a reduction of duties. The South contended for a reduction upon protected articles, and for a tax upon luxuries. The tariff interest made almost all the luxuries free, and left the duties on the protected articles. South Carolina, aroused, resorted to her reserved rights—declared herself “the judge of the infraction and of the mode and measure of redress”—proclaimed her ordinance of nullification, and swore by her altar and her gods that both should “sink together in the dust” sooner than she would submit to oppression. Gen. Jackson rose in his majesty, and swore “by the eternal gods” that he would “see the laws faithfully executed,” and hang Calhoun, Hayne, Hamilton, and McDuffie, “as high as Haman's gallows!” And his wrath was no idle wrath—his threat no vain threat. The State had summoned her chivalry, and, as I am informed, one of the members of her convention, now a member of this House, [Mr. RHETT,] went even so far as to propose a dissolution of the Union, and Jackson issued his proclamation, and his orders to the standing army and to the navy. The nation was called “to arms!”—the nation against a single State. No, sir, the North against the South—section against section—the very army and navy would have been divided against themselves—father against son, and brother against brother! I was no nullifier. I opposed the doctrine. I opposed the theory upon which the resistance was founded. I defeated its advocates in an election for a scat on this floor. I was a Union man and for peace. But let me tell gentlemen that, if war had begun, every Union man of Virginia would have been a Southern man. No standing army would ever have crossed her ancient lines to do battle against a sovereign State, without first fighting her sons of every faith at every pass where volunteers could have made a stand. Why? Because, sir, when the torch of civil war between this Government and a State had once been lighted, the Union would have been dissolved. Once a war, never more a Union—a Union as a Union has existed and should exist. After a war of that kind, it would have been a Union of consolidation, cemented by blood!—such a Union as no Union man of my acquaintance would have been willing to see exist. I doubt whether the officers of the navy or army could have been brought to bear a gun upon their own brethren in arms against what they solemnly deemed unconstitutional oppression.

[Here several gentlemen exclaimed—"Yes! Elliott was there—Poinsett was there, the present Secretary of War.]

Mr. Wise. Yes! and there were others here to pass a "bloody bill," against which my present honored constituent, the present Vice President elect, alone voted! Elliott does not deserve to be called an officer of the Navy. But such, sir, was the unhappy condition of our country when this act passed—an act which, if it be not a compact, is an act of reunion—an act of peaceful compromise of civil hostilities which carried "healing on its wings!" An act, in the authorship of which consists the chief glory of an honored and distinguished Senator, who acquired by its passage the illustrious title of "The Great Pacificator." To that patriot I ascribe all honor, praise, and gratitude, which are due to him; and I mean not to strip him of a laurel on his brow; but there is a part of the secret history of this act which, to the honor of another, has never yet been recorded, and which I will take this opportunity to reveal.

Sir, yesterday I alluded to Mr. Madison as the only lamp of my public life. Him I never saw, and I should have remembered another model of wisdom, and virtue, and patriotism whom I have seen, and seen in all situations of life—long and intimately did I know—well did I love him, and sacredly do I cherish his memory. He is no more. I wish I could imitate his virtuous and hallowed example in life. I mean the lamented Hugh Lawson White, a servant of Tennessee, a son of North Carolina, without whose aid this compromise act never could have become a law—without whose patriotism and firmness there would have been a civil war upon a sovereign State and upon the Union. South Carolina ought to be told of this: South Carolina, who, in 1836, threw her vote from him, her best defender from a tyrant. When this act was before the Senate, he was President pro tem. of that honorable body. He was in the chair, and had the appointment of the committee which had to consider and report upon the plan of adjusting the tariff difficulties. In this high place, with this power, he was warned—I will not say by whom—not to put a certain gentleman (John M. Clayton of Delaware) on the committee. The reason was, that there were rival plans—one proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, of whom and whose measure that certain gentleman was the friend; and the other plan was that of the Administration then in power. That Administration was governed by one of two motives, perhaps by both, in wishing to defeat this act. They wished certainly to give preference to their own plan, and to deprive the authors of this of the honor of the compromise; and, perhaps, the head and chief wished nothing so much as the opportunity to apply "the second section" to the leaders of resistance, whom he charged more with treason to him personally than to the country. The President pro tem. of the Senate knew well the danger of defeating this act. When orders were issued to him not to appoint its friend and advocate on the committee, what was his reply? The reply of that sage, and patriot, and hero—hero he was, for he had, like his chief, been in the wars—his reply was a plea to the jurisdiction of any power to dictate the manner of discharging his duty. He told the man who assumed this authority, "You are too late. Mr. Clayton is appointed; and if he was not, he should be. I voted for the force bill as a decision merely that the Government had the power to execute its laws. I never intended it should operate or actually be put in force against any portion of my countrymen who happen to differ from me in opinion, and who are as honest and conscientious in those opinions as I am in mine; and, having voted for it, I will afford every opportunity to legislation in my power to prevent its effect." And this, sir, produced the first cause of difference between him and General Jackson. He muzzled the bloodhounds, disappointed his chief of his prey, aided the compromise, and gave peace to a distracted people. Who would wish, even if he could acquire the title of second pacificator, to produce scenes like these again? Sir, if ever this tariff controversy rages again, gentlemen will not find one State alone in her resistance, but they may find their "bloody bills" as vain as any attempt at compromise will be in future. Let us, then, I repeat, consider this act, as does the Secretary, an honorary bond of union, as binding as faith, and as precious as peace.

But, sir, whether an ordinary act or legislation or not, it is and will continue to be a statute, such as it is, until repealed, every section of which will continue, unless repealed in whole or in part. Some, sir, seem to imagine that the act expires in June, 1842. So far from it, sir, then, and not until then, commences the part of the bargain or stipulation intended for the South. From 1833 until then the tariff interest will have had the duties mostly above 20 per cent. and not until then will the maximum duty, not to exceed 20 per cent. become fixed. It will be hard, indeed, if it shall continue a compromise until one party gets all their share of the bargain, and immediately cease to be a compromise, and become a mere ordinary statute, subject and liable, like all other statutes, to be repealed, as soon as the period arrives, by its own limitations, for the other party to derive from it a benefit. This truly will be yielding to the protective gentlemen's construction both the big and the little end of the bargain. A part of the very bargain was, that the excessive protection should be gradually reduced only for nine years, and then not exceed a given rate of 20 per cent. Will gentlemen now say that they will enjoy this excess of protection above 20 per cent. for these nine years, gradually reduced only, and then, as soon as the reduction falls to 20 per cent. that they will repeal the act and pass a new act to suit their cupidity—to go back, if they please, to the highest rates of duty, and that duty laid on what articles they please? If this is what they mean by saying this is no compromise, I agree with them, and admit that, in this sense, it will mean for them to take all and leave nothing for us!

The act of 1832 was an ordinary act of legislation, liable to repeal at any time, but containing no limitation of time for its operation. That act is the basis of this act of March 2, 1833, commonly called the "compromise act." Both acts continue on until repealed, in whole or in part.

The 1st and 21 sections of the act of March 2, 1833, fix the duties on certain articles named in the act of 1832 at 20 per cent. from and after the 30th day of June, 1842.

Section 31 enacts that all duties shall be cash duties "from and after the 30th day of June, 1842;" that "such duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government," from and after that day, and it establishes the home valuation after that day.

Section 5th makes certain articles free "from and after that day;" prescribes on what articles duties are to be laid after 30th June, 1842; and provides that the duties on no articles shall exceed 20 per cent. "from and after" that day.

Section 6th shows that the act contemplates its restrictions in some respects to operate after 30th June, 1842.

Here, then, we see that this act is but a modification and continuation of the act of 1832. No new legislation is necessary after June, 1842, in consequence of any expiration or suspension of these laws. If let alone, they will work out their own provisions. They do not necessarily require any renewal or change or additional enactment whatever. And the duties laid by these laws are sufficient in ordinary times, when unusual causes do not obstruct trade, to supply revenue for an economical administration of the Government. There is no necessity for your disturbing the act for reason of any defect in it, or that it will not continue to operate.

The extent and limitations of the act are well defined by the Secretary of the Treasury's report:

"What, then, are those stipulations or restrictions?"

"1. The first seems to be, that a reduction, by instalments, of the former rate of duties, when exceeding twenty per cent. should forthwith commence, and continue uninterrupted until July 1st, 1842; so that when that period arrives, no duties whatever should exceed twenty per cent. The leading section of the act is explicit upon this point. Hence, to defer or repeal, as some have proposed, the two reductions now remaining, and which are to take effect in 1842, would keep many duties higher than twenty per cent. and thus be in direct violation of this general provision. But if these last reductions should create a deficiency in the revenue, the 6th section of the act would allow it to be supplied in a different way, because this section provides that, in such an event, nothing contained in the law shall prevent 'altering the rates of duty on articles which, by the aforesaid act of 14th July, 1832, are subject to a less duty than twenty per cent.'"

"2. It will be seen, however, that this provision contains a second restriction by limiting any revision made before 1842 for an increase of the tariff to only such articles as pay a less duty than twenty per cent."

"3. The next and third restriction on a revision is, that though one may be made before 1842, for purposes of revenue, if, when increasing the duties, it be confined to articles paying less than twenty per cent.; yet it should not raise the tariff on those above that rate, even for revenue—much less, probably, for any other purpose. The close of the 6th section seems to be express, that the duty on articles paying a less rate than twenty per cent. if changed before 1842, shall be altered in such manner as not to exceed that rate."

"What would be deemed the proper disposition of this limitation, if a duty of twenty per cent. on all imports would not yield sufficient for the legitimate purposes of revenue, must be settled when the case shall arise. But it is believed that, with proper economy, there is no likelihood of such a case ever occurring in a period of peace."

"4. Another restriction supposed to have been intended is, that if a revision be made to operate after June 30, 1842, instead of before, still, as a general rule, none of the duties shall be then raised above twenty per cent. Thus the close of the 6th section provides that 'all imports, on which the 1st section of this act may operate, and all articles now admitted to entry free from duty, or paying a less rate of duty than twenty per cent. ad valorem, before the said 30th of June, 1842, from and after that day may be admitted to entry, subject to such duty, not exceeding twenty per cent. ad valorem, as shall be provided by law. A change could then be made, at pleasure, from twenty per cent. downwards, to entire freedom from any impost; but no increase was to be permitted to go above that rate. Indeed, the inference would seem to be, that the compromise was intended to prevent any duties from being assessed, even after 1842, exclusively for the purpose of distribution, or protection, whether below or above twenty per cent. in amount; because a clause in the 3d section provides that, after 1842, 'duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government,' but is silent as to recognising or sanctioning an authority to do it for any other purpose. The raising such a revenue was the great object of granting any power in the Constitution to lay taxes and imposts. And it would be difficult to find, in a limited grant of powers, like what is contained in that instrument, for laying imposts, a warrant to impose them for other and distinct objects; and especially if the operation of such a measure, apparently under an assumed authority, and on a subject so delicate and momentous to mankind as taxation, should tend to enrich particular classes or sections at the expense of others. In truth, the tariff is as much a system of taxation as a land tax, a stamp tax, or a direct tax of any kind; and is chiefly distinguishable from them by being more subtle and less obnoxious in its form. The confining of all duties, hereafter, to a low rate, was, therefore, desirable to the great mass of the people, because it was confining taxes to a low rate. It was further supposed, without doubt, that, though comparatively low, they would yield, with the other ordinary receipts, an ample supply of revenue for such an 'economical administration' as is contemplated by this section of the act."

"It is also probable that many sound principles of political economy, and a mutual desire to arrange permanently the tariff controversy, united to persuade Congress not only to reduce the duties lower, but to provide that they should always be kept lower. It must have been far seen that this would avoid the useless vacillation, if not folly, of first diminishing all the duties to twenty per cent. by 1832, with a view, afterwards, of again immediately raising them above it. It was obvious, too, that, by keeping the imposts more reduced, the tariff would operate more advantageously to free trade, and the procurement of reciprocal favors abroad. By confining, in substance, any future change to purposes of revenue alone, and within twenty per cent. instead of a wide range of thirty, fifty, eighty, and even more, at times previously in practice, and frequently for protection, it would likewise impart greater permanency and prosperity even to manufacturing, and, with that, to all other descriptions of industry. It is well known, from recent experience, that such stability in our system of duties would be better for the manufacturer, as well as the merchant and the community at large, than even a higher rate, exposed to constant changes; because, in the former case, intelligence and foresight could make more accurate calculations for the future; a more uniform thrif, a more regular reward to industry, and a higher tone of moral feeling, would everywhere take the place of constant fluctuations, mere gambling speculations, and a dangerous operation, from renewed hopes of high profits, often so very fallacious. Business and the currency would then be steady, and be regulated, as they should be, rather by the great laws of trade than by banks or politicians. Nor is this permanency injurious to the laborer and artisan any more than to others, as all trades and regions of this country are open to enterprise; and a larger share here than abroad of the income in any one branch of business; must and should uniformly go to wages rather than capital, or the workman will, under our free institutions, quit it for more lucrative employment. On the contrary, if an unusually large share go to him for a time, in any particular pursuit or place, others will soon rush in, participate, and reduce it, by competition, even below the average. Uniformity and steadiness, are, therefore, not injurious to any, though engaged in labor or manufactures; but useful to all, except the mere speculating classes.

"Two other restrictions exist in the 3d section of the compromise act, which seem to have been intended more especially for the benefit of the manufacturers and of the revenue.

"5. One is, that after June, 1842, 'all duties on imports shall be collected in ready money; and all credits now allowed by law in the payment of duties, shall be, and hereby are, abolished.' This was regarded, at that time, as a change likely to be very favorable to the manufacturing class, by making the twenty per cent. in cash operate, virtually, as a higher protection than twenty per cent. on a credit (as now) of three and six months without interest. In point of fact, it was, also, a provision prophetic as to evils to come under an excessive credit system, and will be possessed of much importance in curing them, and in securing the Government, and, through it, the community at large, against losses, by credit to merchants for duties, and by defaults of collectors, district attorneys, and marshals, caused by indulgence from them in collecting bonds for duties. After June, 1842, the importers of goods will, in this respect, stand on the same foundation with the purchasers of public lands. While no complaint can then be made by either of favor or discrimination, the revenue will thus be rendered much safer, and public and private morality improved, by the removal of one great source of speculation and bankruptcy.

"6. The other restraint requires the duty, after 1842, to be imposed on the value of the merchandise 'at the port where the same shall be entered.' This will render the twenty per cent. still more important to both the manufacturers and the revenue, by being more secure against frauds and evasions, and being another virtual increase of duty on the same articles, as the latter are usually worth much more here than abroad. Whether the value of them here being not uniform at different ports, would, if taken as the guide in assessing the duty, be justly open to any constitutional objection, it is not deemed appropriate on this occasion to discuss. From these various considerations, the following deductions are made:

"That the present tariff laws should be as little disturbed by any revision as possible, consistent with the public wants, and an adherence to sound principles; that changes should be made chiefly, if not solely, for purposes of revenue; that these changes, when raising the duty, whether operating before or after July 1, 1842, should, as a general rule, be confined to articles not paying a duty as high as twenty per cent.; that, except in extreme cases, it should never raise them above that rate; and, lastly, that the existing provisions for the payment of duties in cash, and the assessment of them on the value of the merchandise at the port of entry, after 1842, are too important to be disregarded."

By the act of 1832—

1st. Certain articles were taxed above 20 per cent.

2d. Certain articles were taxed below 20 per cent.

3d. Certain articles were made free.

4th. The duties above and below 20 per cent. were laid almost entirely upon the protected articles.

5th. The articles made free were chiefly, almost wholly, of the unprotected class, or luxuries.

By the act of 1833—

1st. The duties above 20 per cent. are to be reduced by June, 1842, to 20 per cent.

2d. Certain specified articles, entirely of the unprotected class, are made free.

3d. The duties on no articles, except those paying less than 20 per cent. should be increased prior to June, 1842, and those duties should be increased to 20 per cent. only.

4th. The duties on no articles whatever shall, after June, 1842, be raised above 20 per cent.

5th. After June, 1842, the duties on all imports on which the 1st section operates, on all articles then admitted free, and on all paying less than 20 per cent. may be laid as high as, but no higher, than 20 per cent.

6th. After June, 1842, all duties shall be laid for the purpose of raising such revenue as may be necessary to an economical administration of the Government.

And this last is the great and leading principle gained by the anti-tariff party in the compromise: 1st. A tariff for revenue only; 2d. Only so much revenue as is necessary to an economical administration of the Government.

Such, sir, are the great leading features and principles of the great compromise of 1833.

By these features we can easily distinguish the dividing lines between the North and the South in 1833. Here we can see that neither party got nor lost all. By the debates of that period you can easily find the extreme points for which the respective parties contended.

The resolution of Mr. Hayne, who was truly the champion of the South, and his able commentary upon it, show you what the anti-tariff party contended for and against:

1st. For a tariff for revenue.

2d. For the reduction of revenue to the wants of the Government.

3d. Against the constitutionality of a tariff for protection per se; admitting, however, the power of discriminating duties for revenue, but contending for an equalization of duties upon the protected and unprotected class of articles.

See volume 8th, part 1st, of Congressional debates of 1831 and 1832:

"Monday, January 16.—The Senate took up the following resolution, submitted by Mr. Clay on the 10th instant:

"Resolved, That the existing duties upon articles imported from foreign countries, and not coming into competition with similar articles made or produced within the United States, ought to be forthwith abolished, except the duties upon wines and silks, and that those ought to be reduced; and that the Committee on Finance be instructed to report a bill accordingly.

"Mr. Hayne moved the following modification of the resolution:

"Strike out all after the word 'countries,' and insert as follows: 'be so reduced that the amount of the public revenue shall be sufficient to defray the expenses of Government according to their present scale, after the payment of the public debt; and that, allowing a reasonable time for the gradual reduction of the present high duties on the articles coming into competition with similar articles made or produced within the United States, the duties shall be ultimately equalized, so that the duty on no article shall, as compared with the value of that article, vary materially from the general average.'"

Such were the rival propositions; and reference to the speech of Mr. Clay, at the time, will show the policy which the tariff party contended for. January 11, 1833, he said:

"Although it may be impracticable to say what the exact amount of the public revenue should be for the future, and what would be the precise produce of any given system of imposts, we may safely assume that the revenue may now be reduced, and considerably reduced. This reduction may be effected in various ways, and on different principles. Only three modes shall now be noticed:

"1st. To reduce the duties on all articles in the same ratio, without regard to the principle of protection.

"2d. To retain them on unprotected articles, and augment them on the protected articles.

"And, 3d. To abolish and reduce the duties on unprotected articles, retaining and enforcing the faithful collection of those on the protected articles."

The first two modes he opposed, and the third he supported as equitable and reasonable; taking particular care not to notice or debate, however, a fourth mode—to abolish and reduce the duties on the protected articles, and to retain, and, if necessary, to augment the duties on the unprotected articles, or "luxuries," as they are now called—the modes for which the South contended.

The compromise retained but reduced the duties on the protected articles, and made, contrary to the will of the South, most of the unprotected articles or luxuries free.

Then gentlemen of the tariff party resisted the duties upon "luxuries" in order to retain those on the protected articles. Now they wish to tax nothing so much as "luxuries." Is it their object now to lay a tax on luxuries in order to have a pretext for increasing the duties on the necessities of life? Sir, can any man read the letter and spirit of the compromise act and not see that this must be the object of those who understand its letter and spirit? Does not every eye see that there is a certain relation kept up throughout the positions assumed, the debates, and the acts of 1832 and 1833 themselves, between the protected and the unprotected articles? Will it not be, then, simply a question of the single rule of three with protection gentlemen—that, if protected articles are taxed only so much, while luxuries, or unprotected articles, are free, how much shall the duties on protected articles be increased when luxuries become taxed? If we, of the minority, consent to disturb the tariff on luxuries, do you suppose we will be allowed to stop there? May not, will not gentlemen insist upon carrying out the compromise act, and preserving and continuing these relations established by the act between protected and unprotected articles? Sir, the moment that gentlemen began to talk even of duties on "luxuries," did we not see the resolution proposed to be offered by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT], and did we not see the pin bill? If we consent to disturb the compromise, where shall we stop—what security have we that a majority will stop at all? Give up, yield to the first inroad on this act, and you will be stuck full of pins!

Mr. WISE continued. Sir, some gentlemen undertake to shear wolves. I will not. I will wait until I am obliged to contend with a superior force before I fight. I will fight this tariff majority shy. I will retreat, sir, as our fathers did in the Revolution—barefooted first, before I will grapple with a majority tempted by every interest to put me to the slaughter without quarters. That majority, consisting of members of all parties, is now alive and watching for us in the minority to touch "luxuries," and our only hope against protective duties is to contend at once for the first great principle established by the act itself—"not to disturb the compromise without an actual and unavoidable necessity." We have this giant majority bound now only by the shreds of faith; they are weak enough, we all know, and they shall not be unbound with my consent. I fear the beast of a protective tariff, and am no Van Amburgh, to be thrown into a cage of lions and tigers! Other gentlemen may risk the fangs and teeth of a wild majority—I will not.

By the compromise we obtained somewhat of approximation to equalization of duties on protected and unprotected articles. And whether the act of last session—the fourteen sections of the Senate—were in conformity either to the letter or spirit of the compromise act, let the world decide. Will the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLEY] say these sections were in accordance with the compromise act? No. And yet we were then told the same thing—that nobody desired to disturb the compromise!

[Here Mr. STANLEY rose and said "he had no objection to say that those sections were in accordance with the compromise."]

Mr. WISE. Then the gentleman's understanding of the compromise is wholly different from mine. What is the compromise? That no article, either before or after the 30th of June, 1842, shall be taxed more than 20 per cent. What were the provisions of these sections? That silk and worsted goods, and bleached and unbleached linens, should be taxed from 5 to 25, and even as high, in some instances, as 50 per cent. Does the gentleman deny this? I know the act was exceedingly complex; it named no duty; it employed, ingeniously enough, a great deal of circumlocution; but I have expositions of its mode of operation, from from the most enlightened merchants and from the Comptroller of the Treasury. Gentlemen and I—all say, they mean to carry out the compromise; but, sir, we understand it differently—there is the rub! Gentlemen and I do not mean the same thing. For example, sir, that bill contained a direct protection of Kentucky cotton bagging—a protection which was aimed at in 1832, and withdrawn by the act of 1833; and yet it was inserted in these sections as perfectly consistent with the compromise. I refer gentlemen to the same speech of Mr. Clay, in 1832:

"The success of the American manufacture of cotton bagging has been such that, by furnishing a better and cheaper article, the bagging of Liverpool and Dundee has been almost excluded from the consumption of the States bordering on the Mississippi and its tributaries. There has not yet been sufficient time to fabricate and transport the article in necessary quantities from the Western States to the Southern Atlantic States, which, therefore, have been almost exclusively supplied from the Scottish manufactories. The payment of the duties is evaded by the introduction of the foreign fabric, under the name of burlaps, or some other mercantile phrase, and, instead of paying five cents the square yard, it is entered with a duty of only fifteen percent ad valorem. That this practice prevails, is demonstrated by the Treasury report of the duties on cotton bagging for the years 1828, 1829, and 1830. During the first year, the amount was 137,505 dollars; the second, 168,668 dollars; and the third, it sunk down to 14,141 dollars!"

So, sir, my friend from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] can here see that it is no new idea to exclude bleached and unbleached linens in order to afford protection to the agricultural products of either cotton or hemp, by increasing the consumption of the fabrics of either. The same idea was faithfully pressed by the protective party in 1832; and it is the same protective idea still, whether applied to hemp of Kentucky or cotton of South Carolina.

[Mr. THOMPSON replied. He had said that he had no doubt that the prohibition of foreign linen would increase the consumption of cotton fabrics which would be substituted, but that he would neither vote for a prohibitory nor protective duty upon linens; first, he would not because he believed it unconstitutional, and he would not vote for a measure which he thought unconstitutional, for any paltry benefit to his own section, nor would he, for any present benefit to his own particular staple, recognise the protective principle which, in its general operation, would infinitely counter-vail the benefit of a small increase of consumption of cotton.]

Mr. WISE. I understood the gentleman not to intend to vote for protection to cotton in this sense, but I could not so well understand why the idea was so elaborated by him, and why cotton fabrics were praised as so much "prettier" than silks. I give this principle of protection—this provision of the fourteen sections passed in the Senate last session to tax bleached and unbleached linens of Russia and Scotland, in order to exclude "burlaps," &c. from competition with American hemp—this old and not odd idea of 1832 again revived at this time, when the cry is now only to tax luxuries—as an example merely of the understanding of some gentlemen of how the compromise act is to be carried out! Sir, it only shows that this thing of carrying out this act is a complex and intricate question—it is an edged tool, and we of the minority are treading upon burning ploughshares every step we take in taxing luxuries. This mode of carrying out the compromise—of not disturbing the compromise, has made me distrustful and disinclined to touch the subject of the tariff at all—has determined me to meet the attempt at the threshold, to "take the ball at the first hop."

Besides, sir, the compromise act provides expressly on what articles the duties shall be laid prior to June, 1842, in case of excess or deficiency of revenue. What are they? See section 6th of the act, which provides that, "in the contingency either of excess or deficiency of revenue," an act may be passed prior to the 30th day of June, 1842, "altering the rates of duties on articles which, by the act of 1832, are subject to a less rate of duty than 20 per centum ad valorem," in such manner as not to exceed that rate, and "so as to adjust the revenue to either of the said contingencies."

By the report of the Secretary already quoted—page second—we see also that the second limitation of the compromise is that there shall be no alteration of duties prior to June, 1842, except upon the articles named in this section—to wit, the articles subject by the act of 1832 to a less rate of duty than 20 per centum ad valorem.

What are those articles? See the act of 1832. The list is too long to quote, but many of these articles are of the protected class, and if we touch silks and wines, what is to prevent an increase of duties not exceeding 20 per centum ad valorem on the whole of these protected articles? Did not the resolution of inquiry proposed by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] point directly to this? I feared it did sir, and, therefore, objected to its reception.

Again: The duties proposed even upon wines and silks and bleached and unbleached linens, &c. involve protection and the whole subject of countervailing duties, and violate the compromise act.

The 4th section of the act provides expressly that "bleached and unbleached linens, table linen, linen napkins, and linen cambrics, and worsted stuff goods, shawls, and other manufactures of silk and worsted, manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be the component material of chief value, coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope, except sewing silk, shall, until the 30th of June, 1842, be admitted to enter free from duty." Yet the act of last session proposed to tax some of these very articles as high as 25, and even 50 per cent.

But, sir, I wish to examine a moment the subject of duties on French wines and silks, especially as connected with our staples of tobacco and cotton.

On this subject, sir, I am for "letting well enough alone." I do not know how it is with the pipe and segar tobacco of Maryland—the kite-foot of my friend, (Mr. JENIFER,) but the old James river weed, the chewing tobacco of Virginia, I am told, was never doing better. It never, upon the whole, bore a better price as compared with other articles of export, and our planters are doing too well to enter upon a war of countervailing duties, which never yet ended in anything else but recrimination, making bad, even where there was any bad, worse. I want more light, Mr. Chairman, than the Tobacco Convention has yet beamed upon this subject. Maryland may have cause to complain, though I am told there are more than 76 millions of cigars imported into this country, and the most of them are not only manufactured of our tobacco, but are actually manufactured here and exported to get the Havana stamp before they are sold—that the enhanced value of the cigars will justify the exportation for importation again. However this may be, and I do not vouch for it, I have a full survey of our whole trade with France, which ought to be well understood before we tamper with the delicate subject of countervailing duties. Look to it, sir, or you may lose in one way, and various ways, more than you gain in another. I hold in my hand a full statistical and historical view of our commercial relations with France, to which I beg leave to call the attention of the committee.

[Here Mr. TRIPLETT, of Kentucky, rose and inquired by whom the statement was made?] Mr. WISE. I am not the author of the statement, but I adopt the information it contains, and rely upon it as my own, until some gentleman shall point out an error in it. I will read it.

"The commercial relations between France and the United States are based upon the terms of the convention of the 24th of June, 1832, which does not regulate the general duties upon merchandise, but only the discriminating over-taxes that affect on both sides, to the benefit of the national flag, the shipping of the adverse party. In relation to the respective products, no international stipulations provide for their rates of entry or exportation, and it has always been referred to the general legislation of both nations.

"From these, however, are excepted French wine; on one part, and American long-staple cotton on the other—concessions having been reciprocally made in their favor by the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831.

"Excepting, then, these two articles, the situation as regards the commercial stipulations consists purely in the repeal of the discriminating duties imposed upon the rival flags, caused by the direct transportation of goods, and in the perfect equality of tonnage duties, mutually established at the identical rates of 5 francs on one side and 91 cents on the other.

"In Washington as well as in Paris, the grievances expressed by the Federal Government, directly or through its diplomatic agents, have a double character.

"Some rest on a system of general recrimination against the French legislation of customs, and on a comparison of the advantages derived by both countries in the course of their commercial relations. Others relate to a certain number of designated articles, such as cotton, rice, linseed, tea, indigo, and tobacco.

"The United States participate in the general commercial movement of France in the following proportion:

Amounts expressed in millions of francs.

Years.	Importation.			Exportation.
	Out of U. S.	By the U. S.	Proportion.	Out of,	To the U. S.	Proportion.
	Mill'ns.	Mill'ns.	Per. ct.	Mill'ns.	Mill'ns.	Per. ct.

1837	569	87	15.3	514	53	11
1838	657	101	15.4	659	120	18.2

"Therefore, the Americans, instead of taking the fourth part (as asserted by their Government) of the whole of the French products, only take the sixth; and France, in return, receives from them more than the seventh part of her whole imports.

"The year 1837, even, shows a result entirely to the reverse, as the United States only took the ninth part of the French exportation, while France received from them more than the seventh of her whole importation.

"If compared together, the relative amounts of this double movement of the French commerce with the United States, during the period of the twelve years above stated, will be found to give the following results:

Years.	Amount of imports in millions of francs.		Difference in favor of		Proportion per ct.
	Imports.	Exports.	Imports.	Exports.	Of the imports.	Of the exports.
	Mill'ns.	Mill'ns.	Mill'ns.	Mill'ns.	In favor of the U. S.	In favor of France.

1838	657	101	19	34	2	15.8

"It may be objected that the advantages which these tabular results seem to show in favor of France are still increased by the nature of the exchanged products, since those sent to France consist mostly of primitive materials; while France sends in return a large quantity of manufactured articles. But it is important to notice, according to the above table, that this last circumstance has largely contributed to ensure to the American exportation its almost constant and regular increase since twenty years; that the only decrease in the importation was in 1831; that, in 1837, it was 33 per cent. larger than the French exportation, and that, from 1825 to 1838, it increased from 41 millions to 101; increase equal to 146.3 per cent.

"During that time, the French exports have been submitted to the most abrupt variations, as well in increase as in decrease. From 1832 to 1833, it went from 53 millions up to 107, to fall back again, in 1837, from 158 millions to 53. The 153 millions to which it amounted in 1836 and the 120 in 1838, but particularly the first, may be considered as unusual, being to a great degree the result of the extraordinary impulse given to the commercial intercourse with Europe by the establishment of local banks in the different States of the Union, and the facility they afforded to the commerce to get rid of their own paper. And this impulse may be considered as the source of all the losses sustained by the French commerce in the liquidation of this unusual exportation. And at the present time, like in 1837, the reaction of this system, again felt in the United States, will create, and has already created, a notable reduction in their importation from France for 1839 and 1840. Notwithstanding these observations, if we take as a regular term of comparison the amount of French exports for 1833, we see that, since 1825 to the present moment, it has only been increased from 94 millions to 120; that is, 28 per cent.

"Moreover, the French exportation is diminishing, while that from America is in progress; and, though the difference in favor of France be still 33.8 per cent. the Americans have in fact derived more profit than the French.

"But it is important to mention one fact, showing that the difference in favor of French exportation is far from being a disadvantage to the Americans; it is, that most of their products shipped from France for the different ports of the Union cannot be considered as forming part of the American imports from France.

"Indeed, if we take the amount of the exportation of 1833, though a better one might be used to strengthen this argument, we would find that the consumption of French products, amounting to 120 millions of francs for a population of 12 millions of souls, would make the annual consumption of articles of French industry or production by each inhabitant equal to 12 francs, while the whole of the French exportation to Europe, which amounts to 233 millions of francs for a population of 213 millions of souls, makes the consumption of the same products by each inhabitant equal to only 1 franc 30 centimes.

"The relative wealth of the American consumer does not afford a sufficient explanation of this very great difference. A sufficient reason for it cannot be found, either in the state of the American industry, which in fact is very far from standing out of competition with that of Europe, its annual production having been valued at no less than 300 millions of dollars. To account, then, for this enormous difference, it is necessary to admit, not only (what is otherwise ascertained) that a part of the French products are merely deposited in the United States to be reshipped for other countries of the same hemisphere, such as Mexico, Columbia, Central Republic, Venezuela, Ecuador, New Grenada, &c.; but, moreover, that is done for a large amount. The Americans, in furnishing out of their own ports these nations, who possess little or no navy, with an important part of the products of France, have, besides the profit of navigation, all the benefit of the commerce of deposit and of transit, and even the gains on commercial speculation. This state of things is very unfavorable to France, and annihilates the advantages expected by her as a consequence of her treaties of commerce and navigation with the new States of South America.

"Another grievance expressed by the American Government is based upon the assertion that a duty exceeding 50 per cent. is levied by France upon the primitive materials coming from the United States."

"It is easy to prove how erroneous is this calculation.

"In 1838, France exported to the United States about sixteen millions of francs worth of natural products, and about one hundred and four millions of manufactured articles; amounting in all to one hundred and twenty millions. The following list gives the principal articles, classed according to their importance:

French Exports to the United States.
Silk goods	51,672,428
Woolen goods	16,478,945
Cotton do.	9,430,278
Linen do.	6,001,431

Wines, spirits, &c.	83,583,055
Worked kids and gloves	10,496,000
Vitification	6,165,000
Hosiery	3,232,000
Military	2,211,000
Fruits	1,751,000
	1,220,000

"In the same year, 1838, France received from the United States eighty-five millions of francs worth of materials necessary to industry, and more than thirty millions worth of manufactured articles; altogether, one hundred and one millions of francs. The principal articles are as follows, according to their importance:

Exports from the United States to France.
Cotton	78,826,000
Tobacco	12,168,000
Palm-leaf hats	2,514,000
Potashes	1,268,000
Whalebones	1,106,000
Common timber	923,000
Products of animals and skins	851,000
Rice	783,000

"The duties paid on the whole import, amounting to one hundred and one millions of francs, excepting a few more articles of no importance, were 9,817,255 francs.

"So that the duties imposed by the French tariff upon American products, which are said to exceed 50 per cent. are, in fact, according to that same tariff, less than 10 per cent. And, if the same calculation be applied to American cotton alone, it will be found that the duties paid upon it, amounting to 8,714,288 francs are not more than 11 per cent. of its value.

"It is said also that the products of America are generally submitted in France to an overtax of 23 per cent. compared with the products of other countries; and that, while American commerce is thus treated by France so much more unfavorably than that of other nations, France is favored in the United States by discriminating duties of 10 per cent. imposed upon articles coming in competition with the products of French industry.

"Far from there being even the slightest appearance of discrimination in the duties imposed by the French tariff with a view to give to the products of any nation the preference on those of America, the French legislation is, on the contrary, very favorable to the importation from that country.

"For example: the rice from Carolina is charged with a smaller duty than the rice of any other country, even that of Piedmont, which for many reasons might be favored, and, however, pays a duty of 6 francs, while the first only pays a duty of 2½ francs.

"The duty on American cotton has been brought down to 20 francs, without distinction of quality, while cotton from other countries remains submitted to duties of 25 and 30 francs.

"American potashes pay 15 francs, and those from Russia 18.

"No distinction is made between the flour, the timber, the drying wood coming from any ports of Europe and that imported from transatlantic ports; and the duties are of no importance.

"It is the same thing for turtle shell, on which the duties are regulated by the same quality, varying from 17½ to 25 and 50 francs.

"The same for the following articles:

Whalebones	30 francs.
Fish oils	8 do.
Honey	5 do.
Wax not worked	2 do.
Hides	4 do.
Palmleaf hats, fine	75 centimes.
Do. coarse	25 do.

"But these articles being almost all that constitutes the direct export from the United States to France, it is easy to judge whether the tariff of France deserves or not all the accusations charged against it. It is sufficient to add that all differences of duties which were established by it in favor of French navigation have now turned, since the convention of 1822, to the benefit of the American flag.

"As to the objection representing the discriminating duty of 10 per cent. levied in the United States on Chinese silks as being specially established in favor of French industry, and as relating to a certain number of other foreign products brought in competition with those of France on the American market, it is proper to state that this duty only bears upon one article—the silks imported in the United States from countries situated on the other side of the Cape of Good Hope; that it cannot be said to be favorable to France alone, as it is also profitable to the exportation of silks from all parts of Europe, without distinction; that it has been established less with a view of a European or French interest than for the protection of certain cotton articles manufactured in the United States, and which could not, without this duty, support the competition with common Chinese silks.

"Therefore, the advantage which France, whose legislation of customs is so favorable to the direct importation from America, may find in the American market, is but the consequence of measures taken without regard to her interest, however useful they may prove to her, as the price of concessions at least equivalent. Among these may be speedily classed those made in favor of French wines by the treaty of the 4th of July, 1831, for they have been bought by the renunciation (stipulated in that treaty) to the French claims with relation to the 8th article of the treaty of the 30th of April, 1803, for the cession of Louisiana, and by the promise, since realized, to bring down the duties upon long staple cotton to equal those paid upon the other kind of cotton directly imported on French or American vessels.

"This favor even, notwithstanding the price doubly paid for it by France, has become more nominal than effective, in consequence of certain measures since adopted by the Federal Government.

"Among the special grievances expressed by the United States against France, we have already mentioned those against the duties levied on cotton, rice, linseed, tea, indigo, and tobacco. It is easy to reduce these recriminations to their proper value."

[Here Mr. Wise concluded his remarks on the 23.]

FRIDAY, January 29, 1841.

[Mr. Wise having taken the floor for the purpose of resuming his argument of yesterday—

Mr. RHETT requested him to yield it for a moment to enable him to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. Wise having yielded—

Mr. RHETT said he had understood that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] had said yesterday that a member of the convention of South Carolina (now holding a seat on this floor) had in that body (so high had the excitement run) proposed a dissolution of the Union. As he (Mr. R.) was the only member of that convention now on this floor, he supposed the gentleman must have referred to him.

Mr. Wise was understood to say that he did allude to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT;] that such was the impression then prevailing in the country, and that if the newspapers at that time were to be believed, a dissolution of the Union was actually proposed or talked of in that convention.

Mr. RHETT said that the gentleman was entirely misinformed. Neither he nor any other member of the convention ever proposed a dissolution of the Union, nor was any such proposition ever made or discussed in the convention.

Mr. Wise was understood to say he was glad he had made the remark, because it had afforded the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] an opportunity of contradicting it. He hoped, so far at least as South Carolina was concerned, that that section of the country would stand vindicated from the charge forever.]

After this explanation, Mr. Wise resumed. Sir, I left off reading yesterday when I came to the special grievances complained of against France. I will proceed to read—commencing, where I left off, with cotton:

"Cotton.—The difference of 5 francs in the duties, which is complained of by the Federal Government, is but a just compensation for the greater value of American cotton compared with that of Turkey and Egypt. This difference has not at all been established with a view to protect one kind more than the other; and the results show it.

"Though submitted to higher duties, (the difference being formerly 25 francs,) the importation of American cotton has increased in fifteen years (1818 to 1832) from 7,669,400 kilograms to 27,333,000; and since the royal ordinance of the 16th of June, 1832, has reduced the difference to 5 francs, the amount of American cotton importation has increased in six years 15,396,000 kilograms; that is, more than one-third, having gone up in 1833 to 43,780,000 kilograms, while from 1823 to 1833 the importation of Egyptian cotton went down from 7,665,000 to 2,362,178 kilograms.

"But a most important fact to notice is, that the difference of duties in favor of Egyptian cotton exists only when brought on French ships, and of this the Federal Government has no right to complain, when the equality of duties stipulated in the convention of 1822 bears exclusively on the importation under both flags of international product. As to the duties levied on Egyptian cotton when imported in vessels of other nations, even those of Egypt, they are established in such a way as to constitute a premium of five francs in favor of the same product from America when brought on American vessels.

"It must be said, also, that certain circumstances, some permanent, some temporary, such as, on one part, the competition created by American planters with each other, the progress of cultivation, and, according to General Cass, the progressive diminution of prices, which must be the consequence of it; and, on the other, the unusual state of Egypt, and the want of extension in the cultivation of that country, paralyzed as it is by a monopoly, leaving no hope for a diminution in the prices equivalent to that which must take place in America—all these circumstances must necessarily ensure to the United States the largest share in the supply of cotton for the French market. The truth of this is fully ascertained by the following results:

"The proportion of American cotton used in the French consumption is estimated at about	87
That from the East	10
And that from other countries, including places of deposit	3

"This shows how little America has to complain of the competition from Egyptian cotton, and how little reason there should be to take away the entirely nominal advantage which is left to this cotton, since (to realize the promise made in the treaty of 1831) the duties levied on American cotton have been reduced from 40 francs to 20.

"Rice.—As regards this article, the American recriminations are really incomprehensible—the tariff being altogether favorable to the American product.

Rice coming from the port where first shipped pays, if from the United States	fr. 2.50
If from European ports	4.00
from place of deposit	6.00
from Piedmont, direct by land	6.00
on foreign vessels	9.00

"This renders it evident that the Carolina rice is greatly protected, if compared with that from other countries, even when brought on French vessels.

"Linseed.—This article has never been of any importance in the commerce of France with the United States. Besides, the duty of 5 francs formerly levied upon this product, no matter what country it came from, (excepting, however, a small quantity brought from Russia for seed, which was slightly favored,) has been reduced by the law of the 2d of July, 1836, to 1 franc when imported on French or American vessels, and to 1 franc and a half when brought on all other foreign ships from any country, without distinction.

"Tea and Indigo.—These two articles are also of very little consequence in the commerce of the two nations. In 1833, the quantity of tea brought to France from the United States was but 1,003 kilograms, the whole value being less than 20,000 francs. Of indigo, the importation does not exceed 6 or 7 hundred kilograms a year.

"Tobacco.—The recriminations addressed by the Americans against the monopoly exercised by the French administration touch directly the right possessed by all nations of regulating as they choose the elements of their internal revenue. If such pretensions were admitted upon one point, there would be no means, no reason to repel them on any other. To-day, the subject is the monopoly of tobacco; to-morrow, it would be municipal taxes, &c. and the internal economy of France, as well as all measures calculated to act directly on the conditions and the regulations of exotic products, would become the basis or the pretext of constant and endless aggressions.

"In principle, these recriminations must be expressly declined.

"But, even laying aside this peremptory consideration, the complaint of American planters cannot sustain discussion. The duty imposed upon foreign tobacco by the monopoly being, after all, in whatever form it may be levied, but a duty of consumption, the legitimacy of which is acknowledged, what remains to be examined is, how far it restrains the consumption of foreign product, in the interest of which it is incriminated.

"The nature of the tobacco manufactured by the Régie being intended for different classes of consumers, the inferior qualities are composed of the indigenous product, while all the superior qualities are manufactured with the mixture of American tobacco. The increase of prices created by the duties has no restrictive action on the habits of rich consumers, for whom the tobacco from the United States is particularly designed. There is then, in fact, no loss for these qualities, constituting almost the whole of the American product. As to the inferior quality, which is produced in the United States as well as in France, it would be difficult to conceive how the Americans could claim from France a protection for their interest, when that same protection would oblige France to the sacrifice of her own interest at home.

"A proof that there is no loss to the United States is, that the consumption of their tobacco, which forms the four-fifths of the whole of the French imports of foreign tobacco, is in progress; the amount of the importation of 1837, which was the largest one, having been exceeded by that of 1838, as will be seen by the following table, which gives the imports in France of foreign tobacco as well from the United States as from other countries, from 1818 to 1838:

Years.	From the United States.	From other countries.
	Kilogrammes.	Kilogrammes.
1818	952,851	87,232
1819	1,000,421	340,703
1820	4,645,288	184,668
1821	270,162	1,056
1822	2,453,936	2,389
1823	4,493,224	34,394
1824	2,792,180	129,518
1825	2,227,965	333,989
1826	2,747,819	317,799
1827	4,323,222	1,136,815
1828	5,230,750	1,229,819

"It is said that the American tobacco does not find under the French legislation sufficient conditions of equality for its sale.

"It is hardly necessary to answer this assertion otherwise than by noticing that the agents of the French administration, coming in the American market with the buyers from all countries, pay the same prices as the others, and necessarily contribute to maintain these prices by their competition, especially when it is known that the wants of France, which can be estimated in advance, increase every year in an obvious proportion, with the exception of a slight variation, which is in no way a consequence of the monopoly.

"But still, we can show that the monopoly, far from restraining the sale of American tobacco in the French consumption, is, on the contrary, favorable to it. If we suppose for one moment that this monopoly be abandoned, it must be compensated by the creation of new custom-house duties, causing the tobacco to be placed on an equal footing with all other foreign articles of consumption, and consequently submitting the supplying to all the chances of commercial competition. Tobacco would be like tea, pepper, cinnamon, indigo, &c. The American planter would find in the French market numerous competitors opposing his prices and conditions, instead of the present constant and regular issue offered to him by the enlightened preference given to him by the administration. Moreover, the extinction of the monopoly would enable the French planter to produce indigenous tobacco, diminishing, so much, the consumption of foreign product. In all conscience, can the American planter wish for such a change?

"Finally, a last complaint is made by the Government of the United States relating to the navigation between the two countries. Its substance may be expressed in the following words:

"As regards the navigation, the tonnage duty of 5 francs, viz. 94 cents, established by the convention of 1822 upon United States vessels in France and upon French vessels in the United States, throws in the hands of third nations all the benefit of the transportation between the two countries, because the flags of those nations paying but 4 francs 12 centimes consequently derive a profit of 85 centimes, and enjoy in the United States the advantage of a free entry."

"To answer this complaint, it will be sufficient to designate the consequences of the Convention of the 24th June, 1822, the stipulations of which regulate the relations of navigation between France and the United States. But, for a better appreciation of the effects of the convention on navigation, it may be useful to glance over the effects produced in this respect by the different regulations at previous times.

"Three distinct periods have preceded the one regulated by the convention of 1822.

"The first period, during which the French flag paid an overtax in America while the flag of the United States paid none in France, was that which preceded the law of the 23rd April, 1816. If, during that period, the United States enjoyed alone the profit of the transportation between the two countries, it was owing not only to the regulations then established on both sides, but especially to the state of war and the laws of blockade. Therefore, no comparison can be based upon the period of the French empire, and the Americans were wrong to consider, then, as an acquired right, the exclusive advantage of transportation, when they possessed it only in fact, and as a neutral power. As for the two years, 1814 and 1815, the French navy was not yet organized—they cannot, then, be taken as a term of comparison.

"The second period—that which immediately followed the law of the 23rd April, 1816—is the only one that can be taken as a starting point, for with it began a more regular order of things. It established, in principle, a difference of duties in favor of the French flag for the importation of foreign products, not including, however, in this system, the French exports proper. Under that regime of discriminating duties, the share of France in the transportation increased yearly. This share, which was nothing previous to that period, amounted, at the end of 1817, to one-sixth of the whole transportation; in 1818 it was one-fourth; and in 1819 nearly one-third.

"The third period was that of the reprisals, by which France was obliged to answer the aggressions of the United States—the last 5 months of 1820, the year 1821 and the first 9 months of 1822. The year 1821 is the only one that offers complete results. During that year, the share of France was a little more than one-seventh, that of the United States a little less than two-sevenths, the remnant to the other flags.

"During the period regulated by the convention of 1822, France obtained the first year (1823) but a little less than one-twentieth; but the event of a war with Spain must have had an influence on this result: the year 1824, free from it shows a slight increase.

"The following table shows the relative shares of both countries, and that of the other flags, in tonnage, between France and the United States, from 1825 to 1838:

Years.	Amount of general tonnage.	Proportion per cent.
		Share of each flag in the general tonnage.
		French	Amer'n	Others.	Aggre'd.
1825	106,552	13	87	—	100
1826	151,256	10.4	89	6	100
Mean for 10 yrs. from 1827 to '36	172,000	12	86	2	100
1737	210,338	17.5	78.8	4.7	100
1833	232,131	13	85	2	100

"So that in a tonnage, which in 1833 is nearly treble of what it was in 1816, having increased from 86,542 tons to 232,131, the proportion which can be considered as the usual share all owed to France by the convention of 1822 is but 12 to 13 per cent. that is, about one-eighth of the whole transportation; the remnant belonging almost entirely to the United States.

"This convention has, therefore, made the situation of the French flag worse than it was under the influence of the law of 1816, and even worse than in the time of the reprisals, though the object of this convention was, as it was said in its preamble, to regulate the relations of commerce and navigation of the two nations in a manner reciprocally advantageous and satisfactory. But this is the more worthy of consideration, because the sacrifices imposed by this treaty to French navigation did not find any compensation that could be taken in account, in the condition made to French products, since this condition was not a consequence of the stipulations of 1822, and was only, as it has been proved before, the price of subsequent concessions, at least equal to, or merely the result of general measures taken without regard for French interests.

"Yet there is another element of the question of navigation which it is important not to neglect, in order to get a just estimate of the damages sustained by France in this respect: it is the nature of the products entering into the mutual commerce, and the share that seems to be assigned from the capacity of these products to each party, in the respective navigation, notwithstanding the reciprocity which is the aim of the convention.

"The Federal Government pretended that the tonnage required for the transportation of American products to France was four times greater than the tonnage required for the transportation to America of an equal value of French goods, even including wine and brandy. The French administration, convinced that this estimate could not be correct, and wishing to know exactly the real difference existing in this respect between the products of both countries, ascertained from numerous and decisive sources of information that the difference in more for American products was in the proportion of 23 to 14.

"In this supposition the relative encumbrance resulting from the capacity of the French products requiring but a little less than a third of the tonnage, viz: about 31.3 per cent. the share of France in the transportation should not exceed the equivalent.

"Therefore, even leaving the discussion on the ground adopted by the Federal Government, the heaviness of the losses sustained by the French navy would still be unquestionable, for the share of France in the general movement of transportation being but from 12 to 13 per cent. there would be still for her a constant loss of from 18 to 19 per cent. on an equal value of exchanged products. To this loss should also be added the portion of tonnage that ought to be secured to France for the surplus of value of her exports over imports.

"From this we can judge of the spirit of inaccuracy which characterizes the grievances of the Federal Government and the carelessness brought in the examination of the facts by which are supported these grievances. But another thing quite as strange as the lamentations addressed to France is the pretext given to them, when based upon a pretended encroachment on this transportation by the flags of other nations, whose share in the transportation has not outreached (as shown in the above table) since 15 years the insignificant limit of 2 per cent. Moreover, the cause assigned to this encroachment is no more correct than the assertion itself, and, in this respect, the Federal Government are yet mistaken when they think that the American vessels pay 83 centimes more in France than the vessels of other nations (English excepted). For, to the 4 francs 12 centimes of ordinary tonnage duties paid by other nations must be added all the expenses for expedition, permits, passports, pilots, &c. which exceed for foreign ships the sum required from French vessels or from American ones, as both enjoy the same privileges.

"If we resume the sundry results which we have just had occasion to state, they bring us to the conclusions which we have yet to offer:

"1st. As for Commerce.—During the last 12 years, from 1827 to 1838, the general movement of merchandises between the United States and France has been equal to 1,916,000,000 francs, that is, an annual mean of 160,000,000.

	During the 12 years, from 1827 to 1838.		Annual mean.	Proportion per cent.
	Mill'ns	Cent's
Share of America, or imports from France,	838	69	42.6
Share of France, or exports from France,	1118	93	57.4
Surplus in favor of exports	280	24	14.8

"But this difference of 290,000,000, an annual mean of 24,000,000, be it 14 per cent. does not constitute a disadvantage for the Americans, for, as before stated, a large amount of French products are brought to the United States to be reshipped for other countries of America; and this amount, which is at least sufficient to destroy the balance against the United States, is a certain source for them of very important profits.

"Therefore, a fact which can be asserted with truth and without exaggeration is, that, as regards exchanges, there is no loss on the part of the Americans.

"2d. As for Navigation.—During the same 12 years the aggregate tonnage between France and the United States (coming in and going out united) has amounted to 2,161,000 tons, giving an annual mean of 180,000 tons:

	Annual mean.		Proportion per cent.
	1841,000 tons.	153,000 tons.
From 1827 to 1838.	226,000 "	12.3
54,000 "	4,500 "	2.5

2 161,000 tons. 180,000 tons. 100

"If we value in the above proportion the difference existing in the capacity of the respective products, the share of France in the general tonnage ought to amount, for an equal value of products, to a little more than one-third, that is, about, viz:

	Annual mean.		Proportion per cent.
	1841,000 tons.	153,000 tons.
54,000 "	4,500 "	2.5

"But the French products having exceeded in value the American products by an annual mean of 24,000,000, or 14 per cent. must have ensured a proportional increase of tonnage to the French flag; calculated in said proportion this increase would be .45 "

"Therefore, the share which France ought to have obtained should be equal to .358 "

"If compared with the one she has obtained in fact 12.3 "

"It will show an annual mean loss for her of .235 p. ct.

"This makes on 180,000 tons a loss of .42,300 tons. "And if from these 42,300 tons we deduct 3,000 tons, taken out of the 150,000 forming the mean annual share of other nations, (because their share is about two-thirds of the going out, and one-third of the coming in,) we will find .39,300 "

To be the amount which, to the detriment of the French flag, formed the annual profits of Americans during these 12 years."

"3d. As for the legislation.—In France, no sort of over tax upon merchandise; entire reciprocity for the flag, privilege given to American products, compared with similar products, not coming from French colonies or from India; advantage to all products coming from the United States over the products of India, not brought directly on French bottom.

"The result of this in fact as has been seen: Equality of advantages in the exchanges; absorption, almost total, of the navigation by the American flag. Such is the situation.

"Such being the state of things, can the United States express any reproach, or threaten to raise the duties on French products? The answer, it seems, is easy to give. And all that remains to be added to the considerations exposed in the present note is, that France, in permitting, as she has done until now, the convention of 1822 to subsist, (this convention giving in fact the 8th of the transportation in the intercourse to the American flag,) has sacrificed the interest of her navigation to the advantages which her commerce could derive from the progressive importance of the markets opened in the United States to her products of all kinds. The commercial relations between the two nations can be maintained, in a manner useful to both, in this sort of balance between the advantages granted to the American navigation and those devoted to French products. But, any modification altering the commercial advantages which alone have caused the concessions made by France to the navy of the Union, and which alone can allow the continuation of these concessions, would evidently authorize the French Government to withdraw favors which, given at her detriment, would have no more compensation.

"The French Government will then await, with calm, the result of the discussions which the tariff may raise in Congress. But it would see itself, although with regret, bound to adopt defensive measures, should this result alter the present state of the commercial relations between France and the United States."

And, sir, in addition to this view of the whole subject, I will present the following views and tables from the New York Herald of December 13th, 1840:

"Instead of devising new means of supplying the extravagance of the Federal Government, the true policy is to cut down the expenses to a level with the revenue. The party about to come into power are already fully cry for an increase of the tariff, and many specious pretences are set up in order to effect that object. The most prominent are the great import of silks from France, and the great duties imposed by that Government upon tobacco shipped from this country. In order to understand the relations between the two countries, we have compiled from official sources the following table of the whole trade for five years, combining years of the greatest depression and inflation:

"In these tables we find that the average import of French silk for five years is but little more than $11,000,000, instead of $20,000,000, as has been asserted by Mr. Biddle, Mr. Webster, and re-echoed by all the party papers from one end of the country to the other. At the same time France buys, on an average, $15,000,000 of cotton from us annually, and one million of dollars worth of tobacco, while our import of cotton goods from France is scarcely $1,000,000. If the silks of France are to be subjected to duty, what will prevent her from laying a discriminating duty in favor of East India and Colonial cottons, to the damage of our planters? It is set up as a pretence that this great excess of silk imports from France causes a drain of the precious metals; on the contrary, we find that the imports of gold and silver exceed the exports for that country in five years near $5,000,000. In this view of it, therefore, there is no reality in the pretence set up, and there exists no good reason for increasing the duties on French imports. In regard to the heavy duties alleged to be levied upon American tobacco in France, the position assumed by the planters, that their interest suffers by it, appears to be entirely erroneous. In the first place, the article of tobacco, from its nature, is exempt from the usual rule of commerce, that an increase of price decreases consumption; the small quantities which each individual addicted to the use of the weed consumes in a year, make the doubling or quadrupling of its prices a matter of minor importance to him, and he does not curtail his usual allowance. On the contrary, it has been observed among the poorer classes, that when other necessities of life have decreased in consumption, in consequence of high prices, tobacco has increased, because it, in a manner, becomes a substitute; for a proof of this, on a grand scale, the facts offered by the planters are the most conclusive. They state that the Government of France derive a revenue of $30,000,000 from imports on the article. Now, if we turn to the table of exports, we find that the export to France has increased from near 7,000 hhds. in 1835, to near 15,000 hhds. in 1838, to 10,000 hhds. in 1839, when the export was short, showing a vastly greater increase than is presented by any other article.

"In the face of this rapid sale of their product, the planters ask for retaliative duties upon the imports of France, to the damage of their fellow-citizens, unless the European Governments consent to forego a most lucrative monopoly which, it is absurd to suppose, they will do, especially on such an article as tobacco, the extended use of which it is wise policy to discourage. The planters appear to be impelled by the same feeling which induces England to make war upon China, because they will not buy her opium. Instead of listening to these injurious pretensions, which the wisest policy of national councils will be to seek means of extending our foreign trade on the American system of reciprocity. It has been the policy of England always to build up markets for herself, by cultivating the trade of new and distant countries. The United States are now in a position in which they can compete successfully with England in foreign countries. The mighty empire of the Brazils affords an immense field for the enterprise of this country. She already buys $13,000,000 of English cotton goods annually, which might be furnished from this country, if the intercourse was properly managed. As it is, we are now without a commercial treaty with that empire. We will shortly recur to this subject."

We lose but little in our general commercial relations with France, and what is lost by the difference in her favor, if there be any, on imports and exports, is more than made up by the profit in our favor on navigation. Will the ship owners and navigation interest go for this war of retaliation on France? Why this war on France, our ancient ally and benefactress—a nation which has in good faith settled with us and paid every claim either upon her justice or her generosity? Is it the old war upon the "red waistcoats"? How came these wines and silks free? Was it our fault, or the fault of an all-grasping protective party, whose interest it was to make all luxuries free, in order to raise all the revenue from protected articles? And now, since Southern commerce has found articles of France to exchange for Southern products of cotton and tobacco, since the exchange of these for silks and wines has become profitable to us, are we again to have a tax laid as directly upon our production as it has heretofore been laid upon our consumption? That, sir, will be the effect, inevitably, of a tax upon wines and silks—of a war of countervailing duties upon France. Separated as France is now from the Holy Alliance, weakened and threatened as she has been lately by the other great European Powers, I would sooner, sir, commence a war upon any other nation than upon her. She needs, especially at this time, the countenance of that country which owes its independence and national existence to her generous aid and alliance. So much for countervailing duties on luxuries.

But gentlemen say there is a deficiency in revenue! Admit it. Gentlemen say themselves that they cannot meet the present emergency with a loan, much less with a tariff. If they cannot wait thirty days for the advertisement for a loan, do they expect less time to put a tariff in operation, when there is no part of our foreign trade which does not require as the shortest possible period to meet new and increased duties on imports, a notice of from sixty to ninety days? This tariff on luxuries now free cannot possibly mean, then, to provide for the present deficiency. No, sir, it must be intended for the future—for more than sixty or ninety days or a year to come. The object is not to lay a tariff now: all these movements now are mere advanced guards of the policy hereafter—they are mere feelers and pioneers for the present. There is time enough hereafter, gentlemen, therefore, to consider your schemes to increase the tariff. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

But gentlemen say, also, that there will be a large reduction after December in this year, and after June in 1842. What says the Secretary of the Treasury? See his report, already referred to, pages 1 and 2:

"It is believed that the reduction in the duties on imports, which, by the existing tariff, will take place in the year 1842, cannot vary much from five millions of dollars. For reasons assigned in the last two annual reports on the finances, the expectations of the undersigned are, that, if the expenditures are properly and seasonably diminished, it will not be necessary to raise all this amount by taxation in any form."

Now, what does this reduction mean? Do gentlemen, does the Secretary, mean to say that a reduction of duties five millions is a reduction of revenue to that amount? If they do, I answer that the one does not follow the other of course, not by any means. A reduction of duty is more frequently the cause of increase than of diminution of revenue. A reduction of duties is most likely to cause an increase of importations. A medium duty on imports is the best duty always to produce a large revenue. A duty so heavy as to amount to prohibition produces no more revenue than a free article. A duty next to prohibition produces no more revenue than a nominal or very small duty. That duty which is a medium between prohibition and free duty is the most productive of revenue, and twenty per cent. on most articles, with a home valuation and Government appraisement equal to fifteen per cent. more, will be still above a fair medium duty on our imports. I doubt, therefore, whether on articles now taxed above twenty per cent. there will be any reduction of revenue, though there be a considerable reduction of duty, after December and June next. At all events, the amount of dutiable imports will not be less than seventy-five or eighty millions, yielding at least fifteen or sixteen millions of revenue, with twenty per cent. ad valorem duty, besides the amount of revenue from public lands and other sources. So that there will be, in all probability, a revenue of at least twenty millions of dollars. And is that sum not sufficient for the purposes of an economical administration of the Government?

From what cause does this deficiency of revenue arise? What have we Whigs been attributing as its causes? Does it proceed from an inherent defect in the sources of revenue, or from casual obstructions to our resources? Is it a permanent or a temporary deficiency? The gentleman from Maine (Mr. EVANS) asked what a permanent deficiency is? Sir, it is capable of definition and easily distinguishable from a temporary deficiency, and upon this distinction the application of the compromise act in a measure depends. A permanent deficiency is one which must continue from defects in the revenue laws, and in the sources of revenue; as where a duty is laid so high that imports are prohibited and cannot come in, or where duties are so low as to produce no customs though millions of imports are entered, or where lands are sold in such a way by law as to bring no price. But a temporary deficiency is one which can continue no longer than obstructions to the operation of laws are removed; as where the duties are all laid exactly proportioned to produce revenue, but extrinsic causes prevent or interrupt trade and diminish importations, where the duty is high enough and not too high, but no imports are entered on which to receive duties owing to temporary obstructions of commerce. And this latter case is precisely our case. We have not heretofore—no Whigs have heretofore—never before the election, complained of any defect in the laws; but we have loudly complained and with triumphant effect of the war of the Administration on the currency, on credit at home and abroad, on commerce, on banks, and on State debt; of the experiments of this Administration, causing excessive speculations, a large foreign debt, extravagance at home, immense importations for a few years, and perfect non-importations now. The fluctuations of trade have been immense, and of currency more enormous still. The foreign debt two years ago was 200 millions, and it can hardly have been reduced 25 millions, if reduced at all since. These and extravagance, and defalcation, and political electioneering in the offices of Government are the causes of the present deficiency in the revenue. The rate of duties, defects in the tariff laws, are no more the causes of this deficiency than any alleged defects in the laws organizing the Treasury Department were the causes of the defalcation of S. Swartwout! Heretofore the Administration has been charging every evil and loss and error to the defects of laws; and we have been defending the laws and charging every thing to their faithless and corrupt and negligent execution of the laws. And, sir, believing all I said before the election, I believe all I say now, and will not change my tune with my change of fortune. Out of power and in power, I declare that it is owing to no defect in the tariff laws that we have not revenue enough to pay every debt we owe and to have a large surplus besides. In 1839 the importations were excessive and enormous—the foreign debt was increased so much and the country so overstocked with goods that last year the importations had to fall enormously, much of the foreign debt was paid, the country is now bare, the demand for goods is great and growing, large orders are sent out for goods to supply the demand, many goods are shipped to us by foreign merchants on their own account, the importations must increase again, and, with the restoration of confidence, and trade and credit and currency, the revenue must be very considerably increased. At all events, I am for waiting and seeing the course of events, the developments and results, before I plunge into another high tariff. I will, if I can, await the full effect and operation of the compromise act, and, if it must be revised, take it up as a whole and revise it as a system altogether. It is obvious that if we legislate now upon the tariff at all, we must do so both partially and blindly.

But yesterday, Mr. Chairman, there was an excess of revenue, and there ought to be now, upon any calculation, an excess of at least thirteen millions. I have read to you the 6th section of the compromise act. It provided that the duties should be altered prior to June, 1842, as it declared, only "in the contingency either of excess or deficiency of revenue," "and so as to adjust the revenue to either of the said contingencies." If there was an excess, the duties of course were to be diminished, and if a deficiency, to be raised on certain articles, not to exceed 20 per cent. Now, sir, I say we had an excess, a surplus of revenue, to the amount of forty millions in 1836; and was there a diminution of the tariff then? Did any gentleman then cry "excess! excess!" as vehemently as they now shout "deficiency! deficiency!" Was there a voice heard then exclaiming diminish the duties, as plainly as we hear many voices now loudly calling for an increase of the tariff? Did any who are so anxious now for taxing the "luxuries" of the rich, then propose to take the burdens off the necessities of the poor? No, sir, no! Not a voice was heard then from the South demanding the adjustment of the revenue to the contingency of an excess. But let a temporary deficiency arise, however temporary and evanescent, and we hear the tariff party immediately announce it, and call for an adjustment of revenue to the contingency of a deficiency. This is the everlasting difference of the North and the South. The one is ever vigilant and true to its own interests, the other is ever generously careless, and indifferent and inactive until the evil is actually upon them! No, sir, there was then no demand for diminution. On the contrary, there was distribution! And, sir, distribution is one of the main causes of this deficiency. Gentlemen who wish me to raise the tariff must first pay back into the Treasury twenty-eight millions which, since the compromise act, they have taken out of it, and without constitutional authority, and in the teeth of the compromise act, deposited—ay, deposited with the States; and will ever remove those deposits?—before I admit any deficiency as a pretext for raising the tariff, when forty millions of surplus was no pretext for diminishing the tariff! Suppose these twenty-eight millions, were now in the Treasury, I would admit you a deficiency, the highest insisted on, of fifteen millions, and then, sir, we would have an excess still of thirteen millions, I repeat, for the pretext of diminution instead of increase of the tariff at this very time. Now, now, at this moment, there should be an excess for diminishing, instead of a deficiency for increasing the tariff, if there had never been such a thing as distribution. Yes, sir, instead of a voice from the South to hail "excess" for diminution of the tariff, the arch nullifier himself was seen side by side with the great champion of the tariff, coming down from the Senate into this House aiding the bill of deposit-distribution, in open violation of the compromise act—their own joint act—and of the Constitution!

Distribution! I must give that, sir, a thorough discussion! The first thing I have to say of it is, that, contemplated in direct connection with this bill to issue Treasury notes, it makes me doubt the sincerity of gentlemen in pretending to any alarm about a serious or considerable deficiency in the Treasury.

How can gentlemen be sincere in their demands for increased duties on imports to supply the wants and pay the debts of the Government, when in their next breath they proclaim their policy of—

1st. Distribution of the revenue from public lands.

2d. Enlarged appropriations to harbors and all internal improvements.

3d. That there can be no reduction of expenditures.

Are these objects of raising the tariff consistent with their avowed reason of a deficiency? Or is a deficiency the pretext, and are these the real reasons of a clamor for an increased tariff?

Sir, I desire, in the next place, to relate to this committee the history of that bill to deposit the surplus of revenue in 1836 with the States of the Union. I mean the deposit act of July, 1836.

In March, 1833, the compromise act was passed, enacting expressly, as we have seen, that no more revenue should be raised than was necessary to an economical administration of the Government; and in case of excess, the duties on imports should be adjusted to that contingency, or, in other words, be reduced.

The Government deposits were removed from the custody and the control of law in October, 1833. From that time until the passage of this act of July, 1836—for the period of two years and ten months—the public deposits remained, without authority of law, wholly under the custody and control of absolute Executive discretion. During all this interval, at the sessions of 1833-'34, 1834-'35, and 1835-'36, the Executive exerted all its influence, strained every nerve, to pass a deposit act to sanction in the first place the removal of the depo-sites, and, in the second place, to confirm in the Executive an absolute and unlimited discretion to deposit the Government funds in State banks, as should seem fit to the Secretary of the Treasury controlled by the President as his officer.

The journal of 1834-'35 will show that, at that session, Mr. Polk, who was then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, brought forward the Administration project of an act of deposit with the State banks, which was very like, if not precisely the same as the bill which passed in July, 1836. The bill, as proposed by him, like the bill of July, 1836, contained at all events no provisions whatever to secure the safety of the public deposits. It left, as the bill of July, 1836, did, every thing to a broad, unlimited Executive discretion. The bill was reported in 1835, and regularly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. In committee Mr. Binney, the able and distinguished representative of Philadelphia then, whose seat is now filled by the gentleman to my left, [Mr. SERGEANT,] proposed sundry salutary amendments, the chief of which was an amendment requiring the banks to have in their vaults at least one-fifth of the amount of deposits in specie. This amendment was offered at the right time, just when the cry began for gold and silver and a "hard-money Government;" and, though the Administration opposed it might and main, and though they had a majority in the House, it passed in committee by so decided a vote as to insure its success in the House. And here, let me remark, sir, that, if that single amendment had passed with the law then, and had been strictly observed, we should not have had that terrible explosion and universal suspension by the banks, which have since followed for the want of it in the act of July, 1836. Mark that as you go along, to the blame of the Administration, not the banks, and to the honor of the truly great statesman who then proposed and insisted successfully in the committee upon the amendment. Passing in the committee, why did it not pass in the House? I will tell you, sir. It actually defeated the bill. The Administration was determined to have the bill as it was, without any such limitation and restriction by law, or to pass no bill at all. The Opposition was then wisely determined to guard the deposits by salutary provisions of the kind, or to defeat it altogether, and leave the whole responsibility upon the Executive which had "taken the responsibility" upon itself. Well, sir—the Administration had suffered a defeat in the committee. The amendment was too wise, too proper, too "hard money," for "hard money" partisans to dare to vote it down, even under the strictest party drill. What then was to be done? All the party schemes of bank speculations, issues, loans, discounts, and deposits, concocted by the pets of a "pet bank" Reuben M. Whitney concern, were likely to be knocked in the head by this "specie clause" amendment, as it was called! Conservation was in the whole camp—but "bargain and compromise" put all right, and saved all appearances of victory. Those of the Administration party who had voted for the amendment, and who could not do otherwise, were told that, if they would only reconsider the vote on the amendment, and reverse their votes and defeat it, the bill should be quietly laid to rest, and their party allegiance and consciences both should be saved and troubled no more by a call to vote again either for the bill or the amendment that session. The bargain was struck, and the bill was laid aside or run over rather for that year. The journal, sir, shows every one of these facts, I repeat, except the moving consideration and the bargain.

Congress again met in December, 1835, and the same contest was again begun and continued over the "specie clause amendment." Mr. Polk went into the Speaker's chair, and Mr. Cambreleng became chairman of Ways and Means. Under his lead the same war continued, and, just as I thought we were about to win the victory, lo! "a sudden thought" seemed to strike certain great leaders of the Opposition. All three of them [Messrs. CLAY, WEBSTER, and CALHOUN] seemed to exclaim at once, like the Greek philosopher, Eureka! Eureka! "We have it!" "Give us the surplus for the States, and you may do as you please with the deposits of the Federal Government. You may place them in a hundred and one rotten banks, without 'a specie clause,' if you please, provided you will deposit the surplus with the States!" Magnificent scheme! Tempting bait! How successful it has been in bankrupting the Treasury here—in luring on the States and individuals to every species of improvidence—in helping to bloat a bad currency—in making bad debts—in causing "deficiencies"—in making pretexts for another high tariff—let the present condition of our people, of our State and Federal Governments, of our whole country, at home and abroad, attest! It took—it passed—its effects are felt. Thank my stars, Mr. Chairman, that there was one Opposition man, though but one, and forty-three of the Administration only, who voted against that iniquitous bargain. The vote always was read—"Nays, 43 Democrats and Wise." That vote I am prouder of than any I ever gave in my public life.

In a hot night session, during the last days of the long session of July, 1836, that deposit act passed; and, sir, as it was going out of that door next to the post office an enrolled bill in the hands of a messenger, I was upon the floor exclaiming—the author of Nullification [Mr. CALHOUN] and the author of the American System, [Mr. CLAY,] the authors of the compromise act, sitting near, and looking on—I was exclaiming, "There goes the first blow at the compromise act—there goes the heaviest blow ever yet stricken at the legislative power of Congress over the public money—there goes a direct sanction of Executive usurpation—there goes a heavy blow at the land ordinance of 1787—there goes a bargain and sale of the public deposits and of their safety—there goes the death warrant of State rights; and if General Jackson will only veto that one bill, fraught with more mischief than any or all other acts put together, I will forgive him the multitude of his sins." And, sir, the next day, hearing that he was inclined to put his veto upon it, I came very near going to him in person to implore the exercise of his constitutional interposition.

Such is the history of the deposit act of 1836. But for its passage, there would now be an excess instead of a deficiency of revenue—a permanent excess, for it is not with an excess as with a deficiency. A deficiency may be temporary, as I have shown, but an excess is necessarily permanent—that is, it may be husbanded and kept—it is in the Treasury, and may be continually, as far as its amount will go, applied to the future wants of the Government. And do gentlemen now wish, in the face of this rightful excess, and the terms of the compromise, to raise the tariff in advance? and are they now seizing on a temporary, not a permanent deficiency in revenue to do so, in order to make a pretext for another distribution? Sir, I believe this to be their object, and I cannot go with them. I must separate from them on this question, as heretofore, and they must pardon my consistency. I ask them again, what does the compromise establish? I answer, that all duties shall be laid for revenue alone—that all revenue shall be raised for the purpose of "an economical administration of the Government," and that none, of course, shall be raised either for protection or for distribution, or for any other purpose under Heaven.

Sir, I put a case to gentlemen. Suppose that an economical Administration required but $20,000,000—suppose that the whole of that sum, enough for the Government's own purposes, was raised from customs alone, would gentlemen then contend that they could lay on another cent of duty for protection and distribution? Would not another cent be protection, per se? I presume that no one will differ from me in saying, in such a case there could be no increase of the tariff, and that additional duties would be protective duties per se. Admit that case, and I will trust to the argument afterwards. Admit that only, what I presume every man will admit, and I put you another question following in order: What is the difference between the case put, and that where the Government needs but $20,000,000, and you have that amount of revenue raised—in part, say $15,000,000 from customs, and $5,000,000 from lands; and where you give away, distribute the $5,000,000 of revenue from lands, and raise duties to supply the "deficiency" of $5,000,000 thus caused by distribution? The only difference is, that in neither case you have a deficiency, but in the latter case you make a deficiency unnecessarily, not for revenue, but for distribution. Are not the additional duties in both cases equally protective per se? They are, because in neither case are the duties laid for revenue. What power has Congress to make a deficiency by giving away revenue? What power has Congress to lay and collect duties to supply any such deficiency so made? For what may Congress lay and collect duties? The Constitution provides specifically: "to pay debts and provide for the common defence," and for no other purpose whatever can revenue be raised; and when revenue is once raised, it cannot constitutionally be applied to any other purposes whatever. These are the old and the true Republican doctrines of constitutional construction.

How are these positions answered and met? Sir, it is not in order to allude here to what passes in the Senate, but the other day I went to a certain place—no matter where—we will say, for supposition sake, to the Loo-Choo islands, as a friend of mine, now dead, used to say. There I found birds of every feather—sea-gulls, crows, and curlews, all flocked together—I will not say vultures nor geese, for I am merely using a figure for the sake of order, and do not mean to call hard names. They were not birds of prey, and, being in high debate, I found them very knowing birds—

"Twas certain"—

"Lands they could measure, terms and tides presage."

The old bird, whose physiognomy is the very phiz of the bird of wisdom, answer the very argument which I have just made. He said, in answer to this argument—

1st. Congress has power to lay and collect taxes. This is a substantive and independent power in itself.

2d. Congress has power "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States." And this is a substantive, absolute, and independent power in itself.

3d. And these two powers being independent of each other, Congress may, therefore, lay and collect taxes without reference to the revenue from the public lands.

Such was the argument so forcibly and strongly put, that it put me to putting on my studying cap for an answer. He told the other birds that this sequitur must be so, "because, if, on the one hand, it be contended that Congress cannot lay duties without first exhausting the land, so, on the other hand, it may be and is contended that you cannot sell the land and collect the proceeds without first exhausting the customs." And he gave examples very striking and pertinent, concluding by saying that "if he was not right, the result was, that Congress could resort to neither power because it had both powers, which is an absurdity."

Sir, this argument is really worth examining, for it is the great and only strong one on which a tariff for distribution can stand. Is this a fair sequitur? Is it an answer to the argument that you cannot empty the Treasury of any revenues already in it, in order to make the wants of Government require additional duties? That is the question; and I answer, no; because when revenue is once collected and placed in the Treasury, no matter from what source derived, one kind is not distinguishable from another, and the purposes to which it is to be applied are specified in the Constitution, "to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence." It cannot be given away. If it may be given away because it is derived from land, why may it not be given away too because it is derived from custom? Because we are told that the revenue from lands is collected under the absolute and unlimited power "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States." But I answer, this clause gives the power to "dispose of" "the other property" too; and is not revenue from customs property? If this clause, then, grants the power of giving away or distributing either kind, it grants also the power of giving away or distributing both kinds of revenue. This argumentum ad absurdum of the Loo-Choo islands proves too much—it is itself reduced ad absurdum. It is sophistical in this, that it makes the words

"dispose of" too omnipotent and absolute, and confounds the power to dispose of lands with the power to dispose of revenue. If it is good for any thing, the only legitimate proposition it contains is, that Congress is not imperatively bound to dispose of lands to raise revenue, or that it may raise revenue from customs alone, without selling the lands. And if this is all gentlemen mean, I grant their position, and they may stop the sales of the public lands to make a necessity for additional duties when they dare!

If they do sell and "dispose of" the territory of the United States for revenue, however, all I contend for is, that they cannot constitutionally empty it out of the Treasury again to make a deficiency for a tariff, or dispose of it for any purpose whatever, except "to pay the debts and provide for the common defence" of the nation.

Indeed, sir, this new doctrine that the power to "dispose of" "the territory or other property" of the United States is absolute and unlimited, is the most Federal and latitudinous that was ever heard of, even from this "god-like" bird of the Loo-Choo islands! There is no such thing as an absolute and unlimited power in this General or Federal Government. There is no power without its well defined limits; and every power is limited by its very objects and purposes. The grant to lay and collect taxes is limited by the objects and purposes of paying debts and providing for the common defence; and the power to "dispose of the territory" is limited by the objects of treating concerning it, of surveying it, of sectioning it, of selling it, and of dividing it into political corporations of Territories and States, and such like objects. In its particular sense, it is a power especially limited to the object of conveying it away to a patentee for a valuable consideration, in addition to the power of making needful rules and regulations respecting it whilst it remains the property of the Union.

Gentlemen need not recur to the deeds of cession from Virginia and the other States to prove, at this late day, after all that has been assumed by the General Government over the public lands, that they were ceded to the States, and not to the United States. The truth is, that, in the deed of cession from Virginia, various modes of expression are used; such as, "for the common benefit of the Union"—"that all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States," &c. on the one hand, and "shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States, &c. according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure," &c. on the other hand—the one class of expressions rather signifying a federal gift, and the other class signifying a State rights gift, if I may so term it; the one a gift or cession to the Union for the common benefit of all the States, the other a gift or cession to each State separately, to take its respective proportion through the United States as an agent. Contemporaneous exposition has long ago settled this point by the invariable administration of the public domain as the property of the United States, from the dates of these deeds down to the day of this modern refinement upon them.

The public lands became, by these cessions, the common property of the United States, to be governed, like the "territory and other property" of the United States are governed, by the Constitution of the United States. And, sir, it is no little amusing to hear gentlemen who are constantly in the habit of reasoning from such phrases as "We the people of the United States"—to show that the Constitution is not a compact between States, but a consolidation of States—to hear these same gentlemen, from like phrases in these old deeds, reasoning to prove that the public lands are ceded to the States, and not to the Union for the common benefit of the States! In this instance, where they are for State rights, I am for Federal construction. And, sir, the worst of it is, as I will show directly, their State Rights construction of these deeds precisely conforms to their consolidating construction of the Federal Constitution; whilst my federal construction of these deeds exactly conforms with my State Rights construction of the Constitution. But, before I proceed to show this, let me ask gentlemen what they will do with the Spanish and French cessions of Florida and Louisiana, embracing now the States of Arkansas and Missouri and the Territory of Iowa? There is no doubt but that these lands, acquired, since the Constitution was framed, by the treaty-making power of the nation, paid for out of the Federal Treasury, are the property of the United States. Will gentlemen keep separate bags in the Treasury—separate accounts of expenditure and of proceeds—so much from customs, which cannot be distributed—so much from Spanish and French lands, which cannot be distributed—so much from Virginia lands—so much from Georgia lands, &c. which may be distributed? No, sir, no. They will heed none of these nice and troublesome distinctions. They will distribute the proceeds of all the public lands, without discriminating between the power under this deed or that deed; and, notwithstanding the sales of the public lands up to 1833, I think, amounted to only 97,000,000, whilst they had cost the Government, in clearing Indian titles and in surveying and selling them, upwards of 102,000,000, besides Indian wars, which had amounted to 37,000,000 more—nowwithstanding there were in fact no proceeds of public lands, but a dead loss on them of 42,000,000, which was paid by customs, of course—though this balance against them may never be paid by the lands, gentlemen will distribute their proceeds. And though these proceeds are all in fact due to supply customs, which have been taken to supply land deficiencies already to this amount of 42,000,000—gentlemen will, if they cannot distribute, deposit customs themselves, as they did in 1836! They will, as they have, deposit—to that bourn whence no traveller returns." Gentlemen smile at the very thought of ever calling for the return of any part of the 28,000,000 deposited with the States in 1836!

And now, sir let me show you that I am consistent with my States-rights construction of the Constitution, and that gentlemen are perfectly consistent also with their consolidating construction. Let me see, too, whether I am not in all this argument consistent with my oft-repeated Whig professions. What do we Whigs profess to be one of the main objects, if not the very chief object, of getting into power? To curtail and abridge Executive power, and to diminish the patronage of the Federal Government. Will the distribution of the revenue from the public lands not add to the patronage of the Executive and of the Federal Government?

Sir, the patronage of the Federal Government, whatever it may be, wherever it be found, is the patronage of the Federal Executive. In point of patronage, the Executive is "the Government." General Jackson proved it to be so, and therefore called himself "the Government." Congress may usurp or acquire powers, but the Executive absorbs them all. In discussing the patronage of the Federal Government, therefore, I am at once discussing the power of one man—the patronage of a President. Let that ever be borne in mind.

Have gentlemen ever surveyed the height and the depth, the length and the breadth of the power of the public domain? Since the days of 1798 and 1801, when they were strong enough to overthrow the elder Adams, to elect Jefferson and Madison, and keep them in power through wars foreign and domestic, the doctrines of strict construction and of State rights have been gradually declining, until at this time they have fallen into a by-word, and become the jest of the scoffer. Why? What is this owing to? Every gentleman no doubt has his theory, but my reason is one peculiar to myself, has never yet been assigned. Sir, I attribute this lamentable declension of State power and influence to the land ordinance of 1787. Its effects are demonstrable.

Sir, that ordinance, with a rapidly unexampled in history, has built up roads and bridges, and towns and territories, and cities and States, and is fast building up an Empire. It is an institution the like of which is not to be found in the annals of other nations, ancient or modern. It is an institution next only to the Constitution of the United States, in its singular history and tremendous effects. Subordinate to the Constitution only, it is an imperium in imperio. No other nation under the sun ever before sold its public domain, and there is nothing in the feudal system, nothing in any thing else in all history, like this land ordinance of 1787. Like the Constitution, it was a new and untried experiment, and yet it is most curious to behold how, like the Constitution, it has succeeded beyond any system in comparison with it in working its wonderful effects and in acquiring its tremendous power and patronage—I will not say strength, for strength implies durability—either for good or for evil. It was the work, I am told, of old Nathan Dane. It is now a perfect study, grand and immense and wonderful, which its own authors, at the time they framed it, never could have fully comprehended in all its scope. That it has done some good, yea, much good, immense good, there can be no doubt, and I do not intend to detract from its design or from its past effects. By its simplicity of detail, its order and precision, its surveys and sections, and regularity of sales and patents, clearing away all clouds and disputes about title, equalizing and facilitating the acquisition of its titles and advantages, it has settled now millions of hardy, industrious, laborious, and independent terre-tenants, under a free Constitution and laws, on the fairest heritage of valleys, and mountains, and lakes, and rivers, and prairies, and forests, and mines, which the sun and the rain ever fructified—on half a continent of more luxuriant land than was ever lorded over by any prince or potentate! This is praise enough for it and its authors, for the past. But I am looking to the future, and I ask whether it is not time that it was changed with the times? Is it likely to continue to pour out blessings upon this country? Has it not been working some evils with its great good, which ought now to be arrested, and which, if not arrested, will more than counterbalance all its greatest good? Look back to its origin. At the time this ordinance was framed, we were two or three millions of people only, scattered over a wide and wild waste of a virgin continent, roamed by savage tribes hostile to the white man. We were in debt a hundred millions for our Revolutionary conquest. We were agricultural. And it entered not into the mind of man to conceive that we were to be any thing else for centuries to come than a poor and burdened people, to struggle hard for ages for the means from year to year of supporting a precarious national existence. The probability and the rational fear then was, that we were to be too weak. When, lo! we not only left our mother country at a very early age—the age of infancy and childhood—but were found in Empire's temple contending with the mighty nations of the earth! There has been something miraculous, almost divine, in the progress of this people. From that time to this we have been rising like a god-like giant in stature and in strength. Thirteen Colonies are twenty-six States—three millions have become near twenty millions—and who would have imagined that, by 1836, in less than half of a century, we would have paid off all the debts of two wars, and have had more than forty millions of surplus revenue to distribute, besides making thirteen powerful Republics out of the public lands? And who could, in 1787, have foreseen the mighty accretion of power in the Federal Executive which has grown with the growth and strengthened with the strength of these wonderful results? If our fathers, the framers of this ordinance, had foreseen these unexpected effects, would they have organized the land system as they did? How did they organize it? Sir, they placed the whole power of the system in the President. The whole patronage of the public domain is in the Executive. The President appoints and removes at will the surveyors, the registers, the receivers, the land and Indian agents of every description; he treats with the Indians, holds salaries, and annuities, and purchase-money in his hands; he opens roads, builds bridges, court-houses, state-houses, and appoints governors, judges, and other officers in Territories; he locates land districts, opens and appoints the time of land sales; the surveys, and sales, and entries, and patents are in his hands; bidders, and purchasers, and settlers, and squatters, and speculators, are in his grasp; the banks and their notes, and specie, and every description of currency with which lands are to be bought, are subject to his will; he holds judicial power in the issue of patents to an immense extent; legislative power in the control of Territories and new States and of their Representatives and Senators in Congress; and the very new States are nursed from their chrysalis territorial condition into existence upon Federal pap from the Executive spoon. He has, by this ordinance, become the “great father” of States! And all this power and patronage is wielded over millions of population, and millions of millions of acres of lands such as are lying in the great valley of the Mississippi! Some of these powers, gentlemen may say, belong to Congress. Congress passes the law, it is true, but the President executes it, and dispenses its bounties. Sum up this power of the public domain, then—can you do it? No. It is too infinite, too multifarious, too ramified, too extensive, and yet to minute in its influences, to be traced or seen all at once. But it embraces immense money power—immense official power over officers and agents—immense individual power over persons natural and corporate—immense popular power over elections—immense territorial power over the organization and admission of Territories—immense legislative power over Congress—immense judicial power over persons and property under patents—immense State power over the new States coming into the Union, and as long as there are large quantities of public lands within them; and over the Senate, which is intended to be a check on the Executive. I ask gentlemen to reflect solemnly upon three facts which I will call their attention to. A member of Congress from a new State once told me, during the last land mania, that, if he would permit himself to take compensation for labor and influence here, besides his eight dollars per diem—a man whom I believe to be honest, and who no more would have touched such extra compensation “with a pair of tongs” than I would—he could make from ten to twenty thousand dollars every session or year he was in Congress. Some lands were selling at $10 and $20 an acre; they were entered at $1.25 per acre—$800 only for 640 acres of land; there would be a dispute about the patent, about who was entitled to enter the land; an appeal would be taken from the Register and Receiver of the Land Office to the Commissioner here, and from him to the President. In every such case—and there were hundreds from Alabama and Mississippi, especially under the Choctaw and Chickasaw treaties—there would be from five to ten thousand dollars involved on a stake of eight hundred dollars only, and the claimants would readily give one-half to any agent who would get them the patents. Members of Congress were sought, of course, as agents, because they had votes here and in the Senate. If they were friends of the Administration, they were held by a golden chain to their party allegiance; if in the opposition, they were silenced and kept still, if not by their own interests, by the interests and stake of their constituents, dependent upon Executive favor. Thus, the Executive wielded an omnipotent land influence over the independence of the legislative department.

Again: Will gentlemen reflect upon the amount of jurisdiction over property and persons both, the President wields in a single year in the issuing of land patents? The land receipts in 1836 alone were from twenty-five to thirty millions. This is a judicial power. Now sum up the whole amount of property, and the whole number of persons involved in all the cases of all the Federal and State courts of the Union, and the jurisdiction over persons and property will not be found so great, I venture to say, as that of this patent jurisdiction of the President. Twenty-five or thirty millions adjudicated by him in a single year!

Again: Not only has there not been a delegate from a Territory, since the foundation of the Government, from General Harrison himself down to my friend before me from Florida, [Mr. Downes,] who was not obliged, in duty to his people and in regard to their interests, to keep on the right side of the Executive—who is the fountain of all honor and favor to a Territory; but, no new State has come into the Union, no matter who was President—whether it was an Adams or a Jefferson—no matter what party was in power, the Democratic or the Federal, the Whig or the Loco Foco—which has not at first, and as long as the land offices were numerous, and large quantities of land were in market, invariably sent two Senators, not to check the President, but to defeat the theory of the Constitution, making the Senate a check upon the Executive! Look at the whole line of your frontier, from Michigan to Louisiana, until lately—see how they all have voted, and how a majority now vote in the Senate. The Senators and Representatives from a new State are obliged, no matter how honest the men are, to be land politicians. They are constrained by the necessity of this system. The fault is in the system.

Shall we add, then, to this system, so enormously overgrown, the distribution feature? Sir, if our sires, the sages who framed this ordinance and this Constitution, could now rise from the tomb, what astonishment and mortification would they not feel and express at the inroads which the former has made upon the latter of these two instruments! They were men who saw far beyond their own times, and who, judging, as they had to judge, from the past, established every possible guard against known or apprehended dangers to liberty. They were men, too, who “snuffed tyranny in every tainted breeze,” but here was a danger which they—which no set of men in their day—which no human foresight could foresee. But seeing it now, would they not reform it? I can imagine the shade of Nathan Dane walking in this Hall aghast at the mighty changes which have been wrought: it approaches my table, and asks “Where are you from?” “From Virginia.” “I have heard before of Virginia.” “Where are you from?” addressed to members from Ohio—to 19 members, each representing 47,500 federal population in a State which now is only part of what was an unknown wilderness northwest of the Ohio river! “From Ohio.” “I have heard before of the river Ohio—most wonderful!” “And you?” “From Indiana.” “And you? and you? and you? and you? and you?”—addressing delegations from Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, Arkansas, and Iowa! “Wonderful! Most wonderful! And how have these great and mighty States been nurtured into being?” “Upon the kind and paternal patronage which you provided for them in the Federal Government.” “What, then, has become of State Rights—where are they?” “Gone. Yes, gone forever, unless this patronage be now arrested.” And, sir, I imagine I see that shade departing, with a warning finger pointed, and with the words “Yes! and public liberty and the Federal Republic will be gone too, unless you restore the just balance of powers established between the States and the General Government by your fathers!” Yes, sir, unless you restore that balance, if that shade should again rise another century hence, it may be like the ghost of Cicero amidst the ruins of Rome.

I have read somewhere, or somebody has told me, the story of a scene got up by some German nobleman to satirize the modern Italians. He represents a foot traveller as entering Rome at night just before the breaking of day. He tries in vain to arouse the slumbering inhabitants over whom drowsiness, and darkness, and stillness, and silence seem to reign like death where once a city stood on seven hills, with all its life by day and lights by night. He throws himself down to rest by the side-way of one of the streets in the open air. In the mean time, the ghost of Cicero, after a lapse of centuries, enters just as the traveller is again rising to arouse the lazy inhabitants. The traveller takes from his fob a watch; the ghost starts back and inquires “what is that?” “A watch, an instrument to measure time.” “Wonderful! and who invented that?” “The Germans.” The traveller then takes from his pocket an almanac, and the ghost again asks, “What that is?” “An annual calendar; and upon hearing an explanation of the art of printing, it raised up its hands exclaiming, “Wonderful! wonderful! and who invented that?” “The Germans.” Failing to awaken and arouse the sluggish populace, the traveller draws out a pistol, and fires it off, to the alarm of the ghost, which again inquires, “And what is that?” “A fire-arm;” and upon being informed of the invention and use of gunpowder in the art of war, it exclaims, “Wonderful! wonderful! most wonderful!”

but who invented that?" "The Germans." "Great and mighty people they must be! but what has Rome been doing all this time? Where are her pillars with 'Roma Eterna' upon them? Where are her temples and her household god? her legions, her Senate, her forum, all her ancient grandeur and glory?" Just at that moment one of the lazaroni of Italy entered, yawning and gaping from sleep, and dirty and ragged and debased, from idleness and poverty. "There now," said the traveller, "is all that is left of Rome." The ghost vanished! So, sir, if this domain patronage continues, our ghosts may rise up but a short time hence in the history of nations, to witness nothing but the dilapidation, and decay, and ruin, and lazaroni of a fallen, a gone empire! Rome rose to a grandeur which we may not attain; but Rome, in all her glory, with all her provinces and conquests, never parcelled out to her legions lands such as we bestow on our citizens and our States. No Consul of Rome, no Emperor ever wielded a patronage of domain like that wielded by the President of this American Republic; a patronage already over the people, their money, their Legislatures, their laws, their institutions, their States, which is fearfully and fast tending to empire—to empire which, like all empires, must decay and fall. We have now a Government of imperial patronage—it must be corrupt—its patronage must be brought down!

Sir, your land ordinances has done wonderful things for this nation; but, if it cannot be changed for the better in respect to Executive patronage, that patronage must not be magnified and increased. It is too great already. As no figure of speech—as no hyperbole—I say that I would vote to give all the public lands at once to the States rather than see their influence constantly tending to empire increased. I am far from going for another system proposed, [Mr. CALHOUN'S,] but at the proper time, when the whole subject can be taken up, and remodelled and amended, I will do nothing, vote for nothing, on the subject, by piecemeal. I will propose an amendment, which I cannot go into now, but which will be a better bargain for the new States and for the old than has ever been yet offered in the market. Old Virginia—which blessed mother of them all the new States never fail to deride and abuse on this floor, like good old parents are ever sure to be abused by ungrateful children who have had advances made them before burial and testament!—Old Virginia, I say, or at least one of her districts, which I can speak for, will advance her children at once sooner than see them hawking themselves about in the market as they do, and sooner than see the land she so generously ceded "to the common benefit of the Union" remain any longer just so much capital only for politicians to trade on and their partisans to waste!—sooner than see these lands merge the States of this Union into a grand, imperial consolidation!

And, sir, if such be the tendencies of the present system, as it is, what will they be, or rather, what will they not be, if distribution be added? Heretofore, sir, the new States, only, have been bound by this alarming power; heretofore, the old States have been the only check upon its progress towards an imperial despotism, and old have multiplied as fast as new ones. The policy which Ohio and Tennessee would have contended for twenty years ago, has become a counter policy to theirs now. As soon as the new States have got well clear of their land offices and well filled with population, they then have become old States in their land policy. In all this we have heretofore had some check, some security, though not enough, I know, against this domain patronage. But, sir, what if distribution be now added to the system, and this powerful patronage be extended to the old States as well as the new? This is all that is lacking to make its power absolute and irresistible. This will consummate the evil. There will then be no check, no security! Catching the States enslaved by State debts, the "borrower is the slave of the lender;" catching them subdued by taxation, with "deficiencies" which they cannot supply by duties on imports. Having the power to supply the "deficiency" of the Federal Government by a high tariff here, the friends of consolidation tempt their weakness with this bait, this fatal lure; and, oh God! the old mother, Old Virginia herself—no, not Virginia herself, but Virginia in the feebleness of dotage—may, perhaps, be seen with toothless gums to eke out her flabby lips to take some of this land pap from the Federal spoon! May God in his mercy spare me that sight! She is, though old and stripped of her ancient vigor, out of debt and proud as ever, though poor. She will not, I trust, sell her old Republican faith for a mite only of an immensity which she once gave away!

Sir, in the combined operation of the principles of an increased protective tariff and of distribution, the manufacturing States will have a double profit, and the agricultural States will bear the whole loss.

The first will get their full share of distribution, and the whole profit of protection. The second will pay the full tax of their consumption under the tariff, which will more than exceed their full share under the distribution. To the former there will be a double gain, and to the latter there must be a certain loss; and this, too, to a great extent, whether duties are laid upon the protected articles or upon luxuries or unprotected articles involving countervailing or recriminating duties; because all countervailing regulations, retaliatory by other nations upon our commerce, must fall almost wholly upon exports which are the products of agricultural States. I shall, therefore, oppose an increase of the tariff at this time, and a distribution of the revenue from public lands at all times.

Gentlemen ask, then, What will I do? Sir, I will postpone the tariff question as long as I can, and leave the present laws to operate as they will, without additional legislation, until I know there is a permanent deficiency in the Treasury. My opinion is, that, when trade and commerce and currency are restored, and confidence revives, there will be importations to the amount of one hundred and fifty or two hundred millions per annum, and that, upon such amount of importations, the revenue from the present scale of duties will be sufficient, and not "deficient." The chief of the duties now are above 20 per cent; and the most of them, after June 30, 1842, will be 20 per cent. ad valorem. That is high and protective enough, when to the ad valorem we add at least 15 per cent. for the home valuation, the Government's own appraisement, the cash duty, and for the rate of exchange—making the duties chiefly, after June, 1842, at least 35 per cent. for protection. When the proper time comes to increase or lay on additional duties, for a proper object or purpose—if ever that time does come—I will vote, of course, to tax luxuries and unprotected articles. We will, however, see whether the manufacturing interests will do that. I will not, though, in any case, vote for an increase of the tariff on any articles to distribute a deficiency.

But what will I do to supply the wants of the Government, and to keep it in successful operation? I will, in the first place, and for this time, vote for this bill to issue Treasury notes. To provide for the future, I would recommend gentlemen—

1st. To husband all resources. Cease the destructive war which has been waged since 1833 upon trade. Encourage and be peaceful with the credit and commerce on which your customs depend.

2d. As long as there is a "deficiency," at all events, in the Treasury, guard and watch your public lands. Neither give them away nor let them be stolen from you—mind, I do not mean by the squatters; I have a friendly regard for them, and would encourage them to improve and enhance the value of our wild lands by any reasonable compensation; I mean the real, high handed land robbers—the political and pecuniary land speculators—who will rob you, like pirates, of land and liberty both, if they are not closely watched.

3d. In the language of the present Secretary of the Treasury, "push a vigorous reduction." He is hypocritical, I will admit you, and has never observed the recommendation himself. But a hypocrite always uses the language of a saint, and a saint may therefore take up his words and be sincere. I then repeat the words—push a vigorous reduction. It is a mode of supply. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS,] the other day, said he could not comprehend how this could be considered a mode of supply. Franklin informed me, sir, when a boy, that a penny saved is a penny gained. I was astonished to hear from a Whig, so soon after the election, that there can be no reduction. Economy will supply the deficiency in the Treasury. I would commence economy—

1st. By reducing Executive patronage. That is one of the first Whig maxims with me. Executive patronage is one of the most costly appendages of this Government. It aspires to a splendid administration, and reduces the Government to the condition in which it is now, a state of "shabby splendor." As an instance to show how costly this patronage is, no better example could be given than this policy of distribution. Gentlemen contend that the public lands belong to the States, and not to the United States. How much cheaper it would be, then, and how much would it save to the States, if, instead of taxing the people of the States, through the tariff, to pay the salaries of surveyors, and registers, and receivers, and agents to watch all these officers, and to pay all the losses by defalcation and otherwise, and to meet all the expenses of acquiring and selling the public lands, you would just give up to the States at once their property, which you say belongs to them, and not to the Union. The loaf, I should think, would be quite as large if you would not cut so many slices from it before you deliver them their own. But, to give away the lands themselves to the States, instead of giving them the revenue from lands after deducting expenses, would be monstrous, monstrous with some gentlemen, because there is no Executive patronage in that system! As for myself, I like neither the one system nor the other. I am content, for the present, with the system now in operation, and pray only that Executive patronage may not be increased by adding distribution to the other evils and curses of a system which is already bad enough. If I am proscribed by my party for this doctrine, I shall be proscribed for a Whig doctrine, and shall still be a Whig. But, Executive patronage may be diminished in other respects. Retrenchment should be unfeignedly practised in great matters and in small. It was once promised, and the promise was broken—shamefully and extravagantly broken. Let us not be false to ourselves and to our country, and we will save much by retrenchment. I would cut down appropriations to internal improvements. Not another harbor should be built until, at all events there was a surplus in the Treasury to be wasted. I would stop and arrest at once the woful extravagance of that disgraceful Florida war; an extravagance woful, indeed, to humanity, when, as I believe on my soul, one-half the money spent has been pocketed in part by plunderers upon the Treasury, and in part spent by them in keeping up the war, in order that they may plunder still more. All the contracts of Government require strict scrutiny, retrenchment, and reform. Especially Indian treaties, and Indian contracts, and Indian agencies, should be watched and reduced. I would abolish sinecures of every description, and there are a thousand and one of them in this Government. I would abolish useless ports of entry for the customs, and useless collectors who do not receive the amounts of their salaries. I do not know how it is, but the expense of collecting the revenue has increased, in the last ten years, more than 50 per cent. This expense ought to be reduced back again to its old standard of four per cent. Salaries ought to be reduced. One thing, which has tended with considerable effect to overshadow the State sovereignties, and to make them comparatively insignificant and unimportant, has been the extravagant salaries which this Government has paid to its officers in comparison with the salaries of State officers. The States are not able to vie with the extravagance of the Federal Government, and the Federal salaries should therefore be scaled down to the State standards, if we mean to preserve the just balance of State and Federal power, as well as to economize.

Sir, there is economy and a large supply of means in reform as well as in retrenchment. I do not mean that hypocritical canting reform, which aspires only to turn out one man and to put in another. But I do mean that effectual reform which will make the coming a business and not an electioneering Administration. If Government officers are allowed to interfere in elections, yea, required to save their salaries by their party services, the Treasury must suffer for it; for electioneering requires funds, and officers will not take their own money when they can reach Uncle Sam's. The dearest purchase ever made by any people is the purchase of themselves with their own taxes which they have paid into the public Treasury. I would put down at every hazard the tyranny of proscription, the most extravagant of all tyrannies, which is always sure to turn out of office some honest and many knowing officers, and to put many dishonest and ignorant ones in their places. I could give many instances of many losses under the present and last Administrations from this cause alone. Appoint the virtue and intelligence of the country to office without regard to party services, and you will find thousand of dollars gained as well as thousands saved by that simple operation of finance. Stop the spoils system, and punish corruption in every shape by prompt removals from office for any abuses or defalcation. Put aside incompetency in every case, and favor no fool because he happens to be your personal or political friend. These are some of the maxims to replenish your exhausted Treasury and to supply its apprehended deficiencies. If they are faithfully observed for twelve months to come, my word for it, there will be no deficiencies to be supplied. Above all, give to the country a safe, sound, and uniform currency, and restore confidence between man and man and Government and citizen, and your coffers will soon be full, and Heaven's and the people's blessings will rest upon your Administration.

As to the best mode of giving to the country a safe, sound, and uniform currency, my opinions are well known to those who know any thing about my opinions at all. With Mr. Madison, I believe that a National Bank is absolutely necessary, and must, try whatever other experiments you please, be resorted to in the end. I believe such an institution not only constitutional and expedient, but, as a Southern man and a State rights man, I support it as the best friend of the South, which is more injured by a bad currency than any other section of the country, and as the only means of creating a hand of the law for the legislative department, to keep the legislative power of the custody and the control of the public money out of the hands of the Executive. The Executive has assumed that power by snatching the public money from the vaults of a National Bank. I would create a National Bank for the purpose of restoring to Congress its constitutional fiscal power, if for no other purpose. That is one of the best modes of reducing Executive patronage. But my views on this question were delivered at length at the extra session of 1837. Now, I will only say that I will vote for such an institution if it be brought forward at the right time, is it be properly organized, and be located at the proper place—and that proper place with me will be as far as I can get it from the contaminating and dangerous influence of stockjobbing and brokers.

In conclusion: I have discharged my duty by declaring my sentiments on all these subjects in advance. I have addressed myself to the House, to the country, and to the President elect. I have declared my opinions as independently as I entertain them. I am apprehensive that they will not be acceptable to some gentlemen of either party, and that is a proof to me that they are nearly, if not exactly right. I trust that they will be acceptable to General Harrison. If I am correctly informed of the man, independence and frankness are qualities which he admires; and, if I am correctly informed of his political sentiments, he will agree with many of the opinions which I have advanced. A gentleman near me shakes his head; but, sir, I do not recognise the right of that or any other gentleman to speak to me for Gen. Harrison. I have never believed him to be that weak old man that his enemies have represented him to be. I believe him to possess a sound mind in a sound body; to be honest, patriotic, and able to project his own policy, and to speak for himself. I believe that he will imitate Washington in calling good and wise men of various and different views to his councils; that he will consider the opinions of all, and then judge and act for himself. At all events, I have spoken to him, here in my place, of public measures touching public interests, as I had a right to speak, and as it was my duty to speak, independently and without reserve. He can take no exception to this course; and if he does, he owes me more than I owe to him—having exerted the best of my humble powers to elevate him to the Presidency. He can easily cancel that small debt by faithfully redeeming the promises which have brought him into power. The sentiments and opinions which I now advance are the same as those which I advanced before his election, and whilst advocating his pretensions to the Presidency, as all my friends and constituents and thousands of strangers in various parts of the country know. That he will agree with all these views and opinions I do not expect. I will compromise much with Gen. Harrison; and yield much to his better judgment and information. I expect to support his Administration most cordially; and I will do so as far as I can in conscience, without a sacrifice of consistency and of vital principle, and with a due regard to the duty I owe my country. I am the same Republican Whig now as before the election—let me not, therefore, be misunderstood or misrepresented.

REMARKS OF MR. MALLORY,

OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, February 5, 1841.—On the bill providing for an issue of Treasury Notes.

MR. STEENROD, of Virginia, having obtained the floor, said that he was desirous of addressing the House on the various topics which had been introduced into this discussion; but as his colleague [Mr. MALLORY] had recently taken his seat, and had evinced a disposition to address the committee, he would, with pleasure, yield the floor to him, as the limited time now remaining, before he bill would be taken out of committee, would not allow them both to occupy the floor.

Mr. MALLORY thanked Mr. S. for his kindness and courtesy, and apologized for obtruding himself upon the committee at that late hour. Whatever might have been my original intention, (said Mr. M.) the period fixed by the House for terminating the discussion having nearly arrived, it is impossible for me at this time to enter into a full consideration of this bill, and of the various topics which have been alluded to in the course of the debate. Nor, indeed, Mr. Chairman, is it necessary, after the able, unanswered, and unanswerable argument of my distinguished colleague, [Mr. WISE.] My principal object in rising, sir, is to notice some remarks of the gentlemen from Maryland and North Carolina, [Messrs. JENIFER and RAYNER,] in relation to the course he has deemed it his duty to pursue.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. J.] had said that "not one position of my colleague [Mr. WISE] was in unison with his party;" and "that his speech was not approved by a single political friend." I ask the gentleman if I am correct in ascribing to him this language? [To this Mr. JENIFER assented, and said "he did not recognise Mr. MALLORY as a political friend of Mr. WISE." Now, sir, I do not mean to be read out of church by the member from Maryland, or by any body else; but I take this occasion to declare that, with one exception, I fully approve, endorse, and intend widely to circulate the speech of my colleague. I thank him, Mr. Chairman, for his bold and manly stand in defence of our interests and principles: for, however offensive it may prove to certain politicians in this Capitol—however he may be denounced or misrepresented here or elsewhere, unless I am greatly deceived, the views he has advanced will meet with a hearty and cordial support among those whom we represent on this floor. They are the doctrines avowed by the Harrison party in lower Virginia, during the late canvass, and around which we mean still to rally. On that ground I plant my flag, and on that will I stand or fall. When we entered the Harrison party we did not compromise our principles; and if the principles of the late contest are to be in opposition to the movements of the coming Administration, then, sir, all that I have to say is, that we have been deceived ourselves, and that we have deceived others.

But the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RAYNER] said that the remarks of my colleague are "ominous," &c. and that he heard them "with pain and surprise." Now, I ask that gentleman to tell me what principles my colleague has advanced in his speech which he had not before avowed? I beg to assure the gentleman they are the doctrines of the Whigs in Virginia, if they are not of the Whigs of North Carolina.

But, sir, what position has my friend assumed that can be construed into an act of hostility to the measures of General Harrison's administration? Is a National Bank to be recommended and pushed, without an opportunity of consulting the people, and without regard to the condition of the country? Why, sir, General Harrison told us he would not resort to a bank until all other expedients had failed, and unless it was called for by a majority of the people. My colleague says, in substance, the same; so that here, at least, there is nothing "ominous" of a difference. The President elect is pledged to adhere to the compromise act on the tariff; and the main argument of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] was in favor of that position.

Mr. JENIFER here rose and said to Mr. MALLORY—Define your own position.

Mr. MALLORY to Mr. J. What, on the tobacco question? [Mr. J. had made a long speech on this subject a day or two before, and is very active in getting up conventions, &c. on the tobacco trade.]

But, says the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RAYNER,] why did not the honorable member from Virginia [Mr. WISE] wait until General Harrison arrived in this city? I answer, why did not gentlemen who spoke before him adopt the same plan? I undertake to say that my colleague would have waited until the arrival of General Harrison, if others had thought proper to do the same. But such had not been the case. Other gentlemen had given their views, without reserve, and he and his colleague were not going to permit public opinion to be prejudged, even if the indications did come from a high quarter.

Mr. M. said he had listened with much attention to this debate, and he was yet to hear any good reason why this bill should not pass, whether we view it in connection with the present or coming Administration.

When last he had a seat on this floor, no one was more decidedly opposed to the policy than himself; and, if he did not discuss the question, it was because he left it to others who could bring to the aid of our cause greater powers of debate and more weight of character than he laid claim to. Since then, our relations have materially changed, and his vote would be given to suit this variation. I admire (said he) consistency in a politician; but I like to see him accommodate his conduct to the exigencies of the times and the wants of the State, not make it square with mere pride of opinion or the prejudices of party feeling.

When the question of issuing Treasury notes was first proposed, the party bringing it forward was flushed with victory, and disposed to rush headlong into the field of untried expedients. The settled principles of our fathers and the most cherished institutions of the country were subjects of the wildest experiments, and a radical change in the character of our Government sought to be effected. Disapproving the measure as a permanent financial scheme, and fearing that it formed a link in the series of measures designed to establish a Government bank, I three times voted against such a bill. As a circulating medium, they are every way objectionable; nor do I approve of resorting to such a process as an ordinary mode of raising money. But in the present aspect of our affairs, as a temporary expedient to supply the wants of Government, in the absence of a better, I feel justified in voting for the bill. Things have materially changed. The Sub-Treasury, so intimately connected with it, and without which they are stripped of most of their objections, as a natural consequence of the election of Gen. Harrison, will be abandoned. With new men will come new measures, and doubtless some other expedient will be resorted to. In the mean time, let us act on the scriptural maxim, that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." But my principal object in supporting this bill is to avoid, if possible, the evils and dangers of an extra session of Congress; and I hope the amount authorized to be issued will not only be large enough for the wants of the expiring Administration, but also for that about to assume the powers of Government. For my part, I am utterly opposed to this called session. I am desirous that the President elect should have ample time to examine into the condition of the Government, and calmly to consider what measures are best calculated to relieve the country. I want him by all means to avoid hasty action on the vital questions that must be considered; to view them without reference to mere political considerations and unbiassed by party influences. It would be extremely injudicious and unwise, in the present state of public feeling, to think of adopting this measure. To suppose that subjects of such importance as would come up at an extra session of Congress, surrounded as they will be by all the elements of political strife, could be considered with reference to the true interests of the nation, is, I think, greatly to mistake the state of parties and the schemes of political aspirants. General Harrison, whatever may be the position of some of his prominent supporters, is now unpledged and uncommitted. Premature action may place him in a position fatal to the just expectations of his countrymen, and fatal to the renown of his Administration. The voice of a free people has elevated him beyond all parties. No man, since the days of General Washington, has had such an opportunity to advance the great interests of the country, and win for himself the deep and lasting gratitude of a great nation. His measures will, I trust, be wise and useful, and his Cabinet selected with an eye single to our wants and interests, having no reference to the succession. For the present, at least, I wish him to be guided by the "let-alone" principle. That the body politic is sick, cannot be denied. It has suffered for years from empirical treatment—at one time for undue stimulation, then again from excessive depletion. No system has been long adhered to, and no indication properly followed out. Quackery has been the order of the day, and from its effects the patient has been gradually sinking. But protracted as has proved the malady, and inefficacious the remedial means employed, a close examination discloses no organic disease. There are, it is true, disturbances in the circulation, with undue determinations; but now that the acrid secretions are removed, the favor will go off, leaving behind no incurable effects. Rest and the vis medicatrix naturee will soon bring about a state of sound health and vigorous action. Sir, I protest against this incessant unkinging—this never-ceasing doctoring—and, as many an unfortunate patient has been physicked to death just because the physician, in order to satisfy the anxiety of his friends, felt called on to prescribe something, without exactly knowing himself how his medicine would act, so is the business of the country in like danger from too many legislative prescriptions. Confidence, Mr. Chairman, in your attendant goes far to effect a cure; and, as in medicine, so it is just now with the body politic. The physician selected by the people to minister to the diseases of the State is one in whose skill and integrity they place all confidence. As one who played an humble yet active part in this selection, I am for giving him full time to examine, to reflect, to decide, and, when he acts, let it be with a full knowledge of our condition, and with a clear perception of our wants. Let the country alone, therefore, for awhile, and it will restore itself; in its present feverish state, it would be extremely imprudent to add additional excitement; the proper way for its recovery to a healthy tone is to avoid all stimulation. I am unwilling to subject the business and currency of the nation to the injurious influence of another year of political agitation; I am unwilling to pass through another summer of turmoil, which will as surely come as you convene Congress in May or June, to discuss the question of a bank, of distribution, and of a tariff. It will be a President making session, for with it will open the campaign for the succession. This question, I believe, the people do not desire to agitate soon, whatever may be the wishes of ambitious politicians. The elements of prosperity are still to be found in the country, and, if allowed time, will soon settle down into order. We want rest, and, if we expect to do well, we must have it.

How can the advocates of a called session expect that General Harrison, immediately on coming into power, should, without proper time for reflection, precipitate himself into great measures? No: the proper plan will be to allow him time to look around him, and to examine into the true state of affairs before he acts. Above all, Mr. Chairman, I am against that policy calculated to place General Harrison in a condition where he will be compelled to commit himself to the schemes of any man. I am averse to making any individual our next President, by bolstering up his hobbies with the great popularity of General Harrison. I have voted for him to be President, and for nobody else. I deny that any one on this floor, or in the other wing of the Capitol, is authorized to indicate what are to be the measures of the incoming Administration. For one, I will denounce the attempts of any clique to mark out the course of the President elect before he reaches the seat of Government, or has been clothed with authority. And, Mr. Chairman notwithstanding the manifestations from the regency quarter of this Hall, I protest, in advance, against their opinions being considered as the orthodox principles of the Whig party. I find fault with no member of our party for expressing himself in regard to a bank, a tariff, to distribution, or internal improvements. I am willing to hear all that gentleman may have to say, and expect to be heard in return, without being proscribed for so doing. But I do object to one set of men undertaking to manufacture political opinions for others; and will resist, cost what it may, what I regard as an effort to prejudice these questions in the public mind, so as to force us up to their standard of Whig principles; or, failing in that, to make us objects of suspicion to our friends, and to excommunicate us from the true church.

Gentlemen insist that a called session at an early day is necessary to provide means to supply the ordinary purposes of Government. Sir, I hold the opposite opinion, and believe, if the amendment of my colleague prevails—which proposes to give to General Harrison the power to issue five millions of Treasury notes after the fourth of March next—that there will be money enough for an economical Administration of our affairs. We have, over and over again, charged the Van Buren party with extravagance, and promised to reform abuses and retrench expenditures if the people would elect Gen. Harrison. But certain gentlemen here, who had sung this tune for years, had not a word to say about retrenchment and reform. The cry now is, money! money! give us money. Yes, we must have money to carry on a splendid Government, and to get this money they must raise the taxes of the people. If, Mr. Chairman, the indications, put forth by the members over the way, who have spoken on this subject, are to be received as the principles of the incoming Administration, notwithstanding all our past cry of retrenchment and reform, it is evident we shall gain nothing on this score by a change of rulers. If this be so, all that we have accomplished by the turn of the political wheel is, to put out one set of charlatans, and put in another. I mean, sir, so long as I remain here, to practise on the precepts I inculcated before the people—to carry out, when in power, the promises made to the people when candidates for office. Nor do I recognise any here as authorized to speak for the President elect. He came into power on the pledge that he would carry out reform and retrenchment, and I believe he will fulfil his promises to the letter.

It is the duty of the Administration about retiring to make ample provision until the next session of Congress. They owe it to themselves and to the country; justice and policy both demand it at their hands. But suppose they do not; what then? On the Van Buren party, and not on the friends of General Harrison, will rest the responsibility. And surely, sir, the instruments he will select to carry on the Government will have tact and sense enough to present this in its true light before the people. I have no fears for the coming Administration of General Harrison. I believe that distinguished man will draw around him persons of talent, who will aid him in ascertaining the true state of the country; and men who will be able to make a correct exposition of its affairs. That he will encounter difficulties, is very certain; otherwise, we have deceived the people as to the condition of the country and the Government. But I hope he will meet them like a man; and, if he proves faithful to his trust, the people will sustain him in any emergency that may arise.

During the canvass, we were in the habit of assuming, as a correct standard for the expense of the Federal Government, the amount of appropriations per annum under the administration of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] and, allowing something for the increase of population, the Florida war, &c. to compare the expenditures of Mr. Van Buren with those of the former. What I preached then, I am willing to practise now; and, for one, I hold my political associates to a strict and rigid accountability. Instead of resorting to a loan, as proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] and as approved by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. RAYNER,] instead of taxing our constituents by increasing the tariff, I maintain it is our duty to try first retrenchment and reform. A loan will entail on us a permanent national debt, to which, except on extraordinary occasions, such as war, I am entirely opposed. It is with Government as with individuals. Money loaned for ten or twenty years creates no uneasiness in the mind of the borrower. He maintains his habits of extravagance, and makes no arrangements to liquidate the debt, because the day of payment is a long way off. But let him, instead of a deed in trust, give his bond payable in a few months, and at once he will make an effort to meet the obligation. So is it with Government. Lend us money for ten years, and in vain may you look for retrenchment. But force us to redeem our notes every twelve months, and we dare not incur the responsibility of extravagant appropriations. Sir, I respect the patriotic professions of politicians to a proper extent, but my experience here satisfies me that if you want an economical and pure Government, you must keep it poor! Take not a single dollar from the pockets of the people that is not absolutely necessary to their security and defence.

The honorable member from North Carolina, [Mr. RAYNER,] in arguing in favor of borrowing money, assigned as a reason "that a loan would expose to the country the state of our finances." But surely we can do this without incurring a permanent national debt; for if you borrow money it must be for years, not months; nobody will lend it to you for a short period. A competent and honest Secretary of the Treasury can very soon find out the state of our money affairs. The remarks of Messrs. BARNARD, BELL, and EVANS, had convinced him that the deficit in the Treasury is greater than the revenue will fill up, "and that their calculations as to the estimates put this question in so clear a point of view as to remove all doubt." Now, sir, they did agree as to there being a deficiency; but what was the amount of that deficiency was altogether another affair. They all arrived at different results. For instance, one says it is about seven millions, while another had set it down at forty millions—a mere trifle of thirty-three millions of dollars difference between two gentlemen; and yet we are to resort to a "loan to expose to the country the true state of our finances." Sir, would you borrow seven millions or forty? It is obvious to my mind that none of them can tell the real deficiency in the Treasury; and if their data and estimates are so satisfactory to the gentleman from North Carolina, I must confess they weigh little with me.

But suppose this money is borrowed, how do you propose to pay the debt? Oh! say gentlemen, let us tax luxuries; and a mighty dust is kicked up here to blind the eyes of the people to an approaching tariff and an extravagant Government. This cry is all very fine; it sounds well and may succeed; it is at least plausible, but will not bear much scrutiny. It is not a mere question of a tax on wines and silks. There is much more in it than at first meets the eye. I cannot but regard the proposition as designed to spring a tariff on us before we are aware of our danger; and I think so, notwithstanding the many disclaimers that we have heard over the way. Sir, one would almost conclude there were no tariff men in this House—"judicious tariff—moderate tariff—just tariff," is all they want; but what would be just, moderate, and judicious, is about as hard to find out as the deficiency in the Treasury. It might vary, like that, from 7 to 40 per cent. All these disclaimers come too from tariff men, and if they were cross-examined a little as to their understanding of the compromise act, the end and object of this movement would perhaps be put "in a clear point of view." Sir, we have nothing to fear from an open tariff question. Presidential aspirations will prevent that. It is against a high tariff for protection in disguise that we must guard; for here lies the danger. But I do not intend to go into the question of laying a tax on wines and silks. My colleague has done that in a much abler manner than I can, and, as I intend circulating his speech, it is unnecessary.

As my time for speaking is limited by the rule adopted this morning, which takes this bill out of the committee in some twenty or thirty minutes, I must avoid a regular battle, and be content to fire a few random shot, intending to write out what I have no chance of speaking here. This much, however, let me say, that the question is an important one, demanding more consideration than it can receive during the present session of Congress, if the whole time were appropriated to the subject. If increased taxation is necessary, take up the whole question of the tariff, consult all sections and interests, and act openly and deliberately. Let us know what you are about, and let your legislation be general, not partial. Why this haste? Months will elapse, if you adopt the motion, before the duties will commence—not until October next—too late entirely to relieve your Treasury of its present embarrassments. I have no objection to tax luxuries, if you will relieve necessities from taxation. I will go with you to tax the rich man's silk garments, if you will go with me to take off your enormous tax on the poor man's blanket and coarse woollens and cottons. I will tax wine if you will take off your tax on salt. I have no objection to imposing a moderate duty on silks and wines for the purposes of revenue; but I have no idea, as a Southern man, to stand by quietly, and see luxuries for which we exchange our produce heavily taxed, while those exchanged for Northern manufactures come in free of duty. I do not want to force a poor man's wife to give up her silk gown, and compel her to wear coarse Northern cottons at the same price. Why not tax your spices, dye-stuffs, teas, mahogany, &c. as well as wines and silks? But the cry is, the Treasury is empty and how are we to supply the deficiency? Sir, I would advise you, instead of doing this, by increasing the taxes on the people, to study retrenchment and reform; to practise what we have so zealously proposed. I would say to Gen. Harrison, as a friend, study this book, (holding up the blue-book.) I would advise him to act on the precepts contained in the speeches of the gentlemen from Ohio, (Mr. BOND,) from Pennsylvania, (Mr. OGLE,) and others of our party, which inculcate reform. Let him abolish all useless offices. By a judicious reform in New York alone, from 500,000 to $800,000 may be saved yearly in the collection of the revenue, the cost of collection in a few years having gone up to eleven from four per cent. without adequate cause.

Put an end at once to your scrambling system of harbors and internal improvements, which takes millions out of your Treasury, in most cases to be literally thrown into the sea. This we have a right to expect from General Harrison, who, in one of his letters, when a candidate, expressed the opinion that this was a matter which should be left with the States—the time having gone by when the Federal Government could advantageously carry it on.

Cease building your marble palaces for idle show, when plain structures will answer every purpose.

Reduce the contingent expenses of Congress and the Executive Departments.

Cut down your overgrown civil list, both at home and abroad.

Look into the administration of the military and navy departments; your commissaries, contractors, and the vast number of agencies over the country; enough here may be saved, by judicious management, to terminate the Florida war without further draughts on your empty coffers.

Modify or repeal your bounties and drawbacks, which take hundreds of thousands from the Treasury to no useful purpose, and which, in many cases, have become crying abuses.

Revise your pension system; for it is connected with enormous frauds, and has been pushed by Congress far beyond the limits of justice and propriety.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RAYNER] read us a wholesome lecture on economy and frugality; but, strange to say, labored hard to persuade us into the notion of an extra session, which would of itself cost the country some four hundred thousand dollars for pay and expenses of Congress. This is practising what you preach with a vengeance! To begin your system of retrenchment by incurring an unnecessary expense of four hundred thousand dollars, when the gentleman himself admits that our funds are exhausted, and that we should borrow the very money to carry it through. It may be, sir, very practical economy in North Carolina, but does not square with our "abstract" notions in Virginia.

Pursue, then, I say, a vigorous system of retrenchment, and there can be no doubt that Gen. Harrison will soon save money enough to pay all the debts of this Government. Mr. ADAMS averaged about thirteen millions per annum for permanent and extraordinary expenditures; and the great interests of the country were in quite as flourishing a condition as when we expended thirty or forty millions. It is not so much the amount of appropriations, as the manner of disbursing them, that does good to the country. I found fault with the manner as well as the amount under Mr. Van Buren, though some of our Whig friends now do not seem to regard the amount as so enormous, and argue as if twenty millions per annum was not enough. I repeat, sir, the declaration that, with a careful administration of the civil, naval, and military departments, and that of Indian affairs, such a retrenchment may be carried out, without the passage of a single law, as will enable us to pass through the present year without serious difficulty or embarrassment.

But, at the same time that the cry of deficiency! deficiency! is sounded in this Hall, and comes back to us from all parts of our widely extended country—at the same time that the proposition is pending in this wing of the Capitol to increase the taxes and burdens of our constituents, an effort is strenuously urged in the Senate to take from a bankrupt Treasury three or four millions of dollars arising from the sales of our public lands, and distribute it among the States to enable them to pay their enormous debts at home and abroad. The corrupting and injurious tendency of this distribution scheme, the fatal blow it would inflict on the independence of the States, making them "pensioners on the bounty" of the Federal Government, is so happily illustrated in the speech of my colleague that I shall say but little on the subject. Whatever arguments might be used in favor of distribution with abundant resources, surely no man can, in the present state of our finances, for a moment entertain such a thought, unless, through its instrumentality, he seeks to inflict on us a high protective tariff. They are parts of the same policy: the adoption of one, as a necessary consequence, leads to the other. A loan is intended as the basis of a national bank; distribution of the proceeds of the public lands as the entering wedge for the assumption of State debts; and a high tariff as providing the means of payment. They all go hand in hand together; they are links in the same chain of consolidation, and, if not broken, will bury the sovereignty of the States under the ruins of our Democratic institutions.

The question of distribution at this time is a very different one from former propositions of this character. Now it is proposed to take nearly one quarter of the whole revenue of the United States and give it to the several States, when that revenue is admitted on all hands, especially by those who are in favor of this scheme, to be inadequate to our wants. Whereas, when the subject was before under consideration, the Treasury was burdened with an enormous surplus, alike inconvenient to the Government and dangerous to the well being of the country. Many, therefore, who approved it when we had a "vicious surplus," may now, without inconsistency, oppose it with a barren Treasury.

Conscious of the absurdity of "distributing a deficiency," (as my colleague, Mr. WISE, properly terms it,) and of the fatal objection to the proposition to be drawn from a deficiency in the Treasury, the advocates of the policy gravely maintain that it is an assumption of power on our part to use this money for the ordinary purposes of Government; and rely on the deeds of cession to the United States in proof of their position. But there is no expression to be found in any of these instruments which warrants this construction; and certain I am, no man can be hardy enough to maintain that it is in accordance with the spirit and intent of the deeds, and that the parties thereto contemplated at the time any such purpose. But this argument has been blown to the winds; it is utterly indefensible. As to the constitutional power, I have but a single observation to make: Can this Government derive power from any other source than the Constitution? Can a Republican of the State Rights school look for power for the Federal Government in any other quarter without destroying the fundamental article of his creed? In the conclusion of his eloquent address, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RAYNER] endorsed his old creed of nullification. Sir, I am glad to hear him claim still to be a nullifier; for, if the doctrines of his speech be carried out by the incoming Administration, it will not be long, in my humble judgment, before he will again have to resort to "nullification as the rightful remedy." I listened to his speech with much attention—it was a handsome affair—but I must say, it was the best tariff speech that has been made during the whole debate.

But I have another objection to the distribution scheme of still greater force, representing, as I do, the most important naval station in the United States. I believe a more fatal blow to the navy could not be given than to adopt this policy. Once begin the system, and you will find every effort here in vain to obtain an appropriation for this branch of your service adequate to its wants and the exigencies of the country. In the scramble that will follow, how few will be found to foster the interests of the navy! Think you a State owing some twenty or forty millions of foreign debt will give up its share of public plunder to strengthen this right arm of our defence, and, in lieu thereof, consent to tax its citizens to the amount so released? No man now rises to make a speech in Congress who does not, before he sits down, entertain us with patriotic bursts of eloquence about the navy. We have metaphors without bounds, and similes without number; well turned sentences and rounded periods, with eulogistic harangues on our gallant tars—real Fourth-of-July orations. Well, sir, this is all well enough; it is an evidence of the great favor in which the navy is held by the people, when politicians are lavish in expressions of their attachment to its interests, and of admiration for the heroic achievements of its sons. Daily is it rung in our ears that the navy is neglected; that, compared with that of France, England, Russia, even with Turkey and Egypt, it is contemptible as to numerical force; and that, should war ensue with England, our commerce must be swept from the ocean. All this, sir, is, alas! too true, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWY] and myself, some two years ago, in this very hall, fully pointed out, in our attack on the Board of Commissioners. Our fortifications are also declared to be in a condition of utter worthlessness for defending our cities and coasts; few of them completed, and not one with an effective armament. Every tyro in naval or military affairs talks about steam ships, steam batteries, La Paixhan guns, (sixty pounders,) and shell shot; and one not used to the gasconading style of debate here would sometimes think Washington city was invaded, and that a foreign steamer was playing bombs on the Capitol itself.

Mr. Chairman, it must be confessed that these great interests have been most shamefully neglected. We have had, heretofore, the means to carry on a proper system of national defence; and Congress, with a few exceptions, has made liberal provision. Those entrusted with the superintendence of the military departments have been wanting in knowledge or disposition to make them efficient. Look, for instance, at the enormous sum appropriated by Congress for this purpose, which has been returned to the surplus fund in the Treasury, because those entrusted with its management would not do their duty. But adopt your distribution scheme, with an empty Treasury, and you may have the will to build up your navy and to perfect your fortifications, but, sir, you will lack an important ingredient—the means—unless you incur a great national debt, like England, to scourge our people, and grind the laboring man to the dust. Pass the distribution law, and one of two things you must do, if you desire to keep the navy even on its present footing, and all admit the imperious necessity for enlarging it; you must incur a debt, or create an enormous tariff; and from the day that the destiny of the navy is connected with either of these measures may be dated its impending destruction. Our relations with England are of a threatening character. No man can predict when the war trumpet of this great power may not be sounded on our coast; and yet, in the face of this serious danger, with an empty Treasury, a disordered currency, a crippled navy, unfinished fortifications, without foundries for cannon, without materials of war and for ships, for gentlemen to rise in their places and propose to rob the Treasury of millions, to be scattered among the States, seems to me utterly irreconcilable with the dictates of common sense, and the just demands of the country. But what do we see? Why, my colleague the other day had given his views on these great measures, had simply avowed his opinions, when two gentlemen rose and expressed their suspicions that he was about to quit the Whig party. Sir, things have come to a pretty pass if we are to be proscribed or suspected for advocating opinions that for years we have openly entertained.

Mr. JENIFER here made an explanation to the effect that he had said nothing about Mr. WISE being about to desert his party.

Mr. WISE asked whether the gentleman from Maryland had any distrust of him.

Mr. JENIFER made some reply which could not be heard.

Mr. WISE. Well, then, I suppose the gentleman takes it for granted that the party will go with him; when, at the same time, who knows what the measures of General Harrison will be? Were there not some gentlemen making principles for General Harrison before he came into power? But when it was not known what the principles of the coming Administration would be, how could it be said that he was about to desert his party? He (Mr. W.) did not take the gentleman from Maryland as the Administration.

After some further explanations between himself and Mr. JENIFER,

Mr. WISE observed that, had it not been for other gentlemen expressing their views, what they would do, &c. he would never have said a word. But, as every member on the floor who had previously spoken had given his views in relation to the coming Administration, he thought it was as fair for one as for another. And as others had administered their little nostrums for the cure of the disease, he, although not a regular physician, thought he would do so too.

Mr. MALLORY then resumed his remarks, and observed that, at the very outset, before he had spoken a moment, he had been taunted by the gentleman from Maryland with not being one of the party. I repeat, sir, (said Mr. M.) that the honorable member from Maryland shall not unchurch me. I worked as hard in the late canvass as he did; and I come here to sustain the Administration of General Harrison in all good faith, and will do so as long as he acts on the principles which brought him into power. The gentleman, too, from the city of New York, [Mr. MONROE,] who entertained the committee a few days since with a disquisition on common schools, had twitted us with our abstractions—"Virginia abstractions" was the burden of his song. Sir, I will tell those gentlemen that Old Virginia cannot boast of as many common schools as New York; but she has, perhaps, as much common sense. Had the gentlemen witnessed the exhibition in this hall a few mornings since, of certain pupils from the State institution at Lexington, they would have perceived that our people were not altogether ignorant of the science of signs. Sir, we understand the signs given out by others, and it is on the faith of these signs, as well as words that we are acting. I have said that we have common sense, if we do not abound in common schools, though of these we have a few, and I am happy to say they are fast increasing. Perhaps the gentleman [Mr. MONROE] has never heard of a common school case that occurred in the common school State of New York, where his common school people, in the plenitude of their practical wisdom and hard sense, were guilty of an "abstraction" that far surpasses any hair-splitting ever done in the Old Dominion. The case was this: a bridge connected with a railroad line leading to the great city of the Empire State, in consequence of some error in the architectural skill of these common school gentry, gave way with a tremendous crash, and the connection between the ends of the railroad was kept up afterwards by a steamboat. These common school gentlemen, however, with their usual industry, set themselves to work to repair the bridge, and in a few weeks things were all straight again. The steamer, being no longer required, was ordered round home; but, in attempting to pass down the river, it was discovered that she could not get under the bridge, it never having before occurred to the managers that they could all the time have run the boat as well below the bridge as above it, or entered into their calculations to compare the height of the boat with the space under the bridge. The steamer was finally sold for a mere song; and, before she was released from confinement, was stripped to her naked timber. [A member at the Reporter's elbow suggested that it was similar to the mason who built his leg in a chimney.]

But the member from New York was not the only one who had talked of our "abstractions." The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. RAYNER] did not spare us. Mr. Chairman, when an individual here from the South joins in this hue and cry about Virginia principles—abstractions, as they are pleased to call them—I always set it down as a sure sign that he has turned Federalist. Now, sir, if to oppose a high tariff, internal improvements, a splendid and extravagant Government, and all in connection with this beggarly distribution, is an abstraction, then, for one, I glory in being a Virginia abstractionist. The honorable member, too, indulged in some invidious comparisons between North Carolina and Virginia, and spoke of our "former glory," and our present "shame." I have not, sir, a single term of reproach, not an unkind word, or a harsh epithet, to apply towards his State. Between his constituents and mine the best feelings and relations exist. We live side by side, and we trade together. We are almost one and the same people, divided only by an artificial line of latitude, nature having placed no barrier between us. I gloried, moreover, in the gallant stand which his State assumed in the late contest, and rejoiced as much at her victory as I mourned over our own defeat. But if that victory is to be used against the Republican cause, then, Mr. Chairman, give me my good old mother, with all her "abstractions," her constitutional prudery, if you please, even in the decline of her greatness and renown. Give me, I say, the Old Dominion in preference to blushing North Carolina, in the act of prostituting herself to the genius of Federal consolidation.

The honorable member from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] in the course of his eloquent remarks the other day—for that gentleman is always eloquent—talked somewhat about certain "stargazing politicians" "butting their heads against the lamp posts." But let me tell the gentleman there are more sorts of star gazing than one. In admiring the horizon, illuminated by the brilliant rays of the rising sun of Power, it would be as well occasionally to view the quarter whence comes the storm. In our eagerness to relieve the President elect from all embarrassment, we should not forget the interests of those who sent us here. We should look, sir, to the humble cabin as well as to the palace. These movements will produce great excitement in the South. There is a storm ahead; and when it bursts upon us, it will sweep from the ocean many a gallant bark that now sails proudly before the breeze.

But, Mr. Chairman, if those who entertain and have expressed opinions opposite to those of my colleague and myself, are to succeed in putting the ship of State on the Federal tack, I shall never regret the course I pursued in supporting Gen. Harrison. If I am deceived as to the principles on which he will administer the Government, his election, if it accomplishes nothing else, will have the effect of breaking down party trammels in the South, and henceforward we shall meet, not on men alone, but on the ground of principle. In the late contest, men of all creeds united together to accomplish a common object. Laying aside our peculiar notions, we united in one mighty struggle to rescue the Constitution from the Administration which we thought endangered its safety, and threatened not only the institutions, but the liberties of the country. We succeeded, and I am willing still to act together until the great work of reform is perfected. But, while such is my desire, I cannot remain unconcerned when the impression is sought to be made, that my opinions will be in conflict with General Harrison's measures. I draw my conclusions from his letters and speeches, which I am prepared to show do not differ from the principles avowed by my colleague and myself.

If the question again comes up, whether State rights or Federal doctrines are to shape the administration of this Government, I am prepared for the contest. Let the line be drawn as soon as gentlemen please. Doff our name and uniform, and take the field under your own banners. Unmask your batteries, and we fear not the result. Sir, I believe not those who tell us that, in this contest, "our Republican General Harrison" will be against the Republican party, and will lead on our foes. It cannot be true—it is not true.

Mr. Chairman, in thus expressing my opinions, I am actuated by no factious motives, and certainly by no wish to embarrass the next Administration, or produce discord among our friends. As a citizen of this Republic, and as a representative of the people, I have a right to speak freely of public men and their measures; and, come what may, while I have a seat in this Hall, I shall continue to exercise this privilege on all proper occasions. Conscious that, in what has been said, I have endeavored to discharge my duty, I rely for support, not on the approving smile of any man or set of men here, but on the good sense, the justice, and liberality of my constituents at home.

DEBATE ON THE TREASURY NOTE BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. RAYNER, OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, February 5, 1841—
On the bill providing for an issue of Treasury Notes.

The bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes to the amount of five millions of dollars being under consideration, and Mr. BARNARD of New York having moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, giving notice that, if the motion prevailed, and a report to that effect should be made to the House, he would then offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the subject of making provision for the wants of the Treasury be referred back to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions

First. To bring in a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow ten millions of dollars on the credit of the Government, and to issue bonds or scrip therefor.

Second. To bring in a bill imposing duties for additional revenue on wines, silks, linens, spices, and other articles, being luxuries, imported into the United States; but in such manner as not to conflict with the principles, policy, and spirit of the act of March, 1833, commonly called "the Compromise Act."

Mr. RAYNER, of North Carolina, spoke as follows:

He said he should vote against the issue of Treasury notes now, as he did at the last session; but that he was willing to vote for a loan, and for additional duties on articles of luxury, as contemplated by the resolution of the gentleman from New York. Setting aside the disputed question as to the constitutional power of Congress to issue Treasury notes, about which (said Mr. R.) I shall venture no opinion now, yet I oppose the measure on grounds of inexpediency. I believe that a crisis has arrived in our financial affairs which requires a remodelling of the system which must soon be met, and that this issue of Treasury notes is calculated to put off to a future day that which requires immediate attention. I look upon it as deceptive in its character, and calculated to conceal from the knowledge of the country the embarrassed and ruinous condition of the National Treasury. It is also calculated to screen from a just responsibility the condemned authors of that system of misrule which has bankrupted the Treasury, and well nigh dishonored the nation. For whilst it, in fact, entails upon the Government a debt—a national debt, in every sense of the word—yet so much magic is there in a name, that those who have for years been resorting to this system have as uniformly denied that they have imposed upon the country a national debt; but insisted that they were only using temporarily the credit of the Government.

Now, sir, it is right that there should no longer be practised any deception on this subject. It is right that the true situation of the Treasury should be made known to the country. It is right that the authors of the financial embarrassments under which we are now suffering should be held to a strict accountability. Let them, in the few days of power which they have left, confess that the Treasury is empty, that the country is in debt, that funds are necessary to save the honor and credit of the nation, and bring in a bill authorizing a loan; I will vote for it, although it shall be with a protestando against the wasteful extravagance which has rendered it necessary. Sir, if the Government is in debt, without the means of paying, the people should know it; they should also know the amount of that debt, under whose management it has been incurred, and the manner and terms on which it is to be paid.

The issue of Treasury notes, as I have before said, is only putting off the day of settlement, and throwing it on those who, while they have foretold and protested against the present evils, will yet be charged, when the day of reckoning comes, with having incurred the debt, for the payment of which they are now making provision.

If Treasury notes be constitutional—about which, as I said before, I deem it unnecessary to express an opinion—yet I do not consider this to be an occasion when it is proper to resort to them. It may be, that in cases of emergency which cannot be foreseen or provided for—as war, or a sudden revulsion in the trade and revenue of the country—the issue of Treasury notes might not only be expedient, but absolutely necessary; when the interest, the honor, and the plighted faith of the country were in danger of being compromised. Sudden and unexpected difficulties not only require, but justify extreme and unusual remedies. But such is not the case at the present time. The horrors of war have not suddenly burst upon us, and the difficulties which beset the trade and commerce of the country, so far from being sudden and unexpected, have been gradual in their approach, long seen, and long felt. Then, not being suddenly called upon to provide against some unforeseen disaster, I insist upon it that we should take time to view the whole field of difficulty, throw the responsibility where it properly belongs, and resort to such means as shall be consistent with the obligations we owe to the country, and the duty which we owe to ourselves. I speak as a member of the Whig party—as a member of that party which long foresaw and long forewarned the country against the measures which have reduced us to this ruinous and almost degraded condition. Sir, I do not choose to be driven, by this cry of the "immediate wants" of the Government, about which we have heard so much, to the commission of an act which I not only believe to be inexpedient and unwise at the present time, but which, while it is calculated to relieve the guilty from responsibility, will throw the odium of their misdeeds upon those who are to succeed them.

As to the indebtedness of the Government, without the means of making payment, there is no difference of opinion here. That more money will be required than can be supplied by the accruing revenue for the present year, must be admitted on all hands. As to the deficit which exists, and the amount which will be required for the present wants and future demands during the year, is a point of controversy. I shall attempt to show, before I conclude, that it is much larger than can be gathered from the obscure and cunningly devised report of the Secretary of the Treasury. The question is, how is the requisite sum to be raised? After a great and unexampled victory, the Whig party is about to come into power, and they find the Government crippled in its resources, and bent down by years of pressure. We now have to apply the remedy. We now have to raise the means of enabling the country to comply with its obligations, to repair its shattered defences, and to save the national honor. I am willing to do this, but I cannot consent that a discomfited enemy shall dictate the way in which it is to be done; still less am I willing to aid in screening that enemy from public indignation by assuming the responsibility which should rest on him. And if we have nothing to hope from an obstinate and perverse majority here—if this measure is to be presented to us as the ultimatum, as the only relief which they will consent to give, I, for one, am for "bidding my time," and am willing to wait till those who truly represent the interests and wishes of the people shall have assembled here.

I have stated that I am willing to vote for a loan, and feeling assured, as I do, that five millions will not be more than half sufficient to meet the deficit for the present year, I am willing to vote for the ten millions contemplated by the resolution of the gentleman from New York. I prefer a loan, because it will reveal to the country the actual condition of the Treasury, and I prefer that it should be authorized by the same men whose measures have forced us to this alternative. Those who have contracted the debt, and squandered the means of carrying on the Government, should take the responsibility of making provision for both. Paying a debt is not incurring a debt. It may be, and it will be, that the Administration to succeed the one now in power will be compelled to provide the means of paying the debt already incurred, and of meeting the deficit growing out of the shock given to trade and commerce by the destructive policy of the present party in power. And I wish now, in advance, to call the attention of this House and of the country to the fact that any measure of relief hereafter to be resorted to by the coming Administration will be the inevitable result of the policy of the present Administration. If the country is in debt; that debt must be paid; if there is a deficiency in the revenue for the present year, that deficiency must be provided for; and if, in applying the means for either, the country is pressed, let not those be blamed who make the provision, but those who forced it upon them. Sir, I make these remarks because it is very apparent, from the tone of the debate on the other side, as well as of the presses in their support, that this is to be the basis of an organized opposition against General Harrison's administration. And now I charge in anticipation, and I call upon gentlemen on the other side to note what I say, you have squandered the public treasure; you have crippled the resources of the country by your war upon commerce and credit; you are about to go out of power, after having plunged the country in debt, and deprived it of the means of meeting its necessary expenditures; and upon your heads, and yours alone, let the responsibility rest. And in providing the means, as we shall hereafter be compelled to do, to pay for your extravagance, and to supply the deficiency caused by your warfare upon commerce, let it not be said, for in truth it cannot, that we have imposed upon the country a national debt.

If the interest of the country, in a pecuniary point of view, is to be consulted, a loan must be preferable to Treasury notes. Treasury notes, with four and a half millions now outstanding, and bearing an interest of six per cent. are now, I learn, from one-half to three-fourths per cent. below specie par. These Treasury notes are reissuable, let it be recollected, until the 31st March, of the present year. Authorize the issue of five millions more, or ten millions, as contemplated by the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and as you thus increase their amount, you lessen their value. It may be said, these Treasury notes are paid out to the public creditor at par, and received from the public debtor at par. But, sir, is it right, with all your professions about a specie currency, and all your denunciations of paper, to receive the public dues in a medium less valuable than specie, whilst, according to the provisions of the Sub-Treasury law, you are compelled to collect one-half of the revenue in gold and silver after the 4th July next? And is it right to compel the public creditor—or leave him no other alternative, which is the same thing—to receive the amount due him in a medium less valuable than specie, after all the clamor we have heard about the impositions of banks, and the worthlessness of paper money? Treasury notes, like all other bills of credit, cannot long maintain their nominal value, as has been proven by the history of all Governments that have ever resorted to them. In fact, they are a sort of revolutionary currency at best, never resorted to by Governments except when in extremis; and when they have no other mode of supplying their coffers, and of sustaining their credit. They remind me too strongly of continental paper money, and the assignants of revolutionary France, to receive my sanction. Owing to their uncertain and fluctuating character, as to the time and amount of their issues, capitalists are afraid to invest in them; and as a currency, they are entirely unsuited to the public convenience. And all the patchwork of legislation to which you may resort cannot acquire for them the confidence and countenance of the commercial community. But resort to a loan, issue your scrip, redeemable on time, with a fixed rate of interest, and you create a stock in which capitalists will seek to invest their money; and this stock, so far from selling at a discount, will command a premium. I understand that the stock issued by the Government in 1822, '23, and '24, although redeemable at pleasure, sold at a premium of two per cent. If issued on time, it would be worth more; but at two per cent. the Government would save two hundred thousand dollars in a loan of ten millions. If you issue Treasury notes made returnable in one year, you are only postponing the evil, which will be aggravated when the time of presentation arrives. For, as I shall attempt to show, the deficit in the Treasury is not a temporary one, but a permanent one which cannot be supplied unless the imports should be increased beyond any reasonable calculation, or the duties on those imports, or a portion of them, should be raised. So that, at the time these Treasury notes shall return, the Treasury will need all its available means in order to meet the necessary and current demands of the Government.

That there is a deficit all agree. The question is, how large is it likely to be during the present year? I have no doubt that it will be more than ten millions; it certainly will if Congress passes the appropriations that are absolutely necessary for the country. It is true, we can make the expenditures any amount we please, no matter how small, if we are disposed to disband the army, to lay up the navy, desert our fortifications, suspend our foreign intercourse, &c. In reading the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I was struck with the time-serving and disgraceful proposition he has made, for the purpose of preserving a balance in the Treasury at the end of the year. He says: "But the preservation of a suitable balance in the Treasury may require more than what will probably be left after satisfying other purposes. The raising of any sum for that object in 1841, could, however, be obviated by authorizing a contract to be made, under proper restrictions, extending the period of payment for a portion of the temporary liabilities falling due in that year. Yet, in the opinion of the undersigned, the best mode of providing for this case would be, without either an extension of this kind, or a loan, or a further issue of Treasury notes, or a change in the tariff, but merely by lessening the appropriations for the service of 1841 below the estimates, or by passing such declaratory clauses as to the present tariff, and such acts as to the public lands, as have heretofore been urged on the consideration of Congress."

Treasury Note Bill—Mr. Rayner.

H. of Reps.

Now, here is the Secretary of the Treasury, an officer whose especial duty it is to submit an estimate of all the expenditures necessary for the Government, proposing, in one sweeping clause, to lessen the appropriations below the estimates, without specifying any items of expenditure which he would could down, without considering the absolute wants and sufferings of the country, merely for the purpose of making a show of economy, now upon his retirement from office, and of withdrawing attention from that prodigality and extravagance that have bankrupted the Government. And this is the same Levi Woodbury under whose administration of the finances $39,000,000 per annum have been expended, without a murmur against extravagance escaping him. No, sir, I hope no such illiberal, narrow-minded policy is to be pursued here. As statesmen entrusted with the interests of the country, it is our bounden duty to see that its honor and character shall be preserved, and all its main branches of defence shall be sustained; and if there is a deficiency in the revenue, growing out of a long period of misrule, we must resort to other means—to the credit of the Government; relying upon the future for the return of prosperity, and a replenished Treasury.

The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the expenditures for the year 1841 as follows, viz:

Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous	$3,450,740 13
Military	7,725,440 94
Naval	5,445,339 21

Besides these, certain permanent appropriations under existing laws will become chargeable on the Treasury during the next year, in sums as follows:

For ordinary purposes.
Military	864,000 00
For other purposes.
Public debt, including interest and first instalment for the District of Columbia	149,200 00
Redeeming Treasury notes	4,500,000 00

Amounting, in all, to $22,134,720 28
The receipts for the same year he estimates as follows:

From customs	$19,000,000
From lands	3,500,000
From miscellaneous	80,000
Expected balance in the Treasury available on 1st January, 1841	1,580,855
Available from banks	220,000
Treasury notes yet issuable under the act of 31st March, 1840	342,618

Amounting, in all, to $24,723,473

Thus leaving a balance on 1st of January, 1842, of $824,000

These estimates of the Secretary have been proven to be entirely illusory and deceptive. The tables in his report have all been got up, worked out, and arranged to meet a conclusion to which he had resolved to arrive—that the expenditures for the present year should fall within the receipts. Heads of bureaus have declared to gentlemen on this floor that, in making their reports, they were required to cut down their estimates of the appropriations for the public service, so as to make them square with the predetermined estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is enough to make one blush for the degradation of his country, when he sees the minister of finance so far forgetful of the duties of his station, and the great interests of the nation, as to frame his report, not to suit the wants and exigencies of the country, but to save his party from the charge of extravagance, and himself from that of mismanagement.

I shall not attempt a detailed examination of the various items of income and expenditure for the present year, submitted in the Secretary's report; for their fallacy and duplicity have been fully and ably exposed. The gentlemen from New York, Maine, and Tennessee, (Messrs. BARNARD, EVANS, and BELL,) have placed this matter in so clear a point of view, that no one can misunderstand it who is not wilfully ignorant. And the feeble attempts that have been made to refute their calculations have tended to make the conviction still stronger, that they are founded on data which cannot be controverted.

As before stated, the Secretary estimates the receipts for the present year at $24,380,855, including the Treasury notes issuable under the act of March 31, 1840. Of this he estimates $19,000,000 from customs. Now, sir, is it reasonable to suppose that this amount will be received from customs during the present year? As to the Secretary's opinion, what is that worth? In his annual report of December, 1839, he estimated the receipts from customs for 1840 at $15,000,000, and they fell short $2,000,000; and I learn that is nearer than he ever arrived at the truth in any financial calculation. Is it reasonable to suppose that the income from customs for 1841 will be six millions more than 1840? Why should it be? Gentlemen say last year was one of great pressure, but that trade is now reviving, and that the importations during the present year are likely to be heavy. It is true that, since the election of Gen. Harrison, confidence has revived, and business begins to prosper, but yet, in the efforts of the banks to resume specie payments, which is one of the fruits of a restoration of confidence, the pressure in the money market must for a time continue. It is only gradually that business, when once depressed, can regain its former prosperous condition. And if the Sub-Treasury is executed according to the express provisions of the law, as General Harrison is bound to see that it shall be, and one-half of the public dues after July are collected in actual specie, it will create an additional demand for specie at the very time when the banks will be endeavoring to strengthen themselves, and when they will be least able to spare it. And my word for it, if the Sub-Treasury is executed according to the letter of the law, you will have another revulsion, the banks will again suspend, business will be prostrated, confidence destroyed, and the scenes of 1837 be enacted over again. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. THOMPSON] spoke of the large importations now on their way here across the Atlantic, the duties on which were to fill the Treasury. Why, I suppose that is always the case about this season of the year. The importing merchants have ordered out their spring supplies, and although your ports may be crowded for a short time, about the latter part of the winter or beginning of spring, yet, during the summer months, you may scarcely hear of an importation. But I think it may be safely set down that the importations next fall will be very thin; for it must be recollected that, according to the terms of the compromise act, the duties on all articles are to come down on the 1st January next, in the proportion of one-half of their excess over twenty per cent. Then, is it not reasonable to suppose that the merchants will withhold their importations till after the 1st January, except in such small quantities as will meet a ready sale? Most assuredly they will. Otherwise, their stock remaining on hand could be undersold by those importing after the first of the year. Owing to these circumstances, I do not believe that the income from customs for 1841 is likely to exceed that of 1840. But, putting it at a medium between $19,000,000, as estimated by the Secretary, and $13,000,000, the amount received in 1840, and we have $16,000,000, which is a liberal, and, as I believe, an over estimate.

Next is the estimate of receipts from public lands, which the Secretary puts down at $3,500,000. This I am willing to allow, although I understand the Commissioner of the General Land Office has given it as his opinion that it will not exceed $2,500,000. Add to this "miscellaneous," "expected balance available on the 1st January next," the sum "due from banks which is likely to be made available," and "additional means arising from Treasury notes authorized to be issued under the act of March 31, 1840," and you have the whole means for the support of Government for the year 1841, amounting to $21,723,473.

Let us now look at the probable expenditures—not with reference to the very smallest amount with which the Government can possibly get on, but with reference to the actual wants and necessities, the honor and character of the country. I see from House Document No. 265 of the last session, the appropriations for the "civil, miscellaneous, and foreign intercourse for the year 1840" amounted to $4,512,545 05; whereas, in the estimates for the year 1841, it is put down at $3,450,740 13. Why is this? The member from South Carolina [Mr. RAEFF] insisted that $300,000 would be saved in consequence of the shortness of this session compared with the last. But then gentlemen on the other side insist that we intend to have an extra session. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. THOMPSON] said he could see we were determined on this. If we do have an extra session, it will be a charge on the Government. And if gentlemen know this, why not provide the means of meeting it? I certainly know nothing of the purposes of General Harrison, or of those whose counsel he will seek; I have, however, but little doubt an extra session will be inevitable. General Harrison will find the Treasury empty, with pressing demands against it daily, and nothing to discharge them with. In that case, he will be compelled to convene Congress in order to obtain the means of carrying on the Government. In addition to this, the country requires reform at our hands—a speedy and thorough reform. Millions of freemen are calling for the repeal of the odious sub-Treasury. A prostrate commerce and ruined currency require the remedial hand of the Government. I speak only my own opinion. I believe an extra session indispensable. And, if it takes place, the expense attending it will be more than the difference between that of the present session and the last. I discover the Secretary has sent in no estimates for the outfits of Ministers abroad, and the outfits of those who are already there. Does he suppose General Harrison will not change the diplomatic corps? Does he suppose the honor and interests of the country will any longer be entrusted to those who now represent the nation at foreign Courts? Or is this a part of his system of retrenchment, that it will be better not to recall Ministers, because the appointment of new ones will be attended with expense? These extra charges, falling upon the civil list of the present year, will be fully equal to any of the last year, not incident to this. I have therefore sufficient data for assuming that the "civil, miscellaneous, and foreign intercourse" for the present year will amount to at least $4,500,000.

Next come the estimates for the military service. And these the Secretary puts down at $7,725,440 94. Now, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] has so effectually exposed the imposition attempted in this estimate, that I am sure there is not one who heard him that is not fully satisfied on the subject. I see, from the same document to which I have before referred (No. 265) that the appropriations for this branch of the service, at the last session, amounted to $3,343,900 83. And so far from the expenses necessary for the same being less this year than they were the last, they must necessarily be more. Not one word is said about the Florida war. House document No. 70, of the present session, is a letter from the Secretary of War, containing an estimate of the appropriations necessary for the Florida war during the year, of which, it seems, $250,690 10 is due for service already performed, as follows:

For arrearages to militia called into service by the Governor of Florida	$221,244 02
For pay of a battalion of Georgia volunteers for 3 months' service in 1840	29,446 08

It seems that there are already, in addition to the regular army in Florida, two thousand militia, 1,200 of them mounted men, and proposed to be increased to 1,500; and, as stated by the Paymaster General, "the President, having subsequently sanctioned this service, places their claims on a footing with those of the militia regularly called into the service of the United States." According to the estimates submitted in the same document by the Paymaster General, the Commissary General of Subsistence, the Surgeon General, and the Ordnance Department, the expenses of paying and subsisting this force for the year 1841, in addition to the arrearages already due, will amount to $2,385,329 75¢, the whole of which will fall on the year 1841. And, what is remarkable, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had this letter in his possession since the 17th December, without suffering it to be brought to public view here.

[Mr. JONES. I beg leave to correct the gentleman from North Carolina. The letter was in possession of the committee, subject to the inspection of all its members. There was no attempt on my part to conceal it.]

Mr. R. Bat, sir, I insist it was your duty to have brought it before the notice of the House. In the speech which you made at the commencement of this debate, in which you attempted to sustain the views of the Secretary of the Treasury, in submitting your estimates of receipts and expenditures for the year 1841, you did not include this item or expense for the Florida war. Mr. Chairman, (addressing the Chair,) I repeat, it was the duty of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in his character as Chancellor of the Exchequer, with this knowledge in his possession to have submitted estimates of the Florida war, when he unfolded his budget for 1841, in the speech with which he opened this debate. But he is in a letter laid on our desks, from the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, dated December 17, 1840. Here, then, is an additional charge falling upon the year 1841 of $2,385,329, not even alluded to by the Secretary of the Treasury, which added to the estimates submitted by him, amounts to the sum of $10,110,770 69; and which, added to the appropriations of last year for the same service, amounts to $10,729,230 58.

But, says the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] the Florida war will probably soon be terminated. Probably soon be terminated! This is the language we have heard for years. It has long been the theme of Executive reports and of the despatches of commanders-in-chief. Let a few miserable squaws be taken, or starving old men surrender themselves, and it is immediately heralded throughout the land that the power of the Indians has been destroyed; that they are coming in; and that the war will soon be at an end. And the next account we hear is, that the blood has been flowing in torrents, and houses have been wrapt in flames. For every brave destroyed, two seem to spring up in his place. We have, within the last day or two, heard of the capture of sixty or seventy Indians; but how often has this been the case heretofore? It is impossible to estimate the number of Indians in Florida. Years ago, it was said there were only a few hundred; and although we have been destroying them all the while, yet the work of murder and ravage has continued. As soon as the army relaxes its operations, they became emboldened, leave their inaccessible haunts, and commence anew their course of pillage and death. You may suppose there is not an Indian in Florida, you may suddenly withdraw your army, and the first thing you hear may be, that the Indians have reappeared in all their power. Sir, the Florida war is not at an end, nor is it soon likely to be. Sam Jones and Tiger-tail yet lead their merciless bands through the everglades of that ill-fated region; to-day doing "the deed of death," and to-morrow concealed in the impenetrable swamps. The bloody Mickasukies yet rove through the forests of Florida, leaving death and desolation in their track. To legislate with a view to the early disbandment of the army in Florida, is to leave your own countrymen exposed to the horrors of savages warfare. To do this through a false economy, is to sell the blood of your citizens for money. It is to surrender a portion of your territory to the savage, and to confess, in the face of the world, that a predatory band of Seminoles has successfully resisted all the boasted power of the Government. To stop the war at this stage, is to compromise the honor of the country. You must, you are compelled to prosecute it to a successful issue. I therefore take it for granted that, in estimating the appropriations for the military service, you must include the $2,385,329 proposed in the letter from the Secretary of War.

It seems that the Secretary of the Treasury, in estimating the reductions for the present year, cuts down the expenses of the Indian Department $174,000 below the appropriations of last year. I know not whether this is on account of there being funds in the hands of agents yet unpaid, on account of outstanding appropriations, or whether it is in pursuance of that system of gradual retrenchment recommended in his report; for it will be seen, by reading the report of the Secretary, that he undertakes to read Congress a lecture on economy, after having exhausted the Treasury by his extravagance and mismanagement; and, in pointing out the causes of, and grounds for, future retrenchment, he says that "fewer Indians remain to be removed." Certainly there are fewer to be removed. But are there fewer that ought to be removed this year than were removed the last? Judging from the rapid settlement of the Western States, and the consequent pressure around the Indians remaining, I should suppose there were more. I appeal to gentlemen from the Western States—from Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Missouri—and I ask them if they are not anxious to have the Indian title to the lands in their States extinguished, and to have those Indians removed to the West? Are they not every day becoming more inconvenient to the whites, and the whites to them? And yet the Secretary seems to think this system of Indian relations will soon be at an end; and the expense attending it will be lessened every year. This is a most absurd idea. The Indian relations of this country will constitute a permanent, standing charge upon this Government for one hundred years to come; and as the population of the country increases, and its frontier is extended, the more complicated and expensive will our Indian relations become. This must be the case, till the vast region from the Mississippi to the Pacific is settled by the white man, and not an Indian is left remaining.

The Secretary of the Treasury further says, in pursuance of his pretended anxiety for retrenchment, that the pensions are diminished by deaths. Not so very much, sir. Some of the old Revolutionary pensioners die off, to be sure, and I am sorry for it. I wish they could live forever. They serve as a connecting link between the past and the present. They would serve to remind us of our departure from the pure and virtuous principles of the Revolution. And these old men hold on to life well. The same physical vigor which enabled them to perform such deeds of daring in the Revolution, yet preserves to them health and strength. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] demonstrated that, if they had died off last year at the rate of ten per cent. it would not reduce the pension appropriation more than $200,000, whereas the truth is, they did not die in near so large a proportion. But, sir, it must be recollected that whilst the pension list is annually lessened by death, it is still annually increasing from additions to the list. Look at the annual reports of the Commissioner of Pensions; and you will see that this is the case. Look at the quantity of bills on your table for placing additional names on the pension roll, many and most of which will probably pass as soon as time can be obtained to pass upon them. Owing to these facts, I have no doubt but that for the next five years, the additions, with the arrearage pay in such cases, will be equal to the diminution from deaths.

Assuming, then, that the military service will cost as much this year as it did last, which was $8,343,900 83, and adding the $2,385,329, stated to be necessary by the Secretary of War for the Florida service, and you have an aggregate of $10,729,230 for the military service, which will be found indispensably necessary.

Next come the estimates for the Navy, which the Secretary puts down at $5,445,399 21. Although I believe this to be much too small, yet, for the present, I will assume it as a sufficient sum. There is one item, however, of $150,000, for the pay of navy pensioners, which must be added, for which a bill has already passed this House, and for which the Secretary has sent in no estimate, but which will be a charge on the year 1841. But, says the gentleman from South Carolina, we do not know that the Senate will pass the bill. Perhaps it may not; for until that body is purged, which it is soon likely to be, I believe it capable of any injustice. But that is not the question. The question is, is it right to pass it? Shall we legislate here under a supposition that one of the branches of the Legislature will not do its duty? You might as well strike out of your estimates any other appropriation for the public service (the army for example) because we are not certain the Senate will pass it. You are in duty bound to pay these navy pensioners. You have squandered a fund which was properly theirs, and you are bound by every consideration of honor to pay them what is strictly theirs, and by every principle of gratitude to reward them for their services. This $150,000, added to the Secretary's estimates, will make the naval service for the year amount to $5,595,399.

According to the data I have assumed, and I have placed them at the lowest probable amount, the items of expenditure for the present year will appear as follows, viz:

Civil, miscellaneous, and foreign intercourse	$4,500,000
Military service, including the Florida war	10,729,230
Navy pensions	150,000
Naval service	5,595,399
Appropriations made for the service of the year 1841 by former acts of Congress	1,013,200
Balances of appropriations made in 1840 and previously, standing over on the 1st January, 1841, and which will be a charge on the Treasury in 1841, after deducting so much as may remain not called for, and standing over at the close of 1841	2,000,000
Relief of the corporate cities in the District of Columbia, per act of the 26th May, 1836, $139,200, and public debt payable at the Treasury, per act 31 March, 1817, $10,000	140,200
Required to finish public buildings, according to the estimates of the architect	0,000
Treasury notes and interest, allowing for $500,000, which may not come in during the year	4,350,000

Amounting in the whole to $28,887,029 which is the amount necessarily chargeable upon the year 1841.

Here, then, with a probable income of $21,733,473, we must meet an almost inevitable expenditure of $28,887,029. Sir, how can you do it, without borrowing money? You will be compelled to borrow; and, whether you do it by Treasury notes, or loan, how are you to repay it, unless you raise the duties on imports, or resort to direct taxation? And how are you to sustain the heavy expenditures of coming years, unless you regulate your tariff to meet the demands upon the Treasury? But, exclaims the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. THOMPSON] the cry of the Whigs has been reform, and by reform he understands a retrenchment in the expenditures. I can also inform the gentleman that it means honesty in the expenditures. It is not so much the amount expended, of which we have complained, as the manner in which it has been expended: paying $450 a day for steamboats, $20 a cord for wood, purchasing splendid furniture and silver spoons for mud boats, paying high salaries to crowds of loungers attached to your custom-houses, giving high and expensive jobs and contracts to political favorites, &c. It is such corruption as this, of which we have so much complained, and which we have promised to reform. If the money which has been collected had been spent for the interest of the country, in disciplining our army, increasing our navy, completing our fortifications, erecting harbors, and other conveniences of commerce, &c. why, then, sir, we could not have complained. But, what is remarkable; whilst this vast expenditure of money has been going on for the last four years, ranging from thirty to forty millions annually, all the interests and defences of the country have been languishing and going to ruin.

Well, now, sir, in legislating to meet the wants of the Government, I feel bound to look to the future as well as to the present. By profligacy, mismanagement, and corruption, all the great defences of the country have gone to wreck. The present rate of duties will not yield a sufficient income to put the country in a state of defence, and to repair the evils of the last twelve years of misrule. In addition to the deficit of about $7,000,000 for the present year, there is about $5,580,000, consisting of sums and annuities payable to Indians, and amounts pledged to be invested in safe, permanent stocks for their benefit, the interest on which we are now paying. Then, there is the navy pension fund, which has been squandered or invested in worthless stocks, amounting to $1,200,000, which you are bound to make good. Due on trust funds, other than Indian, $500,000. Old funded and certificate debt, $100,000. Debts of the cities in the District of Columbia, assumed by the Government, with interest, $1,750,000. To these are to be added claims on account of Indian affairs, growing out of the Florida war, allowed or to be allowed by the Departments, or pending before Congress, say $5,000,000; although I learn, from gentlemen better acquainted with the subject than I am, they will reach nearer $10,000,000. Other claims now before Congress, and which have been accumulating for the last two years, for want of time to act on them, allowing for those that may be rejected, say $2,000,000; and I also learn that these latter will probably be double that sum. These amount in the whole to $16,280,000 of permanent debt falling upon the next Administration; and which, added to the deficit of seven millions in the revenue of the present year, shows an almost certain liability of more than $23,000,000 by the Government, over and above the current expenditures. And this, too, with a revenue continually decreasing by the gradual operation of the compromise act.

Now, sir, I am for abiding by the spirit of the compromise act. The circumstances under which it was passed require that no violence should be done to the feelings of either of the great interests that were parties to it. That act was the voluntary offering of patriotism, to save the effusion of human blood. It snatched the uplifted sword from the hand of the tyrant, who, with tiger ferocity, was raving and thirsting for the blood of freemen. It stands as an enduring monument of the patriotism, the wisdom, and the magnanimity of Kentucky's distinguished son. And I am free to admit that, if the public sentiment of either of the two great interests that were parties to that compromise should, with any thing like unanimity, insist upon its remaining inviolate and untouched, it would be unwise to disturb it. It is, however, for the majority here, in their wisdom, to examine and decide what may be wishes of the country, and the feelings of the two great sections in regard to the modification of this measure. But, in submitting this measure to the test of public feeling in the two great interests that were parties to it, reference must be had to the calm and unbiased wishes of the popular mind, and not to the wild ravings of party madness. No one man here has a right to speak for the whole North or the whole South; neither has the delegation of any one State a right to speak for its entire section. It is for the majority here, in their discretion, and upon their responsibility, to judge of the public will, upon a dispassionate survey of the whole question. If two parties enter into a covenant for the observance of which their honor and faith may be pledged, neither has the right to violate its provisions whilst the other insists upon their enforcement. But certainly they are not estopped from modifying it by mutual agreement. And so with the compromise act of 1832. If the North or the South, with any thing like unanimity, insist upon its inviolability, I, for one, should be opposed to touching it. But if, by mutual agreement, they are willing to modify it now, where can be the objection?

This brings me to the immediate consideration of the proposition of the gentlemen from New York [Mr. BARNARD] to impose a duty on silks and wines, which are now admitted free of duty. I think this proposition presents a medium, on which the moderate on both sides of the question may meet with safety. I am aware that the ultra tariff men may oppose it, because they may hope that, in remodeling the system after the expiration of the limit fixed to the compromise act, they will be enabled to exempt luxuries from any duty, and collect the whole of the duties from articles of necessity, and thereby protect the same articles of domestic manufacture. They may suppose that, by our imposing duties on luxuries now, they will find it more difficult to exempt them hereafter. I can assure gentlemen entertaining these opinions that the South, so far as I am acquainted with its feelings, will never quietly submit to this discrimination. We are for equal benefits, and for equal burdens. We never will consent that articles of luxury, which are consumed by the rich, shall be imported free of duty; and articles of necessity, consumed by the poor, shall be burdened with all the means of taxation, merely for the benefit of the manufacturers. That has been the source of all our straggles and difficulties heretofore. It came well nigh once plunging this country into all the horrors of civil commotion. By all the exciting associations connected with that gloomy period, I entreat gentlemen who yet cherish the favorite idea of discrimination and protection to abandon it forever. You cannot enforce it without endangering the stability of the Union.

Then there are ultra men on the other side, who oppose this measure simply because it is an imposition of duty, without reference to the objects on which it is intended to operate, or without looking at the real cause of that long and uniform opposition which was waged by the South against the tariffs of '24 and '28. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. THOMPSON] seems perfectly horrified at this new tariff, as he calls it, and asks if this same measure of a duty on imports has not long been the great cause of complaint and difficulty between the South and the North. I can answer his question, and I tell him, no. The South never complained of the revenue for the support of the Government being collected from a duty on foreign articles.

Mr. THOMPSON begged leave to explain. He said he did not mean to intimate that the South was opposed to raising a revenue from customs. What he said was, that a tax on foreign importations had been the great cause of complaint on the part of the South.

Mr. R. A tax on foreign importations! Exactly, sir. That is the same thing. I still take issue with the gentleman. I deny that the South has ever complained that the revenue for the support of the Government was raised by a tax on foreign importations.

The South well knows, and always has known, that it is the only practicable mode of supporting the Government, among a people as sensitive as ours are on the subject of direct taxation. It is the principle of discrimination, for the protection of the manufacturers in a certain section, of which the South has always complained: a protection which, while it increases the cost of consumption to all sections alike, yet diffuses its advantages in the vicinity of the manufactures of the North, without bringing any correlative blessings to us of the South. The South is not only willing to contribute its revenue and its wealth, but its blood, if need be, in support of the Government and the Union. The object contemplated by the proposition of my friend from New York is the very thing that we have always contended for. The North has heretofore refused to grant it to us—they would not concede it in the compromise act—but now, if I understand them aright, they are willing to yield it, and can we hesitate to accept it? My eloquent friend from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] who addressed us so ably the other day, has put this matter in its proper light. He has proven, from the record, than an equalization of duties, upon the protected and the unprotected articles, was the great object contended for by the distinguished Southern statesmen who mingled in the political conflicts of '32 and '33. Sir, we are now estopped, virtually estopped from objecting to this proposition. I thank my friend from South Carolina for the gallant manner in which he has met this question at the very threshold. It came with a peculiar fitness from him. He comes from a region of political darkness, though still from an oasis in a desert waste. His position is one of high moral sublimity. Despite all the efforts of persecution at home, he has stood up for years, almost single handed and alone, as the unterrified advocate of liberty and truth. With a heroic courage, he has refused to quail before power and proscription, and, whether at home or on this floor, he has, with a giant's arm, shaken off his assailants as "the lion would shake the dew drops from his mane." He says he is aware that the demagogue cry of tariff! tariff! will be raised for the purpose of exciting popular prejudice against him at home. That is probable. I am aware that, humble as I am, I shall be subjected to the same charge. But my friend [Mr. THOMPSON] need give himself no uneasiness on that account. Calumny and misrepresentation are the common lot of all who pursue the path of duty, regardless of consequences. Denunciation by the wicked is the price which honesty and patriotism always have to pay for the esteem and approbation of the virtuous and the good. I repeat it, my friend from South Carolina deserves the thanks of the country for the fearless manner in which he has met this question. It will endure in the records of the country, as a lasting memorial of his patriotism, and will constitute the richest legacy he can leave to his children who are to succeed him. The tribute of the country's praise is also due to my friend from Georgia [Mr. NISBET] for his able and eloquent speech on this subject. I was equally pleased with the cogency of his argument and the pathos of his eloquence. With such advocates, the South has nothing to fear; and in such hands the interest of the whole country will be safe.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. THOMPSON] asked how it was that the North was now willing to impose a tax on luxuries; for, said he, this has always been a favorite measure with the South, and it never before has been able to obtain it. Charity compels me to believe it is from a principle of patriotism that our Northern brethren are now willing to yield this; but, whether it be from a sense of justice, or from some other motive, it matters not to me. So we obtain what we desire, it is a matter of indifference what may be the motive of concession. What would be thought of the prudence of any man in private life who would refuse to receive, by the voluntary concession of an enemy, that which he had been striving to obtain, and without success, for years? But with all the gentleman's horrors at the prospect of a disturbance of the tariff question, he seems perfectly willing to go into it, provided he can be allowed to adjust it upon his own terms. He distinctly stated that, when the proper time arrived, he was willing to go into a revision of the whole system. Ay, sir, and when will the proper time arrive? It certainly must have arrived, when it is necessary to do something in order to replenish the Treasury. I fear, if this matter is postponed, we shall not have the pleasure of the gentleman's assistance. Unless the people of Mississippi change their minds as easily as certain Southern gentlemen have changed their grounds upon this very subject, the honorable gentleman is not likely to be troubled with the burdens of legislation here for some time to come. The gentleman went on to tell of the great injury that would result to the cotton-growing interest of his State by an imposition of 20 per cent. on French silks and wines. And yet he seems willing to sacrifice this great interest of his constituents, provided he can be allowed to settle the matter in his own way. He says, take off the duties altogether from necessities, and impose them on luxuries; that for every cent taken off from sugar he will vote to put two on wines; for every cent off from salt, he will impose two on silk, &c. Then, in order to raise revenue sufficient for the Government, you must go higher than 20 per cent.; and in proportion, according to the gentleman's reasoning, you sacrifice the interests of Mississippi.

It is very evident, from the indications here, as well as from the movements out of doors, that there are two classes of opponents to this measure, operated upon by different views. The first class consists of those who have been trying to mix up the tariff question with the conflicts of party; who have declared, in anticipation, that the policy of the coming Administration would be a resort to a high tariff, and who, no doubt, hope to effect a counter revolution in the South by getting up an excitement on this subject. They are astonished that the Northern Whigs should ask for nothing more than an equalization of duties, and now discover that one of their hobbies is about to tumble down beneath them. They no doubt hope that, by a little postponement, the ultra tariff men of the North may be emboldened to ask for higher protective duties, and that thus the ends of party may be answered. To gentlemen actuated by this motive I would say, the day of humbugs has passed. Reason and truth have regained their dominion. The same spirit of conciliation that carried us so successfully through the late contest, will still continue to guide and direct our course.

The other class of opponents to this proposition consists of the ultra enemies of the tariff system, who are uncompromisingly opposed to it in every shape and form, and who are conscientiously opposed to it on principle. They look forward to the time when the duties on the protected articles are to come off entirely, and the whole revenues of the Government are to be collected on the unprotected articles; and they no doubt suppose that an imposition of duty on luxuries now will be presenting an obstacle to the consummation of their favorite designs hereafter. If I understood the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE], he expressed the opinion that the whole of the duties for the support of Government should be collected from articles of luxury, and that articles of necessity should come in free. Sir, this is entirely a Utopian scheme. It is consistent with neither possibility nor justice. I would appeal to Southern gentlemen who are actuated by this object, and ask them if it is reasonable to suppose that we, who have for years been unable, by remonstrance, and even resistance, to obtain a modification of this question to suit us—that we, I say, shall be able to dictate terms to the North? We are the weaker portion; so far as the mere exercise of power is concerned, we are at the mercy of the balance of the Union. As a Southern man, I approve of the proposition, because I conceive it to be our interest to do so. It not only gives us all we ought to ask, it not only puts both sections on an equality, but it gives us as much as we may ever expect by possibility to obtain. I go for the duties on luxuries as an opponent of the protective system.

It is true, the duties on the protected articles, although no higher than on the unprotected, will benefit our Northern brethren engaged in manufactures more than it will the South. We pursue agriculture because it is more congenial to our tastes and conducive to our interests; whilst the people of the North, for the same reasons, pursue manufacturing. And shall we grudge to them the small benefit they derive from the duties on those foreign articles that come in competition with theirs, when we are not injured by it? It is imitating the dog in the manger, to deprive them of a benefit without profiting ourselves. Besides, even if we had the power, which we have not, would it be justice to make a discrimination which would curtail their profits whilst it would not increase ours? The very ground on which we so much complained of them in the high tariffs of 1824 and 1828 was, that they were oppressing Southern interests for the benefit of Northern manufactures. And it would be worse, if we had it in our power, to oppress Northern manufactures without benefiting Southern interests.

The gentlemen from Mississippi and South Carolina both took the ground that a duty on French silks and wines would disturb our commercial relations with France, and that, as Southern cotton was exchanged for those articles, it would to that extent operate as a drawback on Southern interests. Now, even if this were so, which I am sure it is not, do gentlemen see where this argument would lead them? Sir, it is protection, the very protection which we have so long complained of. The argument of the Northern manufacturers has been this: we have large amounts invested in manufactures; if you equalize the duties, if you reduce them on the protected articles as low as they should be on the unprotected, you bring foreign manufactures in competition with ours, and thus destroy our profits. They have insisted that, whilst the Government was exercising the constitutional power of laying a duty for revenue, it should do so with reference to the protection of their interests. And now we hear the same argument used on this floor by members from the South. What is the tenor of the argument used here? It is this: we have large capital invested in growing cotton; if you equalize the duties, if you raise them on the unprotected articles as high as they are on the protected, you disturb our commercial relations with those countries for whose productions our cotton is exchanged, and thus destroy our profits. This is a principle we must not recognise. We are the weaker portion, and, if we use the argument now, it may hereafter be turned against us to our injury and destruction.

But, sir, I deny the position that a duty on silks and wines will disturb our relations with France. I deny that it will operate injuriously to the South. Why should gentlemen harp so much upon France. It is not intended to make a discrimination between France and other countries. Not one-half the silks and wines imported into this country come from France, and we propose to subject them all to the same restriction. Gentlemen have reasoned on the ground that the imposition of 20 per cent. upon silks and wines will either bring about prohibitory duties on American cotton in France, or such high countervailing duties as will raise the price of cotton so high in that country that the people will not be able to use cotton fabrics as an article of clothing, and that thus a market for eighteen millions of dollars worth of cotton annually would be cut off. This was the argument of the member from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT]. Is this argument a sound one? I learn that the duty on American cotton in France, at the present time, is nearly as high as we propose to raise it here on their silks and wines.* Besides, they are compelled to take our cotton. They cannot get it elsewhere; and the employment to labor, which is afforded by the manufacture of cotton fabrics in France, is too immense to be attempted to be destroyed by prohibitory duties. And suppose the French Government should lay an additional duty of 20 per cent. upon American cotton, as gentlemen seem to dread—what of that? It might slightly enhance the price of the article to the French importer and manufacturer; but then, a very great portion of the cotton imported into France is, as I learn, manufactured into laces and other fabrics of the most costly materials; where the cost of the raw material forms but a very small item in the value of the fabrics when ready for market. An additional cost of 20 per cent. upon the price of the raw material could scarcely be seen in the price of the manufactured article. So that France cannot prohibit our cotton without cutting off one of the main sources of employment for her labor, and throwing loose upon the country thousands of indigent and discontented artisans, ready to pull down her Government and institutions. If she raises the duty on our cotton in an equal ratio with our impost upon her silks and wines, it will only increase the cost to the manufacturer there, which will hardly be felt by the consumer. But the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. THOM-

SON] seems to think that a countervailing duty in France of 20 per cent. upon our cotton would have the effect of bringing down the price of the article in the same proportion. He made a calculation of the amount of exportation from Mississippi, and the consequent loss that would befall her. He says, if her twenty millions of dollars of exports are subject to a duty of 20 per cent. the price of them in those countries where they are sent must, in a similar ratio, come down, and that thus Mississippi would receive 20 per cent. less in return than she otherwise would. If the gentleman reasons upon the theory of separating Mississippi from the rest of the world, as it will be recollected he did in stating his argument, he must, to be consistent, go still further, and suppose that she trades with some country exclusively, that is also separated from the rest of the world. If Mississippi traded with France alone, and France purchased cotton from no other country than Mississippi, then a duty of 20 per cent. upon the cotton of the latter might, to some extent, bring down its price. But the gentleman is reasoning upon false premises altogether. In arranging our commercial relations, the entire Union must be looked to as a unit, and our legislation should not be with a view to the aid of sectional interests, but with a view of diffusing an average of benefits and of burdens, as near as may be, in every section alike. The gentleman should recollect that not one fifth of the cotton exported is sent to France. England is the great cotton market of the world; the price in other countries must be regulated by that of Liverpool and London. France must pay as much for it as it is worth in England, or she cannot get it. A tax upon our cotton will be, to that extent, a tax upon her own citizens. But is it reasonable to suppose that France will impose these countervailing duties upon our cotton, when she already imposes a duty of 17 per cent. upon it, and subjects our tobacco to a Government monopoly which is equal, as I learn, to a duty of 1400 per cent.? My friend from Virginia [Mr. WISE] admitted that, taking an average for the last ten or twelve years, the balance of trade against this country, and in favor of France, had been about 10 per cent. annually. I learn from others who are conversant with such subjects, that it has been at least 20 per cent. This, according to the laws of trade, has to be paid off in specie; and, to that extent, it operates as an annual drain upon the specie basis of our currency. As some compensation for this, we should make this balance of trade against us conducive to supplying our coffers with revenue. And suppose France should impose prohibitory or high countervailing duties on our cotton—let her do it; we shall see who will be most injured, she or we. Does it become the legislators of a free people to hesitate to do their duty for fear of the spiteful resentment of other countries? I feel indignant when I hear the argument used here, that we must not supply our coffers with revenue in the only practicable mode to which we can resort, for fear that other countries may take umbrage, and attempt retaliation. National pride and national honor revolt at the idea of hesitating here to see how the exercise of legislative duty will be received by other countries. Has France any right to expect her productions to enter our ports free, whilst ours are subjected to heavy exactions in her ports? But it is idle to talk about prohibitory or high retaliatory duties on Southern staples. Nations, in regulating their commercial intercourse, are governed by their interests. Why did not England prohibit our cotton during the operation of the high tariff of 1828? Because the spindles and the looms of Birmingham and Leeds would have stopped still in a moment. Because hundreds of thousands of poor laborers are dependent on its manufacture for a support. If England were to prohibit our cotton, she would then have chartism with a vengeance. An army of infuriated paupers would soon be on their march to London. The same influences operate in France, to the extent to which she consumes our cotton.

But the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] seems to think that a duty of 20 per cent. upon French silks and wines will operate as a prohibition of the importation of those articles into this country. And, after assuming this position, he went on to show the disastrous consequences to the cotton-growing region, resulting from it. Well, this is a very convenient way of proving a proposition. Let this system of logic once be adopted, and it will dispense with all mental labor for the future. It puts all men upon a level in argument. The member has made a discovery much greater than that of Archimides. The latter said, give him a fulcrum for his lever, and he would lift the globe. The member from South Carolina has already found a fulcrum for his lever, by which he turns over the whole world of argument in a moment; and that is, to give him his premises, and he will prove any proposition, confute any theory. A duty of 20 per cent. prevent the importation of silks and wines! Why does not a duty of 40 per cent. prevent the importation of broadcloths? And the case is much stronger than this in favor of the non-prohibition of American cotton in France; for, whilst we manufacture broadcloths in this country, and could obtain them at home, (although of not so good a quality, and that is the cause of their importation,) yet in France they raise no cotton, and cannot get it elsewhere than from us. Why does not the enormous duty exacted upon our tobacco in France, Germany, and Holland, prevent its importation there? Because the wealthy will enjoy the luxuries of life, and the greater the difficulty of procuring them, the greater luxuries they become. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. Thompson] proved conclusively that a moderate increase of price on luxuries never lessens their consumption. Would any man who wears broadcloth cease to do so if it were to cost 20 per cent. more than at present? Would any lady who wears silk cease to do so if it were to advance 20 per cent. in value? Would any one who now indulges himself with costly wines drink less if they were to cost 20 per cent. more? It appears to me that no one who is at all acquainted with the human character, and the habits and the customs of our people, can for a moment believe that a duty of 20 per cent. on luxuries will lessen their consumption. And if perchance it should do it, to the extent of 20 per cent. even, it will then serve to restore the balance of trade between this country and France, and thus prevent the annual exportation of our specie to supply that balance. So it must be of some advantage in either point of view.

*The duty on American cotton in France is 20 francs per 100 kilogrammes—which is $3.75 per 200 lbs. At an average of 12 cents per pound, this would be a duty of about 17 per cent.

The gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Wise,] who addressed us so ably and eloquently on this subject, argued at great length to prove that the Compromise Act of 1832 was a settlement of the question, having all the binding obligation of a solemn compact; obligatory, in respect to faith and honor, not only until, but after, July, 1842. And yet, a few moments afterwards, he admitted that it might be revised, when it was necessary to raise revenue for an economical administration of the Government. This is my view exactly. We both agree that there is a deficit of revenue of at least ten millions, and yet he refuses to apply his principles to the emergency when it has arisen. He remarked, that the admitting the unprotected articles free of duty was one of the advantages secured to the protective system in the Compromise Act. I know that; and if he is so much opposed to the protective policy, why does he now attempt to deprive its friends of this advantage, by equalizing the duties, and thus prevent the imposition of higher duties on the protected articles. He admitted we were the weaker party, and warned us to stand on the defensive. Would it not be better for us to anticipate the enemy, and put it beyond his power to injure us? The gentleman from Virginia admitted that this Compromise Act can be revived without a breach of faith, wherever there is a necessity to raise revenue for an economical administration of the Government. The gentleman also admitted that there was now a deficit of ten millions. Then I call upon him, as a Southern man, as an anti-protective man, to unite with me in preventing the impositions of further duties on the protected articles, and let us equalize the duties by imposing them on luxuries. But the gentleman insisted that, by moving in this business now, we afford a pretext to the tariff men to raise the duties to 20 per cent. on that class of protected articles now paying less than that rate. Sir, when that is necessary for revenue, I for one am willing to do it. I am for equalization of duties. That is the platform on which the South should stand. We are the weaker party; and if we insist on discrimination now, we are preparing a "chalice" which we may hereafter have "commended to our own lips."

The gentleman from Virginia labored to prove that the present was only a temporary and not a permanent deficiency; and that as soon as confidence is restored, and trade revives, the revenue under the Compromise Act will be sufficient to meet the expenditures of the Government. I differ with him entirely. I have attempted to show that there is a debt of more than twenty millions that will fall upon the next four years, and this must be paid in addition to the current expenditures. But I believe that, if we were entirely out of debt, in the present ruinous and defenceless condition of the country, the revenue would not be sufficient to meet the necessary expenditures. Sir, the public money has been squandered, wastefully squandered, upon favorite partisans, and by faithless agents. We must not only provide for the present, but for the neglect and misrule of the past, and the exigencies of the future. Why, what is our present condition? Our army brought into disrepute—our navy going to wreck—our fortifications deserted—without barracks, without foundries, without harbors, without every thing, in fact, which is calculated to prove our pride in peace, and our defence in war.

I shall not shrink from a discharge of duty for fear of the demagogue cry that I am in favor of a splendid and expensive Government. Those who know me, know that I am no friend to consolidation, or to an unnecessary strengthening of the powers of the General Government. I believe a great crisis is approaching in the history of the world, and that it behooves the United States of America to put herself in a situation to protect our flag and our commerce abroad, and our free institutions at home. Although I am opposed to standing armies in time of peace, in the spirit and for the purpose for which they are kept up in the monarchies of Europe, yet I do believe that our army should be put in such a state of discipline as to form a nucleus around which the military feeling of the nation may rally wherever our yeomanry shall have to leave their firesides and their homes, in order to defend them from a foreign foe. The civilized world is on the eve of a great convulsion. Throughout the States of Europe, liberal principles, ready to burst forth into action, are suppressed by the sword and bayonet; national differences are widening every day; the wisdom and forbearance of statesmen can scarcely repress the fervor of excitement; and after a peace of twenty-five years, three millions of armed men stand ready to shed each other's blood. When the collision does take place, it will be to the political world what the shock of the earthquake is to the natural; and thrones and dominions, principalities, and powers, will be shaken to their base. Can we, intimately connected, as we are getting to be in our commercial relations, with the great powers of Europe—can we expect to steer clear of difficulty? And if we maintain an armed neutrality, as we ought, and no doubt should attempt to do, ought we not to prepare ourselves for such a position?

Gentlemen may say this is all conjecture. If so, let us look at something a little more tangible. Every one must admit that our present relations with England augur any thing else than peace and harmony. The bayonet of the Briton is gleaming on our Northeastern border, and a portion of the American soil is now trodden, forcibly trodden, by foreign feet. Sir, this is no Northern question—no sectional question—but a great national question, involving national honor and national rights. And if force does become necessary to vindicate the national character, we of the South, as well as the North, will not only pour out our revenue, but we will pour out our blood. England has also taken possession of the mouth of Columbia river, the great outlet through which the commerce of posterity will go freighted to the bosom of the Pacific, and in a territory which we claim as indisputably ours. We cannot much longer submit to these aggressions; and when we do act, we should be in a position to sustain ourselves with honor. Let it not be said I am endeavoring to get up a war-excitement against England. I shall be the last one to insist upon war, whilst the country is in its present defenceless condition. Mr. Chairman, with all my admiration for the greatness and glory of England, yet I look with fearful apprehension upon the dangers of a collision with that gigantic power. With an ambition more grasping than that of Rome in her palmiest days, she is extending her Briarean arms into every region of this mighty globe. Her flag is floating in every breeze, her ships are covering every sea. Universal dominion seems to be her object and her aim. Suppose we should be precipitated into a war with England—what would be our condition? Our army reduced to a handful, and they in the swamps of Florida, held at bay by the savage. Our navy consisting of but a few frigates, and still fewer ships, and they unfit for service. Our fortifications unmanned and decaying for want of repairs. Without barracks, without ordnance, without munitions of war; and, what is still worse than all these, with an empty Treasury, and no means of supplying it. With twenty thousand veterans on our Northern border, England would invade our territory and lay our frontiers in ruins. With a fleet of steam-ships, she would ravage our coasts, and lay our cities in ashes. By throwing a few regiments of her manumitted West India slave troops upon our Southern coast, she would excite a domestic insurrection there. Her machinations would soon reach the sixty thousand Indian warriors that are congregated on our Western border, whose yell would resound from the Mississippi to the Alleghanies. This Indian population is already restless and discontented. With a lingering eye they look back upon the deserted graves of their fathers, and, with feelings exasperated and almost goaded into madness by the infiction of their accumulated wrongs, they are prepared for a sudden outbreak, whenever there is the least prospect of success. Thus hemmed in on all sides—on the North, on the West, on the Eastern and Southern coasts—what would be our situation? Gentlemen may say these dangers are all imaginary, and that we should triumph over all these difficulties. I know it, sir; I know it. American patriotism and American prowess would save us in the end, and expel the invader from our soil. But how much suffering would it cost us? how much blood would it shed? How many a widowed heart would it wring with anguish? how many an orphan would it leave parentless in the world? In the mean time, what would become of our commerce, which is extending itself into every part of the world? Exposed to the power and rapacity of our enemies, our little navy would be shattered to pieces, and our commerce driven from the ocean.

I said I was opposed to large standing armies in time of peace. Not so with a navy. There are associations connected with our gallant navy which should endear it to the heart of every American patriot. Its heroic exploits during the last war taught England what she had to fear from American valor, even on her own favorite element. And, owing to the relative position of our country to the European Powers, if we ever have a protracted war with any of them, it must be a maritime war mainly. What protection could our small navy afford to our commerce against the numbers and the strength of theirs? Look to England, France, Russia—even Turkey and Egypt; they are increasing their naval power daily. The Mediterranean is literally shingled over with the fleets of the European Powers. The East and West Indian Archipelagoes are covered with English ships, and the commercial system of China and the East in danger of being entirely revolutionized, or put on a new footing. France is sending her hostile naval armaments almost to our own doors. One day we see her battering down the castle of St. Juan de Ulua, in Mexico, and the next blockading the port of Buenos Ayres; and all this, too, whilst, according to the official organ, as quoted by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. Davis,] there is not a port beyond our own shores where American commerce can float in safety. England and France, and Russia are building steam ships daily; not one or two, by stinted appropriations, as we are, but whole fleets of them.

Mr. GRINNELL. Yes, building them in this country.

Mr. R. Yes, sir, building them in our own country—here, in our own ship yards—to be sent back, perhaps, at some future time, for the purpose of battering down our cities, and destroying our commerce.

With these facts before me, I deem it the part of prudence to prepare for danger before it arrives. Let us organize our army, increase it sufficiently to man our fortifications, and provide military posts for our frontier defence. Let us erect barracks for our soldiers, and establish foundries for the manufacture of munitions of war. Above all, let us increase our navy for the protection of our commerce, and send the American flag to float in triumph in every part of the world. Let us build steam ships for the protection of our harbors and depots, and for the defence of our coasts. More especially ought we to do this, since it is beginning to be admitted that the application of steam to vessels of war is likely to change the whole system of naval warfare; and that vessels of this description are, above all others, calculated for coast defence. In order to do this, we must have money; the only practicable way of obtaining money is from a duty on imports; and, in laying this duty, reference should be had to the great leading interests of the country; the benefits should be diffused, and the burdens equalized. This can be done only by an equalization of duties; and that is what is contemplated by the proposition of my friend from New York.

And, Mr. Chairman, in organizing our revenue system, I take the distinct ground now that I am in favor of raising sufficient revenue from customs for the support of the Government, exclusive of that arising from the sales of the public lands. That I am in favor of distributing among the States. I shall not go into a discussion of this question now; when the subject fairly comes up, I will give my views upon it. Suffice it to say that, whilst I am providing for our national defence, I am also in favor of providing for the moral and intellectual improvement of our people, and extending to them the means of prosperity and comfort, as far as is consistent with the limits of the Constitution. As to the lands ceded, you are bound by the deeds of cession to dispose of them "for the common use and benefit of all the States;" and as to those acquired by purchase, you may, in your discretion, "dispose" of them as you may think most conducive to the public good. Let us, then, dispose of them by distributing them among the States, to be applied by them either to education, internal improvement, the payment of their debts, or any other purpose they may prefer. Thus, whilst providing for our national defence, we shall be extending the blessings and conveniences of domestic prosperity and happiness.

I was surprised at the zeal with which my friend from Virginia [Mr. Wise] opposed this proposition of a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. I had always supposed that this was a cardinal principle of the Whig creed; and, whilst I do not presume to arraign that gentleman for his opinion, yet I do not recognise in him the right to arraign me for mine. When he says no State rights man can go for this system, I put in "a plea to the jurisdiction." Upon the question of State rights, humble as my course has been, I am ready to compare it with his, without any fear of suffering by the comparison. He attempted to cast ridicule upon the proposition of distribution, by calling it a proposition to "distribute a deficiency." Why, no one ever thought of distributing a revenue from this source before it had accrued—for such a thing would be an absurdity—although they might wish to make provision for its distribution after collection. But there is not so great an absurdity in "distributing a deficiency;" after all, if he will have it so. It can only be done by distributing the burdens necessary to supply a deficiency; and, as we can do that only by a duty on imports, we propose to distribute the burdens by an equalization of duties, which will operate equally on all sections of the Union.

The gentleman from Virginia, in the course of his remarks, did me the honor to refer to me as a nullifier, who stood ready to oppose the march of an invading army to South Carolina, in the dark period of 1832. He appealed to my State rights principles, and warned me against what he is pleased to call a revival of the tariff, lest the same stirring scenes may again return. Yes, sir, I was a nullifier then; and, no matter what may have been the motives of those who were most prominent in that contest, for myself, I must say, I was actuated by the youthful impulse of patriotic feeling. And when he referred to that dark period when the cloud of civil commotion was seen in the distant horizon, he touched a cord in my bosom which vibrated throughout my frame. It revived some of the most stirring associations, which have not been destroyed by the lapse of years. And I know not whether I was most excited at the thrilling picture which he drew of our determination to maintain our rights at the hazard of our blood, or mortified when, a moment after, I reflected upon the present timeserving policy of those men on whom all the enthusiastic admiration of my youthful heart was once lavished. Yes, I was then in favor of State interposition—not from any factious opposition to the execution of the laws—not from any wish to dismember this glorious and happy Union—not that I cared for the fine-spun theories and sophistical arguments with which this question was mystified and enveloped—but because South Carolina was struggling against the same system, which I believed to be founded in unconstitutional oppression. The most aggravating circumstance of that event was not the attempt of the General Government to execute its laws, but the cold and heartless scorn which prevailed in a certain section—the careless indifference with which it was threatened to force freemen into submission at the point of the bayonet; and that, too, when a tyrant, raving and thirsting for blood, urged on by the demon of revenge that was gnawing at his heart, with as insatiable an appetite as that of the vulture that preyed upon the liver of the fabled Prometheus—when this tyrant, I say, was profanely swearing "by the Eternal" that he would hang on a gallows as high as Haman's men whom I then believed to be actuated by the purest impulses of patriotism. Gentlemen may say this was a youthful indiscretion; still it was the honest conviction of my heart. And I yet believe that there must be a conservative principle in the States of this Union to arrest the progress of Federal usurpation, when the dangers of resistance become preferable to further submission. In other words, I believe that the action of a State, in her highest sovereign capacity, establishes a relation between such State and the Federal Government, that forbids the idea of force by the latter until conciliation and compromise have been tried in vain; and that, when collision does take place, such action on the part of a State prevents the relation between that State and the General Government, of rebel on the one hand and sovereign on the other. It might be a cause of war; but the idea of the General Government punishing as rebels men shielded by State authority is consolidation. It is making State rights—about which we hear so much—nothing more than those revolutionary rights which are possessed by serfs of Russia or the slaves of Muscat. This, sir, in a few words, is my idea of State interposition. Call it nullification, revolution, or what you will, still I believe it to be the great balance-wheel of our system—the great conservative principle that is to preserve the federative feature of our Government, and to save it from consolidation.

Sir, I do not wish to be understood on this subject. I do not insist that nullification is a remedy, under the Constitution, necessarily peaceful in its operation. I have no idea that a collision between a State and the General Government was ever contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, or provided for in that instrument. But I insist that, when such collision does take place, owing to the peculiar character of our institutions, owing to the fact that the Constitution is a compact between sovereign States, it establishes the relation between the contending parties of belligerent sovereigns, who are to be governed and restricted by the laws of nations. Neither do I believe that the General Government is rendered powerless for action, whenever a State declares that an act of Congress shall be inoperative within its limits. Whenever that contingency happens, it becomes a matter of consideration with the General Government, whether it will yield its construction of the law to that of the State—whether it will pause temporarily, for the sake of conciliation, as I believe it should—or whether it will immediately enforce its own construction by physical force. I can hardly conceive a case of State resistance to national laws, where physical force would not necessarily follow; and, my word for it, no State will ever nullify a law of Congress until it has prepared itself to fight. But here is the great value and advantage of State interposition: when force is used by the General Government, and open war follows, as it necessarily must, the citizens of a State, acting under State authority, when taken with arms in their hands, cannot be hung as traitors against the nation, but must, from the nature and genius of our institutions, be treated as prisoners of war. It never can be, that men, acting in obedience to State authority, are to be placed on the same footing with a lawless band of individuals assembled together for the purpose of arresting the execution of the laws, without having any political organization or legal sanction whatever.

I am aware there is still a lingering prejudice in a certain quarter against all who have ever favored this principle of State interposition. I can assure my Whig friends here, that it is, in a great measure, to the energy, the daring, and patriotic enthusiasm of the advocates of State Rights, that our victory in the Southern States is to be attributed in the late contest. The error of our Northern friends consists in this: they identify State Rights with South Carolina, and the course and conduct of South Carolina politicians. There never was a greater mistake. No one can feel more indignant than we do, at witnessing the despotic and high toned Federal measures to which a profession of State Rights is made subservient in that quarter. It would be as unjust to condemn the Christian religion for all the cruelties and persecutions committed in its name during the dark ages, as to condemn State Rights for all the political heresies and federal oppressions that are now practised in their name.

But I am told by gentlemen on the other side that the principles I advocate are in opposition to State Rights. It has become very fashionable with that party of late to talk of State Rights. Men who have been the uniform supporters of the most Federal Administration that ever existed in this country, now, when they are driven from power, begin to prate about State Rights and the Constitution. The gentlemen from Mississippi, [Mr. THOMPSON,] from Alabama, [Mr. HUBBARD,] and from New York, [Mr. VANDERFORK,] delivered to us homilies upon economy, and the duty of keeping within the limits of the Constitution. Why, what do those gentlemen know about State Rights and constitutional restrictions? Have they not been the consistent supporters of an Administration that is steeped, doubly steeped, in the darkest dye of Federalism? Have they forgotten their course on the New Jersey question? Have they forgotten the course of their collaborators in the Senate, in arraigning the States of this Union for daring to go in debt? When I think of these things, and then hear these gentlemen talking of State Rights, I am reminded of Robespierre haranguing the Jacobin club on the blessings of freedom, whilst the heads of innocent victims were borne on pikes through the streets of Paris. I cannot afford to learn State Rights in such a school.

Mr. Chairman, I must confess that I was not only surprised but pained at the general tenor of the speech of my friend from Virginia. In the outset of his remarks, he alluded to certain misrepresentations and suspicions which, he said, had been indulged in towards him. As to me, he knows, or he ought to know, that I am the last one in the world to do him injustice. He is "grappled to my heart with a hook of steel," too strong to be broken by any political developments here. I have hung upon his eloquence with too much rapture, I have gazed upon his brilliant and gallant career with too intense an admiration, to indulge the least censure against his course. For me to attempt to admonish him, or to criticize his conduct, would be like a raw recruit attempting to lecture an experienced general upon the art of war. Suspect him! No, sir. No one suspects him; no one can. No one has a right to suspect him. His services have been too great, his devotion to the best interests of his country has been too well proven, to allow any one to suspect for a moment the purity of his motives, although we may feel grieved that a sincere conviction of duty may lead him to differ with his friends. And, sir, I must say, my feelings compel me to say, that his speech fell ominously upon my ear. And ought the gentleman to complain that his views have been the subject of conversation and conjecture? It is the highest compliment that could be paid him. We know the strength of his giant arm too well not to feel annoyed even at the possibility of losing his aid in carrying out the great system of reform which we have promised to the country. We know that he was one of the first who dared to "beard the Douglass in his hall, and the lion in his den." We know that he risked not only his political but his personal safety, in dragging from their hiding places the foul agents of corruption, and exposing their enormities to the light of day. And will he not allow us to express our regret, our sorrow, at the prospect of a difference of opinion between him and us? It appeared to me that he travelled out of his way to attack most of the great principles under which we have marched to victory, and to which we stand pledged to the people to conform our action. Whilst bearing testimony to the utility and necessity of a National Bank, yet he says he is opposed to mooting the subject until confidence is restored. Sir, have we not advocated such an institution as the great agent for restoring confidence? Would he leave in operation, and unrepealed, the Sub-Treasury, which has so long been the theme of his withering denunciation? Or would he resort temporarily to the State bank system, which he has equally condemned? Is he for waiting until there is no commerce to foster, no revenue to preserve?

He protested in advance against an extra session, and yet says he is for consultation and compromise. Why, then, not wait until General Harrison has had an opportunity of consulting his friends on such a step? Why furnish, in advance, our enemies with an argument against us, in case an extra session shall be found to be indispensable? He says such a measure would be unwise in the present excited state of political feeling, and tells us to go home and consult our constituents. Is there a member here who does not know the feelings and wishes of his constituents? My friend certainly does not mean to insinuate that the great political excitement through which we have just passed was the mere effervescence of popular feeling, and not the result of calm and dispassionate conviction. If so, he has himself been deceived, for he marched in the front of the battle. Has not reform—a thorough and speedy reform—been our watch-word? Has it not floated on our banners?—has it not been constantly on our lips?—has it not nerved and animated our hearts? The glory of our triumph has been, that it was the result of an impulse that came bounding from the hearts of a wronged and indignant people. We have labored under the same grievances, and been animated by the same enthusiasm, from the Adirondacks to the Sabine, and from the ocean to the mountains. And never was there a representative body so well calculated to reflect the views, and carry out the wishes of their constituents, as the Congress that is to succeed us. And, after having conquered in a great battle, shall we stop short, like Hannibal at the gates of Rome, without possessing ourselves of the citadel? No, sir, no, sir. Let us press forward. Let us carry out the system of reform which we have promised to the people—a reform not only of men, but of measures. And now is the time, when the popular impulse is up, before the enemy has time to recover from his defeat; and the sooner we act, the more speedy will be the relief to the country. For if, after all the promises we have made, and all the high hopes and expectations we have excited, we now stop short, and leave to time to effect what can only be done by prompt and decisive action—if we leave the currency of the country still to suffer, the commerce to languish, the public money unprotected, the Treasury bankrupt, the places of trust and honor in the hands of political gamblers, we shall soon find that our triumph will be as short-lived as it will be barren in its fruits, and that, after all, we shall have but

"A barren sceptre in our gripe,"
Soon "to be wrenched with an unlineal hand,
No" friend "of ours succeeding."

The gentleman from Virginia said he was opposed to proscription for opinion's sake. And who is not? Yet why indulge the supposition, the probability, or even possibility, of General Harrison removing any one from office for this cause alone? I, too, am opposed to such a course; yet I believe that, if "honesty, capability, and faithfulness to the Constitution," are to constitute the criterion for office, the official corps will be thoroughly reorganized; and, if the opinions of my friend are not changed, he must entertain the same views. I know he would not retain in his office that band of plunderers and defaulters whose peculations he has himself so ably exposed; and, if I do not mistake his opinions, he believes a system of investigation would expose the same corruption in every branch of the public service.

My friend from Virginia, in the course of his remarks, made an allusion to my State, in reply to a playful remark of my friend and colleague, [Mr. STANLEY,] which I thought a little unkind, knowing, as he said, our sensitiveness on the subject. He remarked that North Carolina had so long followed Virginia that she now felt like an apprentice just set free. Sir, North Carolina needs no defender here; and if she did, she would be unfortunate in having no abler advocate than myself. She disregards the reproaches and the vauntings of her Northern and her Southern neighbors. She stands not still—whilst the rest of the Union is marching on in the career of prosperity and improvement—to deal with the vague abstractions of the one, nor does she run mad after all the wild vagaries of the other. But there she rests, calm and quiet as the surface of her eastern bays, yet firm and unshaken as her western hills. It is sufficient compliment to her to say that whilst on the north and south of her the spirit of reform has been unable to contend with the demon of faction, yet, on entering her borders, the flag of freedom floats in triumph from her Atlantic beach to the mountain tops. She reposes not on the fame of her ancestors; she boasts not of their former renown. And if she has not as many bright names to adorn her history as those who revile her, she is saved the disgrace of violating their dying precepts, and of dishonoring their shades. Let it be recollected that Athens was once the proudest and noblest State of Greece. All the other members of that confederacy were proud to do her honor. Yet, in process of time, she was the first to surrender her freedom to the golden bribes of Philip; whilst the Thebans, who had once been the objects of her reproach, perished nobly on the field of Chæronea with the expiring liberties of Greece. My friend from Virginia may take the allusion and apply it at his leisure.

I will not suffer myself to indulge in any apprehensions or misgivings as to the policy of General Harrison's administration. He is the mere agent of a great popular movement. He cannot, he will not, he dare not, attempt to check the progress of that great political revolution through which we have just passed. Let him but throw himself in the current of that popular impulse which has swept like a deluge over the land, and which now, when the storm is passed, will flow on in one smooth and placid stream, until it is lost in the great ocean of national prosperity and national glory. Let him but do this, and the history of the period through which we have just come will serve as a lesson to tyrants in all future time, that they are not to treat with scorn the sufferings of a free and noble people.

REMARKS OF MR. NISBET,

OF GEORGIA,

In the House of Representatives, in Committee of the Whole on the Civil and Diplomatic bill, in reply to Messrs. COOPER and BLACK.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Upon the motion to strike out the appropriation for the branch mint at Dahlonega, I have nothing to add to the views presented by my colleague yesterday. I approve of those views, and shall vote against striking out. I rise now for a different purpose. I rise, sir, to reply to certain gentlemen who have taken upon themselves to condemn the course I felt it my duty to pursue in relation to the revenue. I had the honor, some days ago, to address the committee in favor of additional duties upon imports. My colleague [Mr. BLACK] has represented me as favoring a tariff for protection. To him I intend to reply. I shall also take the liberty of addressing to the speech of another colleague, [Mr. COOPER,] in answer to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] upon a subject of delicate interest to my constituents. My friend [Mr. ALFORD] thinks that duties upon silks and wines and other luxuries will open the way for a protective tariff; and he seems to believe that it is the policy of leading Whig gentlemen to entrap their Southern auxiliaries into the support of a tariff policy. In all this, sir, he is wholly mistaken. [Mr. ALFORD explained.] I am truly rejoiced to find, Mr. Chairman, that between that gentleman and myself there is no material difference of opinion. He is for increased duties, but does not believe this is the proper time to impose them. Upon that question, therefore, our difference is as to time only. He is opposed to a tariff for protection. So am I. He is for maintaining the compromise. So am I. I never doubted my friend's fidelity to the Whig cause. Never for a moment doubted it. I know him to be as true to its interests and its honor as the spark to the stricken steel. I do not forget his services in the late great contest; his zeal, his devotion in favor of Harrison and reform. In behalf of the Whig cause, his voice has been heard trumpet-toned ringing through the counties of Georgia, and rallying to the rescue the honest men of all parties. And it will ever be heard thundering its denunciations against wrong and oppression every where, and in every form. He is an honest and an eloquent Whig—Whig, I know, to the core. I repeat, sir, that, between us I am happy to say there is no material difference.

I, sir, have not provoked this debate. Both myself and my friends from the South have been misrepresented on the tariff and the Abolition questions; grossly and unkindly misrepresented. I will endure this no longer. I will not sit down quietly under the attacks of the gentlemen. You know, sir, that I have not, nor have my Whig colleagues, at the last or the present session, introduced into this House our family broils. We have studiously avoided it. Respect to this House and self-respect prompted to a course of long and irritating forbearance. Forbearance is no longer a duty.

Among those who have represented the course which I have pursued in relation to duties, as favoring a protective tariff, is the distinguished gentleman from Virginia. I mean the member from Accomack. In his last speech, he stated that there were Whigs in this House who favored protection because, said he, "they are in favor of duties on wines and silks." And the gentleman referred to the speeches of Southern Whigs to prove his assertion. It cannot be a mistake that he has held us up to the whole South as tariff men, and has more than once charged that a tariff for protection was the already indicated policy here of the new Administration. Now, sir, speaking for myself only, I admit or rather repeat what I before have proclaimed, that I am for duties on wines and silks. But does that make me the advocate of protection? Am I, therefore, a tariff man? Are duties upon unprotected articles identical with protection? I have heretofore shown the contrary. I have shown that French silks and wines would bear a duty without creating protection and without affecting their consumption. I will not now repeat the argument. The gentleman's conclusion is a non sequitur. But, say gentlemen, this is the trap set to catch Southern Whigs. And my colleague [Mr. BLACK] would have the people of the South believe that we, their chosen representatives, because he, their repudiated representative, tells them so, are so weak and so faithless—such mere gudgeons, as to bite at a bait which does not conceal the hook from even his eye. If there be a trap or trick in the proposition to lay new duties, I have not seen it; nor have I seen any evidences of it. I, sir, have as correct means of knowing the views of my Whig associates as my colleague; perhaps more so; as sharp an eye to the interest and honor of Georgia as he has; and perhaps as great capacity of understanding what that honor and interest is as he has. He shall not be the judge of my representative duties. The people shall judge for themselves.

A tariff for protection has not, sir, been indicated here as the policy of the Harrison party. No man has said, or even hinted, that General Harrison will favor such a policy. Indeed, sir, no one; unless it be the gentleman from Virginia, has ventured to prescribe a policy of any kind to the President elect. No one has authority for so bold a move. There is no clique or regency here to rule in advance both Harrison and the party. It is true gentlemen have spoken as becomes the American representative character, freely and fearlessly, and no one more so than the able member from Virginia. But no one has ventured to prescribe to the party but himself. This idea about Northern combinations to revive the protective system is all stuff. It haunts the imagination of gentlemen like a spectre. It is, sir, not the fact that the Northern manufacturers want a new discriminating protective tariff. They are for adhering to the principles of the compromise. They say so, and I believe them. It is their interest to observe the compromise, and that interest they will pursue. If, however, in this I am mistaken—if, hereafter, when the time for action arrives, the Whigs of the North or the Democrats of the North should attempt to burden us with high imports for protection—if a protective tariff should, by any party, be again attempted, and I should then belong to the public councils, I shall oppose it with as much honest zeal, if with less ability than those who are now so very sensitive about Southern rights.

The effect of the course which my friend from Virginia has thought it his duty to pursue is to create distrust of Whig representatives at the South. I have no idea that he intends to produce any such effect. Such result, however, might follow from the character of his speeches. His fame is all over the land; he has a name quite as potent as any of these with whom he differs. His late eloquent denunciations are calculated to "cool our friends and heat our enemies."

No one so much as he has assumed to speak what ought to be the policy of the party. And in the outset of his first speech he declared that, regardless of what might be the views of his political friends, the policy he then indicated upon great and leading measures, he would pursue to the end. Mahomet would not go to the mountain, but the mountain might come to Mahomet. No one, of course, can object to such a rule of personal conduct. But sir, the time and manner of announcing it was, to my mind, most unfortunate. The honorable member did look to me, like a shaft of stone, around which other things might gather; but which, deeply set and towering in its elevation could neither move nor bend. The motto inscribed upon the floating Opposition banners, by the member himself, was the "Union of the Whigs for the sake of the Union." Now, sir, the motto seems to be "Division of the Whigs for the sake of the Union." That division, sir, is unnecessary to the safety of the Union. I believe the gentleman to be a true and stanch Whig. But I cannot say much for his Whig discretion.

Some days ago, whilst an appropriation having relation to the Florida war was under discussion, the gentleman from Ohio delivered a speech, strongly assailing the institutions of the South. To him my colleague [Mr. COOPER] replied. The opinions of the member from Ohio, as then expressed, were wrong—wholly, irredeemably wrong.

With them I have no sympathy, but repudiate them with all my powers of reprobation. And, sir, the propriety of expressing them here had also my unqualified condemnation. My colleague had my sympathy in the argument he made upon that occasion. But, sir, not content with assailing abolitionism, he unnecessarily and most unjustly travelled out of the track of legitimate discussion to assail also the political course of his colleagues in their support of Harrison. I felt this to be exceedingly unkind. Whilst he denied that he intended to hold us up as ourselves favoring abolitionism, he did labor to make the people of Georgia believe that we had deceived them into the support of a party that would favor the opinions of Abolitionists. I do not pretend to quote the gentleman literally. But I am sure that I represent him in substance correctly. The drift of much of his speech was to establish the fulfilment of the prophecies he made in the last summer's canvass about a coalition between Southern Whigs and Northern Abolitionists. To prove that he was then right, he triumphantly pointed to the speech of the member from Ohio. Sir, all this and more was said upon the stump in Georgia. We met these charges there and refuted them. The gentleman was then in the field. He threw all the weight of his character, great, deservedly great, as it is, into the struggle. The cry there was, that the South was betrayed into a ruinous coalition with Northern fanatics and Federalists.

The people, sir, would not heed the voice of my honorable friend. They would not believe him then; they will not believe him now. They condemned him and his friends; they will condemn him and them again. And now, sir, the charge is renewed. The voice of alarm and of warning is raised anew. The same tale is told; the same issue is revived—an issue which he seeks to make a new one. I understand the gentleman. He shall make no new issue here, out of an adjudicated issue at home. He shall, least of all, place me and the Whigs of Georgia in a false position upon this subject. Sir, the Whig party is now what it was then. The member from Ohio was here last winter; his opinions were then as well known as they are now. There has been no new Abolition move here; things are as they were; yet when the Ohio member spoke, my colleague proclaims to all Southern Whigs, "I told you so." But, sir, worst of all, he most ingeniously managed to convey to the people the impression that we Southern Representatives were, by our political position here, slumbering on our post, and conniving at the progress of abolitionism. He did not say so; but a stranger in the galleries could infer nothing else from all that he did say. Nay, sir, I felt, most painfully felt, that my colleague was very willing to have our people believe that he and the member from Scriven were the only true representatives of Georgia upon this floor. Southern rights, sir, have lost nothing by the election of General Harrison. The gentleman errs in his opinion of the Whigs. They will not sustain Abolition principles. He may quiet his fears and soothe his apprehensive feelings. Not even the Whigs will compromise the rights of Georgia here. They are upon the watch-tower, and wide awake. I will not be judged, nor shall the Whig party be judged, by the absurd movements of the member from Ohio. He may be a criterion of judgment for my colleague; I choose one more in accordance with common sense and the actual state of feeling and opinion here.

I said, sir, Southern rights had lost nothing by the election of General Harrison. I go further, and say that they have gained a great deal. There is an auxiliary power north of the Potomac, in esse, which will be, and is now brought to bear in their defence. My colleague may make as much as he can out of this statement. We have tower is us a better feeling at the North than we have heretofore had. The guiding mind of New England is with us. A star has risen in the East, the harbinger of better days, and it has healing, I trust, to the nation in its brilliant beams. As a political question, the greatest of the Eastern politicians is with us. And, sir, I am not so straitened in my notions as to refuse aid extended to us from any quarter. If left to protect ourselves, we will do it at the hazard of every consequence; but if our institutions can be maintained by aid from abroad—from other sections of the Union I mean—when tendered in the fulness of American patriotism, I can see no possible reason for declining it.

Now, sir, allow me to say that my opinion is that General Harrison will be with the South upon this great question. But if, at any time, the party in power should be against us, I am thenceforth against that party. I will make this the greatest, deepest, most controlling of all other questions. As to the motives of my colleague, [Mr. COOPER] I assail not them. I will not speak of his personal character otherwise than respectfully; I should belie my own blood if I did. His political course is greatly antagonistic to mine. Of his opinions and his public acts I speak.

In the speech I had the honor to deliver some days since, I assumed as the basis of my argument, what no one will deny, that the income of the Government would fall short, during the next year, at the lowest estimate, eight million dollars. Upon this basis I argued—

1. That the wants of the Government ought to be supplied by imposts, as preferable to any other mode of raising money.

2. That the duties ought to be laid under the provisions of the compromise act of 1833.

3. That the articles upon which the duties should be laid are the unprotected articles made dutiable by the compromise itself, such as silks, wices, and other luxuries.

4. That such new duties would not be in violation of, but in accordance with, the act of 1833.

5. That revenue should only be raised to supply the wants of an economical administration of the Government.

Incident of these topics, many others were briefly discussed. I disclaimed in any way giving my countenance to duties for protection; and avowed my determination to sustain the anti-tariff principles of my own and other Southern States. I expressed the opinion, an opinion which I now reaffirm, that those principles are to be kept inviolate only by a religious adherence to the compromise. And, sir, one of the reasons, perhaps the strongest reason of all, inducing me to take the position I did, was to preserve the compromise, and to save us from those dangers which I foresee must attend a revision of the tariff after it expires. Upon such principles, with such views, and with no small degree of zeal for my constituents, I addressed the committee. I endeavored to look at their interests, and those of the whole country, with that liberal and enlightened statesmanship which I do not profess to possess; yet to which I ardently aspire.

In his reply my colleague [Mr. BLACK] controverted the propriety of duties on silks, because they would lessen the consumption of cotton in France, and thereby injure the South. How far he established his position or jostled my own argument is for others to determine. Of his argument, even should it demolish my own, I have no right to complain. Of that I make no complaint. In the absence of other ground of attack, he assumed that my speech sounded very much to his ear like a tariff speech. Without being able to lay his finger upon one thought, one sentiment, not to say one position, which gave the least countenance to such an assumption, the honorable member, taking council of his ear, and not of his mind, and doubtless responding to an eager desire to cast me off from the confidence of my constituents, denounced me, by all fair implication, as a tariff man. Sir, that confidence has been, as it ought to have been, slow of growth, hard of acquisition; and, whether it be great or small, my colleague will endeavor in vain to shake it by innuendos, hints, impressions and evil surmises. He will fail of his object. Those who sent me here will require stronger proof that I advocate a tariff for protection than the gentleman's ingenuity can extract from my speech. They will see and read for themselves. Did my colleague intend to teach the people that we were faithless also upon the tariff, and that he was the sole exponent of Southern faith and Southern principle? It would seem so. I faithless to the State upon whose soil I was born, and beneath whose sod myself and my children, if such be the will of Providence, are destined to sleep! No, sir; I may, through fallibility of judgment, mistake her honor or her interest, but I can never betray them.

By way of making out as strong a case as possible, it has been said that we are not only for high tariffs, but go also for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. And almost every gentleman who has addressed you in opposition to the policy of raising revenue by imposts has wound up his alarm harangue by as vivid a presentation of the usual bank horrors as a highly stimulated fancy would permit. So far as I am concerned, it was indispensable for my colleague, in order to get up the merest color of heterodoxy, to travel out of the record of my speech. That, unfortunately for his purposes, was sound—quite orthodox; quite in accordance with all the canons of the true church. In the absence therefore, of either misstatements of fact or errors of opinion, he draws largely upon his imagination—listens for tariff treachery, and fondly dreams and vainly charges that his colleague is the advocate of most damning heresies.

Sir, I have opinions upon the great subjects referred to, well-matured opinions; and when the time arrives for acting on them, I will act and take no counsel from my colleague. I will neither consult his hopes nor his fears. I can assure him that no false clamor that he and others may raise will draw me from a faithful discharge of present obligations. I shall not be deterred by the cry of Abolition, tariff, and bank—cries so fruitlessly raised during the last summer, subserving the purpose of frightening aged women and infant children, but having no terrors for men. The gentleman may go sound his alarms in the nursery, perhaps there they may be available.

What, sir, do you think of that magnanimity which tortures an argument into a construction which neither its positions nor its terms will bear? Or of that liberality which infers the opinions of an adversary from what he omits to say rather than from what he utters? Which passes sentence upon him as to subjects not under discussion by the opinions he pronounces upon those that are; which infers every thing and proves nothing; which constructs a system of the most reprehensive politics, fixes it by artful and illegitimate inferences upon him, and then with quite commendable valor proceeds to its demolition? Such have been the tactics of my honorable colleague. He has his batteries to bear upon positions which have no existence but in his own brain. His artillery have let off their impotent volleys upon mere vacuity. One only position, as I before remarked, did he controvert, and if that had been successfully controverted, not even then would the conclusions he drew as to my tariff tendencies have been legitimate. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] proposed that the Committee of Ways and Means should make inquiry as to the propriety of raising revenue by duties, asking no protection, and expressly providing that the duties be laid according to the provisions of the compromise act. This was one of the ten signs of the gentleman from Virginia, portending death to the Republic; and it was this, next to my own humble demonstrations, which most excited the ire of my colleague. Now, sir, it is worthy of remark that nowhere upon the records of this session is to be found a single proposition to protect. And it is also worthy of remark that the proposition of the gentleman from New York is, most of all, guiltless of protection. Yet, in that proposition, gentlemen affect to see abominations more abominable than those which are found in the tariff act of 1828. They see in it the inception of a most stupendous system of tariff robbery. The very able gentleman, no doubt, as well as his friends, was utterly confounded to hear that there was in his project infinitely more than he, in his poor philosophy, ever dreamed of.

Where, said the gentleman, were my colleagues, that they did not rise and denounce the amendment of the member from New York? His colleagues were in their seats, guarding with calm dignity the rights of the State, and disregarding the boisterous and harmless rebukes of the honorable member. The question and the manner of propounding it implied self-commendation and censure. As to my colleague's right to commend himself, I have nothing to say—that is a matter of taste, about which, as we all know, there is no disputing; but I deny his right to become the censor of my conduct. Who made him a judge over those who, to say the least of them, are his equals here? Not the people of Georgia. The gentleman can choose his own course of action, but may not choose for others—others who think, and whose constituency believe they require no guardian, and who, if they believed otherwise, would not select him. I say nothing of the delicacy and respectfulness which characterized my colleague's reply to me. For me to expect the courtesy of fair debate from him, was to look for a more special favor than he extends to any. That is not his wont. He has undertaken to school the Whig members from Georgia—to instruct them in their duties. He has complained of their silence; and, to give a semblance of right to his complaints, he talks about his political career being about to close, and of his early return to the ranks of the unofficial people. He professes to be one of our constituents, whilst he exercises the prerogative of a representative. One of those relations, I should say, is quite enough for him at one time. He is no constituent of mine; and in that, or any other character, I disclaim his instructions. I reject his counsel, and I will have none of his reproofs. When I have occasion to ask illumination, I will go elsewhere. I will consult the records of the past, the opinions and characters of departed men of renown, or living men of living fame. I will consult my own head and my own heart, but I will not consult the honorable gentleman. No, sir; never.

Mr. Chairman, one word to certain of my own political friends upon this floor. When opinions, designated as State rights opinions, are avowed here, gentlemen affect to treat them as incomprehensible, and, if comprehended at all, as objects of ridicule. Upon their faces is seen the smile of derision, and they sometimes sneer at doctrines which have been held and honored by the greatest men of this nation. However some of us may dissent from the abuse and perversion of State rights, yet we still cherish them. Gentlemen seem to forget that we came into support of General Harrison avowing these opinions, and they need not now be told that, he being elected, we have not discarded them. Every man has a right to think for himself, and I claim, and will exercise, the privilege of retaining, modifying, or wholly changing my opinions. As a Harrison man, I concede to others their opinions, and ask toleration for my own. If we can act together, well; if not, we may differ and divide as to any one or more measures, when called to act, without a total separation. With perfect respect to the politicians referred to, I beg them to suppress their sneers and withhold their deriding smiles.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

REMARKS OF MR. WICK,

OF INDIANA.

In the House of Representatives, February 25, 1841.—

The Navy Appropriation bill being under consideration, and Mr. SALTONSTALL having offered an amendment to augment the appropriation for the increase, repair, armament, and equipment of the Navy, and wear and tear of vessels in commission, from $1,425,000 to $2,000,000—

Mr. WICK said: I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that for any one to rise to address the committee now, and under the circumstances surrounding us, is equivalent to a sort of suicide. Nevertheless, and at the hazard of becoming felo de se, I have obtained the floor (as I am willing to admit, to the prejudice of abler members) for the purpose of redeeming myself from an unfounded imputation. Sir, it has been said that, although I have been sufficiently prompt in speaking my mind elsewhere concerning this assembly and its doings, I have been somewhat bashful and chary here, at the place where declamation, accusation, laudation, exultation, mourning, and lamentation are wont to be made. Here then, sir, at the forum in which and from whence the nation is understood to think, feel, ruminate, calculate, guess, reckon, speak, declare, condemn, and demolish, have I risen to give the reasons why I am disinclined to vote any increased appropriations for the navy, and why, if I vote the Treasury estimate therefor, the vote will be given grudgingly.

I am not inclined against large appropriations for the navy because my abiding place is in the Central West, far beyond the reach of hostile bombarding squadrons. Yet, upon this point, I must say I have been no little amused at the effort made, in the course of this debate, to convince Western members that a navy is peculiarly necessary for the protection of Western commerce. Sir, this jest is too bald. The great Valley of the Mississippi has no valuable commerce for the defence of which a navy is essential. Western products, for export, are such as the rest of the world will only buy when they are hungry, and will then buy in spite of war, blockade, and all other obstructions. The world is an eating animal. We produce the materiel necessary to satisfy the peptic wants of over-crowded populations in other regions, and of the manufacturer, the planter, and of the inhabitants of regions naturally sterile, or rendered so by improvident culture. And, sir, we would be better without than with the commerce for the protection of which a navy is particularly designed. True, a navy will defend our fisheries and our coast and exporting trades. But its energies would be specially devoted to the protection of the trade through which are imported the wines and silks which debase taste, and the gew-gaw trashery which adorn the shelves, the counter, and strong-box of the Western shop-keeper. And I am just old-fashioned enough to imagine that such a commerce is not, to the West, worth defending; more, sir, I am heretical enough to honestly believe that, if such commerce could be neglected—not unnecessarily indulged in—for but the space of three years, the great Valley of the Mississippi would not owe the rest of the world a dollar, and would be the dwelling-place of plenty, peace, happiness, and virtue; the judicial officer would be the arbiter of misunderstandings instead of a "mill" to grind the substance of our yeomanry into money; the executive officer would be a conservator of the peace, a terror to evil-doers, instead of an agent for the collection of debts; and the business of our State Legislatures would be to define and provide guards for individual liberty and right. They would no longer be, as they now are, the panders of miserable schemes of finance, begotten in speculation, "conceived in sin, and brought forth in iniquity."

Sir, we in the West have no local selfish motive to induce us to favor a navy for the defence of commerce; and, sir, we need no such motive. We recognise a navy as the principal bulwark of national defence, and therefore we will aid the nation in its maintenance from patriotism alone. I, for myself, consider a system of land fortifications as being little better than a relic of barbarous ages, when every feudal lord fortified his demesne and manned his castles with his tenantry and retainers—when the human family found a business in offence and defence—when the trade of the world was war. Sir, if this nation should ever be again involved in war, it will be found impossible to defend by fortification every assailable point. Our coast and frontier are too extensive for that. We must, with our navy, meet the enemy upon the great deep, and battle with him there. And if he should succeed in contaminating our soil, by landing hostile legions upon our shores, we must (because we cannot anticipate the precise point of his approach and fortify accordingly) fight him from behind hasty intrenchments of sand, logs, or cotton bags—and in default of these, the bosoms of patriots must become the ramparts of our firesides and homes.

Notwithstanding all these considerations, I cannot vote large appropriations for the navy, until you abolish your miserable scheme of a navy board. Sir, the board is composed of captains in the navy, whose trade is fighting, and not ship-building. Now, sir, such are the principles of human character, that every man imagines himself Solomon's first-born son. In the good old times of our navy, when vessels were built according to models furnished by naval architects, your frigates were crack sailers, and could overtake, or run away from, an enemy, as circumstances might require. But since you have got this miserable board at the head of affairs, the new vessels are all so built and the old ones all so repaired, that, with two or three exceptions, you have not a vessel upon the mountain wave capable of giving successful chase to an inferior, or of escaping from a superior force. Totting tubs are they all, in which are imprisoned the gallant spirits of your country, paralyzed by the remodelling of the models of these ships by your wretched navy board, and rendered incapable of any service but that of surrendering at discretion to an overwhelming force. Sir, rub out your navy board, and reorganize the Navy Department, so that one single man should be responsible for the models of vessels, another for the materials with which they are built, another for their armaments, and so on; and I will then vote any reasonable sum for the navy. Responsibility, individual responsibility, is the great spring of human action. Sir, you may send a committee to ascertain who is responsible for the faulty construction of any one of the vessels of your navy—of the most sluggish creeper among them. Your committee will prosecute the examination till they may think they have found the responsible man. But put your finger on him, and he will not be there. He will tell you, "the board ordered it." Boards, like corporations, have no souls—like them, they can neither be hanged, disgraced, nor court-martialled. There is no action for them.

26TH CONG....2ND SESS.

Navy Appropriation Bill—Mr. Wick.

H. of Reps.

Now, sir, I have a word to say to my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. Mason.] In his speech upon this question, that honorable gentleman again arraigned the present Administration for its supposed opposition to appropriations for the continuance of the Cumberland road—a subject in reference to which that honorable gentleman and myself, and our respective constituencies, feel, have felt, and will continue to feel, the most lively interest. Sir, what are the facts? So long as Congress continued to make appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road, and even after such appropriations were denied, Mr. Van Buren caused to be communicated to Congress an estimate for the continuation of the road, prepared by the Topographical Bureau, sanctioned by the proper Department having charge of the matter—viz: the Department of War. It is true, he did not cause such estimate to be submitted by the Treasury Department, because the estimates of the Treasury Department are legitimately confined to subjects of expenditure arising out of constitutional obligation or standing laws, permanent in their nature, and in their words and spirit implying perpetuity. The appropriations for the Cumberland road have never been of this character. On the contrary, they have been made by laws, in letter and spirit purporting to be single and temporary in their object.

And now, sir, I have this to say to my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. Mason.] I have defended in speech, and with my pen, the course of Mr. Van Buren in reference to this subject. If President Harrison shall recommend, in decided terms, in his annual message, appropriations for the continuation of the Cumberland road, or shall cause an estimate therefor to be inserted in the Treasury estimate, I pledge myself to go among my constituents, and take back all that I have said in defence of Mr. Van Buren on that point. And, sir, if my respected friend [Mr. Mason] will publish, along with his speech, that which I have now said concerning appropriations for the Cumberland road, he may send his printer to me for a ratable proportion of the bill, and I will pay it.

A word to my friend from Virginia, [Mr. Wise.] He said that the present Administration could not be kicked into a war. I think I have met with this expression before. If I mistake not, it was used on this floor by an opponent of Mr. Madison's administration, in reference to those times and events.

Perhaps it was then, as now, used by a Virginian. No, no, no, it came from the vicinity of Hartford. Mr. Chairman, what would the honorable member from Virginia have? Would he have

"The ocean into tempest tost,
To waft a feather or to drown a fly?"

[Mr. Wise. No, no.]

Mr. Wick: Our difficulties with Great Britain grow out of transactions upon our Northern and Northeastern boundaries. On the Northern boundary the difficulties had their origin in the action of individuals—mere marauding. Surely small difficulties, arising out of such causes, are better left to the curative powers of time, and to the mutually pacific explanations of diplomacy, than committed to the arbitrament of arms, rashly assumed.

The Maine boundary question is one of more difficulty. The British Government have raised a claim to a portion of the territory of a sovereign State. By way of asserting this claim, armed demonstrations, upon the debatable ground, were made. Encouraged by this, timber-stealers commenced operations. Sir, here is a cause of war. But the cause, in all prudence, must not produce the effect until after reasonable remonstrance with, and pertinacity in, the wrong-doer. I would even resort to an umpire before an appeal to arms.

In the correspondence between the British Minister and the head of the State Department, I see no lack of decision and diplomatic point on our side of the subject. Let every mean be used to avoid a national struggle for this bit of pine woods; and if all fail, and the sharp contest must come, I say, go ahead, Maine, the Hoosiers will come!

Sir, the two past Administrations have asserted every national right, with a spirit worthy of admiration; and I was sorry to hear my gallant friend from Virginia say that this Administration could not be kicked into a war.

Mr. Wise explained, observing that he had said, not that this Administration could not be kicked into a war, but that it could not be kicked into a war with Great Britain; and alleged that Texan officers were permitted to enlist, openly in American cities, soldiers for the Texan service, against Mexico, while a United States army was stationed upon the Northern frontier to prevent the interference of our citizens in behalf of Canadian patriots.

Mr. Wick: I admit that the reproach was confined to a war with Great Britain. But, sir, the cases cited by the honorable member from Virginia are not parallel. It is the special duty of the Government to provide for peace upon our borders. Personal collisions on our Northern frontier, and the interference of our citizens in Canadian matters, are calculated to compromise the national safety. On the other hand, interference of our citizens in the contest between Texas and Mexico ensures our national integrity, because it tends to raise up an empire of friends and brothers between our Southern boundary and a people aliens to us in feeling, policy, religion, and law. Besides, what bold hand shall be put forth to stay the onward march of the Anglo-Saxon race, carrying civilization, liberal opinions, and enterprise to the remote corners of the earth, baptizing with light nations in their course?

In the progress of the debate upon this bill honorable members opposed to the present Administration have characterized it as a dying power. They have depicted to our minds its last dying struggles. To such I would say, in the name of Democratic principles, "though we die, yet shall we live again." Respectfully too would I offer my advice to the Opposition, to be chary of reproaches at present. I would say to them, You have kept us in hot water a good while. Your ingenuity in bringing forward charges has, at times, puzzled even the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means who, in order to answer your questions, was bound to know every thing, and some things besides. You have had your day. You have succeeded. You have made the people believe a portion of your evidence. You will soon be in power. The tables will then be turned upon you. You will be questioned in this hall. You will be called up to answer charges in relation to every thing under the sun. And, although you may have the major part of talent on your side, you will often be puzzled. Sharp tongues and bold pens will gaff you. You cannot bring the good times which you have promised. Your panaceas for State and individual indebtedness will fail. Money will not grow on the bushes, nor will your legislation raise prices, or produce demand. Mind, I tell you, you will, as Burns said of one of his poetical heroes, in a storm, you will "have business on your hands." Even "Old Tip," all innocent, as he will quite probably be, in the premises, will be in all sorts of trouble. I intend to do him justice. But, in bitterness and gall, will he learn from partisan injustice, that the White House is, at best, a jagged palace, that its pillows are filled with thorns, instead of down, and that all is not gold there that glistened in Ogle's eyes.

Since I have been here, Mr. Chairman, I have discovered that it is, at nearly all times, perfectly in order for a member to "define his position." I wish to avail myself of the opportunity, if this be the proper occasion, and, if it be not, I ask the indulgence of the committee while I discharge that peremptory duty prescribed by the lex loci. I have cultivated, of late, an indifference as to reputation, because I have seen that much of that which is here acquired grows out of a waste of time, and indulgence of personal rivalry and animal tendencies. My business here, sir, is not with individuals, but with subjects, principles, and things. I have been, to a great extent, a silent member; and in the mean time, I am aware that some false prophet or other has, by statements made at hazard, or upon authority of a character too questionable to justify any one in committing himself thereon, produced erroneous impressions concerning the humble individual now addressing the committee. Even the newspapers have received their lesson, and have pummeled me, in prose and song, as a renegade, traitor, and all that. Sir, I was not elected as a Clay man. I came not here to follow in any one's wake—to be no one's eulogist—to take exceptions to no one in particular. I would be sorry to acknowledge any man a "bit better than he ought to be," and equally far would I be from acknowledging any man's dangerous greatness by making him the object of unceasing attack and misrepresentation. I do profess to be a moderate man—moderate in feeling and action, but decided in opinion and principle. It was universally known, when I was elected, that I had voted for Mr. Van Buren, and had expressed much satisfaction with the general tone and policy of his Administration. But, sir, there was a kind of informal convention on the subject, and it was agreed that I should vote against the Independent Treasury measure, and about other things do as should seem to me right and proper. And upon that footing I was elected by both parties, to some good extent. Sir, I have violated no pledge, as has been represented. I have kept faith with my constituency. I am a Democrat of the Virginia school—a man of '98. I cannot, for a moment, think of indulging in a latitudinous construction of the Constitution. I am for construing its grant of powers to this central Government strictly and to the letter, reserving all other powers to the municipal action of the States. And, sir, I not only fear, as the worst of all political evils, the assertion and exercise of powers by the Federal Government not expressly granted by the charter, but I go further. I hold that the original compact between the sovereign States of this Confederacy had for its motive not only the corporate advantage of the whole, but also the separate advantage of each State; and that if the Federal Government should, in violation of the Constitution, trifle with the rights and sovereignty of any particular State, and enact laws of partial effect, oppressive to the interests or rights of its citizens, or conferring immunities and benefits upon other States, denied to such particular State, without legitimate reason, or adopt measures invading rights recognised by the charter, such particular State, its constituted authorities and citizens, have a right to recur to original principles, resist the exercise of the power by the Federal Government not delegated to it, and do the best she may. Sir, in some respects the Federal Government is sovereign—in so far as the Constitution has made it so. In all other respects the native sovereignty of the States remains complete, and shines forth untarnished by assertion and usage, or by infringement submitted to as the choice of evils. To this hour I retain the opinion that the present Executive has represented Democratic principles fairly and well, and therefore I have continued my support thereto.

Such, sir, is my political creed. That it was always such I will not say. Ten years ago, when I was as honest, but I think not so well informed, as I now am, I was a latitudinarian—a Federalist. If any one jeers me for changing, I will tell him that fools never change, and that wise men do sometimes. The change of opinion in reference to myself has been gradual, honest, and complete. It has not been with, but against wind, tide, and the stream.

A word as to the coming Administration, and I will have done. If President Harrison shall be found a strict constructionist—if he shall withhold his countenance from those unconstitutional and dangerous measures which have ever been pressed upon the nation by latitudinarians, I will support his administration, and encourage others to abstain from opposition. But I must not be expected to support his administration if he shall lend Executive influence in furtherance of the chartering of a national corporation, or systems of expenditure giving rise to a necessity for the creation of a public debt.

[Mr. JENIFER of Maryland here asked Mr. WICK under what clause of the Constitution he [Mr. W.] claimed authority for Congress to appropriate money upon the Cumberland road.]

Sir, (said Mr. WICK,) the Cumberland road is a military road, essential for the common defence.

[Mr. WISE. Mr. Jefferson said it was a military road.]

Mr. WICK. Yes! Mr. Jefferson called it a military road; and who will say that he was not a strict and literal construer of the Constitution? Sir, it is a military road. Its construction is necessary for the transportation of arms, munitions, and provisions, and to the march of armies to that Western frontier upon which your policy has—wisely, because you could do no better—located the fragments of a hundred tribes, who may, at any moment, unsheath the knife and fling the tomahawk. And beyond interpose between you and the Pacific a hundred other tribes, with whom many a sanguinary struggle may be expected. Nor is this all. You may yet have to grapple with the power of the two greatest empires on earth, in a contest for the Pacific coast. Sir, you may deny appropriations for that road now. You may close your ears to the voice of reason and of justice; but you will yet complete that thoroughfare to the great ocean. You may incommode the present generation by refusing to do that now which might better be now done than hereafter. But you will yet obey the commands of nature and necessity.

ELECTION OF SERGEANT-AT-ARMS.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, March 8, 1841.

Mr. MERRICK moved to take up the resolution submitted by him on Saturday, to proceed to the election of a Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate.

Mr. BUCHANAN said he should vote against the resolution. After the death of Judge Haight, a strong appeal was made to this body on behalf of his widow, and arrangements were made by which she was to receive his salary for the entire term for which he was elected; and the Assistant Doorkeeper at that time agreed to discharge the duties of Sergeant-at-Arms. This course was adopted from motives of the purest philanthropy and justice: that the Government might not pay two salaries, and yet that the widow might receive that of which she stood so much in need. And now at the close of this session, when there was no earthly use for a Sergeant-at-Arms, why should they impose on the Treasury a double salary? When the Democratic Senators had the power, they refrained from using it, and determined not to elect a Sergeant-at-Arms; they agreed to do without this officer; and now, when no reason for the election exists—when they could do without him until the meeting of Congress, he could not vote for an election, and he called for the ayes and noes on the adopting the resolution.

Mr. MERRICK said the Senate on a former day had thought fit to make a liberal grant to the widow of the late Sergeant-at-Arms; that was very good in itself, but it afforded no good reason why they should dispense with a Sergeant-at-Arms. The office was vacant, and it was proper that it should be filled, and he therefore moved that they proceed to fill it.

Mr. KING expressed his surprise that the gentleman had thought proper to bring forward this resolution at the close of this Executive session. They had a law fixing the time of the election of their officers, and that was at the commencement of the next session of Congress.

Mr. YOUNG, with the permission of the Senator from Alabama, interposed for the purpose of placing before the Senate the precise terms of the rule, which he read as follows:

"RULE 49. The Secretary of the Senate, the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, and the Assistant Doorkeeper, shall be chosen on the second Monday of the first session of the 21st Congress, and on the same day of the first session of every succeeding Congress."

Mr. KING said that was the law to which he alluded, which was binding on the Senate as regarded those officers. He knew gentlemen said there was a vacancy in consequence of the death of Judge Haight. He and his political friends knew the fact, but though they had had the power when the vacancy occurred, they did not deem it obligatory to go into an election. They (the Democratic party) acted fairly towards the party that was to be the majority after the 4th of March; and he asked with what propriety they could make this election, and go before the country, after giving to the widow of their late officer the whole salary to the close of the year, when there was not a particle of business to be done by the new incumbent who ever he might be? It was nothing under the sun but to give a salary when the officer was not wanted and when there were no duties to be performed. If this was the "reform" that had been promised, the new Administration would not have much to boast of. Here an officer of the Senate, not wanted, was to be forced on them merely to give him the salary. No gentleman could get up and say that officer was wanted; and if not, he asked why elect him? Could they get along up to the close of the late busy and excited session with their present officers, and could they not close this extra session—for he hoped it would be closed that or the succeeding day—without an additional one? If this was to be a specimen of what was to be expected from the new majority, he would tell them that many estimable citizens who gave their support in the expectation of "Retrenchment" and "Reform," would turn away from them with sorrow and regret. But they were amenable to the people, and to the people he would leave them.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said really it appeared to his gentlemen on the other side were disposed to make a great deal out of a very small affair. On what authority did the gentleman from Alabama venture to assert that this resolution was to be passed to make a place for a favorite?

Mr. KING. The fact itself.

Mr. CLAY. There was none. Here was an office with certain duties attached to it; that office was vacant. If the office were unnecessary, bring forward a proposition to dispense with it—altogether abolish it—and, if that was done, he undertook to say that they (the present majority) should not fill the office while the proposition to dispense with it altogether, was under consideration. Here was an office with duties attached to it: now there might be, and in all probability would be, an extra session. There was no official announcement, and he spoke only on common rumor, and on information attributed to the President of the United States himself, in some remarks on a recent visit to Richmond. Was it not then of consequence that the office be filled, and that the officer should become familiar with the duties of that office before he was called to it? The salary was—what? Some $1500.

Well, if there should be an extra session, he believed no gentleman would deny that there should not be a Sergeant-at-Arms; and, if there should be an extra session two months hence, and the salary be $1500, it was an affair of $250. Now, it was not in little matters of this sort—it was in great and important sources of expenditure—those monstrous leaks in the Treasury which had left it dry—it was in reforms of that sort, by which the Administration coming into power was to benefit the country. But gentlemen told them they had used the salary in a grant to the family of the late Sergeant-at-Arms: that is, that those having the power had given the salary to the widow of the late Sergeant-at-Arms; and because they had exercised their charity in this way, the public were not to be served by an officer whose duties were necessary. Was that the sort of reasoning by which they were to be dissuaded from the performance of a necessary duty? He (Mr. CLAY) did not complain of the exercise of this charitable disposition; gentlemen had exercised it towards the family of the late incumbent. Be it so: they (the Whigs) had acquiesced. But he deemed that no reason they should not fill the office, the duties of which might be necessary, and in all probability would be necessary, in forty, fifty, or sixty days from this time. Well, then, as to the rule which had been alluded to on the other side: it was a standing rule, and for what purpose? To bring the officers in review before the Senate, that they might decide on their continuation in office from time to time. But did any body suppose that they could not fill at another time a vacancy in the office occasioned by death? Why, suppose they should fill this biennial office, and, two days after, the officer should die: could they not fill the vacancy before the expiration of the two years? Here was a vacancy, the duties of which, he repeated, in all human probability, would be necessary in a short time; and it had been proposed to fill the office. He hoped gentlemen on the other side, on a reconsideration, would see it was not one out of which any thing could be made by a protracted argument.

Mr. KING said he had but one word to say to the Senator, and that was, that there were no duties to be performed after the adjournment of this session; and therefore this—whether the salary were great or small—was simply a question of salary to a favorite. The Senator had talked about Senators on this side giving away the salary to the family of the late Sergeant-at-Arms. Now, did not the honorable Senator know that the proposition came from one of his own friends? [Mr. WHITE of Indiana.] That proposition was pressed on the good feeling of Senators contrary to his (Mr. KING's) judgment, and he did not vote for it. He was willing to vote for what was usually paid for the burial of such an officer, and then allow his family to bury him in its own way; and he so stated. He thought that was the correct course, but the honorable Senator's (Mr. CLAY's) friends, and a portion of his (Mr. KING's) thought differently. But did they (the Democrats) seize upon the circumstance, when they were in the majority, and fill the vacancy? No: they acted in good faith, and they expressed themselves in good faith that the vacancy should not be filled, as the present Doorkeeper had agreed to discharge the duties, and it was not filled. The Senator (Mr. CLAY) seemed to forget himself in his over anxiety to regulate and control every thing at his will and pleasure. Did they (Mr. KING's friends) offer to fill the office? Had they not the power to fill the vacancy? They had, but they left it to the present majority to exercise their right and their duty at the proper time; but they (Mr. KING and his friends) did not think that, at this extra session, it would be brought forward, simply to make a place, and to give a salary. He was not to be twitted with the exercise of improper liberality towards the family of the late Sergeant-at-Arms. He was willing to do all that it was right and proper to do, but beyond that, he was not willing to go; beyond that, as he conceived, the friends of the gentleman opposite had gone in the exercise of their liberal feelings. He had deemed it a duty which he owed to himself that there should be a correct understanding of this matter; beyond that, he knew it was useless to talk, for the fiat had gone forth. Be it so: let the gentlemen proceed to the election, and then let the country judge whether it was a little matter or a great matter. "Sraws shows which way the wind blows."

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said, it seemed to him there were two sides to the question. The Senator from Alabama supposed the object was to make a place for a favorite, but what had that gentleman's party done? They (the late majority) had the power, and what did they do in this matter? Notwithstanding they did not fill this office—notwithstanding the Doorkeeper agreed to discharge the duties of the station for this session—and notwithstanding the amount given to the widow of the late Sergeant-at-Arms—from that quarter came a motion to give to the acting Sergeant-at-Arms $1,000 extra, for about six week's service in discharging the duties of that office. He did not charge it on the Senator from Alabama, but it came from over the way, (from the Democratic side of the House.) That motion was modified, giving $500 extra for the discharge of the duties which the Sergeant-at-Arms should have discharged. Then, as a matter of economy, if the office is not filled, a proposition will come hereafter to give the Doorkeeper the same pay for the discharge of the duties of the Sergeant-at-Arms. Had not the opposite party laid down that principle; and in the case of Attorney General Butler, where one officer performed double duty, had they not paid double fees? Had they not laid down the same principle in the identical case before the Senate? He (Mr. SMITH) voted against the allowance; but when the gentlemen opposite told him that this office should not be filled on the ground of economy, and by their example they showed him that they gave the pay, the charge of want of economy, as applied to him, lost itself. But to return to the question. Here was an office vacant; should they fill it, and have a responsible officer, or should they agree to give the same compensation, by way of extra allowance, to those who were filling inferior stations without the responsibility? This was the ground on which he should give his vote; and the gentlemen opposite could not expect the argument of "economy" to have much weight on him. They (the Whigs) had just as much right to charge the gentlemen opposite with wishing to keep this office vacant, that they might pay an officer double, as they had to charge back upon them (the Whigs) an appointment with compensation, where there were no duties to be discharged. But if there were no duties, why did not the gentlemen opposite discharge the Doorkeeper? It was not a question whether there were duties during the vacation or not, though he had been willing not to fill the office.

Mr. KING. So you were; but you are not so now.

Mr. SMITH would tell the gentleman why. As the matter now stands, he was willing to give his vote for the appointment of a Sergeant-at-Arms, rather than have inferior officers remunerated by extra compensation, for the discharge of duties of a responsible office.

Mr. KING wished to correct a statement of the Senator from Indiana, made in the course of his remarks on this subject. The proposition to give extra compensation did not come from that side of the Senate, if the honorable Senator meant the Democratic side.

Mr. SMITH replied that the proposition came from the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.]

Mr. KING said the proposition of the Senator from Missouri was to fix a regular compensation, and thereby to get rid of the "extras." He (Mr. KING) suggested the propriety of such a course, and his friend from Missouri introduced a proposition to that effect, and it was sent to the Committee on the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; and subsequently, Governor Knight, who was not now a member, but who was as worthy a man as ever occupied a seat on that floor, reported from that committee the proposition to give the extra allowance to the Doorkeeper. He (Mr. KING) knew just as much about these things as the Senator from Indiana. He had been here some years; he had not been inattentive to passing events; and he had seen that the course which had been pursued in relation to compensating their officers, led to difficulties. He had hoped a fixed compensation would be agreed upon. Let it be liberal, let it be permanent, and let them, thereby, get rid of extra compensation. But it was thought impracticable by the committee to fix a compensation that was just and right, and when the allowance to the Doorkeeper was proposed, who objected? His friend from Mississippi [Mr. HENDERSON] objected, and his friend from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER,] he believed, and one or two more, but it passed by almost unanimous consent. Six was the precise number that objected, as the ayes and noes would show. Well, now, of these how many were of the other side? Only two—the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Mississippi—and four were on this side; and this was to be the groundwork on which the gentleman would fix their vindication of this election when there were no duties to perform, unless the new Sergeant-at-arms came here and did the duties to-day and to-morrow. He repelled the remark of the Senator from Indiana, that they wished to keep open an office, that they might give additional compensation to another individual. That individual was entitled to no extra compensation.

As to the extra session, it appeared that they had to go to Richmond for their information. If the extra session were to be early, the State he represented would be without representation in the other House; and he had been, therefore, desirous to know when, or whether an extra session would be held, but hitherto he could get no precise information; but now they got it from the Senator from Kentucky, who got it from Richmond, though that Senator had told them in the early part of the session that there would be one. He (Mr. KING) had not doubted it then, for he took it the Senator spoke with authority, yet he had made inquiries of Mr. Ewing of Ohio—a gentleman of great respectability, but of different politics from him (Mr. KING)—who promised to give him the earliest intimation of the period fixed upon, which he had not yet done. However, it was said that they were to have an extra session, and they must therefore go into an election of Sergeant-at-arms, that that officer might make himself acquainted with his duties. Why this was really laughable. What had he to do? Was it necessary that he should study three or four months to learn to keep all persons out of the Senate except such as were enumerated on the rules at the door? Had he to go through a long course of studies to learn that the galleries were not to interfere with the deliberations of the Senate? These were the studies of the Sergeant-at-Arms! But he felt he was merely wasting the time of the Senate, and he would only say that he should vote against the resolution. He cared not what the political sentiments of the Sergeant-at-Arms, or any other officer of the Senate, might be; he had rarely asked himself the question; and on one occasion, when he had labored, with more than ordinary zeal, to get a worthy but unfortunate man elected there, the man said to him, "I owe it to you frankly to say, that I am an old Federalist." He was elected, and to the best of his ability did his duty, until he fell dead in yonder room, while engaged in their service.

Mr. SEVIER hoped the Senate would not proceed now to this proposed election. He had been struck with some surprise at the remarks of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. SMITH.] The position of the gentleman opposite was that they (the late majority) had been in the habit of voting extra pay, and therefore the other side were disposed to follow that splendid example. But the gentleman need not tell him this story, for although the gentlemen opposite had cried "reform," he knew when it came to the test that it would turn out to be "humbug." They saw it the other day, when fixing the compensation of postmasters and collectors, and now they saw it again. Yes, while they had the cry of "retrenchment" and "reform" still in their ears—while they had the flag of "reform" flying across the Avenue, they had this commentary on that profession of "reform." He had hoped that the example of the late Administration, if it was as extravagant as it had been represented to be, would not have been followed, but that the new Administration would have taken a new and different direction, be it better or worse. But to the salary of this office, which it is now proposed to fill. Subsequent to the death of our late Sergeant-at-Arms, a Senator from Vermont, [Mr. PHELPS,] moved, no doubt, by feelings which are highly creditable to him, introduced a resolution proposing to give to the widow of the deceased five hundred dollars to defray the expenses of carrying the body to Vermont was for interment. This amended at the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. WHITE,] by adding to the sum the amount of salary for the whole time for which he was elected—two years. This resolution was agreed to, and agreed to on the understanding that the present Assistant Doorkeeper would discharge the duties of the situation for the present year. They voted this money, and it was paid; and the Democratic majority—who are so frequently taunted for their recklessness, by gentlemen on the opposite side—in accordance with the understanding, made no attempt to fill the office, though they had the power. But it was said they wished to keep the office open that they might vote extra allowance to another individual for performing double duty; but if he got extra compensation, who would give it to him? Are you not the majority, gentlemen Reformers? and if he gets extra pay at the next session, will he not get it at your hands, and not at ours? He (Mr. SEVIER) only viewed the proposed disposal of this matter as part of the system to be hereafter pursued, and as an exemplification of the purposes of the "great Reformers" of the last few months. He saw no earthly reason why this election should not be postponed until the meeting of the next Congress. The business of the Senate was nearly over, and if we elected the officer, he would have no services to perform during the recess—except, perhaps, the removal of the carpets, and that might be safely entrusted to the Doorkeeper.

Mr. BENTON believed it to be very proper that this motion should be postponed until the second Monday of the next session. Propriety and the existing law both required it. He had been there long enough to be contemporaneous with the enactment of the law, which had been read for the government of this body, and he knew the reason for its enactment. With respect to the rule, and the practice under it, of this side of the House, he knew all about it, and the reason for its adoption, and the reason why it had never been departed from, from the time of its adoption to the present. This office, which they were told was necessary to be filled, to enable them to conduct their business with regularity, had a sufficient attraction in it, from the amount of salary, the easy nature of the duties, and the respectability of the station, to very many persons. The office of Secretary to the Senate, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Doorkeeper, had all sufficient attractions, in their salaries, and duties, and stations, to make them desirable to many persons. The office of Sergeant-at-Arms, he considered more desirable than any other in their gift; it was an office which carried along with it not very laborious duties for any period of the year, but the supervision over others, and to see that they did their duty. When the session was over the duties of the Sergeant-at-Arms ceased, and until the ensuing session there were long vacations, during which he received his salary, while attending to his own business, or travelling wherever he pleased. One vacation was of nine months' duration, during which his duties entirely ceased; in the short vacation he had six months. It was then an office that was desirable to a great number of persons—to men of some age; men who had rendered service to their country, perhaps in the field, perhaps in the council, but who had now returned to private life, and who needed the advantages which a salary would bring; and they found in the duties of Sergeant-at-Arms a place that would suit them in every respect; and the Senate had seen among those who had applied for it, persons of great respectability in the country—some who have had seats in the House of Representatives. Seeing, then, the respectability of the office, and the great many that applied for it, it was necessary that a time should be fixed that persons might know when to apply, and that the Senate might have time to think on the subject. With this view, some years ago a day was fixed on which these elections should take place, and that day was fixed with a great deal of care; It was not the first Monday of the session, nor the first Thursday, but the second Monday, be that when it might. The Senate went on the assumption that, by fixing the day, it would become known, and that all persons who wished to present their names for the office would have an equal chance. The second Monday was fixed as the day on which the office should be filled, and one week was allowed for every Senator to get in his place; and from the day on which the resolution was passed to the present time, there had been no attempt to depart from it. He would not repeat what his friends had said; but when the place became vacant by the death of the late Sergeant-at-Arms, they refused to fill it, although they were then in the majority. But what did they expect? Why, that no office would be filled under that rule of the Senate—especially at this Executive session, when there was no business for such an officer—before the second Monday of the next session of Congress, be it extra or otherwise. But while this was their expectation, and all the advantages would result entirely to the benefit of gentlemen on the other side—for it was amongst their friends that the office would go—while it was their expectation that the vacancy would not be filled until the regular time of filling it, they found notice given on Saturday to proceed on Monday to an election. The day on which the notice was given, too, was well selected; it was a day on which it was almost impossible that any large portion of the community that might be interested in this appointment could become acquainted with the facts, for it was a day of storm and tempest, on which but few human beings could move about. They might, in fact, say that, for all purposes of publicity to the community, no notice had been given at all; for the resolution was laid on the table on Saturday, when the weather prevented publicity, and yet they were then called upon to go into an election and violate every reason and every consideration which had heretofore governed the conduct of the Senate. What had this officer to do, be he whom he may? for he (Mr. BENTON) presumed he was fixed upon—he supposed he was already elected, so far as the substance of the thing was concerned—the form only being wanted. What had he to do from this time to the second Monday of the next session, be it regular or extra? He had nothing to do, but, like the members of the Senate, go off to a neighboring State if he lived there, or to attend to his own business if he lived in this city. He had nothing to do from this time until the day for regularly making the election under the rules of the House. Why then this haste—this hot haste? Why precipitate an election under such considerations? Why violate the rules of the Senate, which had been adopted for their Government under such circumstances? The amount was small, but it was something; and as the Senator from Arkansas had said, whether small or great, it was precisely the same in principle. When they discovered that some officers of the Government, such as marshals and district attorneys had received in fees, as much as $20,000, $30,000, and, in some cases, $50,000, which was never intended under our form of Government, and they wished to place some limitation upon it, the gentlemen on the other side resisted; and, in this case, they also opposed any attempt to limit expenditures. So that the Senator from Arkansas was right; be it large or small, the resistance was the same. Certainly they (the Democratic party) had acted on a principle which was a fair one—that of not filling an office when it was not needed, and when it would give an undue advantage to persons on the ground, to the disadvantage of those who were distant. He thought they ought to postpone this resolution to the second Monday of the first session of the 27th Congress; he would make that motion, and on this question he called for the ayes and noes.

The ayes and noes were ordered.

Mr MANGUM read several extracts from the journal of the Senate, to show that at the extra session of 1837, the Senate had elected their Sergeant-at-Arms and other officers.

Mr. KING said that what the Senator called an extra session, was the first session of the Twenty-fifth Congress; and the action of the Senate in that instance was right and proper, and strictly in accordance with what the Democratic Senators now contended for.

The question was then taken on Mr. BENTON'S motion to postpone the consideration of the resolution, and it was decided in the negative—ayes 20, noes 26, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Ala., Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Nicholson, Sevier, Smith, of Conn., Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, Williams, Wright, Woodbury, and Young—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Berrien, Bates, Bayard, Clay, of Ky., Choate, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Kerr, Morehead, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Porter, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith, of Ind., Southard, Tallmadge, White, and Woodbridge—26.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT said he had not intended to say a word on this subject, but after what had passed he desired now to say a very few words. He came into this body in 1833, in a most exciting session of the Senate, and of the other branch of Congress, as many honorable Senators would well recollect; he believed on paper they had then a Sergeant-at-Arms, but he (Mr. WRIGHT) never saw him, and he did not believe the man was ever in the Capitol, from the day on which he (Mr. WRIGHT) took his seat until the close of that session of Congress. The duties were discharged by the Doorkeeper, precisely as they have been since the death of the late Sergeant-at-Arms. That too was the year of the Presidential election, and an Executive session was held immediately after, but he heard nothing of an election of officers of the Senate of any kind; but the Doorkeeper acted on, and at the commencement of the next annual session of Congress the elections were made; his understanding was, that the Sergeant-at-Arms had either died or resigned. He mentioned these facts, for he was a stranger to this body at that time, and he believed he had never seen an occasion in the Senate when he supposed there was greater necessity for all its officers. Gentlemen would bear him out when he said that, day by day, during the short session, their galleries and lobbies, and not the recesses merely, but the floor itself, was filled with persons who were not members of the Senate, but who had admission under the rule. It was the most exciting period in the history of the legislation of this country that he had ever known; but no claim was then set up of any necessity for the appointment of these officers at the close of the session, and especially at the close of a short Executive session. He spoke in the hearing of gentlemen who were members of the body at that time, and who, if he stated the facts incorrectly, could correct him; he did not design to do so. Well, what was the authority here introduced to justify this proceeding? It was, that on the new Congress being convened in September of 1837, the two Houses proceeded to elect their officers. Now, as he had already admitted, a few days ago, no matter when the two Houses shall be convened for the 27th Congress, then they should elect their officers for the Congress, but not at this Executive session of the Senate. The Senate, for weeks, had sat there quietly with no Sergeant-at-Arms, or with one who did not, perhaps, during the whole session, appear in the Senate, or not more than once or twice; and if the Senate could go on with its business at an exciting period without that officer, could there be any necessity for him now, when they were convened as an Executive session? But perhaps he was departing from the point, for he had heard no argument in support of the resolution, only that they should put a man at school to qualify him for the office in time to come. Well, if that were a necessary duty, that office was to be much more complicated than he had yet known it.

By their permanent rules they were even without authority to provide for contingencies by death or other vacancies, but they had settled the fact that the election shall be made—when? A month, two months, three months, in advance of the time when the officer should enter on his duties? No: but he believed one week after the Congress had assembled for which the officer was to be elected. He had never known any such construction of the rules of the Senate, nor was such an idea ever before entertained, that they should put a man through drill and exercise to make him competent to perform these duties.

The question was then taken, and the resolution was adopted, ayes 26 noes 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Berrien, Bates, Bayard, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Choate, Dixon, Evans, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Merrick, Miller, Morehead, Porter, Preston, Rives, Simmons, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Tallmadge, Woodbridge, and White—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Nicholson, Sevier, Smith of Connecticut, Surgeon, Tappan, Walker, Wright, Woodbury, and Young—19.

Mr. MERRICK then rose and said: Mr. President, I nominate Edward Dyer of Washington city.

Mr. KING. That is unusual; it is out of order; we make no nominations here.

Several other Senators made similar observations.

Mr. MERRICK. I was not aware of that.

The Senate then proceeded to ballot for a Sergeant-at-Arms, and the VICE PRESIDENT announced the result as follows:

Whole number of votes . . . 46

Of which Edward Dyer received . . . 26

Mr. Dyer was accordingly declared duly elected, and took the oath of office.

SPEECH OF MR. ADAMS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In the House of Representatives, February 4, 1841—On the bill providing for an issue of Treasury Notes.

The House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. CASEY of Illinois in the chair,) on the bill providing for an issue of Treasury notes; and the question being on the motion to strike out the enacting clause—

Mr. ADAMS rose and said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Like the gentleman who has just taken his seat, (Mr. J. GARLAND,) it had not been my intention to address the committee upon the bill now before it. It is not now my intention to enter into all the topics of controversy which have been introduced; it is my intention to make only a few remarks.

In the first place, in reference to this bill: I was prepared to vote in favor of it on the first day on which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means introduced it. I have been prepared to vote for it from that day to this—and to vote for it with as much expedition as is generally bestowed upon a bill making appropriations for the expenditures of this and the other House of Congress—that usually takes about half an hour in each House. This is a bill to raise five millions of dollars for the purpose of carrying into effect the engagements of the nation—to pay the debts of the nation—to pay every man or woman that may have a just claim upon the Treasury—and, in voting for it, I do not at all consider myself as voting for a grant of money to the Administration. To me it is a matter of perfect indifference, so far as regards this bill, who or what the Administration may be. I vote to give the nation the means to pay its own debts; and that, too, without stopping to inquire how the Treasury has come to be in such a condition as to require the passage of this bill and of other bills of the same kind for which I have voted constantly. I consider myself as voting to enable the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury to boast, as they have done, that every demand upon the nation has been fully and faithfully met. The President of the United States has made that boast. Whether it has been correctly made or not, is a question into which I will not enter now; but I say, if this has been done, it has been done by donations of money from this and the other House of Congress; that it has been done by donations which I, for one, believe might not have been needed. I say, therefore, that I have been, and now am, ready to vote for this bill, and that I shall vote for it whenever the question comes up. I should probably have preferred the proposition suggested by my friend [Mr. BARNARD] as to the form of raising this money, and most especially as to the means of meeting the engagements which it contracts—that is to say, that the means for the payment of these five millions of dollars, interest and principal, should be provided at the same time. That has been the great defect in all the Treasury note bills for the last three or four years; they have all gone to increase the deficiency in the Treasury; they have all gone to add to your burdens; and they have postponed to a future day the means of paying that very debt—not only the debt contracted by the notes themselves, but the debt which occasioned the necessity of those notes. There is a principle of political economy from which I, for one, would never depart with my own consent; I never would borrow in any form—be it in the form of shinplasters, Treasury notes, bonds, scrip, or whatever you may call it—I never would borrow a dollar without providing the means of paying it. And that is the fundamental principle on which the funding system of Alexander Hamilton was founded at the commencement of the existence of this Government. He laid down, in his report to Congress, the principle—and that principle is the only one which I conceive to be vital and essential to the justice of any thing like borrowing money by Governments—that when you borrow money you shall provide the means of discharging the obligation—principal and interest. I say, therefore, that I should have preferred, and should now prefer, if such were the opinion of this and the other House of Congress, to have made a public loan in a regular form, in which ample provision should be made for the payment, not only of the Treasury notes themselves, but of all those arrears and deficiencies which they were intended nominally to supply. This must be done hereafter.

Now, probably it would not have been necessary for me to have said another syllable, if topics had not been introduced into this discussion upon which I do feel myself obliged to say a few words. We are about the commencement of a new Administration. A new President is on his way to this city; and it is expected that, within the space of one short month, he will assume the position of the Chief Magistrate of the country. From that circumstance—that is to say, from the introduction of a new President in the place of the one who now fills the Executive chair—I, for myself, have drawn one conclusion. I do not know that it is correct—probably it may not meet the views of a very large portion of this House; but I have drawn the conclusion which I believe the people of the United States have drawn—that is, that the system of administration pursued by the present existing President is not satisfactory to the people of this nation, and that they choose to have a change. I will not enter into the inquiry now whether that conclusion is just or not. I think, however, that the people have come to it, and I concur with them in it. I do not think that the political administration of the present incumbent is profitable and useful to the people of this nation, but that a change was a desirable thing. And there I stop—for my part, there I stop. The people have said who shall be at the head of the Administration that is to take the place of the present one. I acquiesce in their decision. But, sir, I do not know—I am not in the confidence of the head of the new Administration—I do not know what his system of administration will be. A system of administration is, of course, a very comprehensive and complicated thing. It involves all the subjects which have been brought into discussion on this bill, and which, in my opinion, were not proper to be brought into the consideration of this bill. Nay, it involves more; it involves not only the subject of the finances—it involves not only the condition of the Treasury, but of our foreign affairs—of our internal affairs—of the relations between the United States and the several States—of our relations with the Indians—of the public lands—in short, of every thing that is connected with the transaction of the public affairs of the nation. All of them are parts of one system; and almost all of them, if not all, will be brought up for consideration here. I say this discussion is premature—that the proper time for it has not yet come. You are discussing here what shall be done—whether we are to have an extra session—what shall be done with the public lands—what shall be done with the State debts—what shall be done with State rights—what shall be done as to a National Bank; and yet you do not know what is the opinion of the President elect of the United States, who is, on the 4th of March, to take the Executive chair. I find in a little book here—for which I have great respect, as I presume the greater portion of the members of this House have—(the Constitution of the United States, which defines the powers and prescribes the duties of the President of the United States)—I say I find it is declared that “he (the President) shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them,” &c. What does this say? Why, making the application to the circumstances of the present time, it says that when General Harrison shall be inaugurated in that chair, or on the steps of the Capitol, or wherever it may be, that then he, he shall determine, amongst other things, whether a necessity for an extra session of Congress exists; and if he finds that necessity, he will say so, and act accordingly. It will be his duty to do this; and if he does not find such necessity existing, he will say so. What, then, is the use of our debating here week after week whether it is or is not necessary to have an extra session? I mention this merely as one example. I might go through the whole of those topics which have been agitated here for the last three or four weeks, and say the very same thing in regard to all of them. We are discussing things, as to which, in the first place, we ought to know what are the views of this gentleman who is coming here to take possession of the powers thus conferred upon him. We have been doing in this House what has been doing very much out of it, I believe, too; for we are all in public and in private every much addicted to what is called settling the affairs of the nation; we have been doing that. We have been making cabinets—we have all turned cabinet-makers; and I should have hoped that, amidst this immense mass of cabinet-makers, we might have found a little more charity and mercy towards manufactures than we have found. I say we are all cabinet-makers. Well, we ask one another every day, when we get up in a morning and go to breakfast, “Who is to be Secretary of State?” “Who Secretary of the Treasury?” “Who Postmaster General?” “Who Secretary of the Navy?” and so on. One says, one day, “It is this man;” another says, “No, it is another man,” and so on. Among other things which I have seen in the newspapers, after the disposition of certain appointments to certain gentlemen, and the assignment of certain positions to individuals who are not to have appointments, was the statement that my friend from Virginia [Mr. Wise] was to be the leader of this House. Well, I thought that as I have been and shall be, so long as I remain here, my own man, “and no other man’s,” I thought that I should be as glad to array himself under the lead of the gentleman from Virginia as under that of any other member of this House, most especially from what I have seen of his political character for a year or two past, were it not for a very important and very vital thing to my policy, in which I stand at the opposite pole from that gentleman. But, altogether, he has been so chivalric, he has been so effective, so efficient, in exposing the abuses of the present Administration, at great hazard to himself, and, as I thought, laying in for himself a great stock of credit with the people of this country, that I have overlooked and forgiven many things in which he and I are altogether at variance, and in reference to which I expect that I always shall be at variance with that gentleman.

When he first reappeared in this House after an absence of considerable tribulation to himself, and which no one regretted more than I did, I thought the gentleman assumed, very distinctly, very unequivocally, the position which the newspapers I have referred to had given to him—as the leader of this House. He assumed the tone and the manner belonging to that station, and I noticed it at the time in the few remarks that took place between him and myself.

Mr. WISE here rose, interrupting Mr. ADAMS, and said, (as the Reporter understood, though it was with difficulty he heard, owing to the fact that Mr. W. turned to the other side of the House,) the gentleman has asserted not that he inferred that I assumed any such thing, not that it was his opinion, but I understand him to have asserted the fact, and I wish him now to say whether he does assert the fact that I assumed that tone?

Mr. ADAMS. I am glad to repeat the assertion I made when the gentleman put the question to me on a former occasion. I did not say, nor intend to say, that he had announced himself, as from his installation, as the leader of this House. What I said, and what I now say is, that the tone and manner with which he came into this House after his absence, were such as to assume ipso facto, whether recognised by this House or not, the position of leader. That is what I said, and that is what I repeat. And in saying this, I must return my sincere and cordial thanks to the gentleman for having said, on that occasion, that he should be extremely averse and unwilling to quarrel with me. Those, I believe, were his words; I do not misrepresent them.

Mr. WISE here called upon Mr. ADAMS to designate the time at which this occurrence had taken place.

Mr. ADAMS. It was at the re-appearance of the gentleman in his seat here after a long absence occasioned by sickness. I believe the committee have a pretty distinct recollection of what took place then, if the gentleman has not.

Mr. WISE was understood to say that he had no knowledge of any re-appearance, or of any era which could be exactly characterized by the term re-appearance.

Mr. ADAMS. I will not take issue with the gentleman on that point. The time when I first noticed the gentleman's assumption in this House—as I consider it, not as he announced it—of the position of leader which the newspapers had assigned to him, is not many days past; it is within the recollection of all the members now present and then present. It was not at the last session of Congress; and if he is in any manner hurt at the use of the term “re-appearance,” I will retract it—and I will say it was his appearance on that particular occasion. The gentleman, very much to my regret, and to that, I presume, of a majority of this House, and I trust I may say of the people of this nation, was for a considerable portion of the last session of Congress and of the present absent from his seat. I regretted it; not only from the circumstance itself and from my friendly feelings towards him, but from the cause, which I understood to be very severe indisposition. However, as I have said, if the word “re-appearance” has any thing in it offensive to him, I withdraw it. I simply refer to a particular time which is within the recollection of every member now here and who was here then. And it was at the same time when the gentleman, amongst other things, said that General Harrison was under more obligation to him than he was to General Harrison. I considered that as of itself not only assuming the position of leader here, but asserting that there was a balance of accounts due between him and General Harrison which the gentleman expected to receive at some time or other. That was the time to which I refer.

Mr. WISE here intimated that he did not precisely hear what the gentleman had said.

Mr. ADAMS. What I understood the gentleman to say was, that General Harrison owed more to him than he owed to General Harrison; and I say I inferred from that there was a balance of accounts to be settled between them, which the gentleman expected to receive in due time. It was also at the time when he made some remarks on the subject of duelling, which, not to misrepresent him, I will read from a report of the remarks which I found in the National Intelligencer. If they are not correctly reported, I desire the gentleman to say so.

Mr. A. then sent to the Clerk's table the following report, taken from the "National Intelligencer," and which was read by the Clerk:

Mr. Wise then rose and said: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I ever will give way, while I have the floor, to another scene of this sort. The anti-duelling bill is producing its bitter fruits—it is making this House a mere "bear-garden." We have an example in the present instance. Here, with permission of the Chair and committee, and without a call to order from any body, we see and hear one member [Mr. JOHNSON] say to another [Mr. DUNCAN] "that he had been branded as a coward on this floor;" the other says back that "he is a liar!" And, sir, there the matter will stop—there will be no fight.

Mr. WISE. That is a correct report.

Mr. ADAMS. It is a correct report? Well, sir, It was suggested to me by a friend of mine that it was not correct, although my own recollection inclined me to the belief that it was. But, however that may be, the gentleman now vouches that it is a correct report. I was going to say that I return him my cordial thanks for the assertion which he made to me, and which I do not expect he is about to recall, (though, if he does, of course I must submit;) I say that assertion was heard by me with great pleasure. He said (or words to that effect) that there was no member here with whom he would be more unwilling to quarrel than with me; and he conveyed this sentiment in complimentary expressions with regard to my age and experience, and those things which, he said, entitled me to his general respect. I thank him cordially for all this, and I am glad to have an opportunity of assuring him that there is no gentleman in this House with whom I would be more unwilling to quarrel than with him. And I do not intend ever to quarrel with him, whether he thinks proper to quarrel with me or not. If he intends to do so, that is his concern. Therefore, I do not mean to do him injustice in any shape or form; and I declare that it is with extreme pain and reluctance that I have said what I have said, and shall say what I still have to say in relation to that gentleman.

He has acknowledged the report of his remarks on the subject of duelling to be just and true. And what is the inference I draw? He gave an account of a very unpleasant scene between two members on this floor—a painful scene, I suppose, to him and me—much so to me—and his lamentation in consequence of it was, that "there would be no fight." That was one of the "bitter fruits," he said, "of the duelling law."

Mr. WISE here rose and said that he took this personal reference as an act of great injustice. The language he had used was incapable of such a construction by any torture, of malice itself, even from a foe—much less from a gentleman with whom he desired, with whom it was his pride, to be friendly. I say (continued Mr. W.) that such a construction cannot be justly put upon my language; it is not the meaning I intended. And the gentleman, whilst in the very act of disclaiming any intention to do me injustice, is doing me most violent injustice—an injustice which he is obliged to go out of his way to do—an injustice which cannot possibly be founded in a good or friendly motive of any description. I say so with pain and regret.

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman has given notice in the newspapers to his constituents that they must not form their opinion about his course until he had written out his remarks. He is going to write them out. I hope, when he does so, he will write that passage as a part of his speech; and then, when it goes forth to the whole people of this nation—duellists and non-duellists—I am willing to leave the construction of what the gentleman at that time said, to their unbiased, unsophisticated sense, and to stand at issue with him on the point. Let him reply as he pleases—I say it is the fair construction of his language, that his lamentation was for the loss of the fight that might have ensued if the thing had occurred before the passage of the duelling law.

Mr. WISE called Mr. ADAMS to order—insisting that no more violent insult could be offered to him, as a gentleman, than this.

[The confusion in the Hall was here so great that the reporter could not hear more than the general purport of what was said; but he understood Mr. WISE as saying]—

That if the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts (and he, Mr. W. used this term in no cant seriousness, but in that sincere respect which age should always command) was permitted to pursue this course of personal insult, after the disclaimer he (Mr. W.) had made that such was not his meaning, he would be compelled to use language to that gentleman which was not becoming the order of this House, and which he would not use if he could avoid it.

The CHAIRMAN said he did not understand the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) as making personal allusions to the gentleman from Virginia. (Mr. WISE.)

Mr. WISE. I understand the gentleman as repeating as fact that which is unfounded and unjust—I apply this language not personally, but merely as repelling the imputation upon me—not to use stronger language—namely, that I meant to encourage a fight, or lamented that there would not be one. I denied it, and yet, in the face of that denial, the gentleman persists in adding insult to injury—injury, in the first place, in attributing to me a meaning which I never had, and insult in repeating it after I had disclaimed it. I call the gentleman to order, and ask for the decision of the Chair.—[The closing sentence was not heard distinctly by the Reporter—but it was understood to be, that if the committee permitted the gentleman to proceed, and he persisted in this course of remark, he (Mr. W.) would hurl an insult at him which, if he were not a venerable gentleman, would have its meaning.]

The CHAIRMAN said: The Chair does not understand the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. ADAMS) as making a personal reference to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WISE,) but simply as giving his views of certain remarks made by the latter gentleman.

Mr. WISE. And the gentleman from Massachusetts is reiterating the charge that such was my meaning, after I had disclaimed it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Massachusetts as saying that such was the meaning of the gentleman from Virginia, but only as asserting that such was the construction which he put upon the language.

Mr. WISE was understood to say (though very doubtfully heard) that he lamented that this House having, by its law, stopped duelling, did not at the same time take upon itself to provide a remedy by putting a stop to insult. He would not appeal from the decision of the Chair. The gentleman from Massachusetts might take his own track—he (Mr. W.) would take his.

Mr. ADAMS. I am glad that the gentleman is willing I should take my own track; and if he will do me the favor not to make three speeches to my one, he will confer an additional obligation upon me. He is perfectly at liberty to make what reply he chooses. He may, if he likes, insult me, as he threatens that he will. I have said I shall not quarrel with him. What did he mean by saying that these were the bitter fruits of the duelling law? Was it such a scene as that which happened in the House that called forth this expression? No; such scenes have happened twenty times before, when there was no duelling law. The object of the duelling law was to prevent such scenes—and, although it has not entirely done so, yet I thank God that it has produced a good effect; for the gentleman himself foresaw that there would be no fight. After what has taken place in this House already, it would have been a deep aggravation to my feelings if there had been a fight, and these gentlemen [Messrs. W. C. JOHNSON and DUNCAN] had hurt each other. And that which is to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] the bitter fruit of that law is to me its most glorious fruit—for it has prevented the fight which frequently followed similar collisions between members of this House. The gentleman was all ready to go out on a mere excuse for doing so—it would have given him great delight if some more Cilley scenes had been enacted in this House.

Mr. JENIFER here rose and called Mr. ADAMS to order—at the same time appealing to the Chair to enforce the rules of the House.

Mr. ANDREWS rose for a similar purpose.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, said something, which, amidst the great uproar, the Reporter could neither hear nor understand.

Mr. WISE hoped the gentleman from Massachusetts would not be stopped. Let him go on; let him throw out his venom—bitter, malicious, deadly as it was. If he (Mr. W.) would have an opportunity to reply, that was all he asked.

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly the gentleman shall have an opportunity to reply to his heart's content. I stand upon ground which I do not mean to concede to him. I maintain that the duelling law is one of the best laws that ever was enacted.

Mr. ANDREWS here rose and inquired of the Chair what was the question. He rose to a point of order, and he should insist upon a decision.

The CHAIRMAN said the debate had taken an exceedingly wide range; and that the Chairman could not stop it now, so long as personalities were avoided.

Mr. ANDREWS. Does the Chair decide that it is in order for the gentleman from Massachusetts to proceed in the manner in which he is now addressing the committee?

The CHAIRMAN said that, whilst the gentleman from Massachusetts avoided personalities, the Chair, looking to the range of debate which had hitherto been allowed, could not arrest him.

Mr. ANDREWS appealed from the decision of the Chair; but, almost in the same instant, withdrew the appeal.

Mr. ADAMS proceeded. The subject I have now touched upon is not so wide and remote from the subject before the committee as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ANDREWS] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] appear to suppose. I am going to give to this committee, if I may be permitted, my reasons for not being willing to put myself under the lead of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] as the representative of the next Administration in this House; and among those reasons is his deliberate and oft-repeated opinion that the practice of duelling ought to be allowed in this District between the members of this House, and that the duelling law, in making which I take to myself the pride of having had an effective instrumentality, and which I am bound not to see treated with contempt, has been productive of bitter fruits. And this is not the first time that the gentleman has uttered such sentiments; he has repeatedly before expressed his opinion about the bitterness of the fruits of that law. I say, therefore, that I will not put myself under the lead of any professed duellist, whether he thirsts for blood or not, whether, after having shot a man through the heart, he can go on and shed tears for his fate.

Mr. CHINN here rose to a point of order—remarking that the committee might assure itself he would not withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] will not proceed further in this strain of remark.

Mr. W. COST JOHNSON wished, he said, to gain the floor for a moment, if he could.

Mr. ADAMS. There is another duellist.

Mr. JOHNSON proceeded. He said that, as his name had been read aloud from the Clerk's table, he wished to make one remark. He made it lest this discussion should go further, and take a latitude which he should himself grieve to be indulged. I shall only say, that I presume the member to whom I once made allusion here [Mr. DUNCAN] has been satisfied with his position. I am satisfied with mine. I shall not refer to him again; and I presume we both consider the account settled and balanced. But I will say that, saving and excepting that individual, to whom I disclaim making any reference now or hereafter, and saving and excepting the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, if any man, no matter of what party or politics he may be, makes one single indelicate allusion to me, whether I will or will not pursue this course or that, he will see what will be the consequence—he will see whether there will be a fight or not. I give this as a fair monition to this House.

Mr. ADAMS. He will see what he will see.

In what I have said, and in what I am yet about to say, if in order, if the committee, and especially the duellists of this committee, will permit me, my object is to assign reasons why I will never put myself under the lead of a professed duellist in this House; and, for that purpose, I must remark upon the duelling law, being the thing which prohibits that practice.

Mr. WISE again rose to order.

Mr. ADAMS. Let me proceed; you may have a week to answer me, if you choose.

Mr. WISE. I may not have an opportunity. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts intimate that I am a professed duellist because I might, under certain circumstances, fight? I never shot a man through the heart, nor has any man been laid in the grave by my bullet. I have uniformly denounced the practice. I abhor it. I have avoided it, and, if possible, I will avoid it to the day of my death. I know of no character more to be abhorred than that of a professed duellist. I have been engaged in duels, and, if such cases should again occur, I might do as I have done before. But if the gentleman means to designate me as such a character, I will ask him to lay his hand upon the time or occasion when I ever professed more than this—that I, for one, like my friend from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] would not be bound by that act, if such a case should again occur; and that, so far as I am a duellist, the act is mere brutum fulmen; it has no force upon me. And all I have said of it was, that, without the power to prevent a fight, it gave all the encouragement to a quarrel.

Mr. ADAMS. I am not willing to be led away by false issues. I did not charge the gentleman with being a duellist. He knows what his professions are, and he knows what his practice is. I did not charge him, I say, with being a duellist. I said that, as a public man, I never would put myself under the lead of a professed duellist; and I repeat it. The gentleman now declares in the face of the committee, that he abhors the practice of duelling. I am extremely happy to hear it, and I hope that his practice from this day to the end of his life will confirm that profession.

Now, in regard to the practice of duelling. I do understand the gentleman as maintaining that duelling between members of this House, for matters passing within this House, is a practice that ought not to be suppressed. I understand him to maintain that doctrine now. I maintain the contrary; and I maintain it for the independence of this House—for my own independence—for the independence of those with whom I act—for the independence of the members from the Northern section of this country, who not only abhor duelling in theory but in practice, and in consequence of which members from other sections are perpetually insulting them on this floor, under the impression that the insult will not be resented.

Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina rose and called Mr. ADAMS to order.

The CHAIRMAN said something, of which the Reporter could not hear a word; (the House at this moment being in a state of tempestuous uproar.)

When the voice of Mr. ADAMS again caught the ear of the Reporter, Mr. A. was proceeding as follows:

Would you smother discussion on the duelling law? There is not a point in the affairs of this nation more important than this very practice of duelling—considered as a point of honor in one part of the Union, and a point of infamy in another part of the Union—with its consequences. I say there is no more important subject that can go forth, North and South, East and West; and I, therefore, take my issue upon it. I have come here determined to do so between the different portions of this House, and in order to see whether this practice is to be continued; whether the members from that section of the Union whose principles are against duelling are to be insulted upon every topic of discussion, because it is supposed that the insult will not be resented, and that "there will be no fight." As to the gentleman's theory or practice, I will say no more about it. I ask the Clerk to read the first section of a law of one of the States of this Union; and I suppose, on hearing it read, the gentleman will know to what State I refer.

The Clerk then read as follows:

AN ACT to suppress duelling.—Passed January 26, 1810.

Whereas experience has evinced that the existing remedy for the suppression of the barbarous custom of duelling is inadequate to the purpose; and the progress and consequences of the evil have become so destructive as to require an effort, on the part of the Legislature, to arrest a vice the result of ignorance and barbarism, justified neither by the precepts of morality nor by the dictates of reason. For the remedy whereof—

1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly, That any person who shall hereafter wilfully and maliciously, or by previous agreement, fight a duel or single combat with any engine, instrument, or weapon, the probable consequence of which might be the death of either party, and, in so doing, shall kill his antagonist or any other person or persons, or inflict such wound as that the person injured shall die thereof within three months thereafter, such offender, his aiders, abettors, and counsellors, being thereof duly convicted, shall be guilty of murder, and suffer death by being hanged by the neck; any law, custom, or usage of this Commonwealth to the contrary notwithstanding.

Now, said Mr. A. read the second section.

And the Clerk read as follows:

2. And be it further enacted, That, if any person whatsoever shall challenge another to fight a duel with any weapon, or in any manner whatsoever, the probable issue of which may or might result in the death of the challenger or challenged; or if any person shall accept a challenge or fight a duel with any weapon, or in any way whatsoever, the probable issue of which may or might terminate in the death of the challenger or challenged, such person shall be incapable of holding or being elected to any post of profit, trust, or emolument, civil or military, under the Government of this Commonwealth.

3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, every person who shall be appointed to any office or place, civil or military, under this Commonwealth, shall, in addition to the oath now prescribed by law, take the following oath: I do solemnly swear or affirm (as the case may be) that I have not been engaged in a duel, by sending or accepting a challenge to fight a duel, or by fighting a duel, or in any other manner, in violation of the act entitled An act to suppress duelling, since the passage of that act, nor will I be so concerned, directly or indirectly, in such duel, during my continuance in office. So help me God.—Virginia Revised Code, l, 553.

Mr. A. continued. There are also other sections, which it is not necessary to read. The gentleman can probably tell this House what State has such a law, and can tell us what are the bitter fruits of that law.

I was going on to say that the reason why I brought this subject into the discussion is, because it is most intimately connected with all the transactions in this House and this nation—and because I think it is time to settle this question between the duellists and non-duellists, whoever they may be. I say that, in consequence of my principles and what I believe to be the principles of a very large portion of the people in that part of the country from which I come, I will not, as regards the approaching Administration, put myself under the lead of any man who considers the duelling law in this District as having borne any bitter fruits whatever. It may not, indeed, be sufficiently potent in its operation to prevent the thirst for blood which follows offensive words; but I believe it has prevented and will prevent any such occurrences as we have witnessed here. But as it bears upon the affairs of the nation, I am not willing to sit any longer here and see other members from my own section of country, or those who may be my successors here, made subject to any such law as the law of the duellist; I am unwilling that they should not have full freedom of speech in this House on all occasions—as much so as the primest duellist in the land. I do not want to hear perpetual intimations when a man from one part of the country means to insult another coming from other parts of the country—as, "I am ready to answer here or elsewhere"—and, "the gentleman knows where I am to be found;" saying, as the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. W. C. JOHNSON) did just now, that he would call to account any person who dared make allusion to what had taken place between him and another member of this House. I do not intend to hear that, any more for myself or others, if I can help it. Therefore, I move to bring the matter up for full discussion here—whether we are to be twitted and taunted with remarks, that a man is ready to meet us here or elsewhere. It goes to the independence of this House; it goes to the independence of every individual member of this House; it goes to the right of speech and the freedom of debate in this House; and I felt myself bound to bear my testimony in the most decided manner against the practice of duelling, or any thing in the shape of even a virtual challenge taking place in this House, now and forever. If the committee thinks proper to put me down, after a debate of three weeks involving almost every topic under the sun, and in which not one man has been called to order, I must submit. It shall go out to the country, and I am willing that the sober sentiment of the whole nation shall be my final judge on this subject. I take issue now with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] on that law, and on the practice of duelling. Let him say what he thinks proper on the subject: let it go forth to the nation: let it go forth to his constituents. He once, in a public address to his constituents, used as a sort of apology, that his constituents demanded—that they insisted—he should fight whenever his honor was offended. Probably I misapprehended him: if so, he can correct me. Well—if his constituents call upon him to fight a duel, mine insist upon me that I shall not; and so do the constituents of other members on this floor, from the same section of country.

Mr. WISE here desired to explain, in justice to his constituents and himself, that he had never made such a declaration as that his constituents demanded he should fight. He had never said so. He was not responsible for his principles as to duelling, except as between himself and his God. But from some misrepresentations which had been made against him on a certain occasion, he had, in justice to himself, told his constituents that he expected to be tried by them, by their public sentiment. He repeated, he had never said that his constituents ever demanded of him to fight. There was more than a political relation between himself and his constituents—a relation of personal affection—and he had not a friend among the thousands he could number, in his district, who did not pray for him and to him continually, to avoid fighting. Whenever he did, from necessity, fight, he fought against their will. They knew it, and he knew it; and he must say that he never fought but against his own will also.

Mr. ADAMS. What the gentleman does according to his own will, or against it, is no matter of discussion here or with me. I do not mean to misrepresent him in this case. I did understand that in a publication of his, he apologized for having been concerned in an affair of this kind, on the ground of public sentiment amongst his constituents, of a necessity imposed upon him by their opinions; thereby intimating, as I understood it, that a majority of his constituents, or probably all of them, thought as he did on that point. I am willing that his explanation should go out. I understand him now to say that he was never engaged in such an affair except against his own will.

And here I take issue with the gentleman on a principle of fact, and I say I hope it is not to be the rule of this House, nor ever admitted, that a solemn law, passed by both Houses of Congress and approved by the President, is to be spoken of with contempt and derision, because it restrains duelling. The criminal law of his own State—that cannot affect him. He bids defiance to it, as he does to the law of this District. He must adhere to his principles. They are between him and his God, he said; but I tell him that I will never put myself under the lead of a man who professes any such principles one way or another. There is a fundamental objection to it, because (this is the inference I draw, he may disclaim it if he pleases) the same principle is to be used as an instrument for political purposes in this House—the principle of duelling upon necessity or public sentiment, that is to be carried into effect in this House—that is to say, by brow-beating gentlemen who are known to maintain another principle. But, Mr. Chairman, I will say no more on that subject.

Another reason why I am not disposed to follow the lead of the gentleman from Virginia is, that about the same time that, in the speech relating to the duelling law, he unfolded the standard of his allegiance, he unfolded also what I would call the overseer's standard. The word "overseer" has a technical meaning in a certain portion of this country which I suppose will be understood by all. The overseer standard denotes the exclusion of nine petitions out of every ten that come from States lying north of Mason and Dixon's line, and the reception of all petitions coming from the South of Mason and Dixon's line. That is now the law of this Congress. If it was couched in such language—if, instead of the words in which the twenty-first rule of this House is expressed, it was in the words following: "Resolved, That all petitions from the South of Mason and Dixon's line shall be received, and considered, and treated with respect, and that, of all petitions from the North of Mason and Dixon's line, not exceeding one in ten shall be received and considered by this House"—if, I say, it was in these words, the exact operation of the rule would be expressed. I speak of matters of fact. I have now in my possession one hundred petitions from the north of Mason and Dixon's line, and of these not one in ten will be received. And yet whoever heard of a petition from the south of Mason and Dixon's line being refused? There has not been a single instance of the kind. That is the operation of your rule as it now stands; and, exclusive, odious, and partial as it is, the gentleman now wants to extend it further. Under that rule, the Speaker (who has himself, supported by a majority of this House, extended it already far beyond what I believe it imported) has decided that if matter to be excluded under it is, in the same petition, connected with other matter not to be excluded, the petition shall be received for so much as does not fall within the rule. But the gentleman from Virginia is not satisfied with that. He is for excluding every thing that is tainted, according to his keen scent, with the offence for which other parts of the petition are to be excluded; if there is even a scintilla of any thing which he thinks tainted with Abolition, it is to be excluded. And if the House should think proper to confirm that view, instead of one petition out of ten from the north of Mason and Dixon's line being received, we shall have to be satisfied with the reception of one in twenty. Yes, sir, twenty to one! because the petitions come from the north of Mason and Dixon's line. That is what the gentleman is now struggling for, with the aid of his friend from Georgia, [Mr. BLACK,] who has appealed from the decision of the Speaker—and for whose anti-Abolitionism I give him the due credit—the geographical credit which belongs to him. Sir, this is the overseer's color. The standard which the gentleman has raised for the next Administration consists of three colors; the first, black—that is the overseer's color; the second is red—that is the duelling color; the third is the pale dirty white—the white of Nullification—the pallid, death-like color of Nullification. That is the three-colored standard which the gentleman from Virginia intends to hoist when he takes the lead of the affairs of the next Administration in this House. Now, I do not intend to place myself under that standard. I am here awaiting the installation of the next President of the United States. I am waiting to be informed what his system of Administration is to be. And I am waiting with the intention and determination to support that system, whatever it may be, to the utmost extent of my power, consistently with the duty which I owe to my country, to my constituents, to myself, and my God. The main principle upon which I intend to proceed is, the support of the coming Administration. It is the principle upon which I supported this and the last Administrations. I have supported both of them in this House, and on very critical occasions. Among the rest, on one measure which the gentleman disclaimed with horror. I mean in the controversy with South Carolina Nullification. I supported the Administration upon that point. I supported that Administration, at no small hazard to myself, upon another important occasion. I have supported this Administration upon points as to which I understand the gentleman from Virginia to have come out with a declaration of war; I mean upon what is called the bill for suppressing frauds on the revenue, and the bill which was annexed to it by the Senate, giving a legislative construction to some of the existing acts of Congress in relation to the revenue. I do not mean to enter into a discussion of those matters now. I had not the good fortune to hear the gentleman's observations on this subject, although I heard of them much. Probably, if I had not heard so much of them, I should not have risen now. But I think of them as of most other things I speak of now, as premature—not proper for discussion at this time. I do not mean to discuss them now, but I will say that, as to the bill for the suppression of frauds on the revenue, and the other bill which was annexed to it by the Senate at the last session, they were both Administration measures, and that, so far as I could in this House, or on the Committee on Manufactures, of which I was then and am now a member, I was for supporting both those measures, coming as they did from the Treasury Department, for the purpose of making some provision to meet those difficulties which were occurring from day to day. I say I supported them. I introduced the first of the two bills here to this House, and I carried it, not only against the opposition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] but against the opposition of many others, of whom he will not consider it a disparagement to say that their opinion is worthy of as much consideration as his. I say I carried the bill through this House by a large majority; it went to the Senate; and then the Senate thought proper to add to it another bill, which had been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means of this House, and not to the Committee on Manufactures; and when in the Senate, it was referred to the same committee of that body. They put the two bills together as one; and when the bill came back to this House in this form, I was willing to take it so, as also was the Committee on Manufactures, with its amendments and the additional bill to it. It was defeated, but not by the gentleman from Virginia. Mr. Robert Jaffray has told a story as to how it was defeated; whether true or false, I do not know. The gentleman before me [Mr. HOLMES] is one of those who opposed the bill with great ability—manfully, openly—but, so far as the matter went, unsuccessfully; and if gentlemen had not been called away from their Champagne dinner, Mr. Jaffray seems to think that the bill might still have passed. I regret that it did not pass, for this reason, that although I acted quo ad hoc as the friend of the Administration, yet I did so under the strong desire of the Administration that the bill should pass. If, therefore, there is a charge of a lurking tariff under it, not to me, but to the Administration it must be traced. I was willing to support the bill; I am willing to do so now. But the Committee on Manufactures have not reported it at the present session, because they thought the discussion of it premature; because the cry of tariff, tariff, might be raised against it. But my opinion is, that, as to a tariff, as to any addition of duties now, it is incompetent, it is good for nothing; and when we are to have the battle about the tariff, I am willing to have it all at once. I do not want to have the discussion now upon trifling matters, about five cent pieces. Let us have the whole question at once; and I hope that my friends will be ready for it, if I am not here; for, at my time of life, I cannot answer for six months. I do not know, therefore, whether I shall be here then, or have any thing to say. But whatever I have to say in reply to the gentleman or any body else, I shall reserve until that time. I will not discuss the matter now. I will simply add that as to the question of duties upon silks and wines which has been discussed here with so much ferocity and with the loss of so much ammunition—to say nothing more—I know, as a member of the Committee on Manufactures, of only one single article to which that discussion can now refer—I speak of the bill reported from the Committee on Manufactures last year, at the solicitation of the Secretary of the Treasury, for increasing the tax upon silks. There is not a word about wines or linens, or any other articles brought in here. The Secretary of the Treasury himself, in his annual report of the last year, mentions those articles upon which duties might be laid to meet a deficiency in the Treasury, without affecting the compromise act; and it was in consequence of that recommendation that the bill was brought in by the Committee on Manufactures of this House. I have been willing to meet it here; but I do not feel at all concerned about it, because however anxious the present Administration were last summer to increase the revenue in order to meet its engagements, I think I can see that they care nothing about it now. They are willing to leave the matter to their successors; they do not want to put into the Treasury any more money than will enable them to pay off their obligations from this time to the third day of March. Therefore, not being desirous to fight the battles of constituents who do not choose to have their battles fought, I shall take no pains to bring before the House either of the bills referred to. But I am ready to vote upon them, if they should come up.

So in relation to an extra session. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] says he will vote for this bill; and one reason is, to prevent the necessity of an extra session. Why, sir, it seems to me that this is idle discussion here. It is not we who are to decide whether there shall be an extra session or not. Not at all—not at all. I presume the gentleman from Virginia knows that, in all probability, this bill will pass; that these five millions of dollars will be furnished. Money is all that is wanted at the Treasury until the third of March; and, as to an extra session, how can we determine whether it shall be or not? Why do we talk about it? It is for that man who is coming here to discharge those high duties to which the people of this country have called him—I say, it is for him to determine, upon a full view of all things, whether the necessity for an extra session exists or not. I do not want to forestall him—much less to dictate to him. I have no balance of accounts to settle with him. I owe him no obligation; he owes me none—certainly none that I shall ever remind him of in this House. But it is for him to determine; and I am willing to leave it to his unbiassed judgment to decide, upon his own view of the affairs of the nation, whether he will call Congress together or not. The responsibility is not upon us; it is sufficient for us to meet in our places here, if he should call us together.

And I take the same ground in relation to a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands—to the financial condition of the States of this Union—and to a National Bank. Sir, it appears to me that, when the President of the United States is installed, at which time this question of a National Bank must come before him, he will decide it with a view to all the interests of this country. How shall we decide here, if at all? We passed a resolution three or four years since, introduced by the then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means—a gentleman not now a member of this House, [Mr. Cambreleng]—declaring that there ought not to be a National Bank. How long that state of opinion may last I will not undertake to say. I do not know. But when the President of the United States recommends to Congress (if he should ever do so) the establishment of a National Bank, then, I think, will be the time for discussing the question, and not now.

So as to the State debts. It seems to me that it is hardly possible to get up here and speak on any subject whatever, but what some member rises from his seat with a cry of horror against the assumption of State debts; and many gentlemen have told you that one reason why they will vote against any distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands is, because there can be only one mode of enabling the States to pay their debts. Upon this subject of the assumption of State debts, there is much to be said, when the proper time comes. I think I have demonstrated in this House, on a recent occasion, that, under this outcry against the assumption of State debts, the Government of the United States has, de facto, assumed a very considerable amount of State debts; that it had been done by directing the Executive Departments to invest funds, not their own, but trust funds, which were in the hands of the nation—funds belonging to others—in State stocks.

I have, within the week, received a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he states that he is by law obliged to invest a certain sum of money now in the Treasury, in State stocks, unless Congress should adopt the resolution which I offered here against it. What did you do with that resolution? You passed the whole series over for one day; one of the resolutions declared that no money should be invested in State stocks. But no; the House would not allow the matter to be discussed at all; and, therefore, I have not been able to relieve the Secretary of the Treasury from the obligation to do that which the law requires of him: for the law is peremptory, and says that the Secretary shall invest the money. And yet I cannot get the action of this House on a resolution which would not only stop the assumption of State debts, but would prevent this great waste of public funds for the time to come.

But amongst other things connected with these very resolutions, what does the official journal, the organ of the present Administration, do? It comes out with a charge against me as an enemy to the rights of the States; and this, too, at a time when this feeling of horror against the assumption of State debts is prevailing here and elsewhere. Well, sir, I am not an enemy to the rights of the States. Let me say a few words on this matter. Many of the States of this Union are indebted in large sums of money, amounting to an aggregate of more than two hundred millions of dollars. This proceeding on the part of the States has been the consequence of your casting away your duty—to provide for the internal improvements of this country. It was the business of this nation, in this and the other hall, to pursue a system of internal improvements, and for the discharge of that duty, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands are continually furnishing means; and in the investment of those means in that way, would we have spent the money of the nation profitably, and would have improved and increased the value of that portion of the public domain which yet remains. It would have been the most economical manner of administering the affairs of this Government. It would have added ten dollars to the value of every acre of land remaining, for one spent in improving it. Now it is gone forever. There is nothing I regret more. But, in the mean time, the consequence of your casting out every idea of improving the face of the country forced the necessity of doing it upon the States. The States were compelled to take the matter up, and they did so. In the year 1817, when I returned from Europe, one of the first men I saw was De Witt Clinton, who, was then Governor of the State of New York, and was carrying on that great project of internal improvement which has immortalized his name. One of the first things he said to me was, "We hope we shall have the aid of the General Government." I replied, "If I have the power, you shall have aid with all my heart and soul." He sent commissioners here the very session that followed this interview. He had been here himself soliciting the aid of this Government in that great work, that operation of making Paradise to flourish in the wilds. But no, he could not be heard. The State of New York was thrown back upon her own resources; she was able to get along without your assistance, and, in consequence, she has contracted a debt of between eighteen and nineteen millions of dollars. I have demonstrated on a former occasion, that you have assumed half a million of debt of the State of Arkansas; and that, by the rule of proportions, New York was entitled to demand of you an investment of twenty millions of dollars; that being the proportion between the population of the State of Arkansas, as represented here, and the population of the State of New York. Pennsylvania, after being turned out of your doors, and being told that if she wanted any internal improvements, she must make them for herself; went to work and did so. Other States of the Union have done the same thing. And now, in the messages of the President of the United States, and in speeches made in both Houses of Congress, these States are daily reproached and insulted for increasing debts. To hear the way in which the States are spoken of here, one would suppose they were spendthrifts and beggars. They may, some of them, be insolvent. But I take the position which I am confident I could prove, if I had collected together all the documents and the evidence, that these $200,000,000 on the average have been wisely and economically expended, and that the benefit to the people of this nation from the expenditure of this money is greater than if it had not been expended at all. I assume as a general principle, which I think can be demonstrated, that these State works, although many of them have been indiscreet, have been experiments, and have not turned out so well as was anticipated and desired; yet, taking the average of them from the commencement of the Erie Canal down to the last internal improvement which may have occasioned a debt to any one State, I say that they have yielded and will yield ten per cent. per annum upon their cost; and that they have added five hundred millions, instead of two hundred millions, to the property of the States. I say this for the States. And now the "Globe" may change me to-morrow with being an enemy of the States. I am willing. I say that.

In the next place, I say that if these States have been indiscreet, imprudent, have got themselves into difficulty, and are unable to fulfil their engagements, they have a right to come upon this Union and demand aid to enable them to discharge their obligations—to what extent, I will not undertake to say. But I say they have a right to come and demand aid of the nation. For, what is the alternative? Supposing they have been indiscreet—supposing they are insolvent. What is the consequence? They fail in their engagements—they destroy the character of this nation—its credit throughout the world—not only their own, but there is not a State in this Union that can become insolvent or declare itself unable to pay its debts, but what infamy must redound upon the whole nation all over the world. What will their creditors abroad say if one of the States should declare itself bankrupt or not able to pay its debts? They will pass judgment upon the whole nation; and justly too. It was your duty to have done that which has got them into difficulty, and they have got into difficulty from good motives and for good purposes. Of all these State debts, very few of them, if any, are to be charged as extravagant, wasteful expenditures. They have all been contracted for internal improvements. I say then, that under the coming Administration, this matter of the financial condition of the States of the Union must come before this House in the gravest form, and must come under the recommendation of the President of the United States. It is impossible that General Harrison should take possession of the Presidential chair without being aware what these debts of the States are, and without having some system (though what it may be I know not) which will govern his Administration in regard to it. Will it be by a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands? I know not. Will it be by raising revenue from duties on protected articles? I know not. Whatever plan he may have—(if I should be here in this House)—a plan which he should consider practical, and which he chooses to adopt as the rule of his administration on that point, I will support it if I possibly can; if I can reconcile it to any of my views of the Constitution, of law, of liberty, of the comfort and well being of this people, I say I will support it, be it what it may. I have not, therefore, made up my mind on the question of the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands—or upon any other matters to which I have referred, and which have been introduced into this debate.

Mr. Chairman, I have gone further into this discussion than I intended. I have been drawn into it by the effect of the reference I made to the duelling law. I say now to the chairman of this committee, that whatever appeals have been made to him on calls to order to arrest me in my remarks, I thank him for the manner in which he has sustained and vindicated the right of free debate in this House on the present occasion. I say that what I have said has been from motives of pure public spirit, without any disposition at all to offend any gentleman here, least of all, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Wise,] whose talents I admire, and whose public services I cheerfully acknowledge. I have felt it to be my duty to say what I did say, because I believe that the application of the principle of duelling as regards different portions of this House is such, that the principles of the gentleman from Virginia must be discarded; that duelling must be considered as a crime; and that it must not be countenanced by professions as to the existence of any necessity for it. It was my intention simply to state the reasons why I am not disposed to place myself under the standard of the gentleman from Virginia, if he should assume it hereafter as leader of this House. I thought I saw there was a disposition of that kind. The gentleman professes great friendship for the coming President; but he lays down the principles of his Administration, intimating that he would not support that Administration unless those particular principles were carried out. Without knowing what the views of General Harrison are or will be, I was very confident that the principles thus laid down as the rules of his Administration would not be those which the President elect would adopt or practise upon. And I felt disposed to say that, as the gentleman from Virginia assumes to be the leader of this House under General Harrison's administration, I, for one, would not follow his lead, nor that of any other man professing similar principles. I have no more to say.

Mr. WISE said, (in reply to Mr. ADAMS:) Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Massachusetts commenced his remarks, it was obvious to the House that I was excited. It would be hypocrisy in me to pretend that I did not feel both anger and resentment. Had the gentleman only gone as far as I expected—had he made only an ordinary attack—I would have replied to him. But, sir, his attack has gone so far beyond the bounds of moderation, courtesy, and order—it has been so unjust, so unfounded, so personal, so malicious, so little, so barbarous, so unprovoked—that, had he been a man of my own years, I should have sat silent after the delivery, and not have noticed it in this House. And, sir, for the reason that he is the very opposite of a young and vigorous man—that, in station, he is far above my humble position—for the reason that he is the son of a Revolutionary patriot who was President of the United States, and has himself been President—that the honor of my country is involved in his reputation and his conduct—that he is a man of venerable age, as I have before characterized him with perfect respect—for these reasons my hands are tied, my arms are bound, and I am deprived of the privilege of retort.

The gentleman is gratified. He has been indulged by the Chair and the House in making this attack upon me, thus tied and thus bound. He has even thanked the Chair for the indulgence of making this attack upon a young man who would not from self-respect reply—who ought not in turn to be indulged by the House in replying in the spirit and in the terms in which the attack itself was made. If this be a gratification to the gentleman himself, I am sure it is no gratification to his friends here, and, if his speech be published as intended, it will be no gratification to his friends elsewhere.

I cannot reply, sir, because I honor and respect Old Massachusetts too well not in this very instance to repel the imputation cast upon her Representatives by the gentleman—that they are constantly insulted and brow-beaten by Southern gentlemen here, who are represented as base enough to take advantage of public sentiment at home and in the North on the subject of duelling! Insult the venerable gentleman—I strike him!—No, no, no. Sir, I would much sooner strike down the arm raised to wound him! And if this be a victory for him, he is welcome to enjoy its fruits. I am at this moment a happier man than he is.

DEBATE ON THE TREASURY NOTE BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. GARLAND,

OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives, February 4, 1841—
On the bill providing for an issue of Treasury notes.

Mr. GARLAND said: I did not intend, Mr. Chairman, when this bill first came up for consideration, to have participated in the debate. Nothing was further from my thoughts or my wishes, and, but for the range of the debate, and the many topics of an important character which have been brought into it, I should now be content to give a silent vote. I was extremely anxious, from the beginning of the session, to act rather than speak; so as to dispose of the immense mass of business under which your table groans; but things have taken a different course, and I am forced by existing circumstances to exhaust a small portion of the valuable time of this House.

I extremely regret that such an immense range of debate should have been taken upon a question so simple, and so many topics discussed so irrelevant to it. It is a bad practice, and will, if persisted in, ultimately drive from our legislation every subject of an important and interesting character. It will convert our Hall into an arena of political gladiation, in which the making of a President will be the principal business, to the neglect of all other. It is not my purpose, on the present occasion, to follow gentlemen in their erratic and discursive course. I do not design fighting over again the late Presidential campaign; nor do I design inquiring into the fact whether the million and a quarter of American freemen who by their suffrages have elevated William Henry Harrison to the Presidency of these United States were seduced into his support by the contemptible pageantry of log cabins, hard cider, and coon skins, or whether the more than million who cast their suffrages upon Mr. Van Buren were actuated by base and unworthy motives; these criminations and recriminations are but little respectful to the virtue and intelligence of the American people, and are altogether unworthy of their representatives. The part which I acted in that great struggle, and the reasons upon which it was founded, are well known to my constituents and to the country, and I shall not here repeat them. They were sufficient for me, and I have no regret to express for any thing I said or did. In voting for General Harrison, I did not commit myself to an unequalled support of his administration; nor shall I. My purpose is to judge his administration according to its acts, approving where I can and condemning where I must. The standards by which I shall judge him are, the Constitution of my country, the fundamental principles of Republican Government, and the success of his measures. This is the only adhesion which I can give to General Harrison's or any other Administration.

The question immediately before the committee is, shall the enacting clause of the bill be stricken out? I shall vote against that motion; and finally for the passage of the bill. I shall vote for the passage of the bill, not because I approve it, or prefer that system to any other for supplying the wants of the Treasury; I vote for it because the friends of this Administration, having in their hands the means of ascertaining the true condition of the Treasury, have been called upon to supply the necessary means for the operation of Government for the current year, and have offered this amount, and in this form. We have made the call, and we must accept what they offer us. If the means which they supply are inadequate, they are responsible to the country for the consequences; if not, there will be no cause of complaint.

In order to determine on the propriety of issuing the Treasury notes proposed by the bill, the first inquiry is, will the ordinary sources of revenue supply the demands upon the Treasury for the current year? It seems to be admitted on all hands that it will not; and the only inquiry seems to be, will the $5,000,000 proposed by this bill to be issued and re-issued for the year, be sufficient to supply the deficiency? I think not; and this opinion is founded upon the most deliberate investigation of the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury. He estimates the receipts from customs at $19,000,000; from lands at $3,500,000; from debtor banks $220,000, and from all other sources $80,000. To this may be added the estimated balance in the Treasury on the first of January last, $1,580,855; making the whole estimated means of the Treasury for the year 1841, $24,380,855.

Even if the estimates of the Treasury Department should be realized, I do not believe that the means of the Government will be adequate to the demands of the year. But is there any reasonable hope that this estimate will be realized? If we judge of the production of the same sources of revenue for the last year; and make even a liberal allowance for the increase of these sources, I do not see how the estimates of the Treasury Department are to be realized.

The receipts from all these sources for the last year, except the banks, estimating the fourth quarter, were $17,197,763 03, which makes the estimates of this year over the receipts of last $5,522,246 99, including the bank debts. Is there any reasonable prospect that the receipts from customs and public lands during the present year will exceed those of the last by so large an amount? I am decidedly of opinion, judging from the ordinary operations of trade, and the condition of the country, they will not. The Secretary estimates the expenses of the current year at $23,899,200, as follows:

Ordinary expenses	$19,250,000
Funded debt on account of the District of Columbia	149,000
Redemption of Treasury notes	4,500,000

Aggregating $23,899,000
According to these estimates, the receipts will be $481,855 more than the expenditures. But are these estimates to be relied upon? Does any gentleman suppose that the ordinary expenditures of the Government can, during the present year, be reduced to $19,250,000? I humbly think not. I think they will be little less than $25,000,000—for more new sources of expenditure have been opened than dried up. Last year the Secretary of the Treasury estimated the ordinary expenditures at $18,280,600; when they in fact reached $22,489,349—difference $4,208,749. Under these circumstances, I am decidedly of opinion that the five millions proposed by the bill will not only be necessary, but will scarcely be adequate to meet the necessary expenditures of the year; but as the Committee of Ways and Means that reported the bill believe that the provision is adequate, and the dominant party in this House proposes it, I will take it upon their responsibility.

While I vote for this bill, Mr. Chairman, I must confess that I do it with great reluctance. I do not approve of this mode of raising means. It is a system so easily abused, and fraught with such mischievous consequences when abused, that I am anxious to see it discontinued entirely. It is true that I have heretofore voted for three bills of like character, but always did so under the strong assurances repeatedly made by the Secretary of the Treasury and the committee of Ways and Means, that these issues were only intended to anticipate, for a short time, the resources of the Treasury, and that no more applications would be made. These assurances have been as repeatedly violated as they were given, and are now to be violated again. I infinitely prefer a direct, to this indirect and dangerous mode of making a loan; and but for the fact that the friends of the Administration are a majority here, and, preferring this mode, would not likely adopt any other, I would vote against this bill. The Treasury must be supplied in some way, and I see no prospect in any other. I shall, therefore, vote for this bill upon the entire responsibility of its friends as to its mode and adequacy. In making my estimate for the receipts and expenditures of the year, I have discarded all Treasury notes, except the four and a half millions of dollars now outstanding, which constitute a charge, because, to the same extent that they operate as means, they operate as charges, and, therefore, balance each other.

These, Mr. Chairman, are all the remarks I have to make directly upon the bill now before the committee; but as gentlemen have introduced, without due regard, I must say, to the business of the House, other interesting and important topics, I feel it due to myself, to the party with which I acted during the late Presidential canvass, and to my constituents, respectfully, but decidedly and unequivocally, to express my opinions in relation to some of the most important of them, and those which will likely be acted on hereafter.

The first of these which I shall notice is the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States. If I were at any time disposed to vote for this scheme of distribution, I could not at this time, under the existing condition of the finances of the country. It is admitted, on all hands, that the receipts of the year will not be equal to the expenditures by several millions of dollars, and some even go so far as to say that it will take several years of the most successful operation of our financial resources to redeem the Treasury from the heavy burden which the mismanagement of the present Administration has entailed upon it; and yet it is gravely proposed to abstract from this deficient revenue $3,500,000, the estimated proceeds of the sales of the public lands during the year. If this be done, it necessarily follows that this amount of revenue must be raised from some other source. Gentlemen, well aware of this inevitable consequence, propose to supply the deficiency by an impost duty on silks and wines, hoping to satisfy the country for this new imposition of taxes upon them by holding out the delusive idea that they are luxuries, and that a tax upon them is a mere tax upon the rich. Now, Mr. Chairman, a tax is a tax, whether it be imposed on luxuries or on necessities; and no one would be so absurd as to contend that the imposition of a tax upon luxuries will relieve, a single stiver, the tax upon necessities, when the tax upon luxuries is imposed to supply the deficit created by the withdrawal of a like amount of revenue from another source. I am no advocate for the exemption of luxuries from taxation, but am ready at any time to subject them to a fair and equal taxation when the necessities of the revenue and the relief of the articles of necessity shall require. But I can see no propriety in creating a deficit in the public revenue, by withdrawing from the public Treasury the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, so long as they are necessary for revenue, by subjecting any class of our citizens to taxation merely to supply the deficit.

It has been estimated that, by the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, the State of Virginia would receive about $4,000,000, and by the array of this result it is supposed that the State would be favorable to the distribution. If this addition to the means of the treasury of Virginia were real and substantial, and would add to the permanent capital of the State that much, then indeed would it present a most formidable and imposing argument in favor of the scheme. But, sir, this is not the case; and, although I do not charge the friends of the scheme with insincerity or improper design, yet, with due deference to them, I must say that the whole appearance is delusive and deceptive. It is true that it will add thus much to the State treasury, but it will add more than this amount to the taxation of the people of the State to supply the vacuum created in the National Treasury; and thus, while with one hand you make a donation to the State Governments, you draw heavily with the other upon the pockets of the people to supply the gift; and thus, when in truth and in fact you profess to be liberal, you are bestowing nothing but an increased burden. It has been contended by many wise and experienced statesmen that the consumers of foreign goods, who are the principal producers of the country, are the principal tax payers; and thus, sir, they would have to bear all the burdens of this system, without any benefit whatever. What estimate would you place upon the intelligence of a man if he would accept a proposition to receive $500 in one pocket to-day, and pay 700 out of the other to-morrow? This, sir, is a fair illustration of the scheme, so far as Virginia is concerned.

I feel very confident, Mr. Chairman, that, but for the very indirect operation of our system of taxation, by which the true amount of the burdens imposed upon the people is concealed from them, this scheme of distribution would find no favor in Virginia or any of the producing States. If a system of direct taxation prevailed, and the people who pay the taxes were to count out to the officers of the Government in dollars and cents the amount they would have to contribute to the National Treasury to supply the deficiency produced by this withdrawal of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands from the general revenue, I am sure that they would not tolerate it for a moment, but rebel against it. But, from the indirect operation of our system of taxation, the great body of the people do not reflect that, in every bushel of salt, in every pound of coffee, and in every yard of woollen goods of foreign manufacture which they use, they are paying their taxes to the Government; and thus, while this four millions of dollars would go to the Government of Virginia, the people of the State would more than refund it to the National Treasury by this indirect system of taxation on their salt, woollens, coffee, &c. I cannot perceive, Mr. Chairman, what possible benefit can result to the people of Virginia by thus bestowing to her Government this four millions of dollars, to be squandered by legislative prodigality, and withdrawing a larger amount from the pockets of the people to supply its place. From every view which I have been able to take of this question, I am well convinced that the present system of disposing of the public lands, and the faithful application of the proceeds to the purposes of revenue, is the most beneficial and just disposition of them which can be made, because, pro tanto, they relieve the taxation of the country.

So far as relates, Mr. Chairman, to the restriction of the fund proposed to be distributed to the purposes of education and internal improvements, I have only to remark, that if this land fund be a residuum after executing the trust created by the original act of cession, then, and in that case, the States have as clear and indefeasible a title to this residuum as they had to the original subject; and any restriction upon its appropriation would be incompatible with, and in violation of, their rights, and could not create upon them the slightest obligation to regard it. Let it be remembered, too, that all the expenses of surveying, selling, and patenting, which are very considerable, are to be thrown upon the impost duties. For these reasons, upon grounds of expediency, I am opposed to this system of distribution. But while declaring my opposition to this system, I find it my duty to state that I am utterly opposed to its competing schemes—the reduction of the price of the public lands, and their cession to the States in which they lie. But, Mr. Chairman, there are other and higher objections to this scheme of distribution which I deem it my duty briefly to bring to notice. The moral influence which it would exert upon the relations between the Federal and State Governments, and its tendency to make the State Governments dependent upon, and subservient to, the Federal Government, are matters to my mind of the most grave and insuperable objection. This small beginning of a connection between the revenues of the State and Federal Governments, I fear, would increase as it progressed, and finally terminate in a permanent and ruinous connection. It would prompt the people to forget that they had State Governments at all, and turn their eyes entirely to the Federal source for supplies. The Federal Government would then be the Alpha and Omega of our whole system, and all the advantages arising from our Federal compact and the cherished sovereignty of the States be buried in its vortex. All moral evil has small beginnings, but swells as it progresses, until it overwhelms every thing with which it comes in contact. The pyramids of Egypt were constructed by piling one stone upon another, until they reached their present towering height; so, I fear, will be the operation of this system of distribution. One system will be piled upon another, until finally it will assume a permanency and strength beyond the control or resistance of the States or the people. I have heretofore had some little experience on this subject of distribution. I voted for the act of 1836 distributing the surplus revenue among the States, referred to and so strongly reprobated by my friend and colleague, [Mr. WISE.] When I voted for that bill, I did so believing it, what it professed to be, a bill for the deposit of the surplus revenue with the States, and with entire confidence that the States would redeem the pledges they were required to give to return those deposits to the National Treasury under the restrictions and limitations prescribed by the act, whenever required. But what now, sir, is the state of things? With a bankrupt Treasury, the States hold on to these deposits, and laugh to scorn the very idea of restoring them. I am sometimes humorously asked by my friends whether I did not know, when I voted for that bill, that it was intended as a gift of the surplus revenue to the States? I answer, no; I was entirely ignorant of it. I had not then acquired so much skill in parliamentary manœuvring as to know how to frame a bill with a constitutional aspect which was to operate an unconstitutional effect. I had not then learned that the Constitution of my country authorized a gift of any part of the public revenue, or any portion of the public property, to any State, or to the States. If I had then known what I know now, that that act would effect what it has effected—an unconstitutional gift of the then surplus revenue to the States—I should not have given it my sanction.

But, Mr. Chairman, where do gentlemen find in the Constitution of the country any authority for disposing, by gift, of any part of the public revenue, or any portion of the public property? The power to collect revenue is distinctly given, and the objects to which it is to be appropriated explicitly defined, by the Constitution. In the enumerated objects for which appropriations may be made, there is not a word or a sentence to be found from which the idea of a power to give can remotely be deduced, unless, indeed, the words "general welfare and common defence" can be so construed as to impart general and unlimited powers to a Government which, from the whole tenor of the Constitution, was intended to be limited to the exercise of enumerated and specified powers. Apart from these words, there cannot be found a single expression to favor the power. There being no constitutional power to make such a distribution, the friends of this policy have very adroitly laid hold of the acts of cession from Virginia and other States to the Government of the Confederacy, and very ingeniously attempt to deduce from these acts of cession the power to make distribution of the public lands ceded by them. I will examine this proposition very briefly. That part of the act of cession of Virginia, passed on the 1st day of March, 1784, which is to determine this question, is in the following words:

"That all the lands within the Territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, or appropriated to, any of the before-mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become or shall become members of the Confederation or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia, inclusive, according to their usual respective portions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

These words are preceded by several specific appropriations, and are introduced for the express purpose of controlling the appropriations of the surplus of the ceded lands which shall remain after satisfying these specific appropriations. The surplus thus remaining is, according to the terms of the act, to be considered a "common fund" for the use of such of the United States as had become or should become members of the Confederation which then existed, Virginia included. The words "common fund" simply mean that these lands should become the property of the Confederacy for the use of the Confederacy, and not a joint stock fund for the use of each of the States in their individual character. It is to be used for the benefit of the Confederacy, and the Confederacy only; so as to relieve the States of the general charge and expenditure to which they are liable for the heavy debt incurred during the Revolutionary war, and for the amount of the expenditure to which they were liable for the support and maintenance of the Government of the Confederacy. This is all that is intended by the act of cession, and this is the fair and natural import of the terms employed. When it is remembered that, at the time of the passage of this act, the Government of the Confederacy had no power whatever to collect revenue, either by impost, excise, direct taxation, or otherwise, but had to rely upon requisitions on the States in proportion to their representation to discharge the heavy debt with which it was burdened and to meet its annual expenditures, the object of this cession, and the interpretation of the clause which I have cited, are too obvious for doubt or argumentation. The restriction contained in the clause was simply intended to prevent the local or partial application of this common fund to the separate and distinct benefit of any State or portion of the States. The object was to provide a "common fund" to relieve, the States from a common charge and pay a common expenditure; and I cannot well imagine, considering that our Government was a mere federal alliance, powerless and penniless without the aid and support of the States, how the framers of the act could have employed more appropriate terms. If the framers of the act had contemplated that there would have remained a surplus out of this surplus to be applied to the individual and local concerns of the States, I feel very confident that they would have been cautious enough to make some specific provision for such a result; but their not having done so is conclusive proof to my mind that they did not design it. From the passage of the act, through a long series of years, the Congress of the United States, both under the Confederacy and the Union, has been acting under the influence of this interpretation in appropriating the proceeds of the public lands, and I see no good reason for reversing it at this late day. In aid of this view of the subject, I will refer to another fact, which I regard as conclusive of its correctness. The framers of the Constitution, having this whole subject before them, gave to Congress the same power over the ceded lands that they did over all lands which the Government then held, or might thereafter acquire; and that was, simply to prescribe proper rules and regulations for their management and disposition. There is not a word nor a sentiment which indicates that the framers of the Constitution believed that they held these lands in trust for the local use and benefit of the States. The power conferred over these lands is precisely the same conferred over all other lands, and, if the one can be distributed, the other can. From these considerations, my mind has come to the decided conclusion that the distribution of the public lands among the States for their local and private use is not justified upon any principles of expediency, nor warranted by the spirit of the Constitution, and not required by the provisions of the act of cession. There is no more safe, more just, or more profitable disposition of the public lands than to bring their proceeds into the public Treasury, and to relieve the people to that extent from burdensome and oppressive taxation upon those articles which are necessary to them.

But, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding my opposition to distribution, I was not a little surprised to hear the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SHEPARD] impugn the title of Virginia to the ceded lands. After entering into a compact with her, accepting the cession and executing it according to its very letter for more than a half a century, I see no propriety in the Government of the United States impugning the title by which she holds these lands. It is a very singular position, that while we are acting by virtue of this cession, disposing of these lands and erecting new States in conformity with its provisions, we are at the same time denying the title by which we hold them! Did the gentleman from North Carolina reflect what effect his argument might have upon the future political balance between the North and South, in another body, if his argument were true? If he did not, I pray him to reconsider it.

The next subject which has been introduced into this discussion is that of a protective tariff. It is matter of extreme regret to me that a subject of so much delicacy, and so irritating a character, should have been introduced at a time and under circumstances when there could possibly be no action upon it; and it is a matter of more regret that any gentlemen on this floor should have indicated a purpose, at a future day, of breaking through the principles of the compromise act of 1832, and re-open this fountain of bitter and agitating waters.

[Mr. BARNARD here asked permission to say a word by way of explanation. Mr. GARLAND yielded the floor for this purpose.]

Mr. BARNARD then said, in substance, that he found himself alluded to now, and he had been frequently before, in the course of debate, as having proposed and advocated, in his speech on the bill now before the committee, a protective tariff, and a high protective tariff. There was entire misapprehension and error here, and apparently a growing misapprehension and error, which he thought it time to correct. He had made no proposition, nor had he advocated in his speech a high protective tariff, or any protective tariff whatever. His proposition looked to revenue, and to revenue only, and not even incidentally to protection.

My motion (said Mr. B.) was to strike out the enacting clause of this bill, and that is the whole of the motion. I accompanied this motion with a notice which disclosed the object of it. It was that, if the motion prevailed, I would move the House to intrust the Committee of Ways and Means to bring in a bill to borrow $10,000,000 on the issue of bonds or scrip; and also a bill to lay duties on articles now admitted free of duty, such as wines, silks, spices, and other articles, being luxuries—but all within the terms and policy of the compromise act. This was my notice; and it is, I suppose, to that that reference is made, when it is imagined that I have proposed to make a new tariff for protection.

Sir, I have proposed nothing of the sort, nor did I, in all my speech, from the beginning to the end, advocate any measure of the sort. I found, as I thought, that the Treasury would want $10,000,000 in 1841 over and above all current revenues. I proposed to borrow it. I found also, as I thought, that the deficit in revenue from customs in 1842 would be very great, and that deficit I proposed to make up, as far as it would go, by new duties laid now, and laid, not upon protected, but on unprotected articles—duties for revenue only.

I will only add and repeat to the gentleman from Virginia, which was all I intended when I rose, that I have not, in occasion of this debate, proposed or advocated a protective tariff.

When Mr. B. had concluded, Mr. WADDY THOMPSON made a like request, and made the following explanation:

Mr. THOMPSON said it is very strange that any such disclaimer of an intention to bring about a protective tariff should be required of the member from New York, when his resolution expressly states that the terms of the compromise of 1833 are not to be violated; and therefore, he proposes duties, not on the protected, but upon the unprotected articles—such has been the language of every single member from the tariff States. The word protective tariff has not been used by one of them unless to disclaim any wish for increased protection. If Southern gentleman question the truth and honor of these members, I would ask, dare these members make this disclaimer if their constituents really wished increased protection?

The distinguished member from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] representing one of the largest manufacturing interests, tells you that the manufacturers do not wish any more protection. That we may lay the duties for the required amount on any thing we please. They do not ask it, but are willing that the duties on the protected articles should be increased; that they propose to lay these duties on the unprotected articles to satisfy us, but, if we prefer, we may choose. No man from the South has said, or will say, that he does not prefer to lay duties on the unprotected class of articles. The North propose this to us, and we denounce the proposition which we approve, because we have a suspicion that, in offering us our own choice, they mean to cheat us. Why, then, sir, this senseless cry of tariff, tariff, tariff?

Mr. GARLAND. I am quite happy, Mr. Chairman, that I afforded the gentleman from New York an opportunity to place himself right before the country. It was to what I had been informed he had said that I referred. As to my friend from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] I would as soon have suspected any man in this House or out of it being an advocate of a protective tariff as him. His explanation may be very well to set him right as to others, but was wholly unnecessary as to me. With this explanation from the gentleman from New York, I will pursue this subject no further, but content myself by remarking that, whenever it does come up, if I shall have the honor of a seat on this floor, I shall be found its unwavering and uncompromising opponent.

In relation to the proposed tax upon silks and wines, I beg leave to submit a few remarks. I am not willing at the present session to enter into that subject. French silks and wines, by treaty stipulation, are exempt from duties until 1842, and I feel no desire to discriminate between French silks and those of any other friendly power; and there is no necessity of any precipitate action on the subject. Whenever the whole field shall be opened, and silks and wines can be made the subjects of a fair and equal taxation with other subjects, I am ready to embrace them and impose it upon them. They are as fit subjects of taxation as any other foreign production, and much more so than many. They are certainly not entitled to any privilege because they are luxuries—nor, as asserted by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. ALFORD,] because "there are great many pretty girls in the South who wear silks." The "pretty girls" of the South are under as high an obligation to pay a tax for the silk which adds so much to their comfort and decoration, as the "pretty girls" every where who wear their light woollens; and although I should regret to be less an admirer of "pretty girls" than my friend from Georgia, yet this distinction is an homage that I am not prepared to pay to their beauty. The Constitution has given the power to raise revenue for the purpose of supplying the means of defraying the expenses of the Government and its other legal obligations. In the exercise of this power I shall always be prepared to impose such duties as shall be necessary to meet these objects. All that I desire in relation to silks and wines is to act upon them at a time and under circumstances when I can act advisedly, and when they can be subjected to a fair and equal and a just imposition of duties.

I have a word to say in relation to the tobacco question. My friend and colleague [Mr. WISE] seemed to think that the Tobacco Convention recently held in this city was but a part of the machinery which was putting in play to bring about a renewal of the protective system. I was a member of that convention, and although I shall not question the sagacity of my colleague, I distinctly assert that in that convention I did not see or hear any thing to justify the suspicion. It may be so, but if it was, it escaped my observation, and I can truly say that I did not participate in it. Upon the subject of the tobacco trade the inclination of my mind is to differ with the view of both my colleagues, [Messrs. WISE and COLES.] I regard the tobacco interest of the country as suffering under the weight of a most wanton and intolerable oppression at the hands of nations whose productions we receive on the most liberal terms. How monopoly and excessive duty in foreign countries are beneficial to that interest, is what I have not been able to discover. From the first formation of our Government to the present time, our constant effort has been to get rid of this monopoly, and reduce this imposition upon our tobacco trade in foreign countries—and yet we are gravely told that all this exertion has been directed to effect an object which would be ruinous to the tobacco growing interest. It is not my purpose to enter into a discussion of this question at this time. I confess that my information is too limited to decide with accuracy, and to act at this time with due regard to the great interest involved. I shall hold my mind open to the conviction of truth, and trust that if I shall ever be called to act upon this question, I shall be able to do so with wisdom and prudence. My colleague [Mr. COLES] seems to be sensible of the great oppression under which the tobacco trade labors in England, France, and other European powers, and that there ought to be some redress, but he is opposed to countervailing duties, "because," says he, "that would be legislating for France and England," forgetting that, if the argument be true, it cuts both ways, and proves that in the monopoly and the imposition of duties by France and England upon American tobacco, France and England are legislating for the United States. Because if the imposition of duties upon foreign productions in our own ports be legislating for those foreign countries, then by the same process of reasoning the proof is conclusive that the imposition of duties upon American productions in foreign ports amounts to legislation for us by the powers imposing them.

That there should be a diversity of opinion as to the propriety of exercising the countervailing power is not to be wondered at, but that there should be any doubt as to the existence of the power is to me marvellous. The countervailing power is the right arm of national defence in matters of commerce, and the Government that is without it must prosecute its commerce entirely at the mercy of other powers. I do not now say that it would be proper to exercise this power in reference to the tobacco trade; but I will say that, if we are entitled to redress, this will be found the only successful remedy. I distinguish between a countervailing duty and one for purposes of protection. A protective duty is always imposed upon some foreign production or manufacture, to enable the domestic article of like character to compete with it in our own markets; the countervailing duty is always directed to such foreign production as will best dispose the foreign Government to do justice to our own productions, and conduct our intercourse with them upon terms of reciprocity. The countervailing duty is intended to operate abroad—the protective at home. The countervailing system is a harsh one, and should be managed with great caution, prudence, and discretion—never rashly. That the countervailing power exists in this Government is with me not a matter of doubt; but if I needed authority to support me in this position, I would refer to that of James Madison, whose opinion on this subject was decided and unequivocal, as were also those of many of his distinguished compeers. I must confess that I am not a little surprised at the remedy suggested by my friend, [Mr. COLES.] He says he would still negotiate. Well, sir, we have been negotiating for nearly sixty years, and the success has been an increase of the burdens. My friend says he will not resort to countervailing duties. If, then, the negotiation is renewed, and it again fails, what is the remedy? According to the position of my friend, [Mr. COLES,] submission. Now, Mr. Chairman, that this monopoly of the tobacco trade and heavy imposition of burdens upon the article is a source of very considerable revenue to the powers of Europe into which it is imported, is matter of no doubt. When, then, you send your negotiator to remonstrate against these impositions and demand their removal, what success do you think will attend his negotiations when he discloses the awful fact that, if the negotiation fails—we submit? This, Mr. Chairman, is the inevitable position in which the remedy of my friend and colleague places this question; and, if it be sound and tenable, it proves most conclusively, to my mind, that we should attempt no further negotiation upon the subject, lest it should result, as heretofore, in an increase of our burdens.

This argument, which means that we are to talk, and do nothing but talk, reminds me very much of an anecdote which took place near the beginning of the Revolution at Boston. The boys of Boston, who had caught the spirit of liberty which was running like fire in the prairies along the whole American colonies, from North to South and from East to West, by their songs of patriotism and their shouts of liberty, became very offensive to an old Tory who lived hard by the city. The Tory, in the agony of his feelings, exclaimed to some acquaintances standing by, in most indignant strains, "These boys ought to be talked to—to be talked to hard—very hard." Now, Mr. Chairman, I suppose my colleague would have our negotiators upon this subject "talk" to those foreign Governments—to talk to them "hard, very hard;" and if talking very hard will not do, to tell them—we submit.

The next subject introduced into this discussion, to which I shall advert, is the subject of a National Bank. Upon this topic, too, I think, the time of this House might be spared. There is no proposition before the House to establish a Bank, nor is there time to mature a bill for that purpose, if such a proposition were pending. But, sir, as this question has been alluded to, and I differ from many of those with whom I acted in the late Presidential election, in relation to the constitutionality and expediency of such an institution, I feel it due to them, to myself, and to the country, to state, distinctly and unequivocally, that I am opposed to such an institution in any form or in any shape. I do not believe that the Constitution authorizes it, or that the true or substantial interest of the great body of the people requires it. When I examine the Constitution, and find it utterly destitute of a single word or sentiment which authorizes the establishment of a corporation of any sort or description—and when I remember that the framers of the Constitution, those sages and patriots of the ever memorable period of the Revolution, refused to impart to this Government the power to create a corporation of any sort or description, I feel well satisfied of the dangers which they believed would grow out of such a power, and do not feel willing to resort to some far-fetched inference or deduction from the delegated powers of the Constitution to supply that which was promptly denied it. Nor, sir, am I willing to amend the Constitution by judicial decision or legislative interpolation. There is but one way to amend the Constitution, according to the Constitution itself, and that is the only way by which I will consent to its amendment. I am not willing to see this country cursed with a Constitution of unstable Congressional enactments and judicial decisions. When that is the case, the sovereignty of the States is broken down, and the liberties of the people trampled under foot. I take the Constitution itself as the shield of the States and the palladium of the liberties of the people, and view with the utmost alarm and apprehension any, the slightest, infraction of it.

Mr. Chairman, as bitterly as I opposed the Sub-Treasury law, as determined as I am on its repeal, I am not now, and never was, more opposed to it than I am to the incorporation of a National Bank—such a one, particularly, as has been indicated. I cannot distinguish, in effect, between an overwhelming and dangerous pecuniary influence in the hands of the Executive of this Government, whether it be directly and openly conferred by a Sub-Treasury law, or indirectly under the mask of a chartered corporation. Such an institution, whether in the hands of a free or a despotic Government, would no doubt add much to the success of the pecuniary operations of the trading community; but, for this benefit to the trading community alone, we let into the gates of the citadel of liberty a most insidious and dangerous enemy. If gentlemen should succeed in their views and establish such an institution, I pray Heaven that it may not be to the free institutions of this country what the fabled wooden horse of the Greeks was to the unhappy Trojans. From these remarks, my friends will readily perceive that there is no aspect which this question can assume that can command my humble support.

These, Mr. Chairman, are my opinions in reference to these questions. They were early imbibed, and are too deeply rooted to be shaken or changed. The party with which I acted in the late Presidential election as well knew my opinions on these subjects as I did many of theirs, and had no more reason to expect, and I am sure did no more expect, that I would abandon them than I had to expect they would abandon theirs. If I had changed my course to suit the shifting current of events, they would have despised and condemned me. It was not because I had undergone any change of opinion on these subjects that I opposed the re-election of Martin Van Buren. I opposed him for other and higher considerations, both moral and political, striking at the foundation of all freedom and all free institutions—causes for which I would oppose, and aid in overthrowing, any Administration.

The freedom of opinion is the greatest birthright of an American citizen, and the shield of an American representative. I refused to yield it to the demands of the party with which I formerly acted, and will, if ever demanded, refuse to yield it to any party. Thus, Mr. Chairman, you have my views on these important and interesting questions; such as they are, they are honestly entertained, and will be firmly maintained. But, sir, why should we be wasting our time in these idle discussions upon mere party questions, when there is in the distance danger of a most menacing and formidable character which we should be preparing to meet? As was intimated by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SHEPARD,] the ambitious designs of Great Britain were never more clearly developed than at this time. She governs Asia, controls Africa, dictates to Europe, and is planting her influence and her military posts all over the American Continent. The world is scarcely sufficient for her grasping ambition. Does any man, who is familiar with her history, suppose that Great Britain will ever yield the disputed territory in Maine and Oregon without a struggle? If he does, he has more confidence in her justice and magnanimity that I have. For such a struggle, Mr. Chairman, what is our preparation? Our navy almost dismantled and disorganized—not a ship in a suitable condition to maintain the honor of our flag upon the high seas. Where is the army, and what is its condition? But little better than that of the navy—our whole coast almost defenceless. While Great Britain is making active and busy preparations all around us, and studding her Canada frontiers with fortifications, we, as we have been for the last eight years, are busily engaged in President-making and party manoeuvring, to the utter neglect of every sort of appropriation. Never was the country in a more unprotected and defenceless condition. I warn you, Mr. Chairman, that the tide of war is fast rolling upon us. I see it in the distance, and it rapidly approaches—it cannot be averted without dishonor upon our part. Is it not time, then, that American statesmen had buried their party feuds, and all harmoniously combine to make a suitable and adequate provisions for the coming emergency? I, for one, Mr. Chairman, feel the necessity, and am, therefore, prepared to commence the work of preparation. I believe in the wisdom of that maxim of the Father of his country—

"In peace prepare for war."

These, Mr. Chairman, are the remarks which I intended to make on this subject. In making them, it has been far from my intention to impugn the motives of any party, or to give offence to any. My object has been plainly and simply to express my own views and place myself fairly before the country.

RESIGNATION OF MR. WEBSTER.

IN SENATE,

MONDAY, February 22, 1841.

The VICE PRESIDENT submitted the following letter to the Senate:

Hon. R. M. JOHNSON, Vice President United States.

"Sir: It is the object of this letter to make known to the Senate the resignation of my seat as one of the Senators from Massachusetts, having already informed the Executive of that State that from this day my place would be vacant.

"In retiring from a situation in which so considerable a part of my life has been passed, I hope I may be permitted to express my high respect for the body of which I have been a member, the interest I shall ever feel in the preservation of its character and dignity, and my cordial wishes for the health and happiness of all those with whom I have been associated.

"With much personal regard,

"I have the honor to be your obedient servant, D. WEBSTER."

The letter having been read, Mr. CUTHBERT and Mr. WRIGHT rose simultaneously, but, the CHAIR recognising Mr. CUTHBERT, Mr. WRIGHT yielded the floor to

Mr. CUTHBERT, who expressed his regret that the Senator from Massachusetts was not present, as he was desirous to make some inquiries from that gentleman as to doctrines some time since put forth by him, in which the people of the South had a deep and vital interest, and in relation to which it had been said the Senator had undergone some change of opinion. If the Senator from Massachusetts could explain this change of sentiment satisfactorily, he would stand better, and stronger, and firmer with the South than he did now. He (Mr. CUTHBERT) had been under the impression that the Senator from Massachusetts would have been here to-day in person, and he had hoped, therefore, that he could have made his inquiries in this chamber.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky wished to express, as he did most sincerely, the deep regret he felt that the Senator from Georgia should have seized an occasion when his (Mr. CLAY's) honorable friend was absent from these halls.

Mr. CUTHBERT here interposed, and protested against the idea that he had seized the opportunity of Mr. WEBSTER's absence to make the remarks he had now done, or that it should for a moment be supposed he had ever shrunk from expressing any opinion he held in the presence of any man whom it might concern. The document on which his remarks were founded, and in regard to which he was desirous of interrogating the Senator from Massachusetts, had been in his possession last session, but he had declined at that time to use it, and it had been left behind him in the district. He had directed it to be sent to him, but this had not been done; he had since used every effort in his power to possess himself of it, and hoped soon to succeed. He had not known till a few days since that it was Mr. WEBSTER's intention to leave the Senate before the expiration of the session. He hoped, therefore, that the Senator from Kentucky would release him from the imputation of being unwilling to express his sentiments in that Senator's presence. It was impossible he could, in this matter, be influenced by any party considerations, because, should the Senator be able satisfactorily to explain, the effect would be rather to weaken the influence of the party to which he belonged.

Mr. CLAY said that it was far from his intention to convey the idea that the Senator from Georgia feared to put any proper queries to his friend from Massachusetts, or had seized the opportunity of his absence with the view of taking any improper advantage of that circumstance; still he could not but express his profound regret, whatever circumstances might have caused the honorable Senator to choose this moment for introducing the remarks he had made, that he had not chosen a more suitable occasion.

Mr. CUTHBERT inquired whether it had not been generally understood that the Senator from Massachusetts was to be in his place to-day, and to address the Senate previously to making the resignation of his seat?

Many voices cried out, "No; there has been no such understanding."

Mr. CUTHBERT. There certainly has been on this side of the Senate.

Mr. CLAY said he could not answer for the Senator's sources of information. That it was his friend's intention to resign his seat, was a fact which had for some time been generally known, and had been stated in the journals of the day, and the Senator had been here in his seat till near three o'clock. He must, therefore, repeat the expression of his deep, his profound regret that, at a moment like this, when every member of the body could not but feel the great void which had been created by the act which had just been announced to the Senate, from the absence of that commanding eloquence and that unsurpassed logic which had been so long and so often exerted in support of the rights and best interests of this country; in the midst of this feeling of general regret—for he would do gentlemen on the other side the justice to believe that, notwithstanding political differences of sentiment, the feeling was fully participated in by them—that at such a moment the Senator from Georgia should have deemed it becoming, and a suitable opportunity, to introduce the subject to which he had just alluded. The day when one of the noblest specimens of American eloquence, one of the brightest ornaments of these halls, of his country, and our of common nature, had retired from his seat in the Senate, perhaps forever, to assume a station of still higher importance, and of still wider influence over the future welfare of this land, was certainly not a time that most gentlemen would have selected for the purpose of interrogating him as to any sentiments he might at a former time have uttered. He doubted its propriety at any time. The interrogatories to be put had no connection with any subject now before the Senate; and the practice had never been introduced into our American halls of legislation to put interrogatories to Ministers, as was customary in England. But if the Senator from Massachusetts had recently intimated any change of opinion in reference to the subjects to which the member from Georgia alluded, why should that gentleman doubt his sincerity? On what subject had he these doubts? He standing in his place, could be a witness for his friend from Massachusetts, that, from his first appearance in the Senate down to this day of his regretted resignation, no sentiment had ever been advanced by him which was not perfectly catholic, and which did not regard as much the rights of the South and the great interests of the West as those of any other portion of the Union: on the contrary, he had ever been ready alike to defend and maintain, in the most determined manner, the rights of every quarter of the country. He had on all occasions declared it as his sentiment, that the Constitution of the United States conferred upon Congress no power, directly or indirectly, to touch the subject to which he presumed the Senator alluded, certainly not beyond the limits of the District; and even within the District, although he might be of opinion that the mere abstract power did exist, yet he believed as strongly that it would be inexpedient to exercise it. On what subject, then, did the South want guarantees as to his course in a higher and more extended sphere of action? His elevation to that station was an homage richly due to him for services and talents unreservedly devoted to the service of the country for twenty or twenty-five years past. And the present was the first and only proof which he had ever received of the due estimation of those services by the offer of any office under the Federal Government; and he would here publicly express his full and entire conviction that there was no subject in regard to which the South need indulge apprehension in consequence of his elevation.

Mr. CUTHBERT said that the Senator from Kentucky had made a great deal out of his brief address to the Senate, having spoken of it as though he had pursued a course which was a subject of poignant regret—as if he had been guilty of some gross violation of decorum—some unpardonable outrage on public feeling; but he was not to be imposed upon by any such affectation.

Mr. CLAY. I call that Senator to order; he cannot be permitted to use such language in application to me.

Mr. CUTHBERT here made some explanation, unintelligible to the reporter, but which ended with the expression, Well, then, we now understand each other. The Senator says that his friend from Massachusetts is a Senator of distinguished abilities. I acknowledge it. That those abilities have long and often been exerted here. I acknowledge it. That his opinion is of high authority. I acknowledge it. But if he entertains the most heretical and abominable opinion in relation to a subject which is of the deepest interest to a large portion of this country, am I not to dare to demand from him an explanation? That I must not dare to speak of a subject of this importance, because it does not comport with the Senator's notions of decorum! Can any man listen to this with patience? That the rights of the whole people are to be put in the scales with the Senator's ideas of delicacy and decorum? I laugh at it. I spurn at it. The interests of my constituents shall be defended by me on all occasions—by God they shall. The gentleman does not understand to a scruple or a drachm the heresies which have been maintained by his friend; not always, by the by, his friend, if I rightly remember. The laurels of the honorable Senator from Kentucky were won by his gallant support of the late war. It was the glory of his eloquence, the fire and splendor of his genius, which inspired the hearts of his countrymen with an undying determination to resist oppression. For that he was honored then—for that he is honored now—and for that he ever will be honored. Where his friend stood on that occasion, I need not say. But what is this doctrine put forth by the Senator from Massachusetts, and in regard to which I wish to interrogate him? It is proved by a document of the very highest authority. I regret I have it not now to produce, but I shall have it, and will produce it. He there asserts it as indisputable that Congress may pass laws to prevent the transfer of slaves from one State or Territory to another!

Mr. PRESTON was understood to say that, without recognising the right of any Senator to interrogate him as to the sentiments of an absent friend, and disclaiming any intention to make an answer for one so abundantly capable of answering for himself, as was the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, he would say that the circumstance which he understood to be alluded to by the Senator from Georgia was one in which he had himself had some participation. He had been present at the time when that honorable Senator made the declarations having relation to the interests of the South, of which the Senator from Georgia complained, and those declarations were, to his (Mr. PRESTON's) mind, satisfactory. The doctrines then advanced were such as he, as a Southern man, felt authorized to sanction, to approve, and, in some sort, to endorse. He did approve, and did endorse them. The explanations of the Senator from Massachusetts were made at Alexandria, in the presence of many thousands of Southern gentlemen, and they were entirely satisfied. His opinions were there avowed openly, and he told the assembly that they should hear of them again; and those very same sentiments, ipsissimis verbis, were echoed among the mountains of New Hampshire, were reverberated along the indented shores of Massachusetts, were proclaimed on the banks of the Hudson, and again put forth in the clearest and most decisive language from the Capitol at Richmond. As a patriot and a Southern man, he (Mr. PRESTON) had heard them with great pleasure. Whether they were the result of any change in sentiment—whether they were the product of any new light, he neither asked nor cared, but hailed them with delight as proceeding from such a man. Whether now or old, if they were Mr. WEBSTER's sentiments, as he could not doubt they were, he was sure the Senator from Georgia must rejoice with him, both that they were entertained and had been thus expressed.

Mr. RIVES obtained the floor, but yielded it at the earnest request of

Mr. CUTHBERT, who said that he had charged these heresies, of which he complained, openly on this floor, upon the Senator from Massachusetts some years ago, when the position of that gentleman was not so important as it had now become, and the Senator from Virginia at that time joined him in pressing for an explanation from the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. RIVES said he should like to know what was the purpose of the Senator from Georgia in thus pressing this subject of inquiry? What was his object?

Mr. CUTHBERT said he would explain. He then repeated the declaration that, when pressing the charge of these opinions on the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from Virginia had united with him, and had expressed to the Senator from Massachusetts his strong disapprobation of those opinions.

Mr. RIVES said that the gentleman from Georgia was certainly mistaken. He had a perfect recollection of the leading circumstances, and did not join the gentleman from Georgia, on that occasion, in charging the Senator from Massachusetts with having promulgated the obnoxious opinion that it was competent for Congress to prohibit the transportation of slaves from one State to another for sale. He had had no information on the subject. All he had heard was from the gentleman from Georgia himself. That Senator had asserted that the Senator from Massachusetts had, in some document adopted by a public meeting in Boston, advanced such sentiments, and this was all that he knew about it. When that gentleman charged the fact on Mr. WEBSTER, and pressed for an explanation, he (Mr. RIVES) had been anxious to hear what reply would be made, but did not join the Senator in making the charge.

Mr. CUTHBERT. I did not allege that the Senator from Virginia made the charge on his own knowledge, but I say, and I will ever repeat, that the Senator from Virginia did, with earnestness and with great ability, press that charge on the Senator from Massachusetts, who, in his reply, avowed the doctrine, and maintained and defended it on the constitutional power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States. I repeat, that the Senator from Virginia did enter into that debate, although I admit that he obtained the facts from me.

Mr. RIVES. I had risen to perform an act of justice to the Senator from Massachusetts and to myself, when I yielded the floor to the gentleman from Georgia. And what is the result of the statement he has made? Does it sustain his assertion that I pressed the Senator from Massachusetts for an answer to his inquiry?

Mr. CUTHBERT. I beg the Senator—I beg the Senator to do me justice. What I said was, that the gentleman from Virginia did press on the Senator from Massachusetts the incorrectness of those opinions, supposing him to entertain them.

Mr. RIVES. Then the whole question, as between the Senator from Georgia and myself, is immaterial. I have not so minute a recollection of all the circumstances as to be able to recall every individual thing which passed; but, fortunately for the Senator from Georgia and myself, we did not speak to empty benches. There must have been others who heard and who remember what passed. I recollect having participated in a very interesting debate, to which the Senator from Massachusetts and other members of this body were parties, on different topics connected with Southern rights. On this occasion I remember it was alleged by the Senator from Georgia that the Senator from Massachusetts had advanced the doctrine that it was competent for Congress to prohibit the transportation of slaves from one State to another for sale, and that he appealed to him to say whether he had or not; but he did not recollect whether the Senator from Massachusetts had admitted or denied having done so.

Mr. CUTHBERT. No, no; he did not deny it.

Mr. RIVES. Let not the Senator from Georgia involve me when he comes forward to make charges against a gentleman who is not here present to defend himself; but, if he advances a charge, and its truth is denied, then the burden of proof certainly lies on him.

Mr. CUTHBERT. I can prove it, and I will.

Mr. RIVES. I protest against the gentleman's drawing me in to support his accusation in a matter of which I have no knowledge. Now do I feel it to be due to the eminent public man who has just dissolved his connexion with this body, and who has been arraigned for his opinions by the Senator from Georgia in a manner which, to say the least, is rather ill-timed and unprecedented, to state what have been the declarations of his opinions, on these same questions, within my own hearing, at a very recent period. With that distinguished gentleman I have differed, and still differ, on some important questions of public policy. But these differences have never prevented me from feeling that his presence here was one of the proudest ornaments of this Hall, and that his withdrawal from it will leave an intellectual void which generations must pass away, in the ordinary course of Providence to men, before we shall see it filled with his like again. His talents and his reputation are the common property of his country, and for one I have ever looked upon them with pride as an American citizen. If my honorable friend from Georgia—

Mr. CUTHBERT. I hope the Senator will drop the expression "friend."

Mr. RIVES. Most cheerfully, if he says so. If the Senator from Georgia, then, had looked as inquisitively into the evidence of the opinions of the Senator from Massachusetts on this important and delicate topic, which has been given to the world during the last four or five months, as he seems to have done into those supposed to have been uttered by him twenty-odd years ago in a town meeting of Boston, he would have seen what he has said under circumstances of the most solemn and imposing character. At the city of Richmond, in the month of October last, on the sacred portico of the Capitol of Virginia, before an assemblage of ten thousand of her freemen—beneath the light of an October sun—in the face of Heaven—he declared, in the most solemn manner, under all the responsibilities of his character and his station, that it was his well-settled and unchangeable opinion that there is no power, direct or indirect, in Congress or the General Government, to interfere, in any manner whatever, in the slightest degree, with the subject of slavery or the institutions of the South. A declaration so broad, so complete, so unequivocal, so emphatic, proceeding from such a man, in such a presence, could not but make a profound impression. These memorable words are on record. They were taken down at the time, and they have been given to the world under the revision of the Senator from Massachusetts himself. Here, then, is the authentic and recorded evidence of the deliberate and final opinions of that distinguished gentleman on the whole of this delicate subject; and it is but an act of common justice that he should be tried and judged by them. Let the Senator from Georgia prosecute his inquiries, by referring to these recent and authentic proofs of the sentiments of the distinguished citizen of Massachusetts; and, if they should fail to satisfy him, he will have this further consolation, that, though that gentleman is removed from this theatre of his public labors, he will not be beyond the reach of any legitimate inquiries in that higher post of duty and responsibility, his accession to which has been hailed, as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] has just remarked, by the general voice of the country. He will be happy, I doubt not, to answer any inquiries which may be conveyed to him, in courteous and proper terms, from an unprejudiced source. My only regret is, that he is not now here to answer the arraignment of the Senator from Georgia, face to face.

Mr. CUTHBERT. None can regret it more than I; no man regrets it one ten-thousandth part as much. I tell the Senator that I have been seeking for the document on which I base my inquiry. Does the Senator believe me, or must I prove it? I repeat the assurance, that I have been waiting for that document, and that only. But I am not sorry for what has occurred. It pleases me. I am glad. I am glad the attention of the country has been fixed upon the fact; it cannot now escape investigation. It will now be seen what has been said of my much-injured State—a State I love with burning affection. I hug her to my heart in proportion as she is assailed and assaulted from abroad.

I say, then, that at a public meeting held in the city of Boston, on the subject of slavery, and for a purpose which the South cannot approve, a committee was appointed to bring in a report. The gentleman from Massachusetts was chairman of that meeting; and one of the resolutions reported by the committee was in nearly the very words uttered by him on this floor. I would have called on him for an explanation before now, but I wished first to procure the document, that I might be sure I was right. It shall yet be produced; and I say again, that I am glad the eyes of the country, the eyes of the whole world, have been turned to this proceeding, and to the heretical opinion advanced by the Senator from Massachusetts. Two or three years since, that Senator carefully investigated the subject of slavery, and in this document he declares it as his opinion that Congress has the constitutional authority to prevent the transportation of slaves from one State to another. It is a case made out; the proof shall be adduced, and it is of itself sufficient to excite the suspicion of the South. The opinion has been spread abroad, and it has every where been quoted on his authority.

Now, if the Senator has changed his opinion, is he not bound to retract this expression of it? If he has formerly expressed an opinion which he now knows to be false and unsound; if he knows, at the same time, that that opinion, as his, has gained currency, and that it furnishes the very form in which the war is carried on against us, and if, under these circumstances, he refuses to do justice to the South, what must be his moral structure? The opinion gains authority in his own State, and it is promulgated abroad as an opinion supported by his authority. If he knows this, and does not contradict it, he re-affirms it. And am I then to be told that the certain vague and general expressions used by him on the steps of the Capitol of Virginia avail to cancel all this? The cancer is spreading, it approaches the vital parts, the patient is in danger, and then we are told that there is some panacea or quack medicine which has been vended for the cure of the disease. A Senator from South Carolina put the document in my hands at the last session. I thought at that time of bringing up the Senator before the people, but the document escaped me, and I have sought it since, with the express intention to make that use of it. I say that the Senator from Massachusetts has set up doctrines which throw open all the South to her enemies, which leave us no barrier for our defence, and with nothing to prevent the sea from rushing in to overwhelm us. The mischief has been done: it has been done by the expression of that opinion: it must be retracted: forgiveness must be asked from a much injured people: there must be repentance, add not only repentance, but reform. The Senator must not profess to repent, and still retain the emoluments of sin. He must not retain popularity at the North for one opinion, and tell the South that he has changed it, and holds another. I say again that I rejoice that the attention of the world has been called to this debate. The Senator has been pledged by his friend to answer. If he shall answer and retract the opinion, then his authority, in the degree in which it will now prevail, and that is but a poor degree, will atone for the mischief he has done. If he does all he possibly can to counteract its influence, then he will stand somewhat better before our people than he now does; but if he shall not—we know our enemies.

MONDAY, March 1.

Mr. CUTHBERT rose and said: Last week, on the resignation of the Senator from Massachusetts, some remarks were made by him, in the course of which he pledged himself to prove certain points by a document which he would produce. The only essential points to which he alluded, were these two: that the Senator from Massachusetts had expressed and advocated this doctrine in certain resolutions in a memorial, that Congress had full power to prohibit the slave trade between the States; and next, that many years after the expression of this opinion, the Legislature of Massachusetts, in the course of its action on the subject of slavery, quoted the same doctrines formerly advanced by the Senator from Massachusetts, and had maintained them. His course on this occasion was simply to produce the document which he had promised to produce, and leave the thing with the Senate, as the period of the session, and the state of their business, would prevent him from desiring that any thing more should be said.

Mr. PHELPS rose to a point of order. He inquired what business there was before the Senate—at present there was nothing before them for the action of the house.

Mr. CUTHBERT hoped the Senator from Vermont would not insist upon his point of order. He (Mr. CUTHBERT) stood before the country pledged to do what he now desired to do; and he inquired whether the Senator from Vermont would not permit him to put himself in a proper position before the country?

The PRESIDENT said the Chair was always disposed to extend courtesy and liberality to Senators, when it was desired to make any explanation, or when a Senator wished on any subject to set himself right, as in the present case. He understood the Senator from Georgia to appeal to the courtesy of the Senate. Perhaps, according to strict rule, the Senator had no right to enter into any discussion, unless there was some specific question before the Senate; but it was the courtesy of the Senate that was now appealed to, whether he should proceed or not; and it had been usual to extend courtesy in such cases.

Mr. KING said he was fully aware that there was no rule of order to justify this discussion. For his part, he had been anxious and very willing that it should have been arrested at an early period; but it was not arrested. In the course of that discussion, his honorable friend [Mr. CUTHBERT] made certain statements—those statements were questioned—they were not directly denied, but they were questioned; and had there ever been an instance of an honorable Senator—when he had made statements which were questioned by any Senator—not being permitted, at a subsequent day, to come forward and make an explanation? There never had been such an instance. Was it said there was no rule of order to justify it? Why, did they not allow Senators to get up and speak by the hour, who concluded with a motion? and had those honorable Senators been called to order before any motion was before the Senate? No: for they supposed that a proper self-respect, and a due regard to public opinion, would prevent Senators proceeding irregularly; and therefore they had not checked them by any rule of order, when making explanations. They enforced rules to facilitate business; but when a Senator wished to put himself right, was he to be checked? The Senator from Georgia held a position, then, which demanded from that body that he should be permitted to explain.

Mr. PRESTON hoped the point of order would be withdrawn. It was the uniform practice of the Senate to permit a Senator to make an explanation, when it was thought necessary.

The PRESIDENT said, under the circumstances of the case, he should feel bound to put the question to the Senate, "Shall the Senator from Georgia be permitted to proceed?"

Mr. PHELPS said, perhaps an apology was due from him to the Senate; and he begged to say to the Senator from Georgia that he was not aware that that Senator was implicated in consequence of any thing which had been said on a former occasion. He (Mr. PHELPS) could only say, by way of apology, that he was absent from the Senate on that occasion during part of the discussion; he came in while the discussion was going on, and he found, to his regret, the Senate engaged in a discussion in relation to the opinions of an honorable Senator, which, it struck him, was entirely irrelevant; nor could he discover now how a discussion respecting the opinions of any gentleman, who may have been honored with a seat here, could be relevant, when those opinions involved nothing for the action of the Senate. When, therefore, he found that the discussion was to be renewed, he felt it to be his duty, as a member of that body, to interfere and to interrupt, if possible, a discussion tending to no result. With respect to the individual opinions of the Senator from Massachusetts, if they were of any consequence any where, it was out of doors; yet if he had supposed that the honorable Senator from Georgia had felt that he was implicated in consequence of any thing that had transpired there on a previous day, and that he felt it necessary to have an opportunity to set himself right, he (Mr. PHELPS) would not have interfered. Having said this much, he might be permitted to add, if the honorable Senator conceived now that it was necessary that he should be heard on this floor, he (Mr. PHELPS) would most cheerfully withdraw his point of order; but, at this late period of the session, it did appear to him that the discussion should be confined to some reasonable limits.

Mr. CUTHBERT said the expression used did not convey his views: he did not feel himself "implicated;" but, in the presence of the country, he had made certain statements which had been questioned; he then promised to furnish the proofs on which his statements were based, and he now called upon the Senate, as a matter of justice, to give him the opportunity to furnish his justification.

The PRESIDENT. There appears to be a general acquiescence. The Senator will therefore proceed.

Mr. CUTHBERT said he had an extract from a report made to the Legislature of Massachusetts by a committee appointed on the subject of slavery. This was the paper which he had stated he had had in his hands in 1838; the paper from which he first derived his information must have been earlier, since this debate took place in 1837. Whether there had been two reports, or whether the first document was not a report of the Legislature of Massachusetts, but from some other source, he could not say; but, passing that by, he begged the Senate to listen to the reading of this extract, which proved the Senator from Massachusetts, who had lately left this Hall, to have been first named on a committee to prepare a memorial or address to Congress, to prohibit the slave trade between the States.

The report of the Massachusetts Legislature, of which this was an extract, went further than to place the Senator from Massachusetts at the head of the committee, for it cited his opinions as those of an "eminent jurist and great constitutional lawyer." That part of the report, however, had not been copied into the extract. Now there might be a question whether this paper was or was not authentic; to this he could say he had compared it with the memorial presented to the other House, and he found it exactly to correspond, with the exception of one word. He now begged that the Clerk might be suffered to read the document.

The Secretary read it accordingly.

It purported to be a memorial, drawn up by a committee of which Mr. WEBSTER was a member. The memorial expressed the opinion that Congress had the power to prohibit the slave trade between the States.

Mr. PRESTON remembered well, some years ago, such sentiments as were there expressed being attributed to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, now no longer a Senator from that State. Whether properly attributed, he had nothing more to rely upon than the common rumor of the newspapers of the country. But more recently he had been present when declarations were made by the gentleman alluded to, which had his hearty approbation. On that occasion he did not stop to inquire what might have been the opinions of that distinguished gentleman on a former occasion; it was sufficient for him that they were now thus and thus, and it gave him great pleasure then to hear that those opinions were to be publicly pronounced. They were so pronounced at Alexandria, again in Virginia, and again in Vermont. Those declarations were deliberately made, as he (Mr. PRESTON) happened to know, and with a full sense of the solemnity of the declaration and the pledge, made for the first time in the presence of a Southern community; and he, (Mr. PRESTON,) as a Southern man, should have considered himself recreant to his duty if he had not hailed, with his utmost approbation, declarations from so high a quarter, of the correct policy of this country affecting the interests of the South. He (Mr. PRESTON) was not in a position to regret to see him come over to Southern principles and Southern interests, and he heartily rejoiced to hear so powerful a voice advocate the best and dearest interests of their country. If this were a change of opinion in the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, it struck him (Mr. PRESTON) as evidence of a change of opinion in the Northern country in favor of the South, and of ground to hope for future changes, for, for a long time past, most unconstitutional doctrines had been held in the North which had a tendency to be fatal to the United States, but were especially deleterious to the interests of the South, which he represented; and therefore he hailed, enthusiastically hailed the declaration of these opinions with delight. He thought it was a most auspicious event, and he was glad that he was there present to bring it about. It may have been a change; he had not inquired whether it were so or not, but he had marked a progressing change of late years. Why, ten years ago gentlemen from the South were willing to get up and move the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia; and gentlemen south of the Potomac, who, he knew, were prepared to move then in the District of Columbia, would now shrink from it as dangerous and abhorrent to them. Changes were going on at which he rejoiced. He especially rejoiced to hear the declarations made at Alexandria by such a man; he was also rejoiced that the pledge to proclaim the opinions then expressed elsewhere, had been redeemed. He then read an extract from Mr. WEBSTER's Richmond speech, to show the opinions which that gentleman now entertained, and he added that he felt confident the rights and interests of the South might be safely entrusted to him.

Mr. CUTHBERT said, after what had been said it would be difficult to force him into a discussion. There was nothing which had been uttered by the Senator from South Carolina which had not been anticipated by him in his remarks to the Senate last week. The essence of those remarks was perfectly where it was; the remarks were general in their nature; the expressions were strong and absolute expressions of a specific doctrine; and not only was it true that such specific doctrines were maintained, but it was also true that they were maintained on the sanction and authority of the Senator from Massachusetts. Now, if that Senator had infused a virus into the political veins, it should be followed by the antidote of his great and high authority. But what authority that man ought to be entitled to, who declared that the clause of the Constitution giving power to regulate trade might be used for the prohibition of trade, he (Mr. CUTHBERT) could not understand. What would be said by the citizens of Massachusetts if Congress, under the authority to regulate trade, should prevent them carrying their manufactures to North Carolina, or to Virginia, or Georgia? Why, it would meet with their strongest expressions of pity. Well, then, if the opinions of this same "eminent jurist, this great constitutional lawyer," had been expressed so absurdly, what was to be thought of either his head or his heart? If the defect were in his head, what became of all those great eulogies which they had had of him, and of all that lavishment of praise which they had heard in the course of the last week? If in his heart—were they feelings of the people whom the Senator from South Carolina represented, could approve? But let him show the Senate the danger of trusting in general declarations. At the time of this debate, in 1837, he thought the Senator from South Carolina would not say the Senator from Massachusetts had made any expression of that change of opinion which had since been made, yet at that time he uttered general expressions in relation to the power of Congress to act on the States, as strong as the English language could afford. At that time, as reported in Gales and Seaton's Register of Debates—

"Mr. WEBSTER said he could not perceive the cause of that warmth which had been exhibited by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. Rives,] while he was so strenuously exhorting other gentlemen to keep cool. That Senator could not express more strongly the want of power in the General Government to interfere with slavery in the States than Mr. W. had often and always done. The Senator had said, however, that those only were interested in this subject who were suffering in the immediate presence of the evil. This Mr. W. could not but consider as a great mistake. Mr. W. though living in a Northern State, and a State non-slaveholding, felt that evil too, from the train of consequences which it inevitably drew after it. He had as deep an interest in the peace and the preservation of the Union as the Senator from Virginia."

When he rose it was simply with the intention of laying the document before the Senate which had been read, and he had no desire to prolong the discussion respecting the opinions of the Senator from Massachusetts: all personal intercourse between him and that gentleman had ceased for years, as was known to many; for the course of that gentleman, it was clear to his mind, was hostile to the interests of the South. His [Mr. WEBSTER's] great ability no one would dispute, but his great ability gave him a more fatal power to work mischief. Great talents were given from on high to be applied to the good of mankind. Intellect! what is it unless connected with moral qualities? What is it without sympathy with mankind, without magnanimity, without a deep sense of what is due to the people? He is a mere monster of intellect who does not join to it moral qualities. Whence, then, did the Senator from Kentucky derive his topics of praise? Perhaps, however, this was to cease.

Mr. CLAY hoped the Senator from Georgia would go on if he had anything to say respecting him, (Mr. CLAY.)

Mr. CUTHBERT. Well, then, with respect to that Senator, it was well known that more than one great crisis had taken place in this country. The first great crisis was the war with Great Britain; the next was when the whole country was agitated on the subject of the tariff. On the first was there any unity of action between the two Senators? [Mr. CLAY and Mr. WEBSTER.] And on the second, when it was compromise or civil war, were they not equally opposed? Then the Senator from Massachusetts sternly contended for no compromise. Good God! at this crisis of my country thou didst carry her through, and I returned thee my humble thanks. The third great crisis was this matter of Abolition. Look at the document presented this day and its reproduction by the Legislature of Massachusetts, and at the whole course of the Senator from Massachusetts, which he had pursued in this Hall. As he had before said, God had given to certain individuals great talents, but for them he would demand an account hereafter. Oh, then, my God! how happy would the Senator from Massachusetts have been if he had known how to improve them! He should have had firmness enough to have said, Oh, my countrymen you have been misled! Oh, my countrymen, if you ever reposed confidence in my judgment and my counsel, abstain from this fatal course!

Mr. CLAY regretted extremely to have been called out in the manner in which he had been by the Senator who had just resumed his seat. He thought with the Senator from Vermont, that this debate was wholly irregular; nor was there any necessity to create an occasion for that exhibition of proof which had been made by the Senator from Georgia, for in a few days the nomination of the late Senator from Massachusetts, to a high office, would be before the Senate, and then the Senator from Georgia might have presented them to the Senate. But since there had been an indulgence granted by the presiding officer to the Senator from Georgia, and as he had thought proper to allude to certain differences of opinion between the late Senator from Massachusetts and himself, (Mr. CLAY) he asked the indulgence of the Senate while he made a few observations in reply. No error could be greater than to judge of human nature by a single quality, or a single opinion. If there must be a coincidence of opinion, both abstract and practical, between any two men before they were brought together—

Mr. CUTHBERT made some observation which was not distinctly heard.

Mr. CLAY. I will not be interrupted.

Mr. CUTHBERT again attempted to be heard.

Mr. CLAY continued, with some warmth. I will not, I cannot, be interrupted. I will not permit an interruption. The practice is much too common; it is not parliamentary; it is too much tolerated in another place in this Capitol, and I trust it will not be continued here. He then resumed his remarks, and observed that no error could be greater than to select a single opinion of any being, whereby to judge of his whole character or of his fitness for office. But what was the accusation brought by the Senator from Georgia? Why, there was a provision in the Constitution of the United States, that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes. There was another, which provided that there should be no prohibition of the importation of certain persons therein described, prior to 1808. It appeared that both had remained to this day unacted upon, except that relating to the foreign slave trade. Now, a reference was made by the Senator from Georgia to the opinions of the Senator from Massachusetts in connection with these provisions. That which gives power to regulate commerce was one about which there was a great diversity of opinion. His (Mr. CLAY's) opinion was, and he had recently taken occasion to express it, that the power to regulate did not imply prohibition, but the removal of obstacles. But suppose it was a case perfectly clear, in which the Senator from Massachusetts was wrong, was he to be judged by a single error of opinion? With whom, at this moment, was the Senator from Georgia acting? The distinguished Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN.] Did, then, the Senator from Georgia hold to the doctrine of nullification?

Mr. CUTHBERT. No.

Mr. CLAY. Did the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Georgia concur on all points? He asked the pardon of the Senator from South Carolina for thus referring to him; it was with no desire to be personal, but for the sake of illustration. He again asked if those two Senators agreed on all points, whether of policy or practice? No: they were to take human character by the tout ensemble, by its whole extent, and not by a single feature. Now, to pursue this idea: the honorable Senator from Georgia reminded him that on three great occasions, according to his [Mr. CUTHBERT's] opinion, which have occurred in the history of this country, the Senator from Massachusetts and himself (Mr. CLAY) have differed. Well, what were they? The first was the late war with Great Britain, and it was very true that the Senator from Massachusetts then differed from him, (Mr. CLAY.) He thought that Senator was then wrong; he (Mr. CLAY) thought the interest, the honor, and the character of the country demanded that war. The Senator from Massachusetts thought otherwise; and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CUTHBERT] was with him, (Mr. CLAY.) But he would tell them there was another war, infinitely more disastrous to the country; and in that war where stood the Senator from Georgia and his gallant friend from Massachusetts? He alluded to that domestic war, which from the inmost recesses of his soul he abhorred, which was commenced under the command of Andrew Jackson, against the liberties of this country. Where stood the Senator from Georgia then? Why, the Senator from Georgia fought against him (Mr. CLAY) and his friends until the country stood redeemed from the dangers with which it was threatened. And where was his friend from Massachusetts? Why, in the midst of the fight, battling for the liberties of the people until the conquest was achieved. Well, was he to agree with the Senator from Georgia because that Senator agreed with him respecting the British war, rather than with the Senator from Massachusetts, who disagreed with him (Mr. CLAY) about that foreign war, but was with him in relation to the domestic contest of the last twelve years?

But, again, they were reminded of the case of the compromise, and they were told that the Senator from Massachusetts was willing to leave the country to the possibility of a civil war. But did that Senator stand alone on that occasion? Where were the Senators from Missouri and New York? [Messrs. BENTON and WRIGHT.] Why, they differed as much from him (Mr. CLAY) about the adoption of the compromise as the Senator from Massachusetts ever did. Did the Senator from Georgia find it difficult then to co-operate with the Senators from Missouri and New York? No; he was heart and glove—he was heart and hand with them in all their measures. Well, the third crisis in which the Senator from Georgia said he (Mr. CLAY) and the Senator from Massachusetts differed was about Abolition. He could only repeat here what he had before declared, as far as he knew and believed, that the opinions of the Senator from Massachusetts were just as much adverse to Abolition as the opinions of the Senator from Georgia himself were adverse to Abolition. That there were dangers impending over this Republic, and would continue over it, they must disregard all the lessons of experience and of history if they did not believe. But let him tell them what was the greatest danger which threatened this country in reference to the delicate subject to which the Senator from Georgia had referred. It was in ultraism. It was in the ultraism of the South on the one hand—of a small portion of the South on the one hand, and the ultraism of Abolition on the other. The course of safety lay in a moderate, firm, resolute determination to maintain the rights of the South—the just, constitutional rights of the South, in their fullest extent, against all attacks, not being led off into an extreme by attacks on the one hand, or frightened into extremes on the other. He had been led off on this subject farther than he had intended to have gone, or he might have referred to another coincidence of opinion of the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Massachusetts, and a difference of those Senators from him, (Mr. CLAY.) He might be mistaken, but he believed the Senator from Georgia was a member of the other House in 1824, at the passage of the tariff act; and where stood the Senator from Massachusetts then? Acting by the side of the Senator from Georgia, if he were there, and by the side of that Senator's friends, if he were absent, and opposed to him, (Mr. CLAY.) Why, during the long course of thirteen years he had agreed with the Senator from Massachusetts, and differed with the Senator from Massachusetts; during the same period he had also agreed with the Senator from Georgia and differed with the Senator from Georgia; and if the Senator from Georgia would undertake to calculate all the coincidences of opinion and the differences in that period, he would work out a far more difficult problem than a friend of his (Mr. CLAY's) in the other House had undertaken, in an attempt to prove that Vermont, and not Kentucky, was entitled to the honor of "the Banner State."

Mr. CUTHBERT thought it hardly necessary to reply to the Senator from Kentucky, or he should be drawn to give importance to that which was not entitled to so much consideration. The honorable Senator's subsequent remarks were inaudible at the Reporter's desk, but he was understood to characterize something as "audacious."

Mr. CLAY rose and said: I wish to know if the Senator applies to me? If he does, I will call him to order.

Mr. CUTHBERT continued. The Senator from Kentucky was himself in the habit of using very provoking language to others. Now let them consult nothing but the public good, instead of consulting nothing but the excitement of factions; and when the Senator from Kentucky learned proper courtesies towards his opponents, he should meet with nothing but courtesy from him, (Mr. CUTHBERT,) and not till then.

After some further remarks by Mr. CUTHBERT and Mr. RIVES.

Mr. WALKER spoke at some length, being drawn into the debate by the allusions of honorable Senators to the Mississippi case then pending in the Supreme Court, into the merits of which he entered with some minuteness.

After a few observations from Messrs. PRESTON, CLAY, CUTHBERT, and BUCHANAN,

Mr. WRIGHT appealed to the Senate whether they would not take up the appropriation bills which were ready to be passed; for that purpose he would suggest that the Senate should take a recess, and meet again at 5 o'clock.

This was agreed to; and the Senate then adjourned until 5 o'clock.

TREASURY NOTE BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. VANDERPOEL, OF NEW YORK.

In the House of Representatives, Monday, February 1, 1841.—In Committee of the Whole on the Treasury note bill.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said, he did not propose to take a part in the discussion of the bill under consideration from any apprehension that it would not pass. He was very sure, if the time should ever come when we could get a vote upon it, it would pass, and that, too, by a most decided majority. At the same time, it seemed to be regarded by one side of the House as furnishing a fit occasion for keeping up a constant fire upon an outgoing Administration. His connection with the committee that reported the bill, and not a disposition to inflict a long speech on this committee, tempted him to invoke enough of its time and attention to enable him to answer a few of what he deemed the unfounded statements and wild speculations of some of the gentlemen who had already addressed the committee.

Complaints loud and deep had been uttered against the Secretary of the Treasury, because he had not given seasonable and more explicit warning in his annual reports of his intention to apply to us for leave to issue Treasury notes. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] had more than insinuated that these annual reports had usually presented a most fair and flattering state of things, since a resort to Treasury notes for relief had been fashionable, because they were printed by thousands, culled through the whole of this extended country, and read by every inquiring citizen; and that, after the session was well advanced, and not till then, would the Secretary intimate the probability of his requiring relief. This was not only impeaching the action, but the motives, if not the veracity, of the Secretary; and Mr. V. thought that common justice required that gentlemen should be well convinced that such allegations were incontrovertibly founded in truth before they ventured to make them. He had, last year, when a similar bill was under consideration, showed the injustice of a similar charge, by reading a few paragraphs from the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury; and justice to that faithful officer required him to call to the recollection of the honorable member, who had now accused the Secretary of this sort of disingenuousness, a few passages of the Secretary's annual report.

In page ten of the document to which he had just referred, the Secretary uses the following very explicit language:

"It will be observed, however, that though, under either of these arrangements, enough might be obtained within the whole of 1841, for the objects contemplated, yet not a due or sufficient proportion in the first quarters, because, by that time, all the measures are not likely to go into full operation, nor much of the anticipated increase to happen in the actual receipts of duties under existing laws. Unusually heavy expenses will also fall on that quarter in the next year. In addition to a full portion of most of the current expenses, and the whole of the pension payments for the first half of the year, and one-third of a million or more for all the annual fishing bounties, there will be imposed on it most of the charges for the whole year connected with the session of Congress and private bills, as well as large payments for taking the census, and for the first instalment of the debt of this district; several of them as early even as the first day of January.

"From these circumstances, and the consideration that all which is due from the banks may not be then paid, and that the balance in the Treasury, under the policy adopted by Congress of late years will, of necessity, be small, while the fluctuations and inequalities are very great between the receipts and expenditures in different portions of the year, to which we are constantly exposed from causes that have, on former occasions, been explained at length, it must be obvious that entire safety requires a conditional power to be seasonably conferred on the Executive to obtain, at any time within 1841, such subsidiary means as may be needed for a few months, and as may be sufficient to enable the Treasury punctually to discharge, during that year, all the liabilities imposed by Congress."

Now Mr. V. appealed to those gentlemen who had been so ready to charge the Secretary of the Treasury with a want of candor, whether they had sustained the charge. He tells you, in language as explicit as he could well employ, that safety requires a conditional power to be not only conferred, but "seasonably" conferred on the Executive, to obtain such subsidiary means as may be sufficient to enable the Treasury punctually to discharge all the liabilities imposed upon it by Congress. What more emphatic notification do you require of his apprehended wants—of the necessity of your seasonable interposition to secure the means necessary to discharge with punctuality and fidelity all the liabilities of the Government? Do you want him to "hit the bird in the eye," in the suggestion of a remedy? to tell you in so many words, that he will want Treasury notes? Now he has not said enough to suit you; but had he told you that "Treasury notes" were the proper remedy, he would have said entirely too much. Then would we have seen gentlemen bristle up, and repel with most terrific indignation, such an impudent specimen of Executive dictation. Then would they have said, and with much propriety, too, that it was enough for the Secretary to tell us that the disease existed, and that it was the sole province of our wisdom to determine what was the appropriate remedy; but now, it suited their purpose to say that the mere announcement, in plain language, of the wants of the Treasury, was not enough; that the Secretary ought to have gone one step farther, and told us what was the suitable remedy. To satisfy gentlemen, then, seemed to be out of the question. If the Secretary go to the very verge of his constitutional duty, he does not go far enough; and if he should step one inch over it, and presume to entrench upon our high prerogatives, then is he guilty of impertinence and usurpation, highly derogatory to our rights and dignity.

It had been said that the friends of the outgoing Administration seemed actuated by a niggardly spirit in regard to the amount of sustenance and support which they proposed to measure out to their successors. He was sure our adversaries did us injustice, in entertaining this supposition. We know too well the men who are soon to be in the ascendant; how hungry they are; how impatient for the spoils, to have it in our hearts to measure out to them a stinted allowance. It is our purpose, before we deliver the assets over to our successors, to fill the crib reasonably full; but whether any reasonable portion of liberality would suffice to fill it full enough to satisfy all the lean, lank, hungry, spoils-renouncing patriots who intended to fasten upon public bounty, must be a matter of doubt to all, who see how extravagant are the hopes, and how numerous the army which is rushing to the manger. At the same time that we should be willing to make the incoming Administration a liberal allowance for its sustenance and support, it should not be done with such liberality as would be apt to conduce to extravagance and prodigality. When young men come into the possession of their estates, it were always well for them to be at first restricted in their power to spend and squander. The fact of having, all at once, too much money under their control, oftentimes leads them into extravagances and vices, from which a more judicious and restricted allowance would save them. Much additional weight to the natural force of this latter consideration was added by the fact, that the past habits and well known principles of those who were soon to assume the administration of the Government, afforded no very satisfactory pledge that public economy stood very high in their catalogue of virtues. Is not this evident from the burden of the song of the champions of the new Administration, who have addressed the committee; from the vigorous and most unnatural effort they have made to prove, in the very teeth of all authentic evidence, that there is already a public debt of many millions of dollars, for which immediate and permanent provision should be made? To prove this seemed to be the primary object of the three gentlemen Neckars of the House, [Messrs. BARNARD, BELL and EVANS.] But what was quite amusing to him was, to behold in these honorable members such a complete harmony of purpose—such an identity of object, and at the same time, such a striking discrepancy in the mode and means of attaining their end. His honorable colleague, [Mr. BARNARD] who seemed rather bolder in figures and calculations than either of his distinguished coadjutors, had cyphered up, to his own entire apparent satisfaction, a debt of forty millions of dollars! The other two gentlemen had been a little more modest, but the roads they travelled, to reach the object for which they started, were as dissimilar as were generally the ways of travellers who, in the fulness of their own self sufficiency, chose to repudiate the guides and landmarks which controlled the direction of the more wise and docile. Before the three gentlemen started upon their common voyage to discover and fish for a public debt, it would have been well for them to have compared notes and briefs, agreed upon the regions, they should traverse, and the direction they would pursue to reach a common destination. Then, perhaps, would not faith in the existence of the object of discovery have been weakened, as it had been on this occasion, by discordant accounts of its nature and character on the part of the learned navigators who professed to have found it. He would, in another part of his remarks, present in a more striking manner than it was in order here to do, the differences of the three honorable gentlemen, who had striven so hard on this occasion. From their strained and most unnatural effort to invalidate the testimony of the fiscal officer of your Government, whose duty it was to know whether the nation was or was not charged with a heavy debt, he had sometimes thought that they might feel a joy at the discovery of a debt, proportioned to the benefits to which they supposed it might lead. If so, it was not surprising, if they felt an anxiety to demonstrate its existence, corresponding with their high estimate of its utility.

26TH CONG....2ND SESS.

Treasury Note Bill—Mr. Vanderpool.

H. of Reps.

Mr. V. said he was sure that at least two of the gentlemen who had preceded him in this debate, [Messrs. BARNARD and EVANS] were the advocates of a National Bank, a high protective tariff, and of a transfer to the States of that portion of our revenue which exists in our rich public domain; and it would be in accordance with a most familiar law of our nature, if upon very slight, and to unprejudiced minds, unsatisfactory evidence, they should be ready to adopt the conclusion, that the nation was already staggering under a heavy debt. It would be according to the principle, that our convictions are too apt to run with our wishes. The honorable members well know, if they know any thing, that they might create as many National Bank charters as they pleased, and they could never get the stock taken up without the aid of a national debt; that Congress must not only create the mould, the charter for a bank, but must also furnish the means, the metal or liquid wherewith to fill it. A bank, with a capital of between fifty and seventy-five millions of dollars, seemed now to be deemed indispensable by the bank-adoring party, to which the reins of Government were soon to be committed. In the absence of a public debt and Government stock, where are you going to get the means of filling it up? There is not enough of surplus and unemployed capital in this country, for so gigantic a purpose; and foreign capitalists have had too recent experience of the sad effects of their connection with "a Bank of the United States," to be willing again to commit their fortunes to its care and keeping. Our repeated suspensions and revulsions were not very well calculated to inspire confidence on the part of foreign capitalists in American investments. Can it be believed that they will invest in the stock of a Bank to be managed by a few individuals, over whom they have no direct control, and who may be entire strangers to them, when they can purchase your good six per cent. State stocks at a handsome discount? When all this was so palpable to the most superficial observer, it would not be wonderful if the National Bank portion of this House should look upon a permanent national debt with sentiments of favor, knowing, as they did, that their pet Mammoth Regulator could have no other reliable nursing mother.

But, sir, there are other objects near and dear to the hearts of the party which is soon to be in the ascendant, to the attainment of which, the immediate, actual, or seeming existence of a national debt was indispensable. The decree has already gone forth, from a quarter which we are bound to regard as more than semi-official, that an extra session of Congress must be called. This cannot be done, with any thing like grace, without the necessity of providing for some pressing financial emergency. The danger of war not being imminent enough to justify a call of Congress, some other pretence must be fabricated; and what is so easy as to question the ability of so cumbersome a machine as the Treasury Department of this Government to meet its engagements? Collecting and disbursing between twenty and thirty millions of dollars per year, with so many objects of expenditure, which the imagination of ultra bankites, tariffites, and distributionists, can increase and increase, in proportion to their extravagant estimate of the requirements of "the public good and general welfare," it would not be extraordinary if the heated fancy of gentlemen, so eager to convince themselves and others that all is not well, should discover, to their own entire satisfaction, that this machine is out of gear. The three erudite and astute financiers who have filed their articles of "impeachment" against the Secretary of the Treasury, no doubt imagine that they have demonstrated this fact, and thus created a fair pretext for an extra session. He, Mr. V. had already lived long enough to know, that whenever a party movement was resolved upon, it never failed for want of a pretext. There was much of point and wisdom in the familiar saying, that the man "who wanted to kill a rabid animal could always find a stick." So the politicians who wanted an extra session for the purpose of hurrying on measures which they feared would lose ground in the public mind from postponement and discussion, would surely not fail of their purpose for want of a reason; and it would be strange, indeed, if that reason was not the alleged result of the folly or wickedness of the past Administration—an inability to keep the wheels of Government in motion through the year because of financial embarrassments. Your pretext for an extra session is an impoverished Treasury, which will render it difficult to get through the year without additional aid. This, said Mr. V. was the pretended, but was not the true moving cause of an extra session of Congress. The party so lately victorious were too impatient to wait the natural course of time for the execution of those measures (of abominations, as he believed,) which they intended to fasten upon the country. The Independent Treasury law must be instantly repealed, because, if you give it another year's chance, fairly to try its operation, all your predictions as to its disastrous effects will be falsified; the public lands must be divided among the States to advance the interests of speculators in State stocks, credit-system bankrupts, and Eastern manufacturers, British capitalists, and some other favored associations, always excepting the people at large—the working, unassuming, quiet, tax paying portion of the community; outfits must be provided for new missions abroad, or for new ministers to be appointed instead of old and recalled ones, as a reward for partisan service, and as a pledge of the sincerity of yourselves and your chief in fulminating such repeated denunciations against the odious "spoils system;" and last, though not least, a huge National Bank must be chartered to complete the subjection of the freeborn people of this country to the money power of England and America. These are the choice blessings, the "measures of relief," you now contemplate, and which you are too eager to usher into being, to be willing to defer their consummation, until the periodical meeting of the National Legislature. A special session of Congress must be convened with a view to these gigantic measures. Why not deal candidly with us, and tell us that these constitute the necessity for your called session? Why, still further, persist in your non-committal and hypocritical game—professing one motive, and actuated by another; professing one object, and actually aiming at another? Why preach to us volumes about the condition of the Treasury for the coming year, when the wants of the Treasury, real or imaginary, constitute the least of all your anxieties; when your true object is, to hurry through measures which you had not the manliness to avow during the canvass which preceded your triumph. Mr. V. said that, were he nothing but a partisan, and had nothing but the good of party in view, he would not deplore an extra session, called, as it would be, if called at all, for the purposes which he had already indicated. Let the triumphant party meet here during the scorching months of June or July, before the exacerbation of feelings consequent upon recent disappointment had subsided, and, his word for it, very few weeks would exhibit it in a light which its very few disinterested friends would have cause to deplore. Distractions, divisions, and heartburnings would be the order of the day. We have already heard the rumbling echoes which precede the storm. We knew, full well knew, that the discordant, heterogeneous materials of which this party was composed, foreboded a certain, if not a speedy dissolution. We knew that the strict constructionist of the South, and the extreme, reckless latitudinarian of the North, could not long labor together in peace in the same vineyard. Though opposite elements may have coalesced for a temporary object, we knew that the Abolitionist of the North and the slaveholder of the South could not long harmoniously jog on together in the same pathway; but we hardly expected such early and decisive demonstrations as we have already beheld. We were quite confident that once in possession of the Government, you could no longer play a General Mum—mere log cabin and hard cider—game; that then you would be obliged, not only to show, but to practice your principles; that stripped of your coon-skin covering your jarring and incohesive elements would stand out in their original and most porous nakedness; and that soon, very soon after their exposure to a cheated and a humbugged people, it would be our privilege, upon the door of some deserted log cabin, erected peradventure by dandies and bank bought satellites, to inscribe your epitaph in something like the following sentiments: "Here stands a memento of bank, hard cider, Whigery of 1840. Having triumphed by concealing its principles, it expired the moment necessity led to their avowal." Yes, depend upon it, gentlemen, yours is not to be the privilege of resting upon a bed of roses, extra session, or no extra session. Your troubles are now just commencing, and from Indian claims, as presented to us by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the coming year, amounted to about eight hundred thousand dollars. This, he had been assured, would be sufficient to answer all the purposes for the year; and as the gentleman had already been shown to be so wide of the mark in relation to other items, he would place his own inability to ascertain any legitimate foundation for this charge, and the estimates and assurances of the Department within whose province the subject legally came, against the assertion of his colleague, that such a charge "probably" existed.

Before he dismissed the consideration of this list of "ascertained and certain" liabilities, he must say a few words upon another most material item—one whose amount surely entitled it to notice. He alluded to the sum of five millions set down by his colleague [Mr. BARNARD] as the "value" of annuities to Indians, payable part in perpetuity, and part for terms of years. How had this large amount been attained? The process by which it was arrived at was a most extraordinary one, and well entitled his colleague to the distinction of being a very prodigy in cyphering out liabilities against that "wealthy old gentleman," (the Government) whom he so felicitously alluded to in the course of his speech. The Government of the United States was bound by treaty stipulations to pay certain sums annually as annuities to certain tribes of Indians. It had not stipulated to pay them ultimately any large sum by way of principal, but to pay them fixed sums yearly; to some of the tribes for stipulated terms of years, and to others in perpetuity. The amount required to be thus annually paid to these Indian tribes was about

More than this under past annuity stipulations could not be annually charged upon the Treasury. But his colleague, being a little of a lawyer, as well as poet and arithmetician, had learned, no doubt, that there was such a thing as the Northampton table, used by courts of equity to ascertain the value of annuities; and by way of increasing the immediate charges upon the Treasury, he sees fit to apply this table to these annuities in order to ascertain their immediate gross market value; thus substituting for the inquiry, what will the Government be obliged, for four or ten years to come, to pay on account of Indian annuities, that so irrelevant to the question now before us, what gross sum could capitalists afford to pay immediately to the Indians for their interest in these annuities? Now, was not this mode of fabricating formidable "ascertained and certain liabilities" against the Government strange, "passing strange?" Follow out this principle as to other fixed and annual charges, in the form of salaries, on the Treasury, in favor of officers, some for life, and others for terms of years. He would bring his colleague, with his new principle in its nakedness, before the mirror which he would now suspend, and see whether even paternal affection would blind him to the weakness and deformity of his bantling. Your judges hold their offices for life, or during good behaviour, which amounts, practically, to a life tenure. Would it not be just as proper to apply to the salaries of all your judges the same rule which his colleague had applied to the Indian annuities—to ascertain their gross and immediate value, according to the Northampton table, and thus swell the immediate charges upon the Government? He was very sure that his colleague would pronounce such a process of ascertaining the extent of the liabilities of the Government "certain" or "probable," most preposterous—yes, nearly allied to madness. And yet, for the life of him, he (Mr. V.) could not see why the principle was not as applicable in the one case as in the other. This was only another illustration of the danger of starting with an inflexible determination to attain a fixed result, without being well assured that the means at command would legitimately lead to it. He had too much respect for the intellect of his colleague, not to believe that, if unclouded by political bias, it would have avoided the palpable heresies into which it had, on this occasion, permitted itself to run.

Another item put forth by gentlemen as "ascertained and certain," was $1,200,000 "amount required by law to make good the deficit in the navy pension fund." He did not see how this could be regarded as a "positive and certain charge" on the Treasury. The navy pension fund had been exhausted under the former legislation of Congress. He did not know that there was any positive obligation on the part of the Government to replace it. At all events, Congress would, rather as matter of gratuity, than of positive obligation, have to provide by law for replacing this fund, before it could be regarded as a charge on the Treasury. It was very easy to swell the "probable" wants of the Treasury to one hundred millions of dollars, if some gentlemen were permitted to make their opinion of what Congress ought to do, the basis of "probable" or "certain" charges. That such opinions oftentimes contemplated a reckless and most prodigal system of expenditure, from which the economist and strict constructionist would shrink back appalled, he need only refer to the peroration of his colleague's speech, in which he strung together a series of fond hopes as to what this Administration would do, and do, too, "without any cowardly apprehension that they might not be popular." His colleague seemed to have no idea that the action of the representative should be palsied by the will of his constituent; that the approbation or disapprobation of the people, should be a consideration, much to be heeded in the discharge of our high duties here.

Mr. V. would now inquire what had become of this formidable, account of "ascertained and certain liabilities" amounting in the aggregate to $16,515,000? It would be well enough now to make a new statement of it, with such deductions as the views he had submitted called for. It was curious to see how little remained of it.

"Amount set forth as 'actual' and 'ascertained' debt	$16,515,000
Deduct as follows:
"Debts of the District of Columbia," difference between $1,500,000 and $150,000, which includes the annual instalments of $600,000, and the interest on the debt, (difference)	$1,350,000
Amount required to be invested for Indians and Indian tribes	2,580,000
Principal sums payable to Indians	1,000,000
Amount required for navy pension fund	1,200,000
Present value of annuities to Indians	5,000,000
	11,130,000
This leaves	5,385,000
"Deduct further the item for remains of old funded certificated debts, for which he could find no authority	335,000
Difference between $4,900,000 for principal and interest of Treasury notes, and $4,500,000, being the amount reported by the Secretary of the Treasury, as required to meet said notes in 1841, (difference)	400,000
	$735,000
Balance	$4,650,000

The Secretary of the Treasury admits, that $4,500,000 will be required to redeem the outstanding Treasury notes; and that this, of course, is left a charge upon the Treasury. Deduct that amount from the above balance of $4,650,000 and there remains $150,000, which is the amount alone admitted to be due for the next instalment of principal and interest on the District debt. Where, then, is the gentleman's "certain and ascertained" balance of $16,515,000? It melts away and vanishes before the force of reason and truth like the poor frost before the sun. If the "certainties" of the gentleman are so easily transformed into nonentities, you may easily imagine what will be the fate of his mere "probabilities" and uncertainties. A word or two now, Mr. Chairman, about them.

He would not detain the committee by going through all these items, amounting to the modest sum of $19,500,000, but would advert to only two, amounting to $14,000,000; and from such specimens, the committee would be able to form some judgment as to the character of those which constituted the remaining balance of $5,500,000. The committee would be predisposed to believe that the gentleman's "probabilities" were not half as plausible as his "certainties"—questionable and unsound as they had been shown to be. The modesty of the caption which introduced the items upon which he was about to comment, coming from one so bold in figures, was, of itself, a sufficient admonition to receive them with much caution. The first item to which he would call the attention of the committee, was the sum of "$9,000,000 for the fourth instalment under the deposit act of 1836, claimed by the States." Sir, does it not require a bold spirit, indeed, to dare even to intimate the probability that the people of this country will ever consent that this Government shall increase their taxes and burdens to raise money for the purpose of deposit with, or distribution among, the States? A most opportune period, indeed, now, to raise nine millions of dollars for this purpose! Now, when you are telling us, almost in the same breath in which you put forth this strange claim in favor of the States, that, without additional taxation, you will not have revenue enough, for years to come, to keep the wheels of Government in motion. This charge is scarcely deserving of a moment's attention. He (Mr. V.) would like to see how many gentlemen upon this floor would dare to vote to tax their constituents $9,000,000 for the purpose of deposit with the States. Low as was the estimation in which he knew his colleague to hold the virtue of Governmental economy, he did not believe that even he would deem it expedient to vote for a direct proposition to impose new taxes on the people, solely with a view to such deposit or distribution. The States have no equitable claim to it. They were to be made the mere depositaries of the funds of this Government, not professedly for the benefit of the States, but for the mere convenience of the depositor. The supervenient wants of the latter had induced it to withhold a portion of the fund which it originally intended to deposit. It had a perfect right to do so; and now no equity whatever has been created in behalf of the States against this Government for the sum so withheld. This item needed no further comment: merely to state it, was sufficient to prove its absurdity.

But the next item was equal to its yokefellow. It was "for claims of American citizens for French spoils on our commerce previous to 1800, (quite likely to be allowed by Congress,) $5,000,000!" Mr. V. said he did not know whence his colleague inferred a likelihood that these claims would be allowed, except what resulted from the known prodigality of the party to which the Government was now so soon to be committed. Was such probability derivable, from the fact that for eight years this claim had been unsuccessfully pressed upon Congress, and that scarcely a voice had ever been heard here in its favor, except the eloquent and melodious one of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Cushing.] When the leading gentlemen of the dominant party inform us that special Congresses must be called to provide means to meet such claims, have we not reason to think that our most extravagant fears in relation to the fruits of the late Federal Whig victory are soon to be realized—that extravagance, taxation, a formidable national debt, and a consequent restoration of the Hamiltonian fundmonger and Bank reign, are the blessings which are to be showered down upon the people? If the claimants for spoils before 1800 are now to be provided for, are we, from this circumstance, and from the denunciations constantly lavished upon the outgoing Administration for its neglect of private claims, to infer that the next four years is to be the time of jubilee to private claimants? that millions of oft-rejected claims are now to receive from Congress a favorable response? that the Meade claim, and the countless catalogue of other oft-considered and as often rejected claims, are now to be allowed? that by carrying into execution your magnificent and extravagant schemes, you are not only to invite the people at large, by seizing upon their own effects through the medium of your taxing power, but are to pour wealth and bounty into the lap of thousands of individuals whom your more cautious and parsimonious predecessors adjudged to have no just claims upon Government? Mr. V. said he would now put it to all fair and unprejudiced minds whether statements such as he had reviewed, furnished the slightest ground for impeaching the accuracy of the Secretary of the Treasury, or the shadow of a pretext for calling an extra session, for the purpose of providing for charges against the Treasury, which the Secretary had neglected to make known? Did it not turn out that the statements and allegations of the "great impeacher" were vulnerable and fallacious in the extreme?

But while noticing the grounds upon which the reports and statements of the Secretary were attempted to be impeached, he would proceed to another ground of impeachment, assumed by another of the impeaching parties. He meant the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON.] That gentleman contented himself mainly with general and sweeping denunciations against the Secretary of the Treasury. This was a much more convenient, and much less hazardous, mode of attack, than was a descent to minutiae and figures. Besides, the gentleman from South Carolina, not hailing originally from "Down East," it was not his privilege to play quite so bold a part at mere guessing as was acted by his two Yankee coadjutors, [Messrs. BARNARD and EVANS.] I listened to this speech with great anxiety, hoping that he would make at least one plunge into facts and figures, feeling pretty well assured that he would lay himself open to me if he ventured one single step out of the more easily tilled field of wholesale denunciation. He did make one sally, and here it is:

"We are informed (says the gentleman) by the Secretary, that the amount of unexpended appropriations which will be called for in the next year, is three millions seven hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars. Here is a subsisting charge upon the Treasury to an immense amount. There is no evading it. It is not even looked to in the estimates. It must be met, and yet no provision is asked for it. Is it not surprising, that with this habitual want of forecast to see future calls upon the Treasury, and when seen, a want of candor to say so, that our Treasury is always straitened?"

Now, sir, what impression do these remarks at first blush have upon the cursory reader? Why, that there is to be a charge of three millions seven hundred and forty-nine thousand dollars upon the Treasury in 1841, which the Secretary has most culpably omitted to mention in his estimates of the wants of the Government for that year. Sir, the answer to this article of "impeachment" is as triumphant and conclusive as were those applied to the items and charges already considered. This sum of $3,749,904 is mentioned in page 8 of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, as that portion of the outstanding appropriations of former years, which was proposed to be applied to the service of 1841. In the same page the Secretary says, that the whole amount of outstanding appropriations at the close of the year is estimated at $10,549,905; and that $3,749,904 is proposed to be applied to the service of 1841. I challenge the gentleman from South Carolina to show an instance in the reports or doings of any Secretary of the Treasury since the formation of the Government, where the amount of outstanding appropriations proposed to be expended in the succeeding year, has been "estimated" or alluded to in any manner or place other than that in which Mr. Woodbury has mentioned this, viz: in the body of his annual report. You will in vain rummage all the detailed estimates of each Secretary from the days of Alexander Hamilton, for the items of unexpended appropriations proposed to be expended in any one year. It is, I repeat, always placed where the Secretary has this year placed it, in the body of his report. The misplaced declamation of the honorable member upon this topic is pretty conclusive evidence that he is unacquainted with the history and yearly operation of these outstanding appropriations. Had he applied his intelligent mind to the ascertainment of facts, and not contented himself with a strain of mere general denunciation, he would have learned that these outstanding appropriations, in any two consecutive years, are generally found to balance each other; that is to say, if $3,749,904 of the appropriations of former years shall be expended in 1841, there will, in all probability, remain of the appropriations made by Congress at this session about the same amount unexpended at the close of this year. For this reason, no doubt, all Secretaries had omitted to include in their estimates of wants for the year, the amount of unexpended appropriations proposed to be expended in that year. It seemed, then, that the arrow which the honorable gentleman levelled, as he supposed, with such deadly aim at the Secretary, had fallen harmless at the feet of its object; and while the former remain unscathed, the latter had the unenviable satisfaction of standing convicted of a gross error, in the very responsible attempt to impeach a most faithful officer of the Government.

Mr. V. said, it would not, in his opinion, be unprofitable, if he detained the committee a moment longer on this subject of outstanding appropriations. Much had been said about the Administration having, the past year, "shuffled off" the lawful claims upon the Government, in order to secure to itself the merit of confining its expenditures within its means. Yet it seemed that within that very year, when gentlemen now say the "stave off" policy prevailed, the outstanding appropriations were reduced $3,277,466. He had looked at these outstanding amounts for the four years past, and found them to have been as follows:

In 1838, (commencement of the year) they amounted to . . .	$14,503,483
In 1839, to . . .	14,698,346
In 1840, to . . .	13,827,371
In 1841, to . . .	10,549,905

Reduction in 1840, $3,277,466

The old appropriations now outstanding, it seemed, were between three and four millions of dollars less at the commencement of 1841, than they were at the beginning of 1840. The Secretary of the Treasury now, in his estimates, asks for nearly two millions less of new appropriations, than the amount expended in 1840. How can you then, unless you select new objects of expenditure—objects not embraced in the estimates—expend as much as you expended in 1840? If the peace of the country should be preserved, it would not be possible, consistently with Democratic practices, to expend more than was recommended by the Secretary; but if the givings out of the gentlemen on the other side, as to what General Harrison's administration was expected to accomplish, formed any criterion as to what was actually to be done during his term, then could we, indeed, say with certainty that the Secretary's estimates would fall far short of the wants of the Treasury. If another class of pensioners was to be created—if another system of internal improvements was to be successfully undertaken—if speculators on our lakes, bays, and inlets, were to be permitted to draw millions from the Treasury, under specious pretexts for constructing harbors for the protection of commerce—if the prodigality inseparable from the course of policy sketched and prayed for by his colleague, in the concluding parts of his speech, was to be the crowning glory of General Harrison's administration—then was it, indeed, idle to talk of an expenditure of twenty, thirty, or even forty millions of dollars per year. The wants of the Treasury would then be commensurate with the illimitable and countless objects of expenditure which the Constitution of the extremest latitudinarian embraced.

The Secretary of the Treasury informs us that the current expenses of 1840, that is, the ordinary expenses of the Government, exclusive of the redemption of Treasury notes and the interest of the debt assumed for the District of Columbia, amounted to . . . $22,489,349

He estimates the current expenses for 1841 at . . . 19,250,347

Difference . . . $3,239,002

The gentlemen on the other side seem to scout the idea of their being able to administer the Government in 1842 for less than it cost in 1841, though the expenditures for 1839 were reduced six millions of dollars, and a further reduction of about $3,000,000 was made in 1840. It seems they now fancy that the minimum point has been attained, and that all further saving is out of the question; nay, they even ridicule the advice or suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury, "to push a vigorous economy," and with an air of great triumph ask, where this economy can be applied? How changed their tone already! Before the election, how constant, how deafening, the promises of "reform and retrenchment." Already, so soon after the victory, have they ceased to be virtues in the estimation of those who, only a few months since, were so free in the promise of them.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] stands "solitary and alone" in preaching the same doctrines with which he edified the people before the election. His brother "Whigs" seem, already, to have gone back to their first love—to their constitutional predilection for a liberal expenditure and a splendid Government. Yes, the Secretary of the Treasury was literally laughed at when he ventured to suggest a single head of expenditure under which a saving might take place, without prejudice to the public service. In his annual report he ventured to make the following remarks:

"It is believed, that the ordinary expenses of 1841 ought to fall some millions below those in 1840, as the pensions have diminished by deaths, fewer Indians remain to be removed, several expensive buildings have been mostly finished, and hostilities with the Seminoles must be nearer to a close."

These remarks had formed the subject of severe animadversion with there of the gentlemen who had preceded him in this debate [Messrs. BARNARD, BELL, and EWING.] The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EWING] had told you that, under these heads, no more than the following sums could be saved:

On pensions . . .	$300,480
For removal of Indians . . .	56,710
On public buildings . . .	203,000
Seminole hostilities . . .	300,000

Total . . . $760,190

Mr. V. said it was evident that the Secretary of the Treasury did not intend to put forth the above as the only heads to which a reduction could be applied; but had evidently thrown them out as some among the many branches in which there could be a diminished expenditure. But was it true that the gentleman from Maine had stated all that could be saved under the above heads? He, Mr. V. could not believe that no more than $200,480 could be saved on pensions. This small amount did not accord with the well established, and so generally prevailing idea, that these time-honored relics of the Revolution were all on the verge of the grave, and fast paying the debt of nature. The whole number of pensioners, as reported by the Commissioner of Pensions, is 44,394. The whole number of deaths, as reported by him, is only 1,605, less than four per cent. which exhibits a mortality entirely too limited to command our belief. It is well known that the Commissioner founds his report of deaths upon information received from pension agents in various parts of the country. These agents could not, at the end of the year, know half of the deaths that had occurred within the year. They were not required to take any special pains to ascertain them, and it was not strange if the agent at Albany did not, very soon, hear of the deaths of old soldiers, who resided in the counties of Erie and Chataque. To found a reduction of this branch of expenditure upon the mere reports of the agents, was, therefore, entirely inadmissible. Nor, was the addition which the gentleman from Maine conceded sufficient. He had other data that enabled us to approximate nearer the truth. From the report of the Commissioner of Pensions it seems that the expenditures under all the acts in 1839 were . . . $3,090,664

That in 1840, they were . . . 2,048,663

Difference in one year, $1,042,001

So on public buildings: the gentleman admits that there can be saved . . . $200,000

He has, however, forgotten to add for marine hospitals . . . 20,000

Light-houses . . . 92,000

For buildings in Territories . . . 48,000

Making . . . 360,000

The last three of the above sums were all expended in 1840, and nothing of a similar character was included in the estimates for 1841. The gentleman, then, as to public buildings, reached a little more than half the amount that could actually be saved; and this was coming much nearer the mark than these high impeaching parties generally attained. Last year $350,000 was appropriated for the gradual improvement of the navy. This year there would probably be no appropriation for this purpose, as there was now no law requiring it. Besides, within the last year, all the remains of old appropriations for the Cumberland road, harbors, rivers, and forts, had been expended. Among the estimates of expenditures, you will find $125,000 expended within the last year for rivers and harbors, being part of old appropriations. You will also find that $86,000 has, within the last year, been expended for the Cumberland road in Illinois and Indiana. As to the Florida war, more than a million of dollars (about $1,500,000) appears to have been expended for it within the last year, independently of the pay and subsistence of your army there. How much, in all conscience, do gentlemen wish to have appropriated for that purpose? And was it true that the Administration was blamed for not having brought this war to a close? Had it not employed the most gallant and distinguished of your officers, including even one of the prominent Whig heroes, upon whom the eyes of so many of his party were already fixed for the highest office in the gift of the people? Need he say he alluded to the gallant Scott, the hero of Chippewa and Lundy's Lane, the lustre of whose well-earned laurels, won in bloody conflicts with his country's enemies, so many of his imprudent friends would dim by forcing him into the turbid waters of politics, and attempting to elevate him to a station for which, in his (Mr. V.'s) opinion, his habits and pursuits necessarily unfitted him? Yes, he, one of the candidates for nomination at the Harrisburg convention, had gone forth against the savages of Florida at the commencement of the war. General Jesup, another of the heroes of the second war of independence had also been put in requisition, and still the Seminole was there; still did he cling to the everglades and the graves of his ancestors.

[Mr. MONROE here remarked that Gen. Scott had been permitted to operate only thirty days in Florida.]

Mr. V. said he had not mentioned the name of that gallant soldier, the friend of his colleague, for the purpose of drawing in question his military skill or prowess; far from it; he claimed to be the personal friend of that distinguished officer. He would not pluck a single leaf from the wreath which decorated his brow; and he did not consider it as at all derogating from his reputation as a warrior chief, that he could not conquer, because he could not find embodied, his skulking and scattered foe. He claimed, he had a right to claim, for the Administration that defence against the charge of not earlier terminating this war which resulted from the use of the most efficient means within its command. It was for this purpose that he alluded to the ill success against the Seminoles which had attended the efforts of the best and bravest of your officers.

But it is said, though it may be true that the Government has got through the year 1840 by expending only twenty-two millions of dollars for ordinary purposes, yet that this has been accomplished by shuffling and staving off its obligations, thus throwing an undue burden upon its successor.

This was a very serious charge, and gentlemen owed it to their own reputation to be thoroughly convinced of its truth before they ventured it. In support of it, what had we heard? Why, it was said that the navy had been miserably neglected by the administrations of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren. Where, he asked, was the evidence of this neglect? Had not all the money appropriated by Congress for the navy been faithfully expended? This fact was not denied, and yet they tell you that your navy is going to decay, that your ships are rotting at their wharves for want of attention—not an example of this species of dilapidation had been cited in support of the assertion. Sir, is the committee aware that within the last eight years your naval expenditures have increased nearly fifty per cent? They were only four millions of dollars in 1833. This year, if the appropriations should be according to the estimates, they would amount to $5,445,339. They have lately exceeded six millions. Where was the evidence of this most reprehensible neglect of your navy? Was it in the fact that, whereas at the termination of the last war you had not a single ship of the line, you could now boast your Ohio, your Delaware, your Pennsylvania, your Independence, your Columbus, your Washington, your Franklin, besides several others now in the process of being built, besides, also, an addition to your frigates and sloops of war, which, all combined, have made you one of the formidable ble naval powers of the earth? He, Mr. V. was in favor of keeping your navy upon a peace establishment in time of peace, notwithstanding the bold and senseless declamation we constantly hear in favor of its rapid increase. Follow out the wishes and the principles of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS,] and your ships of war would soon whiten every ocean—a most gratifying spectacle, indeed, to the mere connoisseurs, the mere lovers of display, but one most grinding in its influences and consequences upon a hardworking and a tax-paying people. Mr. V. said he was now about to utter a sentiment which would, no doubt, be pronounced very heretical by those who entertained more magnificent notions as to what were indispensable appendages of Government than himself. It was this, that he had long been of the opinion, that the familiar maxim, "in time of peace prepare for war," was, in a measure, impracticable under institutions like ours; and he regretted not that it was so, for we had a recuperative energy in the land, which soon, very soon, enabled us to recover from the reverses which, in the incipient stages of a war, had been and would probably always be our lot. He had already lived and observed long enough to adopt the conclusion, that it was better, far better, if war should overtake us only once in half a century, (which was as often as it would occur, under the improved spirit of the age,) that we should meet repulse, and sustain somewhat of defeat, at the commencement of the conflict, than that, for the long peace period of fifty years, we should retain a large military or naval force, to eat up the substance of the people. These are my sentiments. I know they are too simple and too republican to accord with the sublimated notions of the party about to enter into power. It is my consolation, however, to feel assured that they will meet the approbation of those who sent me here.

In further illustration of the position that the "stave-off" policy had prevailed for the last year, two anecdotes had been related, the one by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] and the other by his colleague, [Mr. BARNARD,] The honorable member from Maine had told us that the frigate Constellation had, during the last summer, been detained several days, if not weeks, at Boston, from the inability of the Navy Department to supply its purser with the necessary funds for sailing, and told us quite an affecting tale about the purser's having been imprisoned for liabilities which he had incurred for the Government. Mr. V. said he thought that common justice, not to say common courtesy, required gentlemen to inquire of the heads of Departments whether there was any foundation for such complaints, before they took upon themselves the responsibility, most probably upon the mere representation of some dissatisfied subordinate, who may have had unpalatable justice done him, to make statements of this description. He had done what the gentleman from Maine had omitted to do—applied to the Secretary of the Navy for a true statement of facts connected with the alleged detention of the frigate Constellation, and here was his answer:

"NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 26, 1841.

"Sir: In reply to your letter of this date, requesting a statement of the causes which delayed the sailing of the frigate Constellation, I have the honor to communicate the following information.

"The first cause was the want of money; the second, the want of men. The appropriations for the year 1840 not having been made by Congress until the month of July, those of the preceding year became exhausted to such a degree, as, for a considerable time, to disable the Department from carrying on any other than the most ordinary operations of the service.

"When this indispensable requisite was supplied by the passage of the Navy Appropriation bill, in July, there were not a sufficient number of able seamen at the different stations to complete the complement of the two vessels destined for the East Indies, although recruiting had been constantly going on, and bounties given as an additional inducement. This deficiency was not remedied until the beginning of September, when the Constellation was put in commission, and her officers appointed. Subsequently, the officer designated to the command of the squadron fell sick, and having been officially reported to the Department as mentally and physically disqualified for the performance of his duties, was detached from the Constellation, and another appointed. This occasioned a third delay of some two or three weeks.

"During the period which thus elapsed from the appointment of the purser to that ship, to the receipt of her sailing orders, she had ample time to procure, and it was presumed ad pro, the all supplies necessary to his department, as all his requisitions for funds had been complied with, and it was the province of his commanding officer to see that he performed his duty. After, however, the order for the sailing of the Constellation had been issued, the purser made a requisition for $41,000 without specifying the precise objects to which the money was to be applied. Having every reason to believe that he had at this late period already procured and paid for all his supplies, it was presumed that this sum was required to be carried out in dollars to meet any incidental expenses that might arise on her passage to Rio Janeiro, where she was ordered to stop to replenish her supplies, for the payments of which her commander was authorized to draw on Baring, Brothers, and Company of London.

So large a sum was not, therefore, deemed necessary to the purpose for which it was supposed to have been drawn, and $5,000 was substituted, that being deemed quite sufficient. It afterwards appeared that the purser had not yet paid for his supplies, although all his requisitions had been promptly complied with, with this single exception, and was, it appears then arrested by his creditors at Boston, in the apprehension that the vessel was about to sail. A delay of several days occurred in consequence. It will thus be perceived that the state of the Treasury had no connection whatever with the detention of this vessel.

I have the honor to be,

Very respectfully, sir,

Your obedient servant,

J. K. PAULDING.

Honorable A. VANDERPOOL,
House of Representatives.

Here, sir, is a true statement of the circumstances connected with the detention of the frigate Constellation. But it was proper that he should state another fact in regard to this purser, which would, probably, account for the origin of the complaint which the honorable member from Maine had been instrumental in bringing before the House. He had been informed (and he had derived his information from the highest and most responsible source) that the stores which the pursers distribute to the crews of ships of war, are divided into "necessaries," "comforts," and "luxuries." Bread and meat come under the head of "necessaries." Tea and coffee, according to the interpretation of the Secretary of the Navy, fall under the denomination of "comforts;" and tobacco, if you please, under that of "luxuries;" that the purser is authorized to charge a much larger per centage of profits upon "comforts" than "luxuries," and that this purser claimed the right to charge for tea and coffee as for "luxuries." The Secretary of the Navy forbade him to do so, at which the purser took umbrage, and wished to be detached from the vessel, but the Secretary refused to yield to this wish. This just interference of the Secretary with the plans and intentions of the purser had, no doubt, been the means, direct or indirect, of bringing to the consideration of the gentleman from Maine the information upon this subject which he had felt constrained to lay before the House; and he would now submit it to the candor of that gentleman whether he had treated the Secretary with perfect fairness. He would consider it as doing great injustice even to himself, if, the strength of ex parte representations, made to him by an embittered man, who should come sneaking to him with his tales of abuse, without the courage and manliness to authorize his name to be given as their author, he should here charge, high and most respectable public officers with official delinquency. The honorable member from Maine will perceive that I have not forgotten his communication, anonymous as to the House, about the "sedentary militia" of Florida.

So, also, in regard to the certificates for works on the fortifications, alluded to by several gentlemen, on which, it was said, interest had been charged by the banks, to the prejudice of the poor laborers. He understood the following to be the truth of this matter: During the long session of Congress, the appropriations are not generally made, till the month of June or July. Early in the spring, and in anticipation of the appropriations, laborers on the public works, being out of employment, have generally been in the habit of pressing the superintendents of the works with importunities to permit them to commence working immediately, offering to take their chance of the appropriations being made. Superintendents have frequently yielded to their importunities, and at the end of each week given them certificates of the balance due them for the past week, to be paid "when the appropriation for the work should be made." These laborers, pressed by immediate want, have always been more or less in the habit of getting these certificates cashed, by deducting an amount equal to the interest up to the period when the appropriations would probably be made; and no member of any party has ever been patriotic enough to rise in his place and denounce this practice. It was all considered right—acquiesced in by the good men of all parties; but how soon are the sympathies of honorable gentlemen for the “poor laborer” on the public works awakened, when, in consequence of the legislation of Congress, payment for his voluntary labor has been postponed for a few months. The last session of Congress did not terminate till after the 20th day of July. On about the last day of the session, an appropriation bill passed which contained a provision authorizing and requiring the President to postpone the appropriations for certain public works, if in his estimation the condition of the Treasury require it. In October last, appropriations for some of the works were, in a measure, suspended. Still laborers, upon some of them, insisted upon going on, preferring to labor on and take the chance of getting their pay, as they had always been accustomed to do during the long session of Congress, to being left wholly idle and with out employment. Certificates of the amount due them for their labor were given, payable, the most of them in January, 1841. Pressed by their necessities, some of them got them discounted, by deducting the interest, not to an uncertain period—to one that might never arrive, as they had voluntarily been wont to do, during every long session of Congress—but to a day certain, to which the Secretary of War had seen fit to postpone payment, under a power given by an express law of Congress. And this was the “head and front” of the offending of the President and Secretary of War against the laborers upon the public works. This was the great item of proof relied upon by several gentlemen, to establish the fact, that a most flagitious “slave off” policy had distinguished the last year of this administration. Now, he would put it to his colleague [Mr. BARNARD] whether he had not yielded too credulous an ear to garrulous informers, who had communicated to him information without daring to make public their names, information too, upon which he felt authorized to found “impeachments” against a high officer of the Government. He must here be permitted to say, that with all his colleague’s professions of candor; notwithstanding his express disavowal of any intention “to assail the Administration or any body connected with it,” he had in his, (Mr. V.’s) estimation, done this same Administration most glaring injustice, and had confirmed him in the conviction of what he had long believed, that those gentlemen who were loudest in professions of fairness were generally faintest in its performance.

Again: The Secretary of the Treasury tells us in his annual report, that the receipts for 1841 will amount to $24,160,000, viz:

Customs	-	-	$19,000,000
Lands	-	-	3,500,000
Miscellaneous	-	-	80,000
Balance in Treasury, January 1st,
1841	-	-	1,580,855

$24,160,855

That our expenditures for the year are estimated as follows:

For ordinary purposes	-	-	$19,250,000
Debt of the District of Columbia	-	-	149,000
Redemption of Treasury notes	-	-	4,500,000

It is said that the Secretary is wild in his calculations; that our receipts will not come up to twenty-four millions of dollars, and that our expenditures will far exceed $23,899,000. On what ground do the great impeaching parties, who have entered the lists against the Secretary, undertake to impeach his accuracy? Why, one gentleman tells us that his “annual guesses,” have been woefully wide of the mark; and that, therefore, his estimates are not entitled to any confidence at our hands. From the speeches of these distinguished adepts in finance, it would seem, that in the annual estimates of the various heads of the fiscal departments of your Government, no discrepancies ever occurred before Mr. Woodbury came into office. It has become entirely too fashionable among those who have any pretensions to fairness or justice, to speak of the present Secretary of the Treasury in terms applicable to only the Prince of Bunderers. The flippancy with which mere smatterers in finance indulge in this train of remarks, has long since satisfied me that they are prompted to it solely by the consideration that it has become fashionable. He regarded Mr. Woodbury as a most faithful and invaluable public officer, one whose reputation, as the fiscal head of your Government, would survive the captious criticisms of bitter, unfair, and prejudiced opponents. He held in his hand a table of estimates and receipts of the Government for the last twenty-five years, from which it appeared that, with the exception of the single bloated year of 1836, the average difference between the estimates and receipts in respect to customs, had been less, under Mr. Woodbury’s administration, than under any administration of the finances within that period. In 1816, under Mr. Dallas, the receipts from customs were estimated at $21,000,000. The actual receipts from that source were 36,306,874

In 1833, Mr. McLane estimated the receipts from customs at	$21,000,000
The actual receipts from customs were	29,032,503

Difference $8,032,508

This table is at the service of gentlemen. They are welcome to look at it, and repent if they are conscientious men, of their unjust denunciations against Mr. Woodbury, for what they have politically denominated his “wild guesses.”

How small, after all, the discrepancy between the estimates and actual receipts of last year! In December, 1839, the Secretary estimated the receipts from ordinary sources at $18,500,000. The actual receipts were 17,119,000

Difference only $1,481,000

Had Congress, as the Secretary recommended, graduated the price of the public lands, and created a few more land districts, enough would, most probably, have been realized, not only to have covered the above estimate, but to have paid the outstanding Treasury notes. But let him (Mr. V.) ask here, whether the specimens and evidences of the financial skill of the gentlemen who had so unceremoniously impeached the accuracy of the Secretary, were so striking as to give any very great weight to their “impeachments.” Quite the contrary, in his estimation. He trusted he had already, in same measure, “impeached” the impeachers. He had shown, he thought, pretty conclusively, that the existence of a huge national debt was the mere dream of heated partisans; that the facts and figures put forth in support of it had been most successfully turned against their authors. Now he begged leave to call the attention of the committee to the very discordant character of the means and data by which they sought to impeach the accuracy of the Secretary. His colleague, [Mr. BARNARD,] in his table of “guesses” and “probabilities,” made all the charges on the Treasury for 1841 amount to $27,569,000. And the receipts of the same year to 20,042,618

Deficit $7,526,382

The gentleman from Maine, in his table of “guesses” and “probabilities,” made all the demands on the Treasury for 1841 $31,650,000. All the receipts to 24,723,000

Deficit $6,962,000

Now, how different the process by which they obtained their respective results. The gentleman from Maine had beaten his colleague in his estimate of charges on the year, in the sum of $4,116,000, and still his colleague had beaten him in cyphering out a deficiency by the sum of nearly a million of dollars! How had he done this? Why, he had cyphered down the resources of the year to only $20,042,332; whereas the gentleman from Maine admitted that they would amount to $24,723,000; but to make his sum come out to his liking, he had cyphered up the charges on the Treasury more than four millions of dollars higher than his fellow impeacher! So that one seemed to excel in cyphering up, and the other in cyphering down, and between two arithmeticians so expert in their respective lines, it was very difficult to say what would become of poor Mr. Woodbury. The aggregate amount of their differences was $8,796,382!! The one contended that Mr. Woodbury’s estimate of receipts from customs was much too high; the other admitted that the receipts from this source would, no doubt, come up to the Secretary’s estimate; and still, with all their contradictions, clashing, and discrepancies, they seemed to “lay the flattering unction to their souls” that they had succeeded in impeaching the accuracy, if not the integrity, of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The “self-congratulations” of the Secretary, as the gentleman from Maine saw fit to designate a paragraph or two of his annual report, had formed the subject of no little sarcasm with that honorable member. The Secretary had, indeed, cause to cherish pride in reviewing his official career. Was it not much to the credit of that officer, that, during the last four years, when individuals, banks, and even States, had been brought into dishonor by a failure to meet their engagements, this Government had maintained its credit unimpaired, notwithstanding two suspensions by the bank? Was it not true that the Government had, within the last six years, paid all its current expenditures, as well as the extraordinary ones, of Indian wars and treaties, and deposited with the States twenty-eight millions of dollars, without imposing any additional taxes on the people; without creating a new funded debt; and that, too, under the process of biennial reductions of the tariff? Did not such a review furnish legitimate and most abundant cause of self-congratulation?

Lastly. It was contended by the gentlemen who had preceded him, that the deficit which they seemed to imagine they had cyphered out, ought to be supplied by imposing an immediate tax on silks and wines. To this he, Mr. V. would respond, that if the receipts from sources that now existed were sufficient to carry the Government through the year as he had attempted to prove, why should we, a defeated party, relieve our victorious adversaries from the responsibility, or rob them of the glory, of adjusting a new tariff of duties? We all know, sir, that next year, there must be a revision of the whole tariff. The work could be better done as a whole than by piecemeal. We appreciate the kindness and disinterestedness which prompt you to ask us to share with you the glory of this great work; but we are willing to forego all the profit and honor of an undertaking which legitimately belongs to you.

A tax upon luxuries—upon silks and wines—articles consumed only by the rich. This was quite an ad captandum proposition; but it would be vastly more, taking in its character, if accompanied with a proposition, to relieve, in the mean time, from taxation, necessities consumed by the poor; but while you pick the pockets of the rich under the wine and silk tax, do you propose to lighten the burthens of the poor in the same ratio? By no means. You continue to make all your present exactions from the poor. Glorious charity and beneficence this!! It is very like robbing the poor, and, instead of making restitution to them, atoning for your offence by robbing the rich also. There was much force in the admonition of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Wise,] that we should consider, well consider, and pause, before we did any act which might, by possibility, diminish the consumption of our great staple, cotton, in France. He (Mr. V.) had long looked upon the increase of that consumption as one of the brightest prospects of the exporting section of our country. Beware how you interfere with it. Begin not the work, in the offensive form now proposed, by singling out for taxation, from among the long list of free articles, articles of French manufacture alone. England constantly threatens to foster, to create a rival in the East for the growth of our great staple. France has indulged in no such unfriendly threats. She has not held or encouraged any “world’s convention,” to destroy your domestic institutions. You will soon have the opportunity of reaching her under circumstances less offensive, when you come to revise your whole tariff of duties. You will then, if all the mad and magnificent schemes of the day are to be consummated, be not only authorized, but compelled, to tax silks and wines, perhaps, far beyond the maximum of your compromise bill. Yes, distribute the proceeds of the public lands among the States—raise, by duties, enough to supply the vacuum—and you will require more than twenty per cent. duty upon all imports to support your Government. And then, for the consolation of the Southern wing of the great Whig army, let me say that, with the benefit of exchange, cash duties, and home valuation, the Yankees will have infinitely the best of the bargain.

REMARKS OF MR. HAND, OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, Monday, March 1, 1841—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on a bill making appropriations for certain fortifications reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, on a motion to substitute the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs for the one under consideration.

Mr. HAND said: he sincerely hoped the substitution would be made. If it was proposed to provide for the defences of the country, it was desirable it should be done systematically. Besides, increasing the few works in the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means to the additional amount proposed in the bill from the Committee on Military Affairs, would result, perhaps, in the passage of the former with this augmentation as to these particular works, and in the neglect of the others in the last mentioned bill, thereby not only producing very unequal legislation, but pushing forward some stations with increased vigor, while others of admitted paramount importance, by the mere forms of legislation, would remain entirely neglected. By adopting the general bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, the foundation of a system would be laid, which, when completed, would place this nation in a state of comparative safety. He knew it was usual, on these general appropriation bills, to be very diffuse as to topics. The tariff, distribution of the public lands, the "great political change," and various other matters, had recently been very liberally commented upon. For himself, he had settled views on most of these subjects, which he would express, should his duty call upon him to do so; but he preferred in discussion not to mix up matters so important.

Mr. H. said he was one of those who believe we may have war with England; not soon, probably, but before our present difficulties with that nation are definitively adjusted. England, if she would, cannot long remain quiet. She has an immense naval and military power, which she supports at an enormous annual expense, which bears heavy on her working classes; and the people will not long consent to that burden, if that power long continue inactive. The "concern" requires business. But, again. Whoever has watched England since the commencement of this century, may well believe in the probability of a change in the internal affairs of that great people. The mass will, perhaps, not always be quiescent in their present condition. Their Government will, therefore, endeavor to divert them by the excitement of war—

"Least rest, and lying still, might make them look Too near unto my state."

So too, in time, that high-sounding boast of "mistress of the ocean" will become irksome to us, particularly if it is occasionally forced upon our recollection by a too haughty bearing or insolent aggression. When that supremacy shall be made a point, then in truth the contest will be a severe one. Indeed, our difficulties with that country seem gradually to thicken. That in relation to the Northwest Territory he deemed most important, and when that shall be agitated, he looked for the rupture which he thought their combined difficulties might ultimately produce. Much had been said about McLeod. Upon that subject he did not propose to dwell. He would only say, with reference to some strictures that had been made here upon the ebullition of feeling which had occasionally, in times past, shown itself on the Northern frontier, that, while he held that every man should do nothing unbecoming a good citizen, yet gentlemen at a distance from the transactions might judge with too much severity. None but those who were witnesses to the intolerable wrongs done by the exercise of that bull-dog spirit which sometimes characterizes a provincial domination should judge of the high feeling of condemnation they might produce. Were they in daily intercourse with the victims, they might perhaps allow even good citizens to "sympathize."

But his object (continued Mr. H.) was to speak of the defences of the country. He was for adopting some general plan, the progress of the completion of which should at least keep pace with the resources of the country, and, if the emergency required it, be pressed without stint or delay. No plan had recommended itself to his mind so much as a system of fortifications. The question with some gentlemen seemed to be between fortifications and an increase of the Navy. He was in no way opposed to the Navy. It had been, and would be again, the pride of the nation, and he would keep it on a respectable footing. But he would give a few reasons, why, in time of peace, we should establish a line of fortification in preference, perhaps, to any thing else. But he would first remark upon an objection now frequently heard, and, indeed, strongly urged in the debate on this question by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] that fortifications were becoming useless, owing to the improvements in the art of war. He was aware that such things had been said, and predicted by some who pretend to understand the subject. But he (Mr. H.) had given the subject some attention, and so had the War Department, as appeared by the able documents furnished us last session; and, from all he could ascertain, the changes rendered fortifications more indispensable than ever. Indeed, the greatest changes appear to be going on in naval tactics. This, if so, would as well be an argument against the increase of the navy. There is another consideration which weighed much with him; which is, that England, who could not be supposed to be much behind in these improvements, is at this moment building new and rebuilding the old fortresses in her North American possessions, with great care and expense, which she would not do if she thought them useless.

A system of fortifications, he thought, should be adopted, because, too, it required time for their execution. Such works, if built efficiently, progress slowly. This was not the case with a navy. Materials for the latter could be provided, and when wanted, but a short period would be required for completion. This is fully illustrated by a statement of the time and cost of repairing our navy, kindly furnished him by the Department, and which he held in his hand.

Again: the expense was comparatively small. The Secretary of War last year sent us a general plan of fortifications. This contained works in classes, A, B, C, D, E, F. Omitting those in F, which are only proposed for some late period, and the remainder will give us ninety-five forts for the maritime frontier from Passamaquoddy to the Sabine, for less than ten millions; fourteen forts, &c. for the Northern frontier, for little more than two millions; and fifteen barracks for the Western frontier, costing less than one million; total, thirteen millions. This would furnish the two great lines of frontier, North and South, of this nation, with cordons of safe fortifications for ages. The necessary additional ordnance, and one hundred rounds of ammunition, can be supplied for three and three-fourth millions; making in all but sixteen and three-fourth millions. The report on these subjects, and upon the art and science of war generally, reflects great credit upon the Secretary and the military officers, his coadjutors.

It is very different with the navy; the mere decay and increase of which, since 1816, has cost the nation thirty-one and a quarter millions. Again, not only the expense, but another argument in favor of fortifications is their durability. Well built, they dilapidate very slowly, and are cheaply kept in repair. On the contrary, other means of defence, and particularly a navy, are subject to decay. By the following extract from the report of the Board of Navy Commissioners, transmitted to us with the report of the Secretary of the Navy, at the opening of this session, it appears that the expense of keeping good our naval armament is very great:

The estimated value of these vessels, and of the stores on hand for their completion or equipment, may be stated at about the following sums:

	Vessels.	Stores.	Total.
For 1816,	$1,365,000	$735,000	$5,100,000
For 1840,	9,825,000	6,628,346	16,453,346
Gain,	5,460,000	5,893,346	11,353,346
Money in the Treasury on the 1st October, 1840,			1,385,920
Showing a total gain in values of			$12,739,266

The amounts which have been available for those objects, from 1816 to 1840, both inclusive, have been:

Under gradual increase of the navy	$8,000,000
Under gradual improvement of the navy	8,897,710
For building and rebuilding vessels, specially	2,455,710

Total	14,353,420
And for repairs and for ordnance	16,886,430

Making the total of available appropriations,	31,242,850
The increase of values, as above	12,739,266

deducted from the appropriation, leaves	$18,503,584

as the amount which has been expended to meet the actual loss or decay, or to preserve the values which were on hand in 1816.

This sum divided by 25 (the number of years included) gives for the annual loss and decay or about 14 1/2 per cent. annually on the original cost of the vessels afloat in 1816, which were fit for naval use. $740,143

He begged not to be misunderstood. In contrasting the two modes of defence, naval and military, he was not attempting to disparage the former. Far from it. Both are absolutely necessary. All he was endeavoring to show is, reasons for increasing the latter now, if there are means for one only. He believed if the system of fortifications proposed was adopted, the country, in a short time, will be in a fair state of defence, and that too, without involving it in debt. From a statement the War Department furnished him last session, he found we had 63 vessels, three of which are irreparable, and the others could be rebuilt or completely repaired for about five and a quarter millions. So that after the expenditure of about twenty-two millions, we should have 124 forts, &c. and 7,248 cannon on land, (now 4,708) 65 vessels of war, bearing 2,036 guns, and about 620,000 muskets, besides all the munitions of war in the hands of the States.

But there were other reasons why he was in favor of adopting a system of fortifications. This nation, from its position and the genius of the people, will not make war for territory, profit, or aggrandizement. It has more territory than its people can occupy, with an extensive frontier; and that people have a national aversion to immense armaments, large standing armies, and heavy taxation. Nor do they expect to defend their frontier by a constant force. Upon the militiaman, well armed, defending his own fireside, must this nation depend to repel invasion. We shall act on the defensive, and pursue the course of onward prosperity, in the quiet paths of peace as much as possible. May it always be so. A distinguished writer says: "Happy the nation whose history is dull and monotonous." But if disturbed, with fortifications as rallying points, and as convenient depositories of arms, with just regulars enough to keep the forts and their contents in order for any emergency, the rest may be left to the freemen of the land, at least until the nation is fairly involved in the regular conflicts of a settled war. Mr. H. said he had great reliance on the militia. We have now about one and a half millions organized, and probably at least three millions of our citizens are able to bear arms, and most of them familiar with their use. These must always be formidable to an invading foe. They have indeed already pre-eminent proved themselves so. He had, a matter of curiosity, made a few estimates from the battles fought on land, during the last war with England, as given in Niles's Register. Of these there were 35, and about 70,000 Americans, and 102,000 British troops, were the aggregates engaged. In them about 9,300 of the British were killed and wound ed. The whole number of British killed and wounded was, to the whole number of Americans engaged, about as one to seven and a half. In the ten battles fought by about 16,000 regulars alone, the British killed and wounded were to the Americans engaged as one to nine and four-fifths. And in ten battles fought by about 18,000 militia and volunteers alone, the British killed and wounded were to the Americans engaged as one to five. He spoke this with no purpose to dishonor our gallant army. They had excelled the best troops of Europe. But this will be so almost from the nature of things. Their officers are gallant fellows, but the mode of firing is different. Beside, the regulars have certain imperious and systematic duties to perform, and even the battle ground is often the field where advantage is sought by scientific military manœuvre. On the contrary, the militia are usually called out to resist invasion, and the whole battle is often a trial of individual skill by keen and excited marksmen, making, under favorable circumstances, awful havoc among troops moving in compact military order. While engaged, their sole business is killing.

But (added Mr. H.) he did not intend to detain the committee too long, and should not have spoken at all, were it not for the deep anxiety he felt for some defence on the frontier of the district he had the honor to represent. He was surprised to hear the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, say that in case of a war with England, the Canadas would not be the theatre of action. He thought differently. Every thing tended to convince him to the contrary. After troops have been transported 3,000 miles, it was very probable, that in most cases, they would debark in their own territory, where they had a place of repose, preparation, and safety. This was a natural, almost an inevitable consequence, unless the expedition was on some particular service. This, at all events, could hardly be otherwise, in case of a rupture within a few years. The troops are already in Canada, and a strong force there, would be indispensable.

With these views, he begged to call the attention of the committee to the defenceless state of Lake Champlain. No man could shut his eyes to its importance. It has been the beaten track of war for the last century. Its position is different from that of any other of our waters. It heads in the heart of our country, crossing the line between the two nations at right angles, it terminates at a safe distance in the enemy's territory. Besides all this, it is the first naturally feasible route of ingress upon our people, after entering the St. Lawrence. Government immediately after the last war, acting upon recent experience, turned its attention to its defence, but unfortunately before the line was established. The present Secretary of War and the proper bureau have repeatedly pressed the importance of this place upon our consideration. Every one coincides in opinion with them. The British, too, know its importance. Strong fortifications command their portion of it, and a canal opening navigation into it, is nearly completed by them. Indeed they had gone so far, and were so solicitous, as appeared by affidavits in his possession, as to survey the lake in the vicinity of our contemplated fortifications. He earnestly entreated that this work might not be delayed any longer; and as it is embraced in the bill proposed to be substituted, he hoped that would be done.

One word more, and he was done. Some here have cautioned against a too free expression of sentiments, for fear of provoking a war before we are prepared. He deprecated war, so did his constituents. But he should do them injustice to intimate that they would not boldly denounce all aggression, no matter by whom offered to our country, without reference to the progress of preparation. Whenever our national honor is insulted, they are always ready.

NOTE.—From a statement furnished Mr. H. from the Navy Commissioners' Office in April, 1840, showing the time it would require to repair, rebuild, &c. our vessels of war, it appears that 13 vessels, building, could be completed in the average time of 196 days, 21 repaired and equipped ready for sea in the average time of 68 days, and 6 then in commission at sea in the average time of 90 days.

By their report in 1841, it appears that the Commissioners have contracted for timber for 15 ships of the line, 18 frigates, 15 sloops of war, 9 steamers, and 9 brigs or schooners.

We have thirty-six vessels in commission. From an English military periodical, it appears that the British Government have 194 vessels of war in commission bearing 3,725 guns—31 of these were in North America.

Extract from list of vessels, &c. of British navy, in same work:

Name of vessels.	No. of guns.	Commander.	Where built.	When built.	When commissioned.	Station.

SPEECH OF MR. UNDERWOOD, OF KENTUCKY,

In the House of Representatives, February 20, 1841—

On the bill making appropriations for the Civil and Diplomatic Service of the year 1841.

MR. UNDERWOOD said that, the world over, man was the creature of the circumstances by which he was surrounded. His opinions, motives, and actions, had their origin in the animate and inanimate objects which were constantly operating upon him, affecting his senses, and through them his intellectual powers, and thus forming the character and directing the conduct of life. These circumstances, according to my observation, said Mr. U. "define the position" of members in this body. The impartial spectator, regarding the circumstances by which members are surrounded, will perceive their true position more accurately than by taking it from their own flattering definitions. In viewing the position of members, and defining it for myself, there are some striking characteristics in the different attitudes presented by the Representatives of the people. There is an Atlantic or seaboard position, which does not harmonize altogether with mine; which is entirely inland or "backwoods." There is a city position, which contrasts very strikingly with the village or country position, which most of us on this floor occupy. There is a Northern and a Southern position: and a listener to the debates in both branches of Congress would almost conclude that our sole business here was to inform mankind, ay, sir, the whole universe, exactly where we stood, and how we stood; or, in the parliamentary language of the day, to "define my position."

I have no vanity which prompts me to believe that the fate of my country, that its weal or woe, is dependent, to any great extent, upon what I say or do. Nor am I so humble as to believe that arguments, based upon popular rights, enforcing the truth, and demanding justice, will be entirely disregarded, because they emanate from one of "my position." Sir, I claim to be identified in feeling and in principle with the great mass of the American people. Like that mass, I was born to enjoy or to waste no rich inheritance. My ancestors did not enable me, by the fruits of their labor, to spend a life of criminal idleness, or to devote my time to literary and scientific pursuits, living at ease upon a large annual income, or to play the part of the man of business, wielding a large capital, unconscious of the toil and labor which accumulated it. Like that mass, I have been compelled, of necessity, to labor diligently in my vocation for the means to furnish food, raiment, and shelter for myself and family. I rejoice in the institutions of my country. They have enabled me to rise to a seat on this floor. They present an open field in which every citizen may labor to advance his fortunes; and in which each workman, no matter what may be his trade or profession, is sure to obtain, in the end, a reward proportioned to his merit.

"My position," and inclination also, require that I should condemn extravagance; that I should attempt to reform abuses, and that I should endeavor, by wise laws, to secure peace, safety, and happiness for the people. There are two classes of politicians: one is always actuated by principles, the other is always biased in the fortunes of men. The one goes for the country, the greatest good of the greatest number; the other goes for the personal advancement of the members of a party, for the promotion of a clique greedy for "spoils." In the ranks of the one you may find a high and lofty patriotism, a generosity and nobleness of purpose, which comprehends all interests and every pursuit by its benevolent and dignified legislative action. In the ranks of the other you may look for low cunning and sinister manœuvres to elevate or to pull down individuals, just as this or that party object may be accomplished by it. It is in this class you may expect to find despicable coalitions for selfish objects. And it is here that you may look for men devoted to politics more for the love of the emoluments of office than for the highest glory of our nature, the satisfaction of doing good as a public benefactor.

I will never form an alliance with those whose political life is spent in putting up or putting down particular individuals for selfish purposes. I will never allow, if I can prevent it, that system of rewards for political subservency, and punishment for political independence, which has prevailed in this country during the last twelve years. And I intend, with my last political breath, to demand a reform of those abuses which enable politicians to seize and appropriate to their own use the public property, or which, under enormous perquisites of office, furnish means with which to undermine and subvert the institutions of the country, by corrupting both officeholders and voters. I will partly co-operate with those who think and feel as I do, to carry into effect what our common principles require; but never will I enter a coalition whose chief objects is to distribute the "spoils."

The people of this country, our constituents, do not intend to have the realities of a monarchy under the name of a republic. The people will not willingly pay enormous salaries or allow unreasonable perquisites to the officers of Government. They will cheerfully grant a just compensation for services rendered, but they will not pay those who do nothing; nor will they pay those who work such extravagant wages as to enable them to vie with royalty itself, in the splendor of their equipages and expense of luxurious living. It only requires that the people should be honestly and fully informed of the extent of any crying abuse to secure the application of the proper remedy. They may and do act slowly, but act they will, and efficiently, too, in the end. I regard the election of General Harrison as a manifestation of the efficiency of popular action, when the people are convinced that abuses exist; and if his Administration should not meet their expectations in the work of reform they have willed, they will act again and again through the ballot-box until their will and their interests are obeyed and respected by their agents. The Executive Government must conform to public sentiment, ascertained by and through the Representatives of the people; and it was the apprehension that the Administration of Mr. Van Buren, "following in the footsteps," set public sentiment at defiance, and attempted to manufacture it through the instrumentality of a corrupt press and a subservient Congress, which mainly produced his recent overthrow.

The people has not yet completed their work. By the election of General Harrison they have placed at the head of the Government a man who will abstain, I sincerely believe, from the exercise of arbitrary and despotic powers; as much so as any man who could have been placed in his high station. But the Executive cannot reform existing abuses which have grown up under the operation of existing laws. It requires the repealing and reforming powers of a Congress to do justice to the people, to comply with their will, and to satisfy their expectation. Discreet and judicious action by this and the other House upon the annual appropriation bills can accomplish much; and I will proceed to call your attention to various subjects which deserve the notice of this body and the whole nation. I mean to call public attention to them. I intend to print what I say, and lay what I print before the people; call on them to read and reflect, and then to the polls and act. If the people wish a real, substantial reform of abuses, they must first know what they are, and then elect representatives pledged to reform them, and who will honestly redeem their pledges.

The first abuse connected with the provisions of this bill, was brought to the notice of the committee by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PROFFIT] It consisted in the heavy appropriation for stationery; that we consume more paper, pens, knives, wafers, &c. than we ought, and that we do not strictly confine ourselves to the application of the stationery received to public purposes, cannot be doubted. But, sir, I shall not go into the inquiry with a view to ascertain the precise extent of this abuse. Perhaps it would be impossible to ascertain it, as no accounts are kept showing the quantities delivered to each member, and as every one calls for and obtains till he is satisfied. Many years since, I am told, accounts were kept, and members were charged with the stationery furnished them. These accounts constituted some check; but since they have been discontinued, there is no check but that which each gentleman's conscience prescribes for himself. The best remedy for the evil is that which I suggested the other day to the gentleman from Indiana. It is to allow a certain sum in lieu of stationery. But, sir, I do not advert to this abuse for the purpose of ascertaining its extent, or to suggest the proper remedy. I recur to it in order to notice the character of the remarks which were indulged a day or two since, when the subject was mentioned. Some gentlemen affected to consider it a small concern, a picayune affair, a matter to which the maxim de minimis non curat lex should apply. They seemed to consider it too contemptible for the attention of statesmen assembled to deliberate on great national affairs. Such swelling and blowing about elevated views; such sublime contemplations of subjects infinitely important to the world's welfare, which allow some gentlemen on this floor no time to attend to little things; ay, sir, which fill them with utter scorn for trifles, present a most dignified contrast with their own conduct in pocketing, or rather boxing up, the "spoils." Their flourishing words and laudatory self-gratulations are put forth in the vain attempt to hide from themselves the knowledge of the abuses they practise, and to furnish some sort of apology for failing to do their duty in exposing and putting an end to them. Sir, I have but little respect for, and not the least confidence in, the man who affects to regard little things as beneath his notice, especially little improprieties. My observation through life has proved, to my satisfaction, that those who refuse to attend to little abuses, are sure to wink at enormities. I have no faith in the intellectual ability of those whose mental and moral organization is such that they affect to be incapable of attending to small things. I have ever found them incapable of managing great affairs. Napoleon, Wellington, and our own beloved and great Washington, were men who paid strict attention to the smallest matters of camp police. They were capable of comprehending that a world is but the aggregate of atoms; that great battles are made up of individual contests; that the fate of empires may be decided by the failure to clinch a nail. Such men know that they are great in proportion as they are like their Creator, whose attention, we are informed, is even directed to numbering the hairs of our heads, and who takes note of the falling of a sparrow. Sir, I am shocked at the combined littleness, pride, and arrogance of men who affect to turn up their noses at improper and immoral actions as trifles beneath their notice. The people must dismiss all such from their service, if they would make this Government, in all its departments, what it should be—a light upon an eminence illuminating the nations of the earth—a sun blazing in the political firmament, upon whose disk no spot can be found. I have seen upon this floor some practical illustrations of this elevated disregard of little things. I have seen additions made to the private libraries of members, by voting thousands upon thousands to pay for books, to be distributed among ourselves; and I have seen this haughty spirit, this elevated contempt for little things, skulk from exposure by refusing the yeas and nays. I have witnessed, year after year, palpable violations of the law relating to the mileage of members, and I have in vain endeavored to correct the abuse. I have witnessed efforts made by others to correct it, but all in vain. It passed by as one of those insignificant affairs which the mighty minds of great politicians could not condescend to notice!

Mr. Chairman, the honor, the dignity, and, to a great extent, the utility of Congress, depend upon the abiding confidence which the American people repose in our integrity, in our disinterested patriotism, in our love of justice, in our practical good sense, in our assiduous discharge of the duties of legislators for a great nation—a nation destined, under the guidance of wisdom, to revolutionize and ameliorate the condition of enslaved humanity throughout the world, or to demonstrate that, in the midst of professions of every noble emotion and Christian virtue, we are but canting hypocrites, seeking office with avidity for the sake only of its "spoils." Sir, we ought to clear our own skirts of suspicion by sedulous attention to the least whisper of impropriety, by applying instantly the proper remedy to petty abuses. Demonstrate your resolution to reform crying enormities in other departments, by first taking, I will not say the beam, but the mote, out of your own eye, so that you may more clearly see how to operate upon others.

We have no time to attend to trifling matters! I have known days, yes, weeks, consumed in idle debates upon preliminary motions and points of order.* From the perpetual discussion about order, a spectator in the lobby would suppose that we were more disposed than any legislative assembly on earth to observe strict order, and to do every thing by rule. And yet, sir, the newspaper reports of our proceedings are constantly presenting the country with occurrences on this floor which excite sentiments of shame and indignation in the bosoms of the people. "To-day the Hon. Mr. A. and Mr. B. had some sharp-shooting." "To-day the Hon. Mr. C. and Mr. D. passed the lie direct." "To-day the Hon. Mr. E. and Mr. F. had a fracas in the Hall of the House of Representatives." Such, sir, are the degrading accounts teeming from the press, (and I lament to say with too much truth for our reputation,) in regard to the doings of this order-discussing body. I have sometimes thought I would take up our journals and make a careful examination, with a view to ascertain the time lost in debating points or order and preliminary motions. It would result, I have no doubt, in finding that we waste time to a criminal extent.

[Here Mr. COOPER of Georgia said that he had made the computation, and found that two months of the last session had been thus consumed.]

No wonder, exclaimed Mr. U. that our eight months' labor during that session only brought forth thirty public and seventy private acts, making a little primer of eighty-five pages only. No wonder we meet and break up, and nothing is done. Is it because there is nothing which ought to be

*A most extraordinary instance of time wasted upon preliminary motions occurred in 1837. On the 21st of April Mr. TUCKER made his report relative to the duel between Mr. GRAVES and Mr. CILLEY, and moved that it be postponed until the 7th of May, and that it be printed.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved that the report be laid on the table. Pending these motions, the House adjourned, it being Saturday.

On Monday, Mr. ROBERTSON withdrew his motion (to lay on the table) and moved to commit the report to a committee to be called the Committee on Privileges, with instructions to report this course which, in their opinion, it is proper to pursue.

These questions were discussed daily until the next Monday, when Mr. PICKENS moved that the whole be laid on the table. His motion was negative. The question was then put on postponing till the 7th of May, and negative.

Mr. ADAMS then moved to recommit the report to the same committee, with instructions to strike out all argumentative parts and the resolutions at the end of the report. The motion of Mr. ADAMS was amended, modified, and discussed until the 7th of May, when Mr. SAWYER moved to lay the whole subject on the table. His motion was negative. On the 10th of May, Mr. THOMAS moved to lay the whole subject on the table, and it was carried.

Pending the discussion, Mr. LAWLER died, and the House observed the usual funeral ceremonies; and, with that exception, the whole time, from the 21st April to the 10th of May, was spent on these preliminary motions.

done? No, sir, no. I am informed by the Clerk that there are at least a thousand bills and resolutions upon his table ready for consideration. There are a great number of private claims which have been allowed by your standing committees, and which we ought to act upon. It is enough to make the heart sick to read the imploring letters which claimants frequently address to the members of this body. I have received letters, and from females, telling me that the claims allowed and provided for by such and such bills were their only hope for bread; and that unless Congress would act and pass the bills, the poor-house or the jail must receive them. I have received letters complaining bitterly that the Government failed to perform its engagements and pay for property actually conveyed to it, in consequence of which the citizen was likely to be ruined. I will mention but one case in point, and that is, your failure to appropriate money to pay for hospital sites on the Western waters, although years ago deeds have been made for the lands selected. We have public measures of vast importance which, session after session, and year after year, remain upon our table, calling for the action of this House. Sir, I have had resolutions upon your table for nearly six years, proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and which I conscientiously believe to be essentially necessary to the wholesome operation, if not to the very existence, of our Republican institutions; and, under our time-wasting rules and proceedings, they have not been, and would not be, reached in regular order for a century to come. We originate business enough to talk about, and then spend the whole of our time in speech-making for Buncomb, instead of practical action for the good of the country. These are evils of crying magnitude. The effect of such a course is now glaring in our faces. We are forced, by this sinful waste of time, to act upon the appropriation bills necessary to keep the Government in motion, at the very close of the session, amidst bustle and confusion, and when it is impossible to deliberate in regard to the millions of money we are placing in Executive hands. I mention these matters to show that those who affect to be above attending to trifles do not act upon affairs of magnitude, except in the way of talking about them. And we talk about every thing, when in committee, except the business before us, as this debate fully proves, and as I shall probably demonstrate by my own remarks before I close. It is this rambling practice, with a view to lay our ideas, whether original or borrowed, upon all subjects, before our constituents in the same stump speech, that has rendered this body almost incapable of transacting the public business.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall proceed to call the attention of this committee to some things which I trust will, in the opinion of honorable members, so far transcend the subjects of stationery, books, and mileage, as to claim their attention on account of their magnitude. And first, sir, of attorneys, marshals, and clerks. We have official information that the attorney for the southern district of New York received for his services during the year 1839 $23,009 07; the clerk $19,469 92 for his, the marshal of the southern district of Mississippi $87,150 70 for his, and the clerk of the northern district of Mississippi $9,700 for his. The clerk of the southern district of Mississippi failed or refused to make a return. But we can judge of his fees from what the marshal of his district receives. After deducting all reasonable allowances for expenses and salaries of deputies, it has not been denied that the sum left would make to each an exorbitant compensation. How does it happen that these and other officers holding similar stations are thus extravagantly paid? It is the consequence of the legislation of Congress, which, more than forty years ago, allowed high fees for certain services, and adopted the fee laws of the highest courts in the several States where the fee was not specified in the act of Congress. Notwithstanding the fees have since been greatly reduced in most of the States, Congress has made no reduction. Now, sir, is there any reason why Federal officers acting within the States, should be paid more than State officers for the same kind of services? And if the States have found that their attorneys, marshals or sherriffs, and clerks, can carry on a profitable business by reducing the fees, may we not safely reduce the fees of Federal officers to the present standard of the States? Sir, I have heard no one deny that the fees which the laws of Congress allowed were too high. Gentlemen will not take issue upon that averment. But when it is proposed to correct the evil by introducing the necessary provisions in this bill, we are told that it is not in order; that, if we will introduce a separate bill proposing the proper remedy, gentlemen, who are constrained by the question of order to oppose the introduction of new subjects into this appropriation bill, will cheerfully vote for it. I will in a few words show that this question of order constitutes no barrier to the proposed reform. In the first place, it is not the introduction of a new subject, within the meaning of the 50th rule of the House. The subject of this bill is the compensation of the civil and diplomatic officers of Government for the year 1841, and whatever relates to the compensation of any civil or diplomatic officer, whether he be expressly referred to or not by the provisions of the bill, is germane to the general scope and design of the bill, and therefore ought to be admitted in the shape of an amendment. In the next place, the statute book furnishes many precedents, showing that important provisions, limiting the amount of salaries, and even legislating on subjects entirely dissimilar, have been introduced into the annual appropriation bills. In the appropriation bill of 1839 for the civil and diplomatic service, a section was introduced prohibiting extra allowances to officers of Government for disbursing public money. In the army bill of that year, a new subject was introduced, and provision made for compensating the owners of horses lost or cast away at sea, &c. In the naval bill of the same year, a new subject, in one sense, was introduced, and provision was made for building three steam ships. But the horses in the one case, and the steam ships in the other, were connected with the military and naval service, and therefore had an appropriate place in these appropriation bills. The same sort of connection exists between the appropriation bill for the civil and diplomatic service of any one year, and the salary or fees of any officer of the Government. In the light-house bill of 1838 provision was made for two additional clerks in the Fifth Auditor's office. These precedents, promulgated to the country in the statute book, must satisfy the people that we have become over-squeamish to preserve order if we now refuse to cut down extravagant allowances and perquisites upon the ground that it is out of order to do it in this bill!

Believing that now is the accepted time, and this the proper place, and from past experience having no hope that the subject will ever receive consideration separate and apart from the annual appropriation bills, I will proceed with my list of abuses which demand correction, and to correct which proper amendments will be offered to this bill in due season.

The compensation allowed collectors, naval officers, and surveyors of ports, in the shape of official perquisites, exceeds in many instances what is reasonable and just, and ought to be limited. As the most striking case, I shall call the attention of the committee to the emoluments of the collector at New York. The investigations of the celebrated Swartwout committee ascertained, by proof, that the collector received annually a profit on warehouses amounting to about $15,000. His profits resulting from forfeitures growing out of real or supposed violations of the revenue laws cannot be less than $20,000 annually. Your laws allow the collector to seize goods when their owners attempt to evade the payment of duties; and then permit a compromise to take place, by which a merchant pays the sum agreed on, and his goods are restored to him. The collector and other port officers are entitled to share in the compromise money, or in the proceeds of the goods if they are condemned by the judge on trial. You allow all this as a stimulus to the custom-house officers to be diligent in the discharge of their duties; and, in thus stimulating their diligence, you have tempted them, for the sake of gain, to harass merchants and embarrass commerce, by seizing goods without any just cause for so doing. The merchant, sooner than submit to the "law's delay," compromises, and pays a handsome sum to get possession of his goods; to get clear of the lawsuit, and to get the liberty of trading free from custom-house vexations. In one case I am informed that the collector, naval officer, and port surveyor, divided among themselves $42,000; in other words, received $14,000 each for a compromise upon the seizure of goods! No wonder that the district attorney and judge, as we are informed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. Evans,] should be engaged in court almost from the beginning to the end of the year. We see that it is the interest of the custom-house officers to give them enough to do; and it is equally the interest of the attorney to multiply libels upon each separate package seized, instead of the whole cargo. We all know the story of the separate libels or suits against each box of tea at Philadelphia, for no other purpose than to increase the fees of the attorney. I have seen the same thing in Kentucky. I once knew all the sureties of an insolvent sheriff sued by separate actions upon the official bond for a less sum than the attorney's fee taxed in each suit; in consequence of which the costs for the benefit of the lawyers and clerks exceeded the amount of the debt tenfold. The Legislature of Kentucky interposed to prevent this monster Avarice from glutting his maw by adding to the calamities of the unfortunate. Take the enormous wages from the attorney, collector, &c. at New York, limit their receipts, and you will at least produce one good effect—you will suppress vexatious litigation. But let us sum up the different items in the account of the collector's profits, declare the aggregate result, and pass to something else. The account stands:

Salary per annum allowed by law	-	$4,000
Profits upon warehouse rents	-	15,000
Income from compromises and seizures, at least	-	20,000

And we have the grand aggregate of - $39,000 Being $14,000 more than we pay to the President of the United States! Truly, sir, the minds of gentlemen who can tolerate all this are formed upon a magnificent scale. We shall see by their votes whether they will place those receipts of the collector upon the same footing of their own stationery, books, and mileage. I will not consume time by going into the inquiry, how much the collectors at Philadelphia, New Orleans, Boston, &c. receive. No doubt they are very careful to follow in the "footsteps" of the collector of New York, and I will leave each member to form his own estimates of their annual profits.

I now come to a subject which I have had at heart for some years. I allude to the enormous emoluments of postmasters. With the able assistance of a gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Reed,] I induced this House to adopt a proposition some two or three years ago to prevent what should be denominated extortion from the public, under the pretence of renting boxes or receptacles for letters and papers to private individuals. Such boxes are indispensable auxiliaries to the postmaster, and without them, in such a city as New York or Philadelphia, he could not perform the duties of his office with promptitude to the public, ease to himself, or economy to the Government. Abolish such boxes, and instantly it would be necessary to increase the number of clerks and assistants to do the business. But the postmasters in our large cities have contrived to make fortunes for themselves out of their boxes or pigeon holes, by charging the citizen who appropriates one of them to his exclusive use from one to six dollars per annum. Some years ago I proposed a remedy, which this House adopted, to cure this abuse, but it was rejected in the Senate. We were then told that the Postmaster General had promised to inquire into the extent of the emoluments derived from box rent, and if it was found to be extravagant, that he would recommend or apply the proper corrective. Sir, I believe we had something like that communicated to us officially from the head of the Post Office Department. But that has been the last of it. We have no report of the result of the investigation, if any has taken place; and certainly no remedy has been prescribed to cure the evils complained of. I regard the promises heretofore made as part and parcel of the tantalizing system of hollow-hearted politicians, who are ever about to commence the reformation of abuses, but who take special care never to do it. Their promises are to delude the people. Their failure to act is for the benefit of partisan associates who are rioting on the spoils.

I shall present an estimate of the profits of the postmaster at New York, founded on data the correctness of which I do not doubt, and leave each member to calculate for himself the effects produced by the operation of the present system in regard to box rents and branch post offices in other cities.

There are kept and rented by the postmaster of New York, according to my information, three thousand boxes. His price for each per year is from $4 to $6—say $5 upon an average. He has established a branch post office, at which he delivers daily about two thousand letters, and receives an extra compensation of two cents for each letter so delivered; thus securing to himself an income of $40 a day. His expenses for superintendents, house rent, &c. to conduct the branch post office cannot exceed $15 daily. They may not amount to half so much. He may employ, for aught I know, the regular clerks of his office, paid by Government, to superintend the branch establishment. But admit that he does not, how does the account of his entire emoluments stand? Here it is:

3,000 boxes at $5 each per annum	-	$15,000
$25 per day clear profit of the branch post office, or a profit per year of	-	9,125
His salary allowed and limited by law	-	2,000

Making an annual aggregate income of $26,125

Now, sir, what do we see from the statements I have presented, and which no one controverts? We behold attorneys, marshals, collectors, &c. annually receiving a compensation exceeding, by hundreds and thousands, that which is allowed to the President of the United States, who receives and entertains all foreign ministers, members of Congress and other officers of Government, and distinguished citizens from every part of the Republic, and whose expenses exceed those of collectors and postmasters as far as the dignity of his station and the intellectual and moral qualities which he ought to possess to fill it rank above theirs. We see official perquisites placing the officers of this Republic on a footing with those who, by the grinding exactions of despotism, enrich themselves by forced contributions from an impoverished and enslaved people. Arbitrary edicts and brute force strip the people, to pamper their masters in the rotten establishments of the Old World; but with us we tolerate and encourage the officer to make merchandise of his office, and to sell favors to those who must of necessity transact business with him. There is in these enormous perquisites no one redeeming quality—no single good, even to those who receive the money, and ten thousand evils which threaten destruction to our institutions. While it is no blessing to any one to receive more than he deserves, it is a real calamity to those who pay it. It tempts the one to enter into luxurious indulgences and waste of time, which too often terminate in destruction of character, whilst those from whom the money is taken are thereby deprived of so much that might be applied to satisfy their reasonable wants.

But, sir, there are reasons to fear that a portion of these large profits are withdrawn from the officer by political coercion, to be used for party purposes in controlling elections. The committee of investigation in the Swartwout case ascertained the fact that the officers in the New York custom-house were compelled to contribute a part of their salaries, under pain of dismissal, for electioneering purposes. Now, if party impudence and proscription did not hesitate to force from a petty clerk a contribution of ten or twenty dollars, may they not say to the collector, you must give all the profits of warehouse rents, or the whole of the emoluments arising from seizures, to the party fund, or be dismissed from office? May they not say to the postmaster, you must give the half or the whole of the box rents, and on doing that you may retain the profits arising from your branch post office, and if you hesitate you must walk out of office and give place

o some one who will do it? In this way thousands upon thousands may be collected for party purposes, and I apprehend have been collected. Well, sir, how is the money spent which is thus forced from the officer-holder, and which he is tolerated in filching from the people? I cannot positively answer; because the accounts of its outlay are never published. That is a party secret, veiled from the scrutiny of the people by an impenetrable mantle. I apprehend that these expenditures love darkness rather than light, because all their tendencies are evil. From the very fact that they are concealed, I suspect that their disclosure would astound the nation. Although we cannot see, we may imagine what is going on; and as there are a good many Yankees around and about me, I will venture a few guesses as to the manner in which this "secret service money" is applied.

I guess a portion of it is applied to purchasing wines and suppers to regale party leaders during their nocturnal deliberations.

I guess a portion of it goes to pay political drill sergeants for their services in running from post to post, in drumming up the people, in making stump speeches, and in distributing circulars and documents.

I guess a portion of it goes to pay for gingerbread and liquor, and in some cases direct bribery. Here is so much for your vote. Give the vote and take the money.

I guess a good deal of it goes to pay the printer. And then the character of the publications which he furnishes for the money!—are they true or false? No matter which; how they will operate upon the election is the only inquiry. Is the candidate slandered—are praiseworthy actions misrepresented, and a life of purity assailed by every species of detraction—who cares for it among the throng of rabid partisans? Such means are only intended to accomplish some ulterior object of vast magnitude. That the "end justifies the means" has ever been the principal doctrine of unprincipled politicians and hypocritical zealots. It is necessary for party purposes to convert vice into virtue; ignorance into knowledge; a sneaking selfishness into open manly generosity; the grin of a villain into the benevolent smile of an honest man; the vulgarity of a blackguard into the manners of a gentleman; the thing is done through the instrumentality of a corrupt press, put in motion by party contributions, by actual payments, or promises of reward.

Such are the purposes, the infamous purposes, in my judgment, to which political contributions are too often applied, and for which I verily believe that money has been forced from office holders by threats of removal. No patriot, with my convictions, can contemplate such a state of things, without the most gloomy forebodings. Is there any remedy but to reduce the emoluments of office; but to bring down salaries to that amount which will support an economical man and his family, and allow him to lay up something for old age? Is it not better to encourage economical habits, and even to force office holders to economize under moderate salaries, than to stimulate them to every species of prodigality, from twenty to thirty thousand dollars, ay, even more than that, per annum? It has been twenty-six years since I commenced the practice of law. I have met with a success which satisfies me, and yet, after laboring at the bar, and on the bench for more than a third of the days unually allotted to man, I have not been able to lay up for the evening of my life as much as some of these office holders can save in one or two years. I think I may say, without boasting, that I have the capacity to make a pretty good postmaster or marshal. Their labors are not more like mine than mine. I see no reason why they should become rich and independent in the goods and chattels of this world in a year or two, while with me it is a life-time business. I desire the prosperity of all men. I desire to see all above want. But I have no idea of legislating men into principalities by a sort of political legerdemain.

But some gentlemen contend that this is not the proper time; that we cannot act deliberately just as the session is about to close, and therefore we ought to put it off until a more convenient season; and some of those who hold these opinions have heretofore, as Whigs, cried aloud for retrenchment and reform. They have even gone so far as to reproach the dominant party, who now seem to be willing to co-operate in the work of reform, with their new-born zeal, and with their failure during the last twelve years to apply the pruning knife in clearing the tree of suckers and redundancies. These Whigs proclaim their determination to correct abuses when a new Congress assembles under the auspices of General Harrison. Now, sir, I think that the party in power are highly censurable for omitting to reduce exorbitant compensation and perquisites of their friends. Their failure to bring down their friends to a reasonable standard, and their willingness to reduce just as soon as they lose power, and a new set of men are probably to occupy their places, present a very striking contrast to the people. It proves what I have always said, that the last twelve years will live in history as the period during which the principle of selfishness controlled the political actions of men to an alarming extent. All measures of Executive policy have been adopted, recommended, and pushed along mainly for the purpose of making fortunes for combinations of men; and hence both Houses of Congress could never be brought to co-operate in reducing salaries and correcting abuses. If a direct vote upon yeas and nays could at any time be had in this House during the last twelve years, I admit that a majority would probably be found in favor of correcting any palpable abuse. Members, responsible as they are to the people, and dependent once in two years upon them for the seats they occupy, are constrained to pay some respect to the will of their constituents. This constitutional dependence upon the people is the great conservative principle of representative Democracy, and, without it, the spirit of plunder and the aspirations of ambition would obtain the ascendancy over justice and patriotism, pull down our institutions, and upon their ruins build up government: like those in the Old world, where the many are fleeced and robbed, by law, for the benefit of the few. The difficulty consists in getting a direct vote, under the many evasions which may be resorted to. When this House was constrained, years ago, to adopt my proposition to cure the abuse growing out of box-rents, the Senate, further removed from the people, and composed of a majority of expungers, who allowed no barrier to arrest them, failed to concur. But does it become the Whigs of this House—those who for years have been clamorous for the correction of abuses—now, when their adversaries are giving in and manifesting a willingness to co-operate, to advocate postponement until a "more convenient season?" Sir, in view of the wolfish appetite to feast on the flock, the avaricious yearning for the "spoils," which seemed to actuate the dominant political combinations that held the offices and wielded the patronage of Government under Jackson's reign of terror, I said, in a speech delivered some years ago, that the "sop party" was the only true and appropriate cognomen for such a set. I now say, that those clamorous Whigs, who have cried aloud until the people have become convinced of the necessity of a change, and have made it, and who may now fill the offices, either themselves or with their friends, which were heretofore held by their opponents, ought, under every consideration of consistency, of justice, and of honor, to act up to their professed principles; and all who do not, I denounce to be, in heart and feeling, sop party men. Such men may have joined the great Whig church, but never have been regenerated by a true Whig spirit. What! shall it be said, to our disgrace, that we get up a whirlwind to sweep extravagance from the face of the earth, when our political adversaries enjoyed the profits, but, just as soon as we saw a chance for ourselves, our tornado was hushed to a gentle lullaby?

But gentlemen cannot deliberate; there is no time for it now, at this late period of the session! What deliberation and time are required to enable members to decide upon the propriety of limiting the profits of a collector, postmaster, attorney, and marshal, to five or six thousand dollars per annum? Your Vice President gets five thousand dollars; your heads of Departments get six thousand dellars. Now, sir, it seems to me that a member of Congress who wants time to deliberate whether he ought to reduce a postmaster's salary to an equality with that of the Vice President, thinks too slow for the people, and that they will be very apt to decide, in their deliberations, to leave him at home, to ponder over his private affairs at leisure. It is too plain a case to require a moment's hesitation.

There are yet untold evils growing out of these enormous perquisites. They are the foundation of all the clamor about rotation in office. Who cares to remove a man from office who is doing his duty, when the profits of the office barely afford him subsistence and clothing? In such a case, every body unites in praying the starving incumbent to hold on, for the sake of the dear people, that their business may be rightly performed. But let the profits of the office be such that the incumbent is growing rich, and how is it then? Why, sir, rotation is then preached and clamorously contended for. Some one wants his place, not because he can discharge its duties more beneficially to the public, but because he wants the money that the situation would afford him. And he goes to work, too often by mean and despicable intrigues, to supplant the unsuspecting incumbent who sedulously applies himself to the performance of duty. The Executive, the removing power, is besieged. Flattery does its work to conciliate favor. Calumny does its work to prostrate the victim. And at last the President, being deluded, or "feeling power and forgetting right," removes and sacrifices an honest man to provide for a knave. Bring down the emoluments of office, and it will go far to break up the "system of rewards and punishments for opinion's sake" which has disgraced our political code. Bring down the emoluments of office, and it will tend more than any other thing to break up party rancor and bitterness of feeling, which engender personal hostilities and conflicts among relations and neighbors, and destroy the courtesies and charities which should adorn and bless society.

By adopting the amendments which have been prepared, and will be proposed to this bill, you will save money to the Treasury, and that is a consideration which ought not to be overlooked in the present condition of our revenue. I shall not follow the example set by others, and go into the discussion of the policy of direct taxes, a protective tariff, and all those subjects which I have frequently thought my Southern friends were too apt to bring into every debate, and which have been already discussed under this bill; but I deem this a fit occasion to say that I have no faith in the estimate presented by the Secretary of the Treasury. I have no hope that the revenue from the customs will amount to $19,000,000 for the present year. In estimating the sum which may be brought into the Treasury from this source, the amount of duties imposed, and the quantity of goods likely to be imported and retained for consumption, constitute the basis upon which our calculations must rest. The following table exhibits the facts in a condensed view, from which our deductions and conclusions must be drawn.

Compiled from Official Reports, showing Imports and Revenue from customs during the last four years.

Years	Value of merchandise paying specific duties.	Value of merchandise paying ad valorem duties.	Value of merchandise free of duty.	Total importations remaining for home consumption.	Amount of revenue from customs actually paid into the Treasury.
	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.	Dollars.
1837	30,031,655	32,301,458	56,801,112	119,134,225	11,196,737
1838	23,818,864	24,572,151	52,873,594	101,264,609	16,153,693
1839	32,911,556	47,770,087	63,914,965	144,597,607	23,137,324

NOTE.—In constructing the preceding table, the merchandise re-exported has been deducted from the aggregate importations, so that the merchandise left for home consumption only is exhibited, the revenue being raised, except to a trifling amount, on goods consumed. The commercial year terminates on the 30th of September, the fiscal year on the 31st of December; but this will make no difference in relation to the question of revenue likely to be derived from customs in 1841, and which is the only question intended to be illustrated by the table. The revenue from customs for the three first quarters of the year 1841 amounted to $10,699,688; the revenue of the last quarter, not precisely ascertained when the last Treasury report was printed, might probably raise the amount for the year to thirteen millions. I have had access to no Treasury report which enables me to classify the importations of 1840, so as to show the amounts paying specific and ad valorem duties.

There has been no diminution of duties under the Compromise Act of 1833, since the 31st of December, 1839, and no further diminution of duties under that act will take place until the 31st December, 1841. It will be seen from the table that the aggregate of importations for the years 1837 and 1838 does not equal that of the years 1839 and 1840. The amount imported in 1840 was much less than that of any other year of the series. The very large importations of 1835 and 1836 had no doubt much influence in diminishing the imports of the two succeeding years, and so will the heavy importations of 1839 operate upon the trade and imports of the present year. But there is another cause which, in my judgment, will have a still more potent effect, and that is, the recent suspension of the Philadelphia banks and the yet deranged state of the currency and the exchanges of the country. These things operate as heavy clogs upon commercial business, producing distrust and want of confidence, and a consequent diminution of importations. But suppose the importations of the present year for home consumption should equal the average of the last four, say one hundred and thirteen millions, still the duties collected on that amount, supposing the dutiable part only to equal that of former years, will fall short of the Secretary's estimate, in consequence of the reduction of duty which took effect on the 31st December, 1839. Besides, the fact that another reduction of duty under the Compromise Act takes place on the 31st December next, will tend greatly to diminish the importation of dutiable goods towards the close of the year. These causes combined will render the revenue of the year insufficient to meet the charges upon the Treasury, and appeal to us to save every dollar which can be saved by economical, not parsimonious legislation.

While on this subject, I shall take the liberty of saying, although it may have no direct connection with the bill, that in any future adjustment of the tariff I trust that the manufacturing interests will not be prostrated. There is an incidental protection which can and ought to be extended to them, and which, instead of being hostile to, is promotive of, the great interests of agriculture. I am, moreover, of opinion that a duty of 20 per cent, ad valorem on the home valuation of foreign merchandise is ample to afford all the protection which should be granted, and that those manufactures which cannot succeed with that advantage ought to be abandoned. It is a fact worthy of consideration, that there were cloths, cassimeres, blankets, and cotton goods imported from England and France during the year ending on the 30th September, 1839, amounting in value to $19,029,962, being nearly equal to one-fourth of the value of all imported merchandise paying duties. The New England States supply themselves with these articles mostly from their own manufactories, and therefore pay but little of the duty on these nineteen millions. It would seem to follow, that raising revenue by a tariff tends to exempt manufactures from taxation, and to throw the burden of sustaining the Government upon the agricultural and other classes. The only compensation which these classes obtain for this unequal operation of the tariff is to be found in the erection of a home market and a greater degree of national independence. In this way they are fully remunerated, when the incidental protection which a moderate tariff affords allows an active competition between foreign and domestic articles of the same kind in our own markets. A tariff high enough to exclude foreign articles would operate as an enormous bounty to domestic manufactures, inflicting injury upon the consumer without securing any equivalent benefit; and a tariff so low as to destroy our existing manufactories would bring wretchedness to thousands, break up a valuable domestic market, and inflict a wound upon our national independence. I trust that the wisdom of the country may observe that happy medium, at a proper time, which will do justice to all. That time has not yet come.

Mr. Chairman, I must now beg leave of the committee to imitate the example of others, and wander from the subject immediately before us. I feel that the time is at hand when I should make and publish my last political and testament. I shall designate no executor. The people, if they please, may appoint an administrator, with the will annexed, in after times. They will do it, when convinced that their safety and happiness require it. If they are never convinced—if the legacies I shall bequeath are deemed of too little value to take proper steps to secure them—why, sir, then let my principles and my efforts pass into the "receptacle of things forgotten on earth."

The very thing which I ask leave to do, in imitation of others, is a crying national evil. I mean the practice of talking on this floor day after day, week after week, upon matters and things in general; things having no sort of connection with the business immediately before us. The debates of this House usually take so wide a range, and so often turn upon subjects impertinent to the business in hand, that when we are wearied and disgusted, we put an end to interminable wrangles by adopting resolutions to take bills out of committee, and call the previous question just as soon as we get them before the House. The consequence is, that the merits of the pending question have not been touched, and members are constrained to vote with no more information in relation to the real question than if there had been no discussion at all. The bill now before us appropriates money to pay the officers of Government, and to provide means to enable them to discharge their functions. It would seem that the evils of a high or a low tariff; the blessings of direct taxes; the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the lands; the merits of the coming Administration, or of the man who may succeed General Harrison; the gullibility or corruptibility of the people; whether their votes had been influenced by deception or British gold; &c. &c. had very little to do with it, if not absolutely out of order! And yet we have listened for days, and at times with great apparent interest to the speeches made upon these irrelevant topics. Let a member rise to propose an amendment to this bill limiting the emoluments of office, and immediately "I object" is heard, and the Chair is called on to pronounce the member and his amendment out of order. But let him rise to "define his position," or to define the position of some one else; let him only possess malice enough and talent enough to render any one odious, or to affect his popularity by calumnious satire; or, if without talent, he uses the coarse rasp of blackguardism, notwithstanding we may hear cries of "order," "order," I have rarely, I believe never, known him fail to get out all he intended, and never yet have I known any one punished; no, not even for assaults and batteries which arrest our deliberations. Why is it that we adhere to order, and thereby reject a valuable amendment which no one dares to oppose upon principle, and tolerate the greatest disorder, considering the character of our debates for irrelevancy and personality? What good has the country derived, or can it derive, from legislation thus conducted? Sir, you may find the proper answer by looking into the pamphlet of eighty-five pages, containing all your public acts of the last session. We were here from the 2d of December to the 21st of July inclusive, and during that time we passed seventy acts and one resolution of a private, and thirty acts and five resolutions of a public nature. The private acts gave rise to very little discussion, and the same remark may be made with truth in regard to the most of the public acts. I will present an epitome of their contents, that my constituents and the people of the whole nation may see how we spent our time, and what was done. There were seven general appropriation bills, and a partial one to provide for ourselves. The latter was passed without a moment's discussion, and approved on the 8th of January. The general acts made provision for pensioners, for civil and diplomatic officers and objects, for the military academy, for the army, for the navy, for fortifications, and for the Indian department. These bills, according to the rules of our House, should contain no appropriations except such as are sanctioned or required by pre-existing laws; and it would seem that, if so limited and confined, it would consume very little time to act on and pass them. If a prior law required the appropriation, no member who regarded the faith and honor of the country would refuse to vote for it, and there would be no occasion for long speeches. Amendments to limit an appropriation, or to curtail it prospectively, might give rise to considerable debate; but even then, not much time would be consumed if all the extraneous matter was cautiously excluded from the debate. But, instead of observing this very obvious and proper course, the practice has been to waste time in Committee of the Whole, upon an appropriation bill, by speaking about every thing that the mind and heart of man can conceive of. The twenty-two public acts of last session, in addition to the eight appropriation acts, were: 1, to amend the act for taking the census; 2, to continue the office of Commissioner of Pensions; 3, to authorize the re-issue of Treasury notes; 4, to make regulations in respect to the registry of vessels engaged in the whale fishery; 5, to alter the time of holding certain courts; 6, to revive and continue in force the act allowing soldiers to surrender their bounty lands and to locate other lands in lieu thereof; 7, to extend for a longer period the acts for the relief of insolvent debtors; 8, to give names to two ports, to wit, Sippican and Mattapoisett, (very good Indian names;) 9, to continue in force the act of 1838, granting pre-emptions until 22d of June, 1842; 10, to execute the convention between the United States and Mexico; 11, to authorize registers and receivers to administer oaths; 12, to discontinue the office of Surveyor General when there are no longer lands to survey, and to abolish land offices when the unsold lands in the district are less than 100,000 acres; 13, to place the prisoners of the United States confined in Providence, Rhode Island, upon the same footing with prisoners committed by State authority; 14, to allow the payment of arrears of pensions to executors and administrators when there is no widow; 15, to establish the Sub-Treasury system; 16, to fix the times of holding certain courts; 17, to provide for holding special terms of court, when the judges do not attend at the commencement of the term prescribed by law, or when the judges think proper to hold special terms, and to declare that judgments and decrees of the federal courts shall cease to be liens on real estate in the same manner, and at like periods, with judgments and decrees of State courts; 18, to remove a land office from one place to another; 19, to provide that jurors in the federal courts shall possess the like qualifications and be entitled to the like exemptions as jurors of the highest State court; 20, to regulate the shipment and discharge of seamen, and the duties of consuls; 21, to add a tract of country to the Coosa land district; 22, to provide for the survey and exploration of the Northeastern boundary. Exclusive of the debates on the appropriation bills, and the bill for the establishment of the Sub-Treasury, there was not one week consumed in debating all the other public acts. The resolution relative to the presents from the Imaum of Muscat occasioned some debate. The other four resolutions were disposed of in less than as many hours. The members of State Legislatures, who convene usually when we do, and adjourn often in February, and seldom later than March, and who, in the course of a few months, pass hundreds of bills of as much importance to individuals, and the community upon which they operate, as our acts, will be amazed by contrasting their legislation with ours.

Why is it that we do comparatively nothing? It is because we are too numerous. We are in each other's way. Those who know how to act, and are willing to act, are hindered in the despatch of business by those who think of little else than the "spoils," and who have converted this body into an electioneering convulsion, in which the question of the succession rides over all others, to the neglect of every thing else. This is the secret spring whence flow the endless debates to accomplish the elevation or overthrow of men—to make and unmake Presidents—with a view to secure fat offices for ourselves and friends. This is the reason that on the days set apart for the consideration of private bills it is almost impossible to obtain a quorum. Why, sir, the yeas and nays were taken last session fifty-one times upon calls of the House with a view to secure the attendance of absent members and twenty-five calls were ordered without yeas and nays, making seventy-six in all. The calls of the House will average at least one hour. We do not sit in the House more than four hours a day on an average during the session. It follows that we lost nineteen days last session in efforts to compel the attendance of members, and very often have I known the House to adjourn for want of a quorum at an early hour, on private bill day, without an effort to secure the attendance of the absentees. Perhaps some member might call for the yeas and nays on the adjournment, and thus spend half an hour more most uselessly. The yeas and nays were taken one hundred and twenty-four times last session on questions of adjournment, thus producing a loss of more than fifteen days of our time. Thirty-four days lost during one session in calling the yeas and nays, with a view to compel members to attend to their business! Let the nation think of it.

Two things will correct, to a great extent, these time wasting evils. First, reduce salaries, so as not to present such strong temptations to human passions; and, secondly, reduce the number of this body to double that of the Senate, and then by a constitutional provision limit it. There are now two hundred and forty-two members of this House, each anxious to convince his constituents, by speaking, that he is worthy of the trust reposed; and many are equally anxious to convince the President is, or is to be, to a great extent, indebted to them for his elevation. And there are not a few, each of whom is rabidly anxious to convince the people that he would make as good, if not a better President than even the Father of his Country. Only conceive, sir, of the ten thousand schemes of personal ambition or pecuniary profit, which, in the nature of man, are constantly operating upon an assembly like this, and our wonder must cease that there should be twenty up at a time, crying "Mr. Speaker," to the extent of their lungs, with a view to obtain the floor. And then, sir, the member who succeeds, apprehensive that his time will never come again, is forced, by a sort of necessity, to do as I am now doing, wander from the subject, and speak of other matters which he may deem of vast importance. I have known the gentlemen here to consume days in delivering a speech which, when printed, could be read in as many hours. A great proof this of their want of preparation, and want of a clear perception of the subject. And then, sir, every other member has an equal right, (and, from my experience here, is very apt to exercise it,) and thus the whole of a long session would be too short to discuss any one question or magnitude. It is altogether a mistake to suppose that members are content to hear their ideas advanced by others. Every one must speak for himself, and hence the same thing is repeated over and over to the hundredth time. We must reform this course of procedure. If we do not, the Government will break to pieces from its utter incapacity to legislate. It will sink under the disgust and contempt of an abused and tanalized people.

I have looked into the last census, with a view to ascertain what was probable in reference to making this a business body, by reducing its numbers. A ratio of sixty thousand will leave to the great States of New York and Pennsylvania their present representation in number. But that ratio would increase the whole number of members to 249, and would aggravate the evil resulting from numbers. Under a ratio of sixty thousand, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Vermont, Maryland, and Tennessee would each lose one member; South Carolina and Kentucky would each lose two members; North Carolina would lose three, and Virginia four. Under that ratio Louisiana would gain one member; Alabama, Mississippi, and Michigan would each gain two members, Missouri three, Indiana and Illinois four each, and Ohio six. The other States would retain their present number of members. Ten States would lose members, eight would gain, and eight remain as they are. Now, I submit it to the American people whether it would not advance the public interests in an eminent degree to raise the ratio so as to reduce the number of members to just double the number of Senators. A greater blessing could not be conferred on this nation by the next Congress; and I should rejoice to see the people take up the subject, and pour in petitions and memorials from all quarters demanding this great reform. It is the interest of every citizen, politicians excepted, that it should be made. It would save hundreds of thousands annually to the Treasury, and enable Congress to do the public business.

The example of the British House of Commons and some of our State Legislatures where the popular branch is very numerous, may be referred to as worthy of imitation. No one will be deluded by the reference, if he will contrast the qualities to which members of Congress are indebted for their election, with those of the members of the legislative assemblies alluded to. Popular manners and fine speaking talents are the principal ingredients to please the taste of the Republic. No State can fill its legislative halls with hundreds of accomplished orators, although it may be able to send its quota here. A numerous State Legislature, of necessity, must be composed of a majority who act rather than talk. Influential friends and much money rule the elections of England. God forbid that money should possess a controlling influence over our elections; and yet there is great danger that we may be brought to it by corruption. Those who get here by talking at home, will not readily surrender their vocation; hence Congress has scores of O'Connells, busied in nothing but agitations, whilst the British Parliament has but one.

Here we talk to acquire fame. It is not so much the case in England. If the House of Commons debated as we do, it would be impossible to do any thing. The members of the Continental Congress, who declared independence and signed the ever-memorable declaration, were fifty-six in number. The articles of confederation, which first united the States into a social compact, were the achievement of forty-eight men. There were only thirty-nine members of the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States. There were only sixty-five members of the first House of Representatives, upon whom were devolved the duties of organizing the Government. The number of Representatives fixed by the first apportionment under the first census was 105, and unfortunately the number has been increased at each subsequent apportionment. The greatest events in our history have been the fruits of the labors of deliberative assemblies composed of less than half our present numbers. I tremble for the fate of my country, when I contemplate the prospect of another war, and perhaps with our old enemy, and reflect that we shall be dependent upon a battalion of discordant councillors in this body to provide means for its conduct and issue. The inevitable inefficiency of large masses for any deliberative purpose, or for prompt action, will have a mighty tendency in time of war to strengthen the Executive arm of the Government. The plea of necessity will justify Executive encroachments, and the people will submit, because they will see no other hope of deliverance; and thus we may tacitly yield to the arbitrary acts of a dictator. Let us return to the examples set by our fathers, by reducing this body to the half of its present numbers.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to make one remark upon the subject of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. I shall not attempt to answer the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise,] and, and others who have opposed the distribution, although I believe every thing urged is susceptible of an easy refutation. What I desire to say is new to my own mind, and I merely wish to throw it out for consideration. If it has weight, and I think it has, it will produce its proper effect at the proper time.

The Articles of Confederation were in full operation at the time Virginia ceded her claim to the country between the Ohio and Mississippi rivers and the lakes, "for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the Confederation, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever." The language quoted is taken from the deed of cession. Now, sir, the Articles of Confederation granted to the General Government very limited powers, compared with those conferred by the Constitution of the United States. The Confederation had no power to levy and collect taxes. It was even limited in the amount of profit on postages to the expenses of the Post Office establishment. It could make requisitions on the several States, requiring them to fill the common Treasury; but, if the States failed to comply, Congress had no power to coerce them. As, then, the States raised and furnished the money in their own modes, according to the portions which they were required to pay; and as the Confederation had no authority to draw a dollar from the pockets of the people, except through the action of the State Legislatures, I request gentlemen to imagine a single case: Suppose the States, influenced by the prospect of war had placed in the common Treasury a sum suited to the emergency; suppose the lowering difficulty to pass away, so that the money was not needed; is there any thing in the Articles of Confederation which forbade the return of the money to the States which furnished it? Would it not have been the duty of the Confederation, in such a case, to return the money? I believe every impartial, sound mind must give an affirmative answer. Is there any difference between the money coming from the sales of public land, and that supplied by the States under the Articles of Confederation? Can any one take a distinction, upon which the money drawn by State taxation from the people should go back into the Treasuries of the States, and yet the money arising from the sales of lands must be retained? It is worthy of remark that the deed of cession, by which the Confederation acquired the title of Virginia, does not declare that the lands shall be disposed of for the use and benefit of the Confederation as a whole, and for the purposes of the Confederation exclusively. On the contrary, it is "for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have or shall become members of the Confederation;" evidently implying that the proceeds might be applied to State as well as Confederation purposes, and that the great object of the cession was to allow each State to participate in a common fund according to a prescribed rule, without limiting and restricting the particular manner in which the fund should be used. The Confederation was made the trustee of the fund; and, as such, there could be no more appropriate disposition of the money than to hand it over to the cestui que trust. All this is, to my mind, perfectly clear, under the Articles of Confederation. Nor can I perceive how the subsequent adoption of the Constitution of the United States changes the case. There may be some reason for saying that, as Congress, under the Constitution, derives supplies from its own system of taxation, and as the Government is one of limited powers, money cannot be raised or applied constitutionally to any other purposes except those expressly enumerated. But such reasons have nothing to do with the question in regard to the public lands, and especially that portion of them acquired by cessions from the States. In regard to the public lands held under the purchases of Louisiana and Florida, there is no reason to suppose that it was designed to have a difference made in the money arising from their sale and that coming from the lands ceded by the States, I place the whole upon the same footing, and take the original position of the public domain, under the Articles of Confederation, as my guide. There is at least as much constitutional warrant for placing the public lands of Louisiana and Florida upon the same basis as those acquired from Virginia, as there was for the purchase and annexation of these Territories to the United States.

Some days ago, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] told us that, four years hence, the dead march, Old Roslin Castle, would be played at the funeral ceremonies of the Harrison administration, and intimated that Whig principles would ever after be consigned to oblivion. That gentleman appeared in a new character. I should never have suspected him for a prophet, and cannot now put faith in his Lochiel warning. Sir, I would comment to him and his party other consolation for their own defeat than presaging disasters to those who have vanquished them. Could he but say, "I fell in a just cause," as we all know he loves poetry, he might have found consolation in the reflection that

"The sweet village maid, when with flowers she dresses
Her dark-flowing hair on some festival day,
Shall think of my fate, till, neglecting her tresses,
She mournfully turns from her mirror away."

But alas! I fear the gentleman has fallen in the cause which will not even secure him the sympathy of the log cabin lads and lasses, with whom, in days "lang syne," according to his own account, he drank new whiskey out of a gourd, and danced after music made upon three strings of a cracked fiddle.

Sir, it has not been long since I dreaded the success of lococoism. In my gloomiest moments fancy painted the scenes of the French revolution, and located them in this blessed land. The guillotine, streaming with human gore, rose like a horrible vision before me, and I saw fiends, in the garb and semblance of men, seize the head of the female victim as it rolled from the block, raise it aloft by the hair, and before the brain had ceased its functions, whilst yet a glare of intellectual perception and horror shone from the eye and countenance, spit upon and strike with the fist in the face, and shout "Hurrah for Liberty and Equality." Such was the conduct of the demon Le Gross to the dismembered head of the beautiful Charlotte Corde. If, in a gloomy moment like this, the wizard from Ohio had told his tale, even then I would have said for every true Whig what the Highland chief declared for himself—he will fall

"With his back to the field and his feet to the foe;
And leaving in battle no blot on his name,
Look proudly to Heaven from the death-bed of fame."

But, sir, my days of doubt and dismay are over. It may hereafter, as it has done, take a long time to enlighten the public mind, but I see in the election of General Harrison a verification what the great statesman said, "truth is omnipotent, and public justice certain." All that a good cause wants is perseverance. "Blessed is he that holds out to the end." And if the Whig party will only execute their professed principles, reform abuses, walk humbly in the way of doing good, eschew the monarchical and aristocratical principles practised by their adversaries, cease to follow their examples, and remember that the main object of Government is not to collect taxes from the many to enrich the few, that the glory of a nation does not consist in the wealth and personal grandeur of office holders, but in the comfort and independence of a numerous, hardy, and intelligent population—in other words, let the Whigs renounce the doctrines of the "spoils system," and their political power will continue whilst the Alleghanies maintain their foundations.

Let the Whigs give the nation a well regulated National Bank. Let them amend the Constitution, and limit the eligibility of the President to one term; place the revenues of the country exclusively in the hands of the Representatives of the people, under the management of a Secretary of the Treasury chosen by them; make the Post Office Department wholly independent of the Executive; relieve inferior Executive officers from the condition of slavery in which they are placed, and allow no arbitrary political punishments to be inflicted on those who faithfully and honestly discharge their official duties; render members of Congress ineligible to offices in the gift of the President for a limited time after their representative terms expire; give good but not extravagant salaries; let the election of President be national, and made directly by the people, without the agency of electoral college; yes, sir, let the Whigs do the things they have promised, and they will, by so doing, perpetuate their power and their principles, and secure blessing and praise from a prosperous and contented people. If they fail, political pledges are mere mockeries; Republican Government, a humbug; professions of honesty, the trick of a hypocrite; and our hopes of human liberty, the ignis fatuus of a benighted world—the phosphorescence which lures to destruction.

SPEECH OF MR. GIDDINGS, OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives, February 9, 1841—

On the proposition of Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, to appropriate "one hundred thousand dollars for the removal, subsistence, and benefit of such of the Seminole Chiefs and warriors as may surrender for emigration."

Mr. GIDDINGS said he rose to congratulate the country upon the prospect of bringing this unhappy war to a close. I am, (said he,) however, in some degree incredulous as to its speedy termination by the means proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. THOMPSON.)

While I would go as far as any member to bring this war to an immediate close, I think it important that we should carefully examine the causes that brought it on, the reasons of its repeated renewal and continuation, in order that we may be able to adopt such measures as will ensure peace at the earliest possible moment. I think the plan proposed is defective in one particular; and before I take my seat, I intend to offer an amendment; which, in my opinion, will correct the omission.

This war has become a subject of deep interest to the people of the nation. It has continued to occupy the attention of the Government and the efforts of the army for more than five years. Our officers and soldiers have fallen victims to the climate, and to the hostile tribe with whom we have been contending. Near forty millions of the national treasure have been swallowed up in this most unfortunate contest. The attention of our people has often been called to these facts; while few, very few, of them have been fully informed as to the original exciting cause of this war, or the manner in which it has been renewed and conducted. Our army has been defeated, and I fear that our national honor has not remained altogether unharmed. "Rumor, with her thousand tongues," has whispered of transactions which, if real, ought to be known; if not, these rumors should be forever silenced. The able speech of the gentleman from Vermont, over the way, [Mr. EVERETT,] in 1836, gave us some idea of the manner in which the Indians with whom we are now contending were treated. Our own violations of the treaty with them, while we required a rigid observance on their part of all its terms, were clearly and ably expressed by him. It is not my intention to review our treaties with those Indians, or to speak of the manner in which those treaties were effected, or of the great injustice done to the Indians, except where these subjects have manifestly conduced to the disastrous war now under discussion. It is, however, my purpose to call the attention of the committee to the causes which led to these hostilities; to that policy which has involved us in the vast sacrifice of life and treasure, expended in Florida during the last five years, and to the effect which that policy has had upon the rights and the interests of the free States. I also propose to examine, for a few minutes, the manner in which this war has been conducted, as well as the effect which the conduct of our high officers of Government must have upon the feelings of the people of the free States, and upon the honor of our nation. In doing this, I intend to test the constitutionality of that policy by those plain and fundamental principles of our Government to which I think must all yield assent. In claiming for my constituents and the State which I, in part, have the honor to represent, as well as for the free States generally, the rights and privileges which I think belong to them, and which I think should be held sacred by every officer of Government, I shall rely upon no principle that has not been frequently asserted by the slave States, and by both of the great political parties. Indeed, I intend to assert no principle but such as will command the assent of every member on this floor.

I have made these preliminary remarks in order that the committee may the better understand what I intend to say hereafter, and, having stated my premises, I will enter upon an investigation of the causes which led to the Florida war. Before I do this, however, I will take occasion to say that the lands occupied by these Indians formed no inducement for us to enter upon this war. General Jesup says, "those lands would not pay for the medicines used by our troops while employed against the Indians." The Seminole Indians, by the treaty entered into at Payne's Landing, on the 9th May, A. D. 1832, agreed to emigrate west of the Mississippi upon certain conditions. I shall not inquire whether those conditions were performed on our part, or whether the Indians were or were not morally bound to the observance of this stipulation. It is well known that they refused to emigrate, and that such refusal induced General Jackson to order the military force of the United States to Florida to compel them to emigrate. This attempted compulsion brought on the hostilities which still continue. The important question now proposed, and which I intend to answer, is, Why did they refuse to emigrate? The answer, however, may be found in Executive documents of the 24th Congress, at its first session, (House Document No. 271, p. 8,) in an official letter of Wiley Thompson, Indian agent, to Wm. P. Duval, Governor of Florida, dated January 1, 1834, nearly a year previous to the commencement of hostilities. Speaking of the unwillingness of the Indians to emigrate, General Thompson says: "The principal causes which operate to cherish this feeling hostile to emigration are, first, the fear that their reunion with the Creeks, which will subject them to the government and control of the Creek national council, will be a surrender of a large negro property, now held by those people, to the Creeks, as an antagonist claimant."

Thus, sir, we have official intelligence that the principal cause of the war was the fear of losing this "negro property." And we are led to inquire into the history of these conflicting claims to the "negro property" between the Creeks and Seminoles.

In the letter above quoted, General Thompson, speaking further on the subject, says: "The Creek claim to negroes now in the possession of the Seminole Indians, which is supposed to be the first cause of hostility to the emigration of the latter tribe, grows out of the treaty of 1821 between the United States and the former." We have now traced the original and principal cause of this war, as given by the Indian agent, to the treaty of Indian Spring, made on the 8th January, 1821. This is the official report of an accredited officer of Government, who had long mingled in the councils of the Indians, and who was most familiar with their views, and whose word, I presume, was never doubted. I will now ask the attention of the committee for a moment, while I relate some of the historical facts that brought about this treaty of 1821.

We are all aware that Indians frequently commit trespasses upon the property of their white neighbors. In 1802, Congress passed a law by which the people of Georgia received pay for all such trespasses committed subsequently by the Creek Indians from the public treasure, and the amount thus paid was retained from the annuities or other moneys due the Indians. By the treaty of 1821, an attempt was made to obtain for the people of Georgia pay for slaves who had left their masters and taken up their residence with the Indians prior to 1802; and an agreement was obtained from them, consenting that the United States should pay to the people of Georgia the amount found due them for such losses prior to 1802, and retain the amount thus paid out of the money due the Indians for the lands sold to the United States; provided the sum thus found due should not exceed $250,000. The indemnity sought for the slaveholders of Georgia by this treaty was for losses sustained twenty years prior to the treaty, and extending back an indefinite period.

Under this treaty the Creek Indians were compelled to pay for slaves that had left their masters forty or fifty years prior to the date of the treaty. Nor were they compelled merely to pay for slaves that lived or had taken up their residence with the Indians; but they were charged for the value of the slave when shown to have left his master without proof that he was with the Indians, or had any existence in their country. I speak upon the authority of Mr. Wirt, late Attorney General, as expressed in Executive Document No. 123, 1st session 20th Congress. Nor were those abuses unaccompanied with others of equally flagrant character. Mr. Wirt, in the same communication, assures the President that the price allowed for a slave was two or three times his real value. Yet, after paying for all the slaves that could be shown to have left their masters, at two or three times their real value, together with other property taken or destroyed by the Seminoles prior to 1802, it was found that the whole amounted to but $101,000, leaving in the hands of the Government $149,000 belonging to the Indians. This money, however, was not returned to the Indians, but was retained by Government until 1834, when the owners of the fugitive slaves petitioned Congress that it might be divided among them. This petition was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the chairman, an honorable member from Georgia, [Mr. GILMER] reported in favor of dividing the money among the owners of the fugitive slaves as a compensation for the offspring which the slaves would have borne had they remained in bondage. This plan, which I think sets at perfect defiance all Yankee calculations, was rejected by Congress. But a bill was subsequently introduced, providing for a division of this money among the owners of those slaves by way of interest, in direct violation of the treaty, and notwithstanding they had previously received two or three times the real value of their slaves; and this bill soon passed into a law. This was done in 1834. These slaves had most of them united with the Seminoles or runaways in the peninsula of Florida, and the Creeks, (from whom the Seminoles had formerly separated,) having paid to the people of Georgia two or three times the value of those slaves, now claimed them as their property. The Creeks had mostly gone west of the Mississippi, and their agents were in Florida demanding these negroes of the Seminoles. The Seminoles, in the mean time, it is said, had intermarried with the negroes, and stood connected with them in all the relations of domestic life. If they emigrated west, their wives and children would be taken from them by the Creeks as slaves; if they remained in Florida, they must defend themselves against the army of the United States. With them, sir, it was war on one side, and slavery on the other. This state of things was entirely brought about by the efforts of our Government to obtain pay for the fugitive slaves of Georgia.

This interference of the Federal Government in behalf of slavery in Georgia appears to have been the origin of all our Florida difficulties.

[Mr. WARREN, of Georgia, called Mr. GIDDINGS to order on the ground of irrelevancy.]

The Chairman, Mr. CLIFFORD, of Maine, decided that the remarks of Mr. GIDDINGS respecting the origin of the Florida war were in order; and Mr. G. proceeded.]

I think this interposition of our Federal Government unconstitutional and improper, and will assign the reasons of that opinion.

[Mr. HABERSHAM, of Georgia, called Mr. GIDDINGS to order, and stated that the gentleman from Ohio had intimated his intention to offer an amendment to the proposition before the House, and was proceeding to make a speech pretty freely interlarded with abolition, while this committee were yet uninformed as to the terms of the amendment he intended to offer.]

The CHAIRMAN stated that the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio had reference to the proposition before the House, and were therefore in order.

Mr. HABERSHAM desired to hear the amendment.]

Mr. GIDDINGS resumed. I arose, Mr. Chairman, to discuss the Florida war, and I intend doing so, and cannot be drawn off upon any collateral points, nor frightened from it by the cry of Abolition.

I will, however, say to the gentleman from Georgia, that I have not said, nor do I intend saying, one word upon the subject of Abolition, although I may perhaps touch upon the doctrine of State right and strict construction.

I hold that if the slaves of Georgia or any other State leave their masters, the Federal Government has no constitutional authority to employ our army or navy for their recapture, or to apply the national treasure to repurchase them. We possess no constitutional power to do either. If, however, gentlemen of the South, who hold to a strict and rigid construction of that instrument, will point me to the clause of our Constitution containing such authority, I will confess my obligations to them. Such power would necessarily include the power to tax the free States to an indefinite extent for the support of slavery, and for arresting every fugitive slave who has fled from his master, within the several States of this Union. Such power I deny most distinctly and emphatically. But, sir, we have as much right to do this directly as we have to do it indirectly. We have as much power to employ our army and navy in recapturing fugitive slaves, as we have to make a treaty with the Indians to retake such fugitives, and then employ our army and navy to compel the Indians to do it. We have as much power to tax the free States, and apply the money directly for the purchase of fugitive slaves, as we have to tax them to carry on a war for the purpose of compelling the surrender of such slaves, or even to apply the national treasure to the holding of such treaties. In truth, sir, we have no power whatever over the subject or institution of slavery within the several States of this Union. We have neither the power to sustain nor abolish it, to create or destroy it. I mean, sir, that we have no such powers delegated to us for any purpose whatever. We have not the power to sustain it in the South, or establish it in the North. I know it is said, and repeated, and asserted, that a portion of the people of the free States hold that we have power to abolish slavery in the States. I can only say that I have never met with any intelligent man who has advanced such doctrine in my hearing. For my own part, I believe we have as much power to establish slavery in the free States as we have to abolish it in the slave States. I say nay nothing of the constitutional power of Congress over the slave trade between the States. But, Mr. Chairman, I am not willing to believe that any gentleman on this floor will urge the right of taxing the freemen of the North for the holding in slavery the colored men at the South.

I would not use those distinctions of North and South, could I avoid them. Yet I think no apology is due from me on this point, as I have constantly heard them used, and repeated, and reiterated by gentlemen from a certain portion of the Union, during the three years I have had a seat in this hall.

But, sir, I wish further to look into this power, or rather the want of power, in Congress over slavery within the States of this Union. In December, A. D. 1838, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. ATHERTON] introduced to this House, a resolution expressing the sense of the House in regard to this power.

[The CHAIRMAN informed Mr. GIDDINGS that the discussion of those resolutions would not be in order.]

I had, Mr. Chairman, no idea of discussing those resolutions. I merely refer to one of them, as expressing the views of the North and of the South on this subject. It speaks the voice of all the hundred and ninety-eight members who voted for it. It reads as follows: "Resolved, That this Government is a Government of limited powers; that, by the Constitution of the United States, it has no power whatever over the institution of slavery in the several States of this Union." This resolution received the almost unanimous support of this House. There were one hundred and ninety-eight votes in favor of it, and but six against it. I voted for it myself, because I deemed it correct. Every member from the slave States voted for it. I shall be slow to suspect that any of those gentlemen will now change their position, and say that we have power to sustain slavery; and that, in voting for the resolution, they only intended to say that we have no power whatever over the subject to abolish it. I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that the Federal Government has at times interposed its influence to obtain for the citizens of slave States compensation for slaves taken by Indian tribes and by Great Britain. But this fact furnishes no argument against the position I have assumed. The cases alluded to were merely the acts of the Executive, interposed by common consent, without discussion or objection, for the purpose of obtaining from such tribe or Government a compensation which we have uniformly refused when demanded of ourselves; for I believe it to be well understood that we have never, in any instance, paid the owner for the loss of a slave, even when such slave was pressed into the public service, and killed while thus in the employ of Government. The Florida war, having its origin in attempts on the part of the Federal Government to sustain slavery in one of the States of this Union, is so far unconstitutional, and is directly opposed to the doctrine contained in the resolution above quoted, which received the unanimous support of the slave States.

And now, having called the attention of the committee to the remote and principal cause of this war, I will ask their attention to some of the more proximate and immediate causes. On the 21st of May, 1836, this House adopted a resolution calling upon the then President for "information respecting the causes of the Florida war." On the 3d June, the President transmitted to the House sundry papers relating to that subject, among which may be found an address or petition of nearly one hundred gentlemen, said to be among the principal inhabitants of Florida, calling on the President to interpose the power of the General Government for the purpose of securing them in the possession of their slaves. These gentlemen, speaking of the Seminole Indians, say: "While this indomitable people continue where they now are, the owners of slaves in our Territory, and even in the States contiguous, cannot for a moment, in any thing like security, enjoy this kind of property."

This was a plain, direct, and palpable request for the President to interpose the strong arm of the nation in behalf of slavery. Nor did the President remain deaf to such request; but he immediately endorsed an order on the back of the petition, directing the Secretary of War to make inquiry, and if the charges were found true, "to direct the Indians to prepare forthwith to remove west of the Mississippi." Soon after this, the treaty of Payne's Landing, having remained nearly two years unnoticed by the President, was sent to the Senate for their sanction; and every preparation was made to compel the Indians, by physical force, to remove west of the Mississippi. A correspondence was carried on with the officers of our army; and all the military force that could well be brought to Florida was concentrated there, for the purpose of compelling the Indians, at the point of the bayonet, to emigrate. This was done without even laying the subject before Congress, or asking for any legislative action.

It is not my intention to enlarge on this point, or to comment upon this very extraordinary interposition of Executive influence in favor of slavery, without constitutional or legitimate sanction. Neither have I time to comment upon the manner in which the treaty of Payne's Landing was obtained from the Indians; nor upon the extraordinary terms of that treaty; nor upon the still more extraordinary method of enforcing the Indians to an observance of the compact by the use of the bayonet, without consulting the legislative authority, in defiance of justice, and without precedent. But I desire to examine into the causes of this war, and discover how far it has had its origin in attempts by the Executive to support and maintain slavery at the national expense, and in violation of the rights of the free States. In doing this, I shall speak from no vague conjecture or uncertain suspicion; but what I say shall be "from the book"—from documentary evidence and official reports.

The address to which I have called the attention of the committee estimates the number of negroes among the Seminole Indians at that time at more than five hundred; and they declare it as their belief that four-fifths of them are fugitive slaves. On the 20th January, 1834, Gov. Duval, in a letter to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, says: "The slaves belonging to the Indians have a controlling influence over the minds of their masters, and are entirely opposed to any change of residence. It will be best at once to adopt firm and decided measures, such as will demonstrate to the Indians the determination of the Government to see the treaty justly and fairly executed. This cannot be done until the bands of outlaws (fugitive slaves) mentioned in the agent's report are arrested and broken up; for, so long as they are permitted to remain, every Indian that is unwilling to emigrate will seek their protection." No man, perhaps, possessed better knowledge of these facts than Governor Duval, who assures us that the negroes controlled the Indians, and that the Indians sought the protection and support of the fugitive slaves. He further assures us that nothing could be done while those fugitive slaves were permitted to remain in Florida. If gentlemen will bear this advice in mind, they will better understand the policy that subsequently guided our army against the Indians.

In a letter dated January 26, 1834, Gov. Duval says: "The slaves belonging to the Indians must be made to fear for themselves before they will cease to influence the minds of their masters." You may be assured (says he) that the first step towards the emigration of these Indians must be the breaking up of the runaway slaves and outlaw Indians." Thus we are informed that the war must be first waged against the fugitive slaves. Perhaps I ought to explain that slavery among the Indians is very different from what it is among the whites. It is comparative independence. Hence the slaves of the Indians have a perfect horror of slavery among the white people. Of course the fugitive slaves and the Indian slaves become intimate friends, and act in concert for the liberty of all.

[Mr. CAMPBELL of South Carolina called Mr. Giddings to order, and stated that the member from Ohio was evidently assailing indirectly an institution which, by the rules of the House, was not liable to be assailed.]

The CHAIRMAN said that the gentleman from Ohio had expressed his intention to discuss the Florida war, and he had understood the remarks as having reference to that subject. The CHAIRMAN could not attribute a different motive from that expressed by the gentleman himself. I am (said he) therefore constrained to say the gentleman from Ohio is in order.]

Mr. GIDDINGS resumed. I was not aware, Mr. Chairman, that our rules protected from discussion any institution whatever. I will, however, assure the gentleman from South Carolina that I shall only allude to the subject of slavery so far as it stands connected with the Florida war. That, so far as it has been the means of drawing forty millions of dollars from the public Treasury, and most of it from the free States, I intend to assail it, and no further. Governor Duval says "these slaves must first be made to fear for themselves." The war was first to be waged against slaves, for the reason that they influenced the minds of their masters in favor of liberty. In other words, the war must be directed against the right of a slave to express his mind to his Indian master on the subject of human rights. Sir, these slaves were made to fear for themselves in pursuance of these intimations of Governor Duval, as I will now endeavor to show this committee. On the 28th October, 1834, General Thompson, in a letter addressed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, says: "There are many very likely negroes in this nation, (Seminole) Some of the whites in the adjacent settlements manifest a restless desire to obtain them, and I have no doubt that Indian raiding negroes are now in possession of the whites." Thus, sir, it seems that kidnapping was not unknown in that country. This same General Thompson, the accredited officer of this Government, on the 9th January, 1835, advises Government "that an expedition should be set on foot for the double purpose of driving the Indians within their boundary, and to capture negroes, many of whom it is believed are runaway slaves." And, sir, our army was put in motion to capture negroes and slaves, as we shall find in the sequel. But I wish to call the attention of the committee for a few moments to the manner in which these slaves, in the words of Governor Duval, were "made to fear for themselves." On the 28th July, 1835, John Walker, one of the Apalachicola chiefs belonging to the Seminole band, wrote Gen. Thompson, Indian agent, as follows:

"I am (says he) induced to write you in consequence of the depredations making, and attempted to be made, upon my property, by a company of negro stealers, some of whom are from Columbus, Georgia, and have connected themselves with Brown and Douglass. I should like your advice how I am to act. I dislike to make any trouble or to have any difficulty with any of the white people. But if they trespass upon my premises and my rights, I must defend myself in the best way I can. If they do make this attempt—and I have no doubt they will—they must bear the consequences. But is there no civil law to protect me? Are the free negroes and the negroes belonging in this town to be stolen away publicly, and, in the face of all law and justice, carried off and sold to fill the pockets of these worse than land pirates? Douglass and his company hired a man who has two large trained dogs for the purpose to come down and take Billy. He is from Mobile, and follows for a livelihood catching runaway negroes."

This, sir, is the language of a savage, addressed to his civilized neighbors. He called in vain for protection. A few days after the date of this letter he was robbed of all his negroes; so says the report of the United States attorney, addressed to the Secretary of War, and dated April 21, 1836. But of the number of freemen kidnapped at the same time we are not informed. At all events, "the slaves were made to fear for themselves," as Governor Duval advised. Can we wonder that these Indians were driven to acts of desperation?

Here, sir, is the first mention I have met of the use of "bloodhounds" in this Florida war. They were used by "negro stealers," for the purpose of catching the colored people of Florida, and our officers have copied the example. But I intend giving further examples of the use of bloodhounds before I close. I have, however, no time for comment. My object is to place facts before the people of this nation, and let every man make his own comments, and draw his own conclusions. I will give one more example of the mode of "teaching slaves to fear for themselves." E-con-chattimico was also an Indian chief of the Seminole band, living upon the Apalachicola river, and was perhaps one who signed the treaty at Camp Moultrie in 1832, by which we solemnly pledged the faith of this nation to protect the Indians in the enjoyment of their lives and property. This chief is said to have owned twenty slaves, valued at $15,000. These "negro stealers" were seen hovering around his plantation, and their object could not be misunderstood. By the advice of the sub-agent, he armed himself and people for the purpose of defending themselves. When the negro stealers learned that E-con-chattimico's people had armed themselves in defence of their liberty, (for they considered Indian slavery liberty compared with white slavery,) they raised a report that the Indians had armed themselves for the purpose of uniting with the hostile Seminoles, and murdering the white people. On learning this, E-con-chattimico at once delivered up his arms to the white people, and threw himself upon their protection. Disarmed, and unable to defend his people, they were immediately kidnapped, taken off, and sold into interminable bondage. E-con-chattimico now calls on us to pay him for the loss he has sustained in the violation of our treaty, in which we solemnly covenanted to protect him and his property. Robbed, abused, insulted, and deceived, he emigrated to the West, and now looks to us for a redress of the wrongs he has sustained. I give the substance of his statement, as related by him in his petition, and communicated by General Thompson, Governor Duval, and the district attorney of East Florida, and sworn to by several witnesses.

But, sir, this transaction and others equally abusive were soon known throughout Florida. The Indians and negroes were thus admonished of the necessity of uniting their efforts and energies in defence of their liberty and lives. Governor Duval, speaking of this transaction in a letter to the Secretary of War, dated the 23d May, says "it was an outrage well calculated to rouse the Indians to hostility." These are the acts that have led us on, step by step, until we have found ourselves in the midst of a most disastrous war.

The men who committed these robberies, and kidnapped these negroes, were well known, for the acts were committed in open day; their names and places of residence are distinctly mentioned; but I have yet to learn that any one of them has been punished in any manner for this warfare against the liberty of the blacks and the rights of the Indians. Indeed, it seems to have been an object with some of the officers employed in Florida to induce Government itself to enter into the business of capturing and selling slaves. J. W. Harris, disbursing agent of Government, in a letter to the Commissary General of Subsistence, dated December 30, 1836, says: "I would respectfully suggest that you recommend to the honorable Secretary of War that the annuity due to the hostile Indians be retained to defray the expenses of this war; and that the slaves who shall be captured, whom I believe to have been generally active instigators to our present troubles, be sold at public sale, and the proceeds appropriated to the same object." This is the first official proposition that has come to my knowledge for the Government to enter into competition with the "negro stealers," by capturing and selling slaves. At the time this suggestion was made, we were engaged in open war with these people, who had sought liberty in the wilds of Florida. If they were captured, they would be prisoners of war; and for us to sell them as slaves would be as much a violation of our national honor as it would have been for them to have sold as slaves such of our people as they were able to capture.

I may perhaps be permitted to remark that, among the people of the free States, nothing is regarded with so much disgust and abhorrence as buying and selling of men, women, and children, and that this feeling is common among all classes and all political parties.

Mr. Chairman, I have called the attention of the committee to what is officially announced as the first and principal cause of this war, and also to some of the proximate and immediate causes. I think no man can doubt that it originated in the attempts of the Executive to support slavery by the influence and efforts of our national Government in violation, as I think, of the Constitution and of the rights of the free States. I propose to investigate the subject a little further, and to examine into the cause that led to its removal and continuance.

On the 6th day of March, 1837, General Jesup entered into a conventional arrangement with the Seminole Indians, by which it was agreed that hostilities should immediately cease; that the Indians should emigrate West of the Mississippi; that they should be secure in their lives and property; and "that negroes, their bona fide property," should accompany them. By the terms of this compact no negroes were included, except those who were called the "bona fide property" of the Indians, although Governor Duval, General Jesup, and the Indian agent, all unite in saying that the Indians were controlled by the blacks. These blacks comprised both fugitive slaves and free people of color, who were connected with the Indians by marriage and consanguinity. The attempt to separate them appears to have been hopeless.

The Indian who had married a fugitive slave and reared a family of children would not, in my opinion, quietly fold his arms and view his offspring and their mother marched off into interminable slavery, while he himself should go West. Nor do I believe that will ever be done. They are all the enemies of our country, fighting in arms against us. They have already cost us much treasure, and the blood of many freemen. If they will now surrender themselves "prisoners of war," I would send them all West together. No person can doubt our perfect right to do so; and I think justice to the nation and to the Indians requires it, and my amendment will be to that effect. General Jesup's attempt to separate them failed, and I believe all further attempts of that kind will fail.

This compact between General Jesup and the Indians bears date on the 6th March. On the 18th of the same month, a solemn remonstrance against this arrangement was signed by a number of gentlemen of high standing in Florida, and transmitted to the Secretary of War. These gentlemen totally objected to any pacification that did not provide for the recapture of their fugitive slaves. They objected to the Indians going West until they should take and return to their owners the slaves who had escaped from their masters in Florida. The remonstrance may be found at 55th page of Executive document of the House of Representatives, No. 225 of the 3d session of the 25th Congress. It is an interesting paper, but of too great length for me to read at this time. It shows, in a most palpable light, the views entertained by those gentlemen in regard to the cause and object of this war. Whatever others may have thought upon that subject, it is clear that they supposed the war to have been commenced and carried on for the purpose of aiding them in holding their slaves; and they declare it incompatible with the honor and dignity of the nation to permit the Indians to emigrate until they shall bring the slaves back to their owners. I have no doubt they felt that they were correct in their views; nor do I believe they entertained a doubt of the justice and propriety of taxing the free States to any extent in support of slavery. There was, however, a cessation of hostilities, notwithstanding these remonstrances. The Indians ceased for a time to plunder the defenceless families of Florida, to burn their cabins, and murder the defenceless women and children; but, sir, the fugitive slaves remained yet hidden in the swamps and everglades of that untraversed country. Peace on such terms appears to have been acceptable to the people of Florida. I will not speak the conclusions of my own mind, however, on this subject, but will give you the words of a high officer of Government who was on the spot, and who spoke from positive knowledge. I refer to General Jesup, who, in a letter dated 29th March, 1837, and directed to Col. John Warren, speaking of the anxiety of the Indians to maintain the peace agreed upon, says: "There is no disposition on the part of the great body of the Indians to renew hostilities; and they will, I am sure, faithfully fulfil their engagements if the inhabitants of the Territory be prudent. But any attempt to seize their negroes or other property would be followed by an immediate resort to arms."

Thus we have the authority of General Jesup for saying that the Indians were anxious to maintain peace. That he was at the same time apprehensive that the people would attempt to seize the Indian negroes. What reason Gen. Jesup had to suspect that the people of Florida would be otherwise than prudent, or what reason he had to fear that they would seize the Indian negroes, I know not. He certainly exhibited fears upon the subject. For on the 5th April, being seven days subsequent to this letter to Col. Warren, we find that he issued a general order in the following words: "The Commanding General has reason to believe that the interference of unprincipled white men with the negro property of the Seminole Indians, if not immediately checked, will prevent their emigration, and lead to a renewal of hostilities." The order goes on to prohibit any person not connected with the public service from entering upon the territory assigned to the Indians. In this order we have official intelligence that the whites did in fact interfere with the Indian slaves, or, in other words, they began to rob the Indians of their slaves almost as soon as hostilities ceased. As to the outrages committed upon the free blacks during the suspension of hostilities we have no information in this order, and are left to infer the course pursued towards them from the evidence I have previously given. If these people were sufficiently rapacious to rob the Indians of their negroes under such circumstances, it is easy to form an opinion as to the safety of the free colored people found with the Indians. How many of them, if any, were made slaves, we know not. On the 18th April, twelve days after the date of his letter to Col. Warren, Gen. Jesup wrote to Gov. Call, saying: "If the citizens of the Territory be prudent, the war may be considered at an end. But any attempt to interfere with the Indian negroes would cause an immediate resort to hostilities. The negroes control their masters, and they have heard of the act of your legislative council. Thirty or more of the Indian negro men were at and near my camp on the Withlacoochie late in March. But the arrival of two or three citizens of Florida, said to be in search of negroes, caused them to disperse at once, and I doubt whether they will come in again. At all events, the emigration will be delayed a month, I apprehend, in consequence of the alarm of these negroes."

The embarrassment into which Gen. Jesup was thrown is quite apparent, notwithstanding his order of the 5th April. The people were anxious to hunt for slaves. The negroes, it would seem, were under constant apprehension, and fled when a slave catcher came into their vicinity. Whether the Indian negroes had cause for that fear, we are unable to judge, except from the documents before us. Between the Indians and our army, it appears, there was no difficulty whatever. But the difficulty appears to have been between the Indians and negroes on one side, and those who sought to rob the Indians and enslave the blacks on the other. It is also quite evident that some of the people of Florida were restless under the order of the 5th of April, prohibiting them from entering the Indian country. When intelligence respecting that order reached St. Augustine, it seems a public meeting was called and a committee appointed to procure its repeal, in order that the white people might enter the Indian country for the purpose of seizing slaves.

This committee, said to be composed of men of high standing, addressed a long letter to General Jesup, in which they say, speaking of the people of Florida: "While they believe that the accomplishment of a certain pacification must, as it ought, be an object of primary importance in these negotiations, they persuade themselves that the preservation of the negro property belonging to the inhabitants of this desolated country must be seen by him to be an object of scarcely less moment." It is a most undeniable fact, borne out by every part of these official documents, that the people of Florida supposed that the great object of the war was to aid the slaveholders in capturing and recovering their slaves. This same protest goes to recount facts in regard to their slaves having run away, and finding a place of refuge in the Indian country, and the concluding of an armistice by General Jesup, without getting their slaves back, and then the signers add: "Against such a course, a course so destructive of their rights and interests, the citizens of St. Augustine and others, in public meeting assembled, for themselves and on behalf of the inhabitants of East Florida generally, do most solemnly protest." This, sir, is the solemn protest of the citizens of Florida against any cessation of hostilities upon other terms than of getting back their slaves, or rather of permitting them to enter the Indian country to obtain their slaves. The horror with which the negroes, both Indian slaves and free blacks, regarded those who came within their territory for the purpose of catching slaves, is shown by the letter of General Jesup just quoted; in which he states that thirty Indian negroes, and about his camp, at once ran away when they heard that two men were there in quest of slaves.

With these people the great, important, and absorbing subject appears to have been slaves, not peace. Indeed, we have their solemn protest against extinguishing the flames of war, or stopping the torrent of blood which had so long flowed, until they should have their slaves secured to them. They were unwilling that the treasure of the nation should cease to be poured out until they should have their fellow-men brought back into bondage. But, sir, I should fatigue the committee too much were I to refer to a tenth part of the documentary evidence which I have before me on this subject, or to that part which goes to prove the attempts of our Government officers to get back the slaves who had escaped from their masters; or the manner in which that object entered into the plans of the War Department. Nor have I time to give any considerable portion of the evidence showing how this object of capturing slaves and supporting slavery, entered into the designs, and was carried out in the movements of the army. The time which may reasonably be claimed by me will only permit me to glance at the subject, and to lay before this committee and the people of this nation a small portion of the facts which I wish I were able to present to them. It will be sufficient in this place to remark that, immediately after these protestations against peace—these official communications showing that the Indians had no desire to renew the war, and that the only danger to be apprehended was the unlawful interference by the people of Florida with the Indian negroes, the flames of war were again lighted up; our troops were again put in motion; the Treasury of our nation was again placed under contribution; and the blood of defenceless women and helpless children again flowed, in order, as it appears, that slaveholders might recover their slaves. I speak, sir, from official documentary evidence. These facts, and those which I intend to refer to, are on record in the archives of our nation, and will descend in all coming time to give character to this unholy war.

It would appear, from a perusal of the documents before me, that General Jesup was unable to fulfil his covenant with the Indians to protect them, and the negroes connected with them; but on this point we have no direct evidence. Certain it is, that he was unable to bring the negroes to terms of submission. I use the term negroes, because he says, officially, that "the negroes controlled the Indians." Being unable to subdue the enemy, his troops falling a prey to the unhealthy climate in which he was situated, the citizens being murdered, their habitations burned, and his army discouraged, he issued the order No. 160, to which I will now call the attention of the committee. That part to which I particularly refer is in the following words: "All Indian property captured from this date will belong to the corps or detachment making it." The sense in which the term property was used in this order is fully explained in a letter of General Jesup to Colonel Warren, dated a few days subsequent, in which, speaking of the Seminoles, he says: "Their negroes, cattle, and horses, will belong to the corps by which they are captured." This order bears date on the 3d of August, 1837, and may be found at page 4 of the documents communicated to this House by the Secretary of War on the 27th day of February, 1839. I think that history will record this as the first general order issued by the commander of an American army, in which the catching of slaves is held out as an incentive to military duty. I mention this fact, and bring it to the consideration of the committee with feelings of deep mortification. As an American, I feel humbled at this act, which cannot be viewed by the civilized world otherwise than dishonorable to our arms and nation. That this officer, entrusted with the command of our army and the honor of our flag, should appeal to the cupidity, the desire of plunder, and the worst of human passions, in order to stimulate his men to effort, is, I think, to be regretted by men of all parties, in all sections of our country. Our national flag, which floated in proud triumph at Saratoga, which was enveloped in a blaze of glory at Monmouth and Yorktown, seems to have been prostituted in Florida to the base purpose of leading on an organized company of "negro catchers." Sir, no longer is "our country" the battle cry of our army in their advance to victory; but slaves has become the watchword to inspire them to effort. No longer does the war-worn veteran, amid the battle's rage, think of his country's glory, and nerve his arm in behalf of freedom; but with eagle eyes he watches the wavering ranks of the enemy, and as the smoke rises from the battle-field, he plunges amid their fleeing cohorts to seize upon the sable foe that he may make him his future slave.

But I intend to pursue this subject further. I shall now show that this Government—this nation, composed of twenty-six States, some holding slaves and some denying the right of man to hold his fellow-man in slavery—has been made to deal in slaves; to become the owner of slaves; that this Administration, now just going out of power, has dealt in "human flesh;" that the funds of Government, drawn from the pockets of free laborers, have been paid for the capture of fugitive slaves, and the purchase of slaves captured from the Seminole Indians. And for that purpose I refer to order No. 175, dated at Tampa Bay, September 6, 1837. It reads as follows:

"1. The Seminole negroes captured by the army will be taken on account of Government, and held subject to the order of the Secretary of War.

"2. The sum of eight thousand dollars will be paid to the Creek chiefs and warriors, by whom they were captured, or who were present at the capture, in full for their claim to them.

"3. To induce the Creek Indians to take alive, and not destroy the negroes of citizens who had been captured by the Seminoles, a reward was promised them for all they should secure. They captured and secured thirty five, who have been returned to their owners. The owners have paid nothing, but the promise to the Indians must be fulfilled. The sum of twenty dollars will be allowed to them for each from the public funds. 4. Lieutenant Searle is charged with the execution of this order."

This order, taking the negroes "on account of Government," bears date on the 6th September. From that time they were to be "held subject to the order of the Secretary of War." On the 7th October this order of Gen. Jesup was approved by the honorable Secretary of War, as may be seen by reference to page 43 of the document just quoted. Thus, sir, we have official documentary evidence that the people of this nation, in their national capacity, became the "purchasers of human beings." The money of our people, of the freemen of this nation, was paid for the purchase of slaves.

This fund, most of it collected in the free States, and coming from the hard earnings of free whites, was appropriated for the purchase of Indian slaves, and of those who had sought freedom amid the swamps and everglades of Florida; while our most vital interests at the North are abandoned, and even the implements necessary to carry on our harbor improvements have been sold, and the money thus obtained placed in the common fund, and, perhaps, paid for the purchase of these slaves at the South. I hear it said, in an under tone near me, that the purchase of these fugitive slaves was justifiable and correct. I may differ with gentlemen as to the justice or honor of that proceeding; but I cannot enter into that subject at this time. I would merely say, if the slaveholders wish to have their slaves repurchased, I desire them to furnish the funds, Mr. Chairman, and not thrust their hands into the pockets of your constituents and mine to obtain the money to pay for them.

[Mr. BLACK of Georgia desired to be informed whether the member from Ohio alluded to the citizens of Georgia?]

Mr. GIDDINGS resumed. I deny the right of members to interrupt me for the purpose of inquiring whether I allude to them, or to their constituents. If the garment does not fit them, why do they attempt to force it on? I allude to the fact, that money is and has been collected in the free States, and used to buy up the fugitive slaves of the South, while our most important interest of the North are abandoned.

I see gentlemen here who are tremulously sensitive if the word tariff, or harbor, or manufacture, is but mentioned; and I should like to compare the benefits to the nation, arising from the forty millions expended in the Florida war, with the benefits of the thirteen millions expended throughout the United States for harbor purposes; but I have not time to do it now.

I was speaking upon the subject of retaking fugitive slaves; and I think it due to the people of the nation that they should be informed of the assiduous manner in which our troops pursued the business of catching slaves.

In a letter, dated at Tampa Bay, 25th, May, 1837, directed to Lieutenant Colonel Harney, General Jesup says: "If you see Powell (Oceola) tell him I shall send out and take all the negroes who belong to the white people. And he must not allow the Indian negroes to mix with them. Tell him I am sending to Cuba for bloodhounds to trail them; and I intend to hang every one of them who does not come in."

If the negroes, who appear to have controlled the Indians, had quietly suffered themselves to be trailed with bloodhounds, or to be hanged for their love of liberty, they would have well deserved to be slaves. Another important piece of intelligence we have here also. The expenditure of $5,000 for bloodhounds in Cuba was not, as has been supposed, for the purpose of trailing Indians. In this letter we have it officially announced that they were sent for and obtained for the purpose of catching fugitive slaves. I desire the people of this nation to understand distinctly that they are taxed for the purpose of maintaining and supporting slavery in the slave States; that their treasure has been appropriated directly and publicly to that purpose; that our army—many of whose officers and soldiers were bred in the free States, and in the love of liberty—has been employed, by order of the Commanding General, in pursuing and capturing fugitive slaves. Nor is that all. The freemen of the North are taxed for the purpose of buying bloodhounds to act in concert with our army, in this degrading and disgusting warfare.

The taking of fugitive slaves is regarded, by Northern people, as a most ignominious employment; so much so, that scarcely a man can be found who will do it publicly. Yet, it seems that our military officers in Florida were openly engaged in it.

I will now call the attention of this committee to that portion of General Jesup's order which fastens upon the people of this nation the character of slaveholders and the purchasers of slaves; by which this nation, boasting of its liberty and its regard for equal rights, became a "dealer in human flesh." I refer to that portion of the order which declares the slaves to be "taken on account of Government, and held subject to the order of the Secretary of War." On the 24th September, 1837, General Jesup wrote the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, saying, "The Seminole negroes are now all the property of the public. I have promised Abraham the freedom of his family if he prove faithful to us; and I shall certainly hang him if he be not faithful."

Mr. Chairman, I think the people of my district will be slow to admit that Gen. Jesup possessed the constitutional power, or right, to make them slaveholders. Some of them, I am sure, will disclaim all title to these slaves, and, like Gen. Taylor, will refuse to have any concern or connection with this transaction. They will, I am confident, deny the right of General Jesup, or of the honorable Secretary of War, to pay out their money for the purchase of slaves. Nor do I believe they will admit the justice or honor of selling the freedom of a man's family for the purchase of his fidelity, as promised by Gen. Jesup to Abraham. If I understand the letter referred to, this Abraham was taken into the service of Government for the purpose of acting as a pilot to lead our men to the habitations of other blacks, for the purpose of capturing more slaves and Indians. If he proved faithful to our troops and a traitor to his own kindred and friends, then his wife and children—the objects of his affection—were to have their freedom; but if he refused to betray his own people, he was to be hanged, and his family enslaved. Sir, I know not how other gentlemen view this transaction, but I am free to declare that it does not comport with my own views of honor and justice.

But, sir, where are those slaves? Are they set at liberty, or have they been sold into slavery? The purchase was certainly a very extraordinary transaction, and one that will excite inquiry. The slaves remained at Fort Pike for many months. And, if I had time, I would read to the committee a curious correspondence respecting their being employed in such manner as to earn their living, and the like; but I will not detain the committee for that purpose.

The manner in which they were finally to be disposed of seems to have created some uneasiness with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. In a letter addressed to the acting Secretary of War, dated May 1, 1838, speaking of the purchase of these slaves, he says: "I would respectfully suggest whether there are not other objections to the purchase of these negroes by the United States. It seems to me that a proposition to Congress to appropriate money to pay for them and their transportation to Africa, could its authority for that course be obtained, or for any other disposition of them, would occasion great and extensive excitement. Such a relation assumed by the United States, for however laudable an object, would, it appears, place the country in no enviable attitude, especially at this juncture, when the public mind, here and elsewhere, is so sensitive upon the subject of slavery."

Sir, I fully agree with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. This purchase of slaves by Gen. Jesup, and sanctioned by the honorable Secretary of War, has placed the country in no enviable attitude; it has tarnished our national honor, and deeply wounded the feelings of the North. But this suggestion, as to the propriety of the purchase, was made on the 1st of May, 1838, and, on the 24th September previous, Gen. Jesup, writing

Capt. B. L. Bonneville, commanding the Choctaw warriors, says: "In addition to their pay as soldiers, they (the Choctaws) will have all the Seminole property they capture. And those Indians (the Seminoles) are rich in horses and negroes. The Creek warriors received between fourteen and fifteen thousand dollars for their captures." Yet it seems that, some eight months after the date of this letter, showing that the Creek warriors had then received their pay, the propriety of the purchase was doubted. I think, however, that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs had good reason to suppose that some excitement might arise from this transaction, by which you and I, and our constituents, as a portion of the people of this nation, became "slaveholders," and purchasers of our fellow men.

At page 74 of the document last cited is a list of these Seminole negroes, who were sent to Tampa Bay, after being received as "public property," by order of General Jesup, at the price of eight thousand dollars. The list contains the name, age, sex, and description of each person. I should like to present it to the people of the free States, as a sample of the manner in which the slave trade is carried on under color of this Florida war; but, as the list is of great length, I beg leave to give an extract only. It is in the following form:

Name.	Age.	Sex.	Remarks.
Ben.	5 years.	Male.	Son of Elsy.
Molly.	3 years.	Female.	Daughter of Elsy.
Judy.	1 year.	Female.	Daughter of Elsy.

This short extract contains the names of three children, apparently of one family, and all less than six years of age. These children were purchased by our officers as "public property." Sir, what do our people of the free States, or of the civilized world, think of this kind of "Government chattels?" I have no doubt that many a Northern lady will inquire for the mother of those children. This question I cannot answer. I find in the list the name of Elsy, aged twenty years, said to be the daughter of Fanny. I should judge that she was not the mother of the children; but such may be the case. I am led to believe that both father and mother escaped the fangs of the bloodhounds and the slave catchers.

But the question recurs, where are those slaves? I have, for more than a month, had a resolution lying in my drawer, calling on the Secretary of War for information respecting them; but to this hour I have had no opportunity of offering it in the regular course of business, and I felt no hopes of success by offering it at any other time. It may not have been observed by many members that in the last session of the late Congress a petition was presented to this House from a Mr. Watson, in which he states that, in May, 1837, he purchased these same negroes, captured by the Creek warriors, of their agent, and paid for them $14,600; and he gives pretty good evidence to sustain his statement. This occurred in May, 1838, while the order of General Jesup receiving them as public property was in September previous; and the confirmation of that order was on the 7th October, prior to the time of Watson's apparent purchase. General Jesup's letter to Colonel Warren, saying that these warriors had received between $14,000 and $15,000, bears date on the 17th of October, prior to Watson's supposed purchase. It will be borne in mind that these are official documents, transmitted at the time of their dates. There is also a curious coincidence in regard to price. General Jesup said, in October, 1837, that these warriors had then received "between fourteen and fifteen thousand dollars." And Watson says, and gives good evidence to prove, that he paid to these same warriors $14,600 in May following. Now, if these Indians got twice paid for those slaves, they were more fortunate in slave trading than they ever were in any other transaction with the white people. Another singular circumstance I will mention. On the 1st of May, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs suggested to the Secretary of War that for the United States to assume the relation of slaveholders might create extensive excitement, particularly as the public mind here and elsewhere was so sensitive on the subject of slavery; while Watson's bill of sale bears date only eight days afterwards. On the 9th of May, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs requests of the Secretary of War an order for the officer at Fort Pike to deliver these negroes to N. F. Collins, agent for the Creek warriors; while from other communications, one would think that the United States never had owned the negroes, although they were taken into possession of our troops on the 6th September, 1837, and kept at the public expense until, and long after, the supposed purchase by Watson.

Sir, this transaction is shrouded in mystery. I have read to the committee a portion of its history; but the whole, I think, is not communicated by the documents before us. I have an opinion, and I express it as an opinion, founded on official papers, it is true; but it is nevertheless the conclusion of my own mind in regard to the matter. I then suppose that, after the purchase of General Jesup on the 6th of September, and the sanction by the Secretary of War on the 7th October, 1837, and after keeping these negroes at the expense of the public for eight months, and transporting them to Fort Pike, the honorable Secretary began to entertain doubts whether the public would justify the transaction. He probably felt that my friend here from Vermont, [Mr. SLADE,] or the gentleman from New York over the way, [Mr. GATES,] might not remain entirely silent, "when (to use the words of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs) the public mind, here and elsewhere, is so sensitive upon the subject of slavery," especially as it was ascertained that there must be an appropriation of money by Congress for the funds that would seem to have been paid long previously. Difficulties appear to have beset him on every side; and I think his feelings were well expressed in a letter to General Arbuckle, dated July 21st, 1839, in which, speaking of this transaction, he says, in very emphatic language, "the whole affair is a delicate and a difficult one." Just at this time Mr. Watson, being at this city, was, as it appears from his statements, persuaded by the officers of Government to purchase the negroes, being fully assured that the Indian title was good and valid. The contract was accordingly made, as it appears, with the agent of the Creek warriors, by which he (Watson) paid the $14,600, and relieved the honorable Secretary from his embarrassment; and the nation from the purchase made by General Jesup. The purchase was effected in "this market," with the approbation of the high officers of State, and in the midst of a Christian community. Now, sir, in order that I may be understood, I will leave the purchase and sale of the slaves for a moment, and ask the patience of the committee while I relate the brief story of their travels and peregrinations. They were sent from Florida immediately after the order of the 6th September, 1837, to Fort Pike, near New Orleans. Here some sixty of them were detained by a pretended claim, set up by persons living in Georgia, who insisted that this "public property" was their own proper goods and chattels; while General Gaines, who appeared better versed in the law of nations and the military code than he is in the slave trade, boldly claimed them "as prisoners of war." Yes, Mr. Chairman: these negroes, declared by one commanding General to be "the property of the public," were boldly asserted by another to be "prisoners of war." In the mean time, a Lieutenant Reynolds was deputed to conduct the emigrating Indians to their home west of the Mississippi. Among the Seminoles were these slaves, who had been the subject of capture and purchase, yet remaining at Fort Pike, all under the charge of Lieutenant Reynolds. To him, Mr. Collins, agent for the Creek warriors, and acting, as Watson says, for him, also attended by Watson's brother, applied to get possession of the negroes, and presented the order of the Secretary of War for their delivery to Collins. There is some difference in the relation of Collins and that of Lieutenant Reynolds. Mr. Watson says distinctly that General Gaines and Lieutenant Reynolds both refused to obey the order of the honorable Secretary to deliver over the negroes. General Gaines appears to have declared them "prisoners of war," and ordered them to be sent to the place assigned the Seminoles west of the Mississippi; and Lieutenant Reynolds, punctilious in the discharge of his military duty, "took the responsibility," and started on his way with Indians and negroes, both slaves and freemen. He landed his charge at Little Rock, in Arkansas, to which place he was followed or attended by Collins, who, faithful to his trust, determined to get the negroes. At that place he again demanded them of Lieutenant Reynolds. But a difficulty now interposed, for that officer had not military force sufficient to hold the Indians in subjection, if irritated by an attempt to deliver over the negroes to Collins, to be brought back as slaves to the white people. He therefore called upon the Governor of Arkansas for troops to enable him to effect that object. But Governor Roane, thinking the safety of the people of his State more important than the slave trade, refused all military aid, and required Lieutenant Reynolds to proceed forthwith on his way to the territory assigned to the Indians. In his answer to Lieut. Reynolds, he says:

"Had the Government intended to dispose of these negroes to the Creek warriors, it should have done so in Florida, and not bring Indians and negroes to Arkansas, the vicinity of their future residence, and irritate the Indians to madness and turn them loose upon our frontier when we have no adequate protection. The massacre of our citizens would be the inevitable consequence." "Your immediate departure will ensure peace, and avert the outrages you had such good cause to expect."

Thus, Mr. Chairman, you see we were brought to the very verge of a war west of the Mississippi, by reason of the efforts of our officers to maintain slavery and the slave trade. But Collins, who, so far as the public documents speak of him, was the agent of the Creek warriors, now applied to these same Creek warriors for possession of the negroes. This, sir, is another curiosity. The negroes were taken west among the very Indians who originally captured them, and in whose name the Government officers and Collins were trying to obtain possession of them. But these warriors, having received the $14,600 in "the better currency," showed no disposition to interfere any further. Indeed, they said that they had sold the negroes, and that the United States had possession of them, and that the Creeks were under no obligation to interfere any further in the business. But Collins, ever faithful to his trust, remained in that country, and a correspondence took place between him and the honorable Secretary of War, and other officers of Government, in regard to the measures to be adopted in order to get these negroes back into slavery. Orders were sent to General Arbuckle, and councils of the Indians were called; the Indians, however, showed but little disposition to aid their white brethren in enslaving those who had gained their liberty by such a concatenation of circumstances. In short, sir, they showed almost as much insensibility to the claims of our slaveholders, as our more civilized friend, John Bull, has so often evinced; excepting, always, that the Indians civilly answered all questions on the subject, while I believe the British Government has never condescended even to hold any correspondence whatever for delivering up fugitive slaves. But, sir, while the Indians appeared thus insensible to the appeals made to them in behalf of slavery, the negroes themselves appeared perfectly callous to all entreaties. The Indians would not deliver them up, and the negroes appeared to have become suddenly impressed with the belief that they could take care of themselves. They now felt themselves restored to that liberty of which they had so long been unjustly deprived. Indeed, it appears that the negroes were thoroughly convinced of the perfect safety and propriety of "immediate emancipation and of Western colonization." They, at all events, appeared determined to give to the world some practical demonstrations on these subjects; and, sir, I believe they are yet carrying out that determination.

Thus you see, Mr. Chairman, that the efforts of our honorable Secretary of War, and of other officers of Government, failed to bring those negroes back to a state of slavery, and the agents of Watson were compelled to return without the negroes.

But, in the mean time, Mr. Watson's money was gone, and the negroes were gone also. He had bought the negroes, as he says, upon the assurance of title held out to him by the officers of Government. These officers had exerted their utmost skill to get the negroes for him, but all had failed; and Mr. Watson then applied to Congress for compensation for his loss. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the honorable Secretary of War, both recommend the claim to the favorable consideration of Congress, and urge us to make the appropriation. Of the propriety of doing so I shall say nothing at this time. I hope to do my duty on that subject when it comes before us. My object now is to show the manner in which the officers of this Government have attempted, not only to make us in our national character slaveholders and slave traders, but to make the freemen of the North pay this purchaser for slaves which he could not catch. I will beg leave to give the opinion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in his own words. In a letter to the honorable Secretary of War, dated July 1, 1840, speaking of these negroes, he says: "Any attempt at enforcing a claim to them under the Creek warriors would, perhaps, have resulted in conflict; and, as the hazard of such an issue prevented the use of more than persuasive means, I think General Watson has a just claim on the the United States for the money he paid, and interest." This, sir, is the logic of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and that same opinion is endorsed by the honorable Secretary of War. I have stated, and I think have shown from authentic documents, that the war in Florida originated in attempts by our Executive officers to support and maintain slavery; that it has been renewed and carried on for that purpose; that the money of our nation has been paid for the purchase of fugitive slaves and of Indian slaves. To these I now add the fact that those officers deem it just that we should pay for slaves which the owners cannot obtain.

When I obtained the floor, I intended to call the attention of the committee to the manner in which this war was renewed after Gen. Macomb's treaty of peace in 1839. But I have already detained the committee too long, and I will only say that, if the public papers are to be accredited, the people of Florida held meetings for the purpose of protesting against that treaty, for the reasons that it permitted the Indians to remain in Florida; and they urged that the territory occupied by them would afford a harbor for runaway slaves. Of course the war was renewed, and continues, like a mighty maelstrom, draws within its vortex and swallows up the immense resources of the nation. For a period almost equal to that of our Revolutionary war, the people of the Northern States have been taxed for the purpose of carrying on this contest, directed principally against the fugitive slaves in Florida. To this war the feelings, the principles, the interests, the honor of the free States are opposed; yet, sir, they have been, and still are, compelled to furnish means for its prosecution. Revolting as the trading in slaves is to the feeling of our Northern people, they have been constrained to supply the means of purchasing their fellow-beings. Holding, as the people of the North do, "these truths to be self-evident, that man is born free, and is endowed by his Creator with the inalienable right of liberty," they have been obliged to furnish money to pay for the recapture and re-enslaving of those who, fleeing from the power that oppressed them, had sought in the wilds of Florida those rights to which, by the laws of Nature and of Nature's God, they were entitled.

Sir, I am anxious to see a period put to those abuses of Northern rights. I desire to see this war terminated at the earliest possible moment; but I fear it will not be accomplished by the method proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina. My own opinion is, that all attempts to remove the Indians and leave the negroes will prove abortive. We are told that the negroes control the Indians. With those negroes, an unconditional surrender to us would be a voluntary separation from their relatives and families, and slavery for life. They would probably prefer death to such an alternative. Of course the war will continue until the murder of those people by our army shall proclaim peace to Florida, who refuses peace upon other terms. For one, I am prepared to send all who will surrender themselves as prisoners of war to the Western country, under the pledged faith of this nation to protect them in the enjoyment of their lives, their liberty, and their domestic relations; and for that purpose I have prepared an amendment, which I now send to the Chair.

REMARKS OF MR. STANLY,

OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, February 18, 1841—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the General Appropriation bill.

MR. CHAIRMAN: I presume the bill under discussion will admit of some latitude of debate. I am anxious, sir, to avail myself of this opportunity of making known my opinions upon some important subjects which have been discussed during the present session.

I do not wish to violate the rules of order. I hope, when the present party shall cease to rule, we shall have rules of order better observed than they have hitherto been. But, while others have been allowed to indulge in a wide range, I must, in justice to myself and the cause I espouse, follow their example. That I may be allowed to do so, I make a motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. This opens a wider field.

I wish, Mr. Chairman, to say a word or two relative to the tariff; yes, sir, the tariff—a word which causes certain Southern gentlemen generally to start from their seats with affected dismay, as if they beheld some spirit bring “blasts from hell,” which were to desolate their country.

It will be remembered that, on the 19th day of January last, I submitted the following as an amendment which I would offer to the Treasury note bill. Here is the amendment in my hand:

“JANUARY 19, 1841.—Ordered to be printed.

“MR. STANLY submitted the following, which he will, when in order, move as amendments to the bill ‘To authorize the issuing of Treasury notes.’

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the — day of —, on the importation of articles hereafter mentioned there shall be levied, collected, and paid, the following duties, that is to say:

“On all manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component part, coming from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

“On all manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component part coming from this side of the Cape of Good Hope, ten per cent. ad valorem.

“On all wines, except the wines of France, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

“On all wines of France, as soon as the treaty with France will allow, a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem.

“On all bleached and unbleached linens, table linen, linen napkins, and linen cambrics, twenty per cent. ad valorem; the foregoing duties being in accordance with the terms and the spirit of the act of March second, eighteen hundred and thirty-three.

“Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.”

It so happened, sir, that I was kept from the House by indisposition when the Treasury note bill passed. I was therefore prevented from offering the amendment. The committee, by the arbitrary rule adopted at the time, resolved, that, after a certain hour, no more debate should be had upon the bill. At the appointed time, the Treasury note bill, amidst cries of “order, order, question, question,” was taken out of the committee, forced through, and with unholy haste passed in the House. Several who were present wished to get the floor to obtain a vote upon the amendment; but it was impossible. The party having the majority here seemed to be determined to attempt nothing for the relief of the country.

It will be impossible for me, Mr. Chairman, to proceed in this discussion without an occasional reference to the compromise act of 1833. Much that I intended to say upon this subject has been rendered unnecessary by the able speeches of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. NISBET.]

These gentlemen will hardly, either of them, be accused of advocating a high protective tariff; but I should not be surprised to hear them thus accused. The Whigs were all denounced as allies of Abolitionists last year; they should not now complain that they are accused of favoring a “high protective tariff.”

The tariff law of 1832, which gave so much offence to South Carolina, was denounced, because, among other reasons, luxuries were admitted free of duty, while many necessities were highly taxed. This is most conclusively shown by the speech of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON.] Besides the various quotations made by him from the speeches of Southern Senators, I remember, in reading the debates, that Mr. BENTON complained that luxuries were admitted free of duty, while the poor paid a heavy tax for many articles indispensable to them. I thought, therefore, sir, when I offered this amendment, that I should for once, at least, be found agreeing with the leaders of the Administration party, and among them the representatives from South Carolina. But it seems that the past is forgotten, or disregarded, and that the dictates of party, and not the interests of the country, are still to govern us. I fondly thought, too, sir, that I was but carrying out a hint of the Secretary of the Treasury himself.

In the annual report of that officer, dated December 3, 1839, he says, on page 11:

“If Congress cannot restrict the amount of appropriations, whether ordinary or extraordinary, to the certain current revenue, the only remaining courses which seem defensible are these: either to provide for calling in portions of the public money now deposited with the States, or establish an adequate system of direct taxation, or at once resort to the contingent power contemplated in the existing laws concerning the tariff, when changes become necessary for purposes of revenue, and restore the duty on several articles of luxury now free.”

The result proved that Congress could not “restrict the appropriations,” as he contemplated. We all know, from what we have seen this session, that the appropriations must exceed the estimates; for the estimates did not contain all the liabilities of the Government which must be provided for. Now, sir, I ask, if the “only remaining courses which seem defensible” are as stated by the Secretary, what are we to do? Nothing can be clearer, “either” to adopt my amendment, or recall the deposits from the States, or resort to a system of direct taxation. These are the only “courses,” according to Mr. Woodbury, and I agree with him. I am willing to meet this issue before my constituents. As a Whig, I am willing to meet this issue before the country. I wish to say a word before I conclude, as to the two other “defensible courses” of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Again, sir: in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in December, 1840, that officer, discussing the ways and means of providing money for the Treasury, says that to recall the deposits “appears not very likely to be adopted;” and that the resort to “direct taxation” is not “to be anticipated.” The Secretary then, on page 11, proceeds to say:

“Some other permanent resource must then be looked too. The choice will probably rest between the large reduction of expenditures, with the other accompanying measures before specified, and some extensive modification of the present tariff.”

Here, then, we have again suggested to us the propriety of “a modification of the tariff,” from the Secretary of the Treasury.

As to the reduction of expenditures, we all know that it is impossible now. The Government is largely in debt. Claims have been postponed until they can be postponed no longer. Nothing is more certain than the fact that, for this session, the appropriations will and most exceed the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury.*

This being the case, I prefer a modification of the tariff to either a recall of the deposits from the States or a system of direct taxation.

When we met this session, we were told by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury that we had a most prosperous Government. We were induced to believe that we had an abundant Treasury; that all the demands on the Government had been promptly met. But, after the lapse of a few weeks, we had another proposition for Treasury notes. Yes, sir, five millions of Treasury notes were to be issued—five millions of paper money wanted in the fourth year of that Administration which was to give us all a gold and silver currency. We were called together in September, 1837, at an extra session, to give the Government money. In October, 1837, you had authority to issue ten millions of Treasury notes.

By the act of May, 1838, you gave authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue Treasury notes, on the same terms as the act of October, 1837, in place of the notes which had been returned to the Treasury.

In March, 1839, you extended the act of May, 1838, and authorized the President to cause to be issued the remainder of the Treasury notes, &c.

In March, 1840, another law was passed which authorized the issue of five millions more of Treasury notes.

And now, within two months of the end of this Administration, we have another law authorizing the issue of Treasury notes!

These notes have been issued, a large portion of them at high rates of interest, which, of course, is paid out of the taxes collected from the people, and paid, too, to rich capitalists or the pet banks of this Administration; for only banks and very rich capitalists are able to take the notes from the Government and give them specie.

I have endeavored to ascertain the amount paid for interest on Treasury notes, since the extra session of September, 1837, and I make it as follows:

Amount of interest paid on Treasury notes, viz:
For the year 1838,	-	-	$14,996 48
Do 1839,	-	-	401,212 94
Do 1840,	-	-	173,581 36
Do 1841,	-	-	1,302 77
			$591,093 55

The accuracy of this statement will not be questioned, as I have it from a high source. More than half a million of dollars paid to the rich out of the taxes of the people by this hard-money-loving Administration.

I am tired of such legislation. Treasury notes

*At the beginning of this session the Secretary estimated that the receipts from customs for the coming year would be $19,000,000. From lands 2,500,000. And he thought, if the estimates were not exceeded, there would remain in the Treasury, at the end of the year, the sum of $34,273.

On the 31st of March, 1841, Mr. JONES, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, said, in answer to a question from Mr. SERRANT, “as to the probable amount of receipts from the customs, every gentleman could judge as well as Mr. J. His own opinion was that, owing to recent occurrences, they would probably fall far short of what had been formerly anticipated. Mr. J. admitted that “the whole amount appropriated by the bills and amendments would exceed the estimates by a million of dollars.”

“MR. EVANS here observed that the chairman had omitted some important items.

“MR. JONES recollected that he had omitted one item of $575,000 contained in the naval appropriation bill. This would make the total amount of excess about a million and a half.

“MR. EVANS said the total would be nearer two millions and a half. He then went into an enumeration of items to show that this was a correct statement.

“MR. JONES said that he had spoken only of bills from the Committee of Ways and Means.

“MR. SERRANT observed that, even admitting the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury to be correct, we should have, this year, but nineteen millions from the customs, and three and a half millions from the public lands, and the sums already appropriated would exceed this amount by between five and six millions.”

All this proves the importance of laying duties upon luxuries to meet the wants of the Government, and save the necessity of an extra session. If any additional proofs were necessary to show that the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury could not be relied upon, it is only necessary to mention that, in his estimates, no mention is made of the Florida war. The Secretary of War, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, dated December 17, 1840, shows that the sum of $2,335,329 75 is indispensably necessary; part of this for “arrearsages.” And yet we are told, Congress must not exceed the estimates!

do not afford any relief to the people. They enable the Administration to contract a debt, without appearing to do so. The relief to the Government is only temporary. What are we, therefore, to do? Not only the wisest and ablest statesmen of the country, but your own Secretary, Mr. Van Buren's Secretary, with them, recommend a duty on luxuries.

All admit we shall need more money than can be collected at our custom-houses and land offices during the present year. By the operation of the compromise act, our revenue will be greatly reduced by the 1st July, 1842.

Hear the Secretary of the Treasury on this head. On page 11 of his last annual report he says:

"Thus the progressive reduction of the present tariff, which has been going on since 1833, will, after December, 1841, take effect to a much larger extent than heretofore. Nearly two millions and a half will then be deducted at once.

"On the 1st of July afterwards, at least two millions and a half more of duties will be removed; making an aggregate, in six months, of quite five millions. If the imports then should not differ much from those in 1838, this would leave an income from them not probably exceeding ten or eleven millions of dollars yearly. It will, therefore, be necessary to make corresponding reductions in the expenditures of 1842, or seasonably provide otherwise, in some permanent manner, to supply all wants likely to happen from this cause."

No man in his senses, who has watched the course of public events for a few years past, can expect we are to reduce the expenditures of this Government suddenly from near thirty-nine millions to thirteen or fourteen millions. Besides, the public debt is to be paid. What is the amount of that debt no one here can tell. My able friend from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] in whose judgment I place the most implicit confidence, has shown, with that clearness and force that characterizes all his efforts, that our obligations not provided for will amount to near forty millions of dollars for "past transactions." I adopt his statement; his knowledge is superior to mine, and entitled to more weight than any calculation I can make:

Statement of the public debt, regarded as ascertained and certain, existing on the 1st January, 1841, though the amounts may not be exact.

Treasury notes outstanding	$4,650,000
Interest which will have accrued on them	250,000
Remains of old funded and certificate debt	335,000
Debts of the cities in the District of Columbia, assumed by the Government, without interest	1,500,000
Amounts required to be invested for Indians and Indian tribes, at least	2,680,000
Principal sums payable to Indians, probably	1,000,000
Amount required by law to make good the deficit in the Navy Pension Fund	1,200,000
Annuities to Indians, (supposed to be $600,000,) part payable in perpetuity and part for terms of years; the purchase or value of the whole not less than	5,000,000

Making, of actual debt, it is believed, not less than $16,515,000

To this is to be added probable amounts of indebtedness and liabilities growing out of past transactions, as follows:

For claims growing out of Indian affairs and relations, allowed, and which will be allowed in Departments or by accounting officers, probably	$2,000,000
For claims growing out of the Florida war, &c. and which must be allowed by Congress, probably	3,000,000
Due from the Government on account of trust funds, other than Indian, probably	500,000
The fourth instalment under the deposit act of 1836 claimed by the States	9,000,000
There are claims of American citizens for French spoliation on our commerce previous to 1830, quite likely to be allowed by Congress, to	5,000,000
	19,500,000

So that the whole amount of indebtedness and liabilities, on account of past transactions, was, on the 1st of January, 1841, probably not less than $36,015,000

Now, sir, I presume no man can suppose that, even if, as Mr. Woodbury says, the "reduction be pushed vigorously," we shall have means enough for the years 1841 and 1842.

I wish to give the Government the means which it inevitably will require to pay our debts, to sustain our national honor, by meeting our engagements punctually. I wish to do this by adhering to the compromise act—by laying a duty on luxuries, which will scarcely be felt at all, even by the more affluent, and will not affect the poor man.

My amendment, Mr. Chairman, was not intended to go into operation for some months, as the House might determine, that the importing merchants might have notice, and regulate their purchases accordingly. I selected but a few articles, that it might be liable to as little objection as possible. I was willing to adopt any amendment calculated to effect the object I had in view. At the time I introduced the amendment, I had not seen the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, laid before the Senate a few days since, in answer to a resolution of that body. If I had seen it, I would most willingly have incorporated many, if not all, the articles suggested by the Secretary.

And here let me say, sir, this report alluded to does the Secretary more credit than any paper which has hitherto emanated from him. It is Document No. 95, entitled a "Report from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a plan of a permanent change in the tariff." It is concise, plain, in better style than usual, and contains many valuable suggestions. I hope the members of the House will read it.

His construction of the compromise act is the same I have always heard given to it by those who framed and advocated its passage.

It will be remembered, Mr. Chairman, that I quoted from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury just now to show that by the "progressive reduction" of the present tariff, from December, 1841, to July, 1842, in six months, five millions of dollars will be deducted from the duties.

He proposes to lay a duty upon certain merchandise "free of duty;" his proposition, so worthy of commendation, so replete with good sense, deserves our attention. I quote the following passages, with the tables referred to in them.

I read from Senate Document No. 93, before referred to:

"In raising the sum needed, if it does not become necessary to subject all free articles to a duty, or to one as high as twenty per cent, and a discrimination can therefore be indulged within the restrictions of the compromise act, it is doubtless a sound axiom to select for highest taxation articles of luxury, rather than of necessity. Under similar circumstances, it is also not only competent, but expedient, to select such of the former as compete most with similar articles of American growth or manufacture, though not to raise the duty on them above the limitation of twenty per cent. And another discrimination, sometimes useful, might be to select those articles, in certain cases, for an increased impost, not usually exceeding the same limitation, which may be proper for countervailing injurious imports, placed on our own productions by any foreign power. The broad and well settled ground on which these distinctions rest, cannot require on this occasion much detailed illustration. For the luxuries of life are enjoyed by the few, rather than the many—the rich instead of the poor—and their use tends rather to effeminacy and pleasure, than to what invigorates or makes useful."

"In a form of Government like ours, these principles apply with peculiar force, as an excessive indulgence in luxuries always operates as a bane to Republican manners, and, in time, to Republican principles. On the contrary, articles of universal use, and considered as the necessities of life, are beneficial to all, and are to be cheapened as much as possible to promote the comfort of all. So what is American may well be supposed entitled to receive, within the limitations stipulated, more incidental favor than what is foreign, because obtained with more readiness and certainty, as well as being more safe and independent in its use. Nor can any other country complain with justice, if we counteract its high taxation on theirs, or our products, by imposing some corresponding impost on theirs; and however unprofitable such conflicts usually prove to all concerned, yet when such a measure becomes convenient for our own fiscal purposes, or is required by proper self-respect, and is kept within due restrictions as to the amount of duty, it is believed to be entirely justifiable. The present tariff is, in many of these respects, an anomaly. Being designed to get rid of revenue when it was too abundant, and to diminish a supposed protection to manufacturers, deemed unreasonably high, as well as to establish certain general rules for keeping all duties lower in future, it sometimes omitted to make useful discriminations, and, as a system, does not sufficiently discountenance luxuries or favor the necessities of life. Indeed, the former have already become free in many cases, and in others will be taxed lightly, under the reduction now in progress; while the latter, though at the expense of the consumer, however poor, will, in almost every instance, bear as high if not higher burden, than the greatest superfluity."

"In proposing a plan to raise the sum desired, one cardinal object is, therefore, to obtain the money in a manner that shall not prolong any improprieties or incongruities in principle; and another is to do it, and still preserve faithfully the limitations and stipulations of the compromise as before explained. To furnish some data for practical legislation, which may accomplish these designs harmoniously, two tabular statements have been prepared, which will next be briefly explained. The first one gives the names and value of all free articles imported into the United States in A. D. 1838, after deducting such of them as were exported. (See A.) Taking the imports of that year as a guide, and perhaps nearer an average, for some time to come, as than any other, though probably too low, and the value of all the free articles, excluding of course specie, and the amount of others re-exported, would be about $38,161,583. A duty on these, indiscriminately, of 15 per cent, would yield a net revenue not far from the five millions that may be needed in 1842. But this would embrace several articles which, under the principles before suggested, might judiciously be left free, or at a lower rate of duty than 15 per cent."

"Another mode of raising the same amount of revenue would, therefore, be preferable, if it could be accomplished without including those articles. Suppose, then, that there should be selected from the free articles those which may be regarded most as luxuries, though not in every respect belonging exclusively to that class. Such are teas, coffee, and silks. Should we then add to them others, conflicting with similar American productions, such as worsteds, linens, &c. and the aggregate, deducting the amount re-exported, would be $29,026,448. (See the second table, B.) A duty of twenty per cent, on those, after paying the expenses of collection, would yield about the same amount of five millions. This seems to contain the general data for the most eligible and unexceptionable revision. If a less sum than five millions should prove to be needed, as it is presumed will be the case under the diminished expenditures and increased importations, anticipated and explained in the recent annual report on the finances, as well as from the further augmentation of revenue likely to happen from the new mode of assessing the value of merchandise, any suitable modifications can be made in these details, without departing from the principles believed to be the most appropriate to govern the subject."

Thus it will be seen, sir, if we only take the articles enumerated in table B, and lay a duty of 20 per cent. on them, that, after paying the expense of collection, they would yield nearly or quite five millions of revenue. Wines are not included in this estimate either.

Now, when we are actually pressed for money—when our Treasury is bankrupt—when we are in debt—our country in a deplorable condition for want of defences—our navy rotting from neglect—does it not become us, as patriots, to provide for the wants of the Government while we can do so without imposing any burden upon the people, upon the laboring classes of the country? Will you still force the Government to borrow money, by issuing Treasury notes and paying interest to favorite banks? Will you force the coming Administration to call an extra session to remedy your abuses, to provide for your wanton extravagance? Can you not be induced to do something for a suffering country, to do one good act before you let the power pass from your hands? Or will you prefer to die as you have lived, blinded by the malignity of party spirit, deaf to the prayers of a suffering people—following, to the last, the deluding whispers of the demon of faction?

While upon this subject of taxing luxuries, I beg leave to call attention to a few tables, prepared at the Treasury Department, which will throw light upon this subject, and be of service, I hope, to the country.

Statement exhibiting the value of certain articles, free of duty, imported during the year ending 30th of September, 1840, and showing the amount of duties which would have accrued had they been subject to a duty of 20 and of 15 per cent. ad valorem.

Description of articles.	Foreign cost and charges.	Duties, estimated.
		At 20 p. cent. ad valorem.	At 15 p. cent. ad valorem.
Silk lace, shawls, shades, &c.	$309,858	$61,971 60	$46,478 70
Silk, other manufactures	7,978,930	1,595,786 00	1,196,839 50

Worsted stuff goods - Linens, bleached and unbleached	14,630	2,926 00	2,194 50
Ticklenburgs, osenaburgs, and burlaps, Sheetings, brown and white	4,164,208	832,841 60	624,631 20
Bolting cloths	261,173	52,234 60	39,175 95
Quicksilver	74,594	14,906 80	11,180 10
Opium	54,415	10,883 00	8,162 25
Crude saltpetre	40,944	8,188 80	4,141 60
Animals, not for breed	366,263	73,252 60	54,939 45
Tin in plates & sheets	135,042	27,008 40	20,256 30
Articles not enumerated	879,078	175,815 60	131,861 70
	5,808,366	1,161,673 20	871,254 90
	$24,526,234	$4,905,246 80	$3,678,935 10

By this table, we perceive that a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem, which will not violate the compromise, will bring into the Treasury the sum of four million nine hundred and five thousand two hundred and forty-six dollars and eighty cents; and at 15 per cent. the amount will be more than three and a half millions.

A duty on these articles, such as I propose, would not be felt by the country, and certainly would not be onerous to any part of it.

Here, too, is no mention of teas and coffee, now free of duty. I am willing they should remain so. They are now regarded no longer as luxuries, but as necessities. But if it becomes necessary, for purposes of revenue, to tax them, the following table will show what will be the result, at the rates therein mentioned:

Tea and Coffee, free of duty, imported in 1840.

Teas - Coffee	Pounds.	Foreign cost and charges.	Duties estimated at
			20 per cent. 17 1/2 per cent. ad val.	15 per cent. ad val.
Teas - Coffee	19,988,374	5,418,335	1,083,767 00	812,840 25

Still, sir, wines are omitted. I have before me a few tables which contain useful information, which the country ought to possess. Here is a table of wines imported in 1838, 1839, and 1840, with some interesting calculations showing the present low rate of duties on these luxuries, and the rate at 20 per cent. ad valorem. The wines of France cannot on account of our treaty with that nation, be taxed as high as 20 per cent. until after the 4th July, 1841. Here are the tables referred to:

Gentlemen tell us this proposition to tax luxuries is a "war against France." Well, sir, let me ask these gentlemen if France, by taxing our cotton, is not warring against us? I see it is stated by very high authority recently in the Senate [Mr. CLAY of Kentucky,] that our imports, according to the last commercial return, exceeded our exports of our own native produce to France nearly seventeen millions. And this, too, while France lays a duty of twenty-five per cent. on our cotton! Of course, these seventeen millions must be paid in specie, which we suffer to pass out of the country by refusing to tax the luxuries brought here. Gentlemen would have us believe that we ought to extend this favor to France because she was our ally. They seem disposed to show especial favor to France to the injury of our own country. I cannot forget the advice of the Father of his Country in his Farewell Address. We ought to recur to the principles of that address often. We have lost sight of its precepts in modern times. Hear the following advice from Washington's Farewell Address:

"Harmony and a liberal intercourse with all nations are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand; neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with Powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be, from time to time, abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that 'tis folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more."

"There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation; 'tis all illusion, which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard."

I stand by these precepts. The country will stand by them. They will be revered by all but those who have lost all regard for the memory of Washington and all attachment for the Union. The wholesome advice—

"To thine own self be true,
And it must follow as the night the day,
Thou can'st not then be false to any man."

is as valuable to nations as to individuals.

I think I have shown, Mr. Chairman, beyond all dispute, that the Treasury will soon need our assistance; that it needs replenishing, and that, by laying duties upon wines, silks, and other luxuries, according to the suggestions of the most distinguished statesmen of our time, as approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, we can raise a sufficient sum to answer our purposes without imposing any burden upon the people. Why, then, should it not be done?

Why, sir, we are told it is a violation of the compromise; that it will fasten a tariff upon the country; that the object is not merely to raise revenue, but to distribute the funds arising from the sales of the public lands. And from another quarter we are told this method of collecting taxes by imposts is dangerous and deceptive; that it is not "the Democratic plan;" but it is intimated that direct taxation is the true practice for our Republican Government. I wish to say a few words in answer to these arguments. I wish, while touching upon these subjects, to reply to the remarks of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] whom I do not now see in his seat. I regret his absence, for I could speak to him more to my own satisfaction if he were present. I shall likewise say a little upon the subject of "direct taxation," in connection with this subject of the tariff. I am glad to see the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] in his seat. I wish to show, as I think I can, that the issue is either to create a moderate "judicious tariff," with the union of the States, or direct taxation and disunion. I think I can show that direct taxation is advocated by those alone who have advocated or do advocate a dissolution of the Union.

In replying to my friend from Virginia, I can discuss some of the topics referred to. I begin with him, from the importance of his position, and from the respect I feel for him, and the consequence I attach to his conduct; afterwards I will notice the "direct taxation," disunion gentlemen.

I deeply regret, Mr. Chairman, that my friend from Virginia has thought proper to oppose, unnecessarily as I think, certain great measures which a large majority of the Whig party regard as of vital importance to the prosperity of our country. I regret it, not only for the sake of the country and of the Whig party, but on his own account.

I do not wish to see one of his eminent ability arrayed against important measures. I do not wish to see him opposed to his former, I hope I may say his present friends. I shall always regret the injury which I believe he will bring upon himself if he pertinaciously adheres to his present opinions. I shall long, long lament the day when he leaves his friends, leaves those who have endeavored to follow and fight under his lead, and is forced to unite with others, between whom and himself there is scarcely one feeling in common—no "thought, feeling, and taste" in harmony with his own. If he parts company with us, he must indeed be "solitary and alone"—oil and water will not mingle together. The war eagle of the mountain cannot mate with carrion crows—he would be as uncomfortable as my friend from Virginia, if he, unfortunately for himself, is hereafter found in the ranks of locofocoism.

Mr. Chairman, I entertain for the gentleman more than feelings of mere cold respect. Before I knew him personally, when a private citizen, as I hope to be again soon, I looked on his public course with admiration. I can never forget his gallant resistance of the tyranny of the chief of the Hermitage? The country, I hope, will never forget it. When in the humble walks of private life, I saw the terrible approaches of the then Executive towards absolute power; when I saw a despot, slavishly called "the greatest and best," wantonly disregarding the co-ordinate branches of the Government, seizing upon the public revenues, violating with ruthless hand our glorious Constitution, which he protected as he chose to understand it, I feared all was lost. But, I remember, the conduct of the gentleman from Virginia reanimated my hopes, inspired me with fresh confidence, and induced me to believe that all the supporters of the then President were not the mere slaves of party. I was encouraged, in my humble sphere, to continue an opposition which I had almost feared was fruitless.

I have often thought, sir, that the conduct of Napoleon in the campaign in Italy, when, at the head of a column of grenadiers, exposed to a tremendous fire, he crossed the bridge of Lodi, was not more gallant than the patriotic resistance of my friend from Virginia to the almost omnipotent power of Andrew Jackson, in his palmiest days. Bonaparte was called the "little corporal" for this act of daring. My friend from Virginia was the "little corporal" of the Whig party to me before I knew him. That most extraordinary man, the unfortunate victim of his own desperate ambition, said, speaking of the passage of the bridge, "Lannes passed before me." Sir, there was no

"Lannes" in this House; for the distinguished friend of the gentleman from Virginia (Balie Peyton) followed him.

I brought these feelings with me, and, after an intimate acquaintance of several years, they have ripened into strong attachment. There have been incidents in our personal intercourse never to be erased from my memory. It was with feelings, therefore, of the most painful character that I listened to the remarks of my friend from Virginia on that occasion. I feel it my duty to reply to some of them.

My friend seemed to fear very much that we should have a called session soon after the installation of President Harrison, and he argued against the propriety of such a step at much length. It seemed to me, sir, this was useless, if not unkind. I know of no power now in existence to call Congress together after the fourth of March next. It has been suggested, as highly important, that there should be a called session. I have thought so before the Presidential election, and said so often. Many others have concurred in opinion with me. And, sir, if, when General Harrison takes possession of the Presidential chair, he finds, as we know he will, the currency deranged, business prostrate, the Sub-Treasury either a humbug or an Executive bank in disguise—if he finds a public debt to be paid, for which no provision has been made by the party going out of power—can any man say it will not be his duty to call Congress together? Could he refuse, with a proper regard to the duties of his high office? If he find the Treasury almost bankrupt, the revenue decreasing rapidly, without any means of replenishing it, must he not take some steps to remedy the evil? Can he do this without the assistance of Congress? Surely not, sir. I presume, sir, no one recommends a called session unless it be indispensable to the welfare of the nation. Why, then, in advance, should the public mind be prejudiced against it?

If the people of this country have decided any thing by the late election, they have decided that the measures of Martin Van Buren's Administration were detrimental to the best interests of the country. I know it has been insultingly said in another quarter, that the only decision of the recent election was, that this Capitol should be pulled down and a log cabin erected in its place. This is the declaration of one of the leaders of the defeated spoils' party, in the agonies of disappointed hope. No Whig, no patriot, will concur in this sentiment. If the people, then, have pronounced condemnation on the Sub-Treasury; if they have said, we want a change of measures, shall they not be gratified? Can we refuse to hear their voice, calling on us to carry out the promised reforms as speedily as practicable? Shall we suffer the Sub-Treasury to be the law of the land for twelve months more? Are we to allow the sub-treasurers to have another twelvemonth's harvest in plundering the public Treasury.

Sir, I knew the called session of September, 1837, did much injury to Mr. Van Buren. And why, sir? In the early part of the year he refused to convene Congress, though earnestly requested to do so. He refused, with a heart harder than Pharaoh's, attempt anything for the relief of the country. And when, at last, the Government could not be administered for want of money, he did call an extra session—and for what? To enable him to establish an Executive Bank, to issue ten millions of paper money, and to withhold the fourth instalment from the States, which the faith of the Government was pledged to pay. The country was astounded at his startling measures; many of his best friends left him, not because he had convened Congress, but because, in so doing, he seemed intent only upon the acquisition of power, the accumulation of patronage in his own hands, and because, thinking the people "expected too much," he turned a deaf ear to the lamentations of a people overwhelmed in embarrassment, produced by the folly or the knavery of his own friends.

There is no parallel between the two cases. General Harrison has no selfish feeling to gratify, should he feel bound to exercise the power conferred on him to summon together the Representatives of the people. He has a reputation dear to his country—a reputation gained in council and on the tented field. He is no candidate for re-election. Uninfluenced by the hopes of rising ambition, anxious only to save and serve his country, he has only to disregard the clamors of faction, and steadily advance to the work of reform, to which he is pledged, to extirpate the remnants of locofocoism, and rescue our glorious Constitution from the dangers which recently threatened to overthrow it. It becomes those who have aided in bringing him into the Presidential chair to assist him while he endeavors to do his duty. Let us leave to defeated spoilers the task of upbraiding him in advance. They need no encouragement from us. Let them rail on. They cannot intimidate the farmer of North Bend by their malignant shouts. He has heard the shouts of savages before. He has heard the desperate groans of dying savages of old. He will not call an extra session if it be possible to avoid it. If it be indispensable, the country will sustain him.

My friend from Virginia seems to have a great dread of a tariff. He seems to think he can raise the cry of tariff, tariff, throughout the country, and alarm the nation, as if some direful calamity was about to overtake us. I know, sir, the very word "tariff" is odious in a large portion of Virginia, as it has been in other parts of the Southern country. But I do not feel at liberty to depart from my opinions, or alter my course here, because it may subject me to misrepresentation. At all events, I hope I shall not be driven from my purpose, when deliberately convinced I am right, by the fear of being injured in public estimation by the humbug cry of "Tariff! tariff! tariff!"

My friend from Virginia saw, or thought he saw several "signs" of a tariff which might hereafter be fastened on the country. I was reminded, sir, when he indulged his powerful imagination in enumerating those "signs," of the words of the great poet of Nature:

"The lunatic, the lover, and the poet
Are of imagination all compact:
One sees more devils than vast hell can hold—
That is the madman. The lover, all as frantic,
Sees Helen's beauty in a brow of Egypt.
The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven,
And as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name."

There is certainly nothing of the lunatic in one so wise as my friend from Virginia; but that he has the imagination of a lover and a poet I know very well. That his eye occasionally glances from this earth to that heaven (pointing to the ladies' gallery) is equally true. That he can give to airy nothing a local habitation and a name, no one will doubt who heard his late speech.

Now, sir, what were his "signs"? The first, if I remember right, was the bill of last session—a bill to prevent frauds upon the revenue—to which several sections were added in the Senate—which sections were a tariff, according to the construction of the gentleman from Virginia, and in violation of the compromise. I shall not argue this question; it is a matter of opinion. The venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, who introduced and advocated the bill in this House, told us it was recommended by the collector at New York, by the district attorney there, and by the Secretary of the Treasury. The amendments were adopted in the Senate with but few dissenting voices. It passed with the approbation of some of the same persons who originated the compromise act. The father of that act himself supported it, declaring that it was no violation of the compromise. But my friend from Virginia insists upon it, it does violate that act. If the weight of authority, from gentlemen of both parties, cannot induce the gentleman to lessen his confidence in his own opinion, I shall not attempt it.

Among the other "signs" noticed, was the resolution of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. GREEN.] I had consulted with my friend from Kentucky after he offered his amendment, and understood from him what his intentions were. They coincided with mine, as I have already expressed them. The disorderly manner in which the Treasury note bill was passed from the Committee of the Whole into the House; prevented the gentleman from expressing his views relative to his amendment. He, sir, is not very active in obtaining the floor. It is an honor to him that he is not. His (Mr. GREEN'S) lameness was produced by serving his country in the field, under the hero of Tippecanoe. I hope, hereafter, the country will have his valuable aid in assisting him under whom he served in war, to carry out in peace the great measures necessary for the good of the country. We want a few more such men—such as are attentive to their business, ready and true to their principles—who prefer doing their duty by voting to consuming the time of the House by speeches. The gentleman will pardon me in giving expression to my feelings by thus referring to him. He is the last man, I know, who would speak of his own services.

26TH CONG....2ND SESS.

General Appropriation Bill—Mr. Stanly.

H. of Reps.

Another "sign" was the resolution of my friend from New York, [Mr. BARNARD.] His resolution, so far from conflicting with the compromise act, expressly proposes to impose duties "on wines, silks, linens, spices, and other articles, being luxuries," but in such a manner as not to conflict with the principles, policy, and spirit of the act of March, 1833, commonly called the compromise act. Surely, sir, this "sign" of a tariff exists only in the imagination of the gentleman from Virginia.

As to the "sign" of my amendment, I have already referred to that.

But the gentleman from Virginia thinks, or seems to intimate, that some purpose is entertained of violating the provisions of the compromise act of March, 1833.

I have heard of no proposition from any quarter to disturb the compromise act. Although it was passed against the wishes of a large portion of the North, still they seem, with the best motives I know, to be disposed to give it a fair trial. Acting like patriots, they desire to give peace to the country. They evince a most noble spirit of concession for the sake of harmony, which we ought to appreciate. I deny, sir, that the amendment which I proposed to the Treasury note bill will be any infraction of the terms or the spirit of the compromise. I concur with the gentleman, that we ought not to disturb the act, to interfere with it at all, "without an actual and unavoidable necessity." But I maintain that that necessity now exists, and I humbly think I have proved it.

The Secretary tells us—"It is believed that the reduction of the duties on imports, which, by the existing tariff, will take place in the year 1842, cannot vary much from five millions of dollars."

I concur in all that has been said in favor of the compromise. It was not an ordinary act of legislation. It did come "with healing on its wings." It originated in the breast of the greatest statesman of his day, from an anxious wish to allay a troublesome excitement. It saved many gallant spirits from being subjected to the ruthless power of the chief, who declared he wished to hang them. If the great man who struggled so hard against such fearful odds, and finally accomplished his magnanimous and noble purpose, had no other claim to immortality than this, he would deserve to be gratefully remembered while virtuous actions continue to excite the admiration of the good.

The great and leading principle of the compromise act is as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury in his report to the Senate. Speaking of the stipulations contained in the compromise, he says:

"The first seems to be that a reduction by instalments of the former rate of duties, when exceeding twenty-five per cent. should forthwith commence, and continue uninterrupted until July 1, 1842; so that, when that period arrived, no duties whatever should exceed 20 per cent."

In this I believe we all concur.

I agree also with the Secretary when he gives the following opinion:

"Another restriction, supposed to have been intended, is, that if a revision be made to operate after June 30th, 1842, instead of before, still, as a general rule, none of the duties shall be then raised above twenty per cent. Thus, the close of the 5th section provides that, all imports on which the first section of this act may operate, and all articles now admitted to entry free from duty, or paying a less rate of duty than twenty per cent. ad valorem before the said 30th of June, 1842, from and after that day may be admitted to entry, subject to such duty not exceeding twenty per cent. ad valorem as shall be provided by law. A change could then be made at pleasure from twenty per cent. downwards to entire freedom from import, but no increase was to be permitted to go above that rate."

It is true, sir, one of the sections of the act, the fourth, provides that certain luxuries, until the 30th June, 1842, shall be admitted to entry "free of duty," but then the sixth section of the act contains the following proviso:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent the passage, prior or subsequent to the said thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, of any act or acts, from time to time, that may be necessary to detect, prevent, or punish evasions of the duties on imports imposed by law, nor to prevent the passage of any act prior to the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and forty-two, in the contingency either of excess or deficiency of revenue," &c. &c.

I endeavored to regard strictly the compromise act, when I offered the amendment. I think it was regarded, for nothing is clearer than the fact that there is now a "deficiency of revenue."

If I understood my friend from Virginia correctly, he said the first or main principle of the compromise act was, that the tariff should be a tariff for revenue, and that "protection was abandoned." In this, with all respect for the gentleman, I venture to say he is very much mistaken. In the report from Mr. Woodbury from which he quoted, Mr. W. states expressly that the interests of the manufacturer were consulted in the compromise act. If he will consult the debates of the day, he must see that Mr. Clay all along denied that protection was to be abandoned. Mr. Clayton, who took an active and important part in passing the compromise act, said, before he would consent that protection should be abandoned, he would let the compromise act fail. I think, upon reflection, the gentleman, who is better acquainted with the debates of the day than I am, will see in this he is in error. I know in this opinion the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] concurs with the gentleman from Virginia; but really, Mr. Chairman, the politicians from South Carolina differ so widely upon almost all subjects from all other persons, that I generally think to go opposite to what they recommend is to go right.

While speaking upon this subject of protection, let me say, Mr. Chairman, that gentlemen need not any longer attempt to delude the public mind by any outcry upon this subject. The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT], especially, I thought, seemed anxious to raise an outcry against a protective tariff. I wish to say something presently in reference to the peculiar opinions of that gentleman; and before I do so, let me say, I wish to do so in no spirit of unkindness. I wish to speak of political opinions alone. I do not intend to say any thing calculated to wound the feelings of any gentleman from that State.

But let me remark, as to this protective tariff, that when the question comes up for consideration, I shall be ready to meet it, and to act upon it. And, sir, when my friend from Virginia says, "Southern gentlemen dare not vote for a protective tariff," let me tell him, in all humility, he has no right to speak thus for Southern gentlemen. Let me tell him, here, before the next election in my district, that North Carolina Whigs do "dare to support a protective tariff" whenever they become satisfied the interest of our great country requires it. Yes, sir, we dare, I hope, do all that may become men. A tariff may not only protect Northern manufactures, but a tariff may protect commerce and agriculture. May not our cotton require protection, and that at no distant day? Does not our tobacco already require some legislative protection? The time may come, sir, when my own State shall be sufficiently aware of her own great strength and power—when she will arouse to a proper sense of her own capability, of her immense resources—when she may, as I hope she will, avail herself of the benefits conferred upon her by a kind Providence, and turn her attention to manufacturing; the time may speedily come when we shall demand of our Government a protective tariff. And when that time arrives, yes, before then, if any great branch of American industry requires protection, I shall deem myself unworthy a seat on this floor, if, by any fear of the unpopularity of the measure, I shall be deterred from supporting it. While, sir, I acknowledge the great power of my friend from Virginia; while I am proud to admit that his opposition is calculated to make any measure odious, let me tell him, sir, he is much mistaken if he thinks North Carolina, as a part of the South, "dare not go for a protective tariff." Let not the gentleman lay "the flattering unction to his soul" that he can, by the magic of his name, prevent the Whig party of the Southern country from advocating whatever they may think right and proper. No, sir; in the old North State, thank God, we are free. We have declared our independence of the ridiculous abstractions which tied us to the car of Virginia. We have seen the error of our ways: our people, remembering the noble conduct of our State in 1775, when she took the lead of her proud sister, have determined to think and act for themselves. Yes, sir, she took the lead in 1775, when our Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence was declared, and if we have been under Virginia influence, it was not when our country was assailed by foreign domestic foes. Not only in 1775 did we go ahead of Virginia, but I am proud to say that in 1840 we did likewise. Yes, sir, after the result of elections in Virginia was well known, our people went to the polls, each man knowing he was discharging an important duty to his country, and feeling grateful that he still had a right to exert a proper influence through the ballot-box over the action of his representatives.

[Mr. RAYNER here interrupted Mr. STANLY, and said he hoped his colleague would allow him to ask if he understood him correctly in what he had said of a protective tariff. From what he had heard, he was satisfied Mr. S. had been misunderstood.]

Mr. STANLY said, my colleague is right, sir, in saying I have been misunderstood, if it is alleged I advocate a "protective tariff." As far as I have heard, no one on this floor has preterred to advocate a protective tariff. It is a false alarm, raised by certain persons here, that they may, if possible, induce some tariff man to recommend it, to give them an excuse for indulging in a little blustering talk. I did say, however, sir, that if it hereafter became necessary to the welfare of the country to resort to a protective tariff—if the people of North Carolina should think her interests required it, I should not be driven from the support of it because South Carolina representatives had threatened us that they would not submit to it. If hereafter Texas should, as she may, raise cotton enough to supply our Northern manufacturers, I think it very probable the South would not very strongly object to a little protection. If Great Britain succeeds in her plan of raising cotton in India, and can supply her manufacturers from that source, which will deprive us of a market in England, a protective tariff to keep out foreign cotton, to enable us to sell ours to our Northern manufacturers, would not be so unacceptable to the South as some of us may imagine. I really have heard a protective tariff so much denounced from a certain quarter that I begin to think it cannot be half as bad as many Southern gentlemen have thought.

But, sir, my friend from Virginia seemed to think that there is some charm in the word "tariff," which can call spirits from the vasty deep! He speaks of it as if it were as terrible a monster as that described by Milton, as seen by Satan at the gates of Hell—

"A formidable shape,
Black it stood as night,
Pierce as ten furies, terrible as hell."

Yes, sir, one would think, from the horror expressed by himself and some of the members from South Carolina of a tariff, that it was a monster threatening to attack the South, levelling his deadly aim—

"And like a comet burned,
That fired the length of Ophiuchus huge,
In the arctic sky, and from his horrid hair
Shakes pestilence and war."

I have no doubt, sir, in some parts of our country, where reading, writing, and arithmetic (the three R's, I think, they were once called) are thought to be aristocratic arts, and where "direct taxation" is regarded as the only Democratic way of raising revenue for the Government—I have no doubt in such places a tariff is believed to be some "highland blood" Abolitionist that will liberate all the slaves, and sell all the "respectable poor neighbor men and women." But what is "a tariff"? It is a table of duties on goods, or a book of rates—a declaration by law of the duties to be paid at the custom house upon imported goods. No man, I hope, sir, who knows that we live in a Republican Government, is so deplorably ignorant as to say that a tariff is unconstitutional. I find the 1st article, section 8th of the Constitution, to be as follows:

"Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare," &c.

It is the first power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution. The framers of the Constitution seem to have regarded it as of the most indispensable importance, for without the means of raising money we could not live one day, either in peace or war; it is "the feather that supports the royal bird and adorns his flight; strip him of his plumage, and you fix him to the earth."

My friend from Virginia takes Mr. Madison as his model, he tells us. Well, sir, Mr. Madison will answer for a model upon this question. I find, during the first Congress, among the earliest acts of legislation, that Mr. Madison, the father of the Constitution, introduced a proposition for laying duties on imposts. I have consulted both acts of the first Congress, and I perceive that chapter 1st regulates the time and manner of administering certain oaths, the qualification of the Speaker, the members, &c and chapter 2d is "an act for laying a duty on goods, wares, and merchandises imported into the United States," the preamble of which is as follows:

"Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares and merchandises imported: Be it enacted," &c.

And, sir, I could but observe that George Washington, at that time President of the United States, approved this law on the 4th day of July, 1789. He could not have been forgetful of that great day; the scenes of our glorious Revolution were still fresh in his memory. He had enjoyed the advantage of hearing the powers of the Constitution discussed before him. And he, acting under oath, on this great day sanctioned this law; Mr. Madison, the father of the Constitution, urging it upon Congress; Washington, the President of the Convention which framed the Constitution, approving it. It was "the voice of Jacob, but the hand of Esau." Let us not say such men did not know what they were doing.

In this, as it should always be, the interests of different sections of the country were regarded. Commerce, manufactures, and agriculture, each received some share of protection.

In Mr. Jefferson's messages he recommends the protection of manufactures. In his sixth message he says, "Shall we suppress the impost and give that advantage to foreign over domestic manufactures?"

Mr. Madison repeatedly recommends protection to manufactures. In his Inaugural Address he speaks of the duty "to promote, by authorized means, improvements friendly to agriculture, to manufactures, and to external as well as internal commerce, to favor in like manner the advancement of science, and the diffusion of information as the best element of true liberty."

I am willing to take Mr. Madison as my "model," especially in his recommendation of the diffusion of information.

Mr. Monroe in his inaugural and messages repeats the recommendations of his predecessors in strong language, and especially recommends protection and encouragement to manufactures.

It is well known that General Harrison concurred with Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison in their Republican opinions on this subject. The leading Administration prints opposed him because he was of opinion Congress had power to regulate a tariff, not for revenue only, but also for the purpose of protecting domestic manufactures. What his opinions are upon this subject, he will inform us at a proper time. I am not authorized to speak for him.

Now, sir, as to the opinions of the "illustrious predecessor" of the present "follower in the footsteps." In 1824, it is well known, General Jackson wrote a letter to a gentleman in North Carolina, in which he spoke very favorably of protection to manufactures; he thought "a careful and judicious tariff was much wanted to pay our national debt, and to afford us the means within ourselves on which the safety of our country and liberty depends," &c.

In 1828, General Jackson said, in a letter to the Governor of Indiana: "I pray you, sir, respectfully to state to the Senate of Indiana that my opinions at present are precisely what they were in 1823-24, when they were communicated by letter to Dr. Colman, of North Carolina, and when I voted for the present tariff and internal improvements."

And yet, sir, "the South" voted for General Jackson, and all that the Whigs of the present day desire is "a careful and judicious tariff" to pay our national debt.

I will not examine the course of Mr. Van Buren upon the tariff question. We all know he voted for the most abominable tariff laws. We all know what he said in his disgraceful sheep speech, of the motives which influenced his vote. His conduct upon the tariff question was unworthy an American statesman. He deceived the South in 1828, and was reprovved for it.

To examine Mr. Van Buren's course on this subject would be to censure him. This I do not desire to do. With all his patronage, so corruptly used; with his thousands of office holders electioneering for him; with his convenient Secretaries; notwithstanding his promises and his personal efforts, the American people have consigned him to oblivion. Let him rest in peace, if he can. Worse men may, by accident, be placed in the Presidential chair; a worse President we can never have. Let him go to Kinderhook. I hope he will take with him a cashmere shawl, with a bottle of otto of roses, from his "great and good friend," the Imam of Muscat.

Here, then, is the plan recommended and adopted by Washington and Madison for raising revenue; the best and most equal, the least oppressive plan ever devised by the wit of man. When duties are paid on articles imported, especially luxuries, the man who does not buy surely does not pay any tax. The necessities of life, such as are used by the great body of the people, ought not to be taxed, further than it is indispensably necessary for the wants of the Government. But the consumers of silks, licoans, and wines, being able to pay, have no right to complain of the action of Government. The tax paid by imposing duties on imports is purely voluntary. The farmer who makes his own silk, or clothes his family in articles manufactured on his own farm, pays no tax on these articles. Those who are indirectly taxed through the custom-house never feel the tax imposed on them.

And now, sir, let us see why this venerated custom, this time-honored usage, is sought to be abandoned. Let us inquire what plan is to be substituted for this, bequeathed to us from our Revolutionary sires, handed down to us with the approbation of the framers of the Constitution.

I regard this proposed system of direct taxation as anti-republican, and calculated to be oppressive to the people. I have not time to discuss the horrors of such a system fully, nor do I think it necessary. To mention it is enough to insure its condemnation. No respectable portion of the American Congress can be so lost to all reason as to attempt to adopt the plan of direct taxation. We never will, I hope; lose sight of the path marked out for us by the framers of our Government—the path trodden in this respect by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Adams, and Jackson. We will never leave a well-tryed and beautiful system, under which we have flourished so wonderfully, to try the experiments of a few hair-brained, Hotspur politicians.

I not only object to this mad scheme on account of its impracticability, but because I fear the advocates of it themselves expect no great good from it. They do not seem anxious to promote the prosperity of the whole country, but they exhibit feelings of embittered opposition to the Union. Mr. Woodbury recommended this plan as one which was "defensible," as he said; and the country has said it was opposed to the "grindstone" measures—the Sub-Treasury and direct taxation.

This system is revolting to the feelings of an American citizen. It never can be effectually carried out, unless by an armed force. The thought is worse than ridiculous, that this Government, instead of the present mode, which exempts all from taxation who do not choose to buy imported articles, should create hundreds of thousands of tax collectors, who would invade the sanctity of private life, intrude into every man's house, take an inventory of all his goods and chattels, his household furniture, take an account of his hogs, his cattle, his corn and wheat, and collect a tax on them, to pay their own salaries, to put money in the keeping of sub-treasurers, or in Loco Foco pet banks, to be used for electioneering purposes. It can never meet the sanction of a free people. They will never allow Federal tax-gatherers, the instruments of Executive power, to examine, at their arbitrary discretion, into their domestic affairs. To carry out the power, the officer must be invested with the right to search the houses of the people: They must have power to compel submission to their authority—the invaluable privilege of trial by jury could not be preserved under such a state of things. The advocates of this scheme had better wait until the people sanction the "plan" recommended to our consideration by Mr. Van Buren, of organizing an army of two hundred thousand men.

Sir, if Aaron's hand was stretched out over this land, over the streams, over the rivers, and over the ponds, and brought upon us the plague of frogs, we should not be more sorely afflicted than by this monstrous system of direct taxation.

And now, sir, I wish to examine a little the peculiar "opinions" of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] and his clique, who advocate a system of direct taxation in opposition to laying duties upon imports. That I may not be misunderstood, Mr. Chairman, I wish to repeat, that, in examining, as I intend to do, with freedom, the opinions of the gentleman from South Carolina, I do not intend to use personalities. I wish to discuss doctrines, and doctrines alone.

I shall contend, Mr. Chairman, that the issue before the American people is a system of imposts, of duties on imported articles, with our present Union, on the one side, and a system of direct taxation, with disunion, on the other.

[Here Mr. RHETT asked Mr. STANLY to inform him who had advocated disunion in connection with direct taxation.]

Mr. STANLY said, if the gentleman will be patient I will show him. If I do not satisfy him, I think I can satisfy the House of the correctness of what I say. And, to be short, I would say to the gentleman, in perfect candor, as Nathan said unto David, "Thou art the man." I think I can show that not only the gentleman himself, but some of his friends who approve of direct taxation are also avowing doctrines calculated to cool the attachment which now exists for our Union.

I will furnish what I deem the proofs of what I have said. I will not charge upon gentlemen, wantonly, the desire of dissolving the Union, but I do charge them with cherishing and endeavoring to propagate opinions which must inevitably lead to disunion if they receive favor from any respectable portion of the country.

I was a good deal amused, Mr. Chairman, by reading, in the early part of this session, a correspondence between a distinguished Senator, [Mr. WEBSTER], and the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT]. The gentleman will allow me to say, a correspondence conducted and published with a considerable flourish on his part. It seems, if I understood the matter rightly, that the gentleman from South Carolina denied that he ever avowed a wish to bring "the North" to the grindstone. Now, sir, I think the gentleman has avowed the wish, or he has threatened to do so.

Mr. RHETT asked Mr. S. when such a wish or threat had ever been made by him?

Mr. STANLY said, I will read to the gentleman some of his own language.

I hold in my hand, sir, a pamphlet entitled "The Querist," in which the writer takes the same view of the language of the gentleman, as that taken by myself. He says "Mr. R. B. RHETT, a South Carolina member of Congress, has, it appears, buckled on his armor—denounces the tariff as unconstitutional—insists on a total modification of it—a recourse to direct taxes—and threatens us with his all-powerful "sword" if we do not obey his mandates. When he has stated his decree, he asks his constituents, in the event of our non-compliance?"

Now, sir, here are the words of the honorable member, to which I call his attention:

"Will you submit? If you do, the question is sealed up to you and your posterity forever! The principle will have passed into the Constitution, and to the General Government belongs the power of regulating the industry and controlling the productions of the whole Union. The struggle of '33 will have been in vain—a bitter laughing mockery to point the slow-moving finger of scorn to your fatal defeat at last. Will you submit? I see your answer in your kindling countenances—I hear it in the echo from the past, still beating on the public ear—We will not submit. The alternatives are before them; direct taxation or an equal ad valorem duty! There is yet another alternative which we will leave it to them to present—the sword. Choose ye, for we are too weak in the councils of the Confederacy to choose, but we are not too weak to do all that man can do in maintaining the worst of these alternatives!"

This language, I think, is extracted from a circular issued by the gentleman to his constituents during the last Congress.

Mr. RHETT said it was an extract from an oration made on the Fourth of July to a portion of his constituents.

Mr. STANLY said, then, sir, it is but another item of evidence to support my charge. If I had known, however, that it was a "Fourth of July speech," I should have thought there was some excuse for it. I see now, sir, what was meant by "kindling countenances." I had a copy of the gentleman's circular, Mr. Chairman, but I misplaced it. It was a copy which he honored me by sending to me. I think, sir, I placed it away with a bushel of Abolition papers which I had occasion to use during our late glorious campaign. I thought they were papers of a like character, and ought to go in company. If I had it, I could furnish stronger evidence than I have yet adduced.

But, sir, what language this is from an American statesman! "Will you submit?"—"will you submit?" and "we will not submit." "The alternatives are before them—direct taxation, or an equal ad valorem duty. There is yet another alternative, which we will leave it to them to present—the sword." Mark you, sir, it is not "a grindstone." Oh, no! But it is "the sword." A direct taxation "grindstone."

But, sir, I should like the gentleman to tell us what they mean by saying they will not "submit." What do they intend to do, if Congress is not intimidated by such threats?

Mr. RHETT said he appealed to Mr. STANLY as a Carolinian to state what he would do if Congress passed an unconstitutional law which was unequal and unjust in its operations? Would he "submit?"

Mr. STANLY said, Mr. Chairman, I know this word "submit" is rather unwelcome to Whig ears in modern days. I do not fancy the word. But, sir, let me tell the gentleman to make no appeals to me as "a Carolinian." I do not answer to that name. If he appeals to me as a North Carolinian, I will give him an attentive ear.

I have no hesitation in answering the gentleman. Sir, if Congress should pass a law I deem unconstitutional, it would be my duty to obtain the decision of the Supreme Court upon it. If that court pronounced the law unconstitutional, I should most cheerfully submit. I should do as States have hitherto done in like cases. I should hold myself unworthy a seat on this floor if I impudently endeavored to excite civil war because my opinion upon a constitutional question was overruled by a majority of Congress and by the Supreme Court of the United States.*

* Since the delivery of this speech, I have met with a copy of the "Journal of the South Carolina Convention, in March, 1833," published in Charleston in that year, from which I select the following extract from the speech of Mr. "R. Barnwell Smith," now R. Barnwell Rhett:

"Mr. President, I have one more objection to urge against this report. It is not an objection to an error in principle, but in profusion. In the first column I find the following words: 'Ardenly attached to the union of these States, the people of South Carolina were still more devoted to the rights of the States.' Sir, is this profession plainly and simply true? If it is, let it stand. Since your attachment might be suspected, accumulate epithets to your professions. I ask the gentlemen upon this floor whether they can lay their hands upon their hearts and say that they are 'ardently attached to the union of these States.' Why, have we not for the last seven years been declaiming against this union as inflicting upon us oppression, and poverty, and desolation? And have we not proved it, triumphantly proved it, and throughout the wide South made common the high complaint that these States of this Confederacy, by a policy as destructive as it was unprincipled, were practically colonized to the other sections of the Union. 'Ardenly attached to the union of these States!' Where, then, is your talk about your Constitution and the rights it guarantees? You have more than once declared that the Constitution was annihilated, and annihilated under the union of these States. Is it now nothing—and the Union every thing without it? A consolidated despotism, by virtue of this union, is erected upon the ruins of the Constitution, over Carolina, yet we are 'ardently attached to the union of these States!' Sir, let others think as they may, and act as they may, I pretend not to judge of their feelings or opinions, but I cannot palter with conscience, or play the hypocrite. Nor can Carolina, consistently with her honor or her truth, dissemble as to her true situation. I boldly declare it, (and I believe that I express the feelings of the free men I represent,) under the 'Government as administered,' I have no ardent attachment to the union of these States." Once, indeed, my pulse beat high for this union. But the days of my boyhood have passed away, and the bitterest fruit which the experience of manhood has brought me has been the knowledge of my true situation as a citizen of this Confederacy. What has this union left to us? It has usurped the rights, and trampled on the independence of our native country," &c. &c.

Mr. Chairman, it would consume too much time to examine at length all the opinions of the gentleman from South Carolina. His well-known and often-avowed hostility to the North makes me suspicious of his direct taxation notions. And I think, sir, whoever will read the speech of that gentleman delivered in this House on the Independent Treasury bill, on the 22d day of June, 1840, will have ample evidence of his desire to bring the North to the grindstone. In that speech, which is before me, the gentleman says, "Indirect taxation—that is, laying the taxes on foreign articles when imported into the country—is an admirable expedient for a despotism."

Speaking of the people, the gentleman says: "To judge of the taxes they pay, they must see and understand that they pay them; and to supervise the expenditure of them with the keen jealousy their liberties require, they should be conscious of the exact burdens they impose." He wished to make the people feel what they pay—to make them conscious. The gentleman says the argument that, by indirect taxation, the people do not see the tax collector, "is a flat and flagrant insult to the people." I submit to the gentleman if he is not liable to be accused of arrogance when he says the people cannot know what taxes they now pay? What prevents others from ascertaining all that he has discovered? The gentleman speaks of this system, recommended to us by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and others, as I have shown, as a "system absurd and anti-republican;" and it is in connection with this denunciation that the gentleman abuses Northern manufacturers. He says:

"Now, if our system of indirect taxation, by laying duties on imports, did not exist, the arm of the Government could not be used, by taxes on importations, to sustain forced prices, at the expense of the people, who consume the commodities; and the manufacturers, in common with all other producers, would be interested in correcting the evils of the banking system. As matters now stand, they are its allies, and the people are oppressed by both—first from an inflated currency by the banks, and then by taxation, at the instance of the manufacturers, by which it is sustained. The effort of the manufacturers is to exempt themselves from the evils of an inflated currency, and to indemnify themselves by high prices, exacted from the people for the increased prices in the process of manufacturing occasioned by the banks. The people are plundered by both."

Again, the gentleman says: "Formerly men plundered by open violence. It is now better done by quiet legislation." I might quote page after page from the gentleman's speeches to sustain the charge I have made.

I submit it to any impartial mind, if the opinions of the gentleman are to be relied upon, are we not "plundered" by the North? Is it not our duty to bring "plunderers" to the "grindstone?" Are not such sentiments calculated to produce feelings of alienation in different parts of the country?

In a speech which the gentleman made in this House on the 21st of January last, he gives utterance to opinions which I deem highly censurable.

According to his habit, he deals largely in general assertions, without condescending to furnish proofs.

The gentleman says: "Mr. Chairman, it does appear to me that it is only necessary for Southern enterprise and industry to find a profitable market for our staples, and it is immediately struck at by this Government."

Now, sir, why did not the gentleman tell us who strikes at the Southern markets? Have not Southern gentlemen rather taken the lead upon this question? Has not my honorable friend from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] shown, by his able advocacy of this measure, that a duty upon silks and wines is calculated to benefit the South? I congratulate that gentleman that he has disregarded the pitiful clamor by which we are all likely to be assailed for our support of this reasonable plan. It well became him to take the lead in this matter. It well became him whose gallantry resisted and overcame the attempts made by one who thought himself invincible in South Carolina, to put him down. I hope the country will again have the benefit of the service of the gentleman from South Carolina in public life. His liberal sentiments and statesmanlike views are especially valuable, coming from his State. I trust, sir, he will never be induced to follow the ridiculous dogmas of certain South Carolina politicians; that he will never give up to a party what was meant for mankind.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] tells us that we of the South have borne discriminating duties for thirty years, for the benefit of the Northern States; and he says, "We must bear more, and bear it forever; yield up the principle of protection, and once more lie at the mercy of a majority in Congress—the prosperity of whose constituents, in their opinion, rises exactly in proportion to our oppression." Strange "oppression," under which we have groaned so long, when every one acquainted with the history of the country knows that these protective tariffs were first passed by Southern statesmen, and South Carolina had her part, and a creditable part in it. But I will not into this now.

The gentleman from South Carolina concluded his speech by reading two resolutions recently passed by the Legislature of his State, which I will read, with the concluding remarks of the honorable gentleman:

"Resolved, That the power given to Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, and imposts, does not authorize Congress to collect money excepting for revenue; and that a tariff to protect the industry of one portion of the community, at the expense of the other, is a violation of the spirit and letter of the Constitution of the United States; and when such a case occurs, the several States will decide for themselves the mode and measures of redress."

"Resolved, That the people of this State have cause to congratulate themselves that the party feuds, which lately weakened the vigor of its councils, have happily ceased; and that South Carolina now presents to the enemies of her policy and peace an undivided front; and is prepared, as she is resolved, to repel by proper means every aggression upon her rights, as a sovereign republic, the instant that aggression is attempted."

"Sir, there is no misunderstanding these resolutions, although they may be disregarded; but be assured of one thing: word for word—in spirit and in form—will they be redeemed and enforced by that free and gallant people. It is not for me to anticipate their course, in an emergency which endangers their liberties, or appeals to their honor. They will be true to both; neither dismayed by the frowns of power, nor duped by the faithlessness of unprincipled cupidity."

I have seen the report of the Legislature of South Carolina, with the resolutions, two of which the gentleman modestly referred to—a report ordered to be printed here without being read, or the contents being known. It is a report altogether unworthy the Legislature of South Carolina. It is the most insolent report (if a report of a Legislature can be insolent) ever presented to Congress. And, sir, if I had been in my seat when this report was presented to the House, I should have objected to the reception of it. It should have been treated as Abolition petitions are treated—rejected without being read or referred.

Look, sir, at the threatening language, "and when such a case occurs, the several States will decide for themselves the mode and measure of redress." Yet, sir, the sovereign Legislature of South Carolina evinced some little of that virtue, prudence, in this resolution. I remember during the debate in the Legislature of that State, when some fearless member wished to say that "Nullification" was the proper redress—but not so. The Legislature refused to say nullification was a proper remedy. I commend their discretion; though I think it would have been more "chivalrous" to have declared their remedy. But the report tells us that "South Carolina presents to the enemies of her policy and peace an undivided front," &c. &c. Who are the enemies of her "policy and peace?" Does any one doubt that all the States present the same "undivided front" to their enemies? What is the cause of all this indecorous blustering? Is the Union to be dissolved because we do not adopt the "policy" of South Carolina? Are we to be turned adrift from South Carolina, to lose the honor of connecting our destiny with hers, unless we declare war against all banks and manufactures, and resort to a system of direct taxation, and continue the Sub-Treasury as the law of the land?

Is Congress inimical to her "policy and peace," if the distribution bill is passed? Will she resort to her "measure of redress" if a United States Bank should be chartered? Are we to be brought to the "grindstone" or the "sword," if we do not constitute the South Carolina "peculiar position" members our dictators? And hear, sir, the concluding words of the gentleman which I just now read: "Word for word," he tells us, "in spirit and in form will they be redeemed and enforced by that free and gallant people!" I would appeal to the gentleman, is this proper and decorous language for a member of the House of Representatives? One of two things must be the consequence—either to treat this childish bullying with contempt—I do not mean to be personally disrespectful to the gentleman—or to retaliate, as may be proper for our own dignity, and the rights of our constituents.

I have spoken, Mr. Chairman, in terms of censure of the report of the South Carolina Legislature. I think I had a right to do so. If the Legislature had thought proper to pass her resolutions for the benefit of her own people or the instruction of her Representatives, I should have regarded them with feelings of pity and sorrow. But this report and resolutions were ordered by the Legislature to be submitted to us. They have been printed by order of this House. I do not intend to speak disrespectfully of the State of South Carolina, or the people of the State. The glory of her distinguished sons, in war and in peace, I regard with enthusiastic pride. Their reputation is the property of the country. Her citizens may be misled. I believe they are. That they are, as a people, as high-minded, as brave, as patriotic, as any other people, I certainly shall not deny; but that they possess any "peculiar" virtues which make them superior to citizens of other States, no one I hope will render himself ridiculous by asserting, unless it should be some of those who framed this report.

I confine my remarks to this insolent report. I will call the attention of the House to a part of it.

The first page of the report refers to "the strange delusion which has distracted so many of the Southern States, and led them to unite and make common cause with parties whose avowed principles are at war with the best interests of the South." Here, sir, is a modest charge that Southern States are allied to Abolitionists!

I will read a part of the tenth page of the report: and I appeal to every Southern man, to every American heart, in this House, to say if this language is not as insulting to this House as it is derogatory to the Legislature who used it.

"Your committee unite with the Executive in amazement at that delusion which could induce any Southern State to abandon an Administration which adhered most faithfully to the doctrines which they have struggled to maintain since 1800, and hazard their interest by coalescing with a party to which are allied the Federalists and Abolitionists, the advocates of a National Bank, and the persevering solicitors of a tariff for protection; and while we rejoice to find ourselves associated on the one side with Virginia, the very nursery of Democracy and State rights, and on the other by our own offspring, the enlightened people of Alabama, we feel no unkindness towards our immediate neighbors, and are confident, relying on their general good sense and right feelings, that the moment the development of the true character of the combined and allied opponents of Democracy is exposed, they will promptly and cheerfully unite once more with us in sustaining a common cause, with a sincerity and zeal worthy of their elevated character and their devotion to the rights and interests of the South. And your committee concur with his excellency in the belief that the people of every section of the Union, firm in their principles, and resolved in their purposes, will once more rally in the great cause of Democracy, and reinstate in office its original and unwavering disciples."

"That the late election of President of the United States was corrupt and indecent, wholly unworthy of a sober and discreet public, and calculated to degrade our country in the eyes of the world, observation and rumor, too well founded, it is believed, induce us to lament. The resort to silly pageantries, ridiculous emblems, and vulgar dissipation, was an insult upon the dignity of freemen, and could only proceed from an utter contempt of their intelligence, and a readiness to degrade them to the level of the servile populace of transatlantic monarchies. That funds to a vast amount were lavished was palpable. And when it is recollected that the prize to be gained by opposition was the control of the revenues of the Union; the recuscitation of an expiring moneyed institution, whose stock is so largely owned abroad; and, above all, the delusive hope that there was a magic in change that would relieve men from the losses of improvidence or misfortune, there is great reason to conclude that the elective franchise was polluted by most extensive bribery and corruption."

The fourth and fifth resolutions accompanying this report are highly laudatory of Martin Van Buren, "his principles and policy," and of the "steady and consistent adherence of her Senator, John C. Calhoun, to the well-known, avowed, and mature principles of the State!"

Yes, sir, while Martin Van Buren is lauded, he who supported the Missouri restriction, who gloried in "serving under the chief" who had the force bill passed; he who sustained the proclamation and advocated the bill of abominations; while he is bespattered with praise, North Carolina, Kentucky, Tennessee, Georgia, Louisiana, and Mississippi are denounced as allies of Federalists and Abolitionists!! Yes, sir, reviled by this report, accused of coalescing with Abolitionists and Federalists, and the advocates of a tariff protection; accused of being influenced in their recent elections by the money power! Was ever insolence equal to this: "And while we rejoice to find ourselves associated on the one side with Virginia, the very nursery of Democracy and State rights, and on the other by our own offspring, the enlightened people of Alabama, we feel no unkindness towards our immediate neighbors," &c.

Virginia and Alabama ought to be very grateful for this compliment, but North Carolina and Georgia are totally, irrevocably lost to all sense of gratitude if they are not overwhelmed with this magnanimous condescension! To hear that the "sovereign" legislators in South Carolina "feel no unkindness towards their immediate neighbors," is well calculated to arouse feelings of lasting admiration for such an extraordinary exertion of chivalrous benevolence! We, then, at least, her "immediate neighbors," will not be brought by this terrific power, either to the "grindstone" or the "sword." We ought to have a day of thanksgiving for our deliverance!

I am at no loss, Mr. Chairman, to account for the feelings which actuated those who adopt the sentiments of that report. They spring from the disappointed ambition of the "consistent" Senator to whom I just now referred. It may be out of order to mention names; I will therefore describe him as the Senator who is eternally seeing sea serpents in legislation. If he had been a Cape Cod fisherman, he would have done nothing but chase sea serpents. If it is proposed to lay duties on luxuries, he sees a "protective tariff" coming. If it is proposed to prevent frauds on the revenue, by any modification of the tariff, he sees a monster bank, or a great system of extravagant internal improvements, lurking in the proposition.

I speak with great regret of this distinguished man. He once had a large portion of my admiration. Many gallant spirits, in my own State, were devotedly attached to him. Yes, sir, even after he saw, or thought he saw, that the Sub-Treasury scheme was the only republican plan of taking care of the public money. He professed to despise Martin Van Buren; he had uniformly spoken of him in terms of unmingled contempt; he had compared him to the fox and the weasel, the meanest animals of the tribe.

But when it was seen that the Administration began to countenance the baleful measures of Loco Focoism and direct taxation, and that the remarkable individual to whom I have referred had departed from his lofty position, and had united himself with the spoilers, the confidence of the State Rights patriots in North Carolina was shaken—it was lost. They did not now bow in slavish obedience to the man; they had regarded him as the defender of the South, the guardian of her interests and honor; they admired him as the advocate of great principles: but when they saw him bow down to the footstool of power, when he had at last yielded—

"Yielded with coy submission, modest pride,
And sweet, reluctant, amorous delay!"

they could no more, with self respect, entertain feelings of admiration for him. It was melancholy to see him, as I did, in social, cordial intercourse with Blair and Kendall and other kitchen pets; yes, playing second fiddle to the great humbugger, who was decidedly first in favor with the past Administration.

When I view him, "fallen from his high estate," I feel the sincerest sorrow.

But does it not come with a good grace, from the admirers of his consistency, to tell the people of North Carolina that they are in alliance with Federalists and Abolitionists?

I confess, Mr. Chairman, I do feel some "sensitivity," as my friend from Virginia said, when I hear North Carolina referred to with disrespect. There is some excuse for this sensibility. We know it is the invariable usage of many persons from Virginia and South Carolina to speak contemptuously of the old North State. We have seen it on this floor; we see it in the public prints; we see it sometimes in the Senate—yes, sir, even in the Senate. I have read a severe speech made in that body not long since, and it furnishes additional evidence that those who are fond of vilifying North Carolina have probably spent much of their lives in company with "blue-beards, who are ragged, dirty, brawling, browbeating monsters, six feet high, whose vocation is robbing, drinking, fighting, and terrifying every peaceable man in the community."

I have seen it stated, by one who said he had passed through the State, through the turpentine region, on a railroad, that he had seen "the best part of the State!" Why, sir, the man who travels through the State on a railroad, and thinks he sees in the turpentine region the best portion of the State, is as well qualified to judge of the character of the productions and the soil of North Carolina as a mole, in these Capitol grounds, is to judge of the architectural beauties of this hall.

[Mr. STANLY made some other remarks in reply to the speech referred to, which he thinks, upon reflection, did not deserve the notice he bestowed upon it.]

But, sir, to pass from smaller matters, I repeat, it is a common thing to hear North Carolina derided. My friend from Virginia spoke of her as a freed "apprentice." She may have been once in the condition of an apprentice to her proud sister Virginia; but, sir, in those days, the indentures were given to master workmen, like Washington, Henry, and Madison. Virginia may have some such men in her borders now; at all events, she keeps them at home. The indentures of North Carolina are now cancelled. She is free and independent. She has shaken off the miserable abstractions which have so long kept down her energies.

I do not wish, Mr. Chairman, to cast a slur upon the venerable Commonwealth of Virginia. No lover of liberty, no admirer of true greatness, no patriot can hear her name without feelings of admiration. She is the mother of heroes and sages. There are honorable men from Virginia on this floor with whom I am proud to associate, politically and personally. But, sir, I do maintain that many of her sons, satisfying themselves with vain-glorious boasting of her former renown, have altogether overlooked her present lamentable condition. In idolizing Mr. Jefferson, and venerating his dogmas as true as Holy Writ, they seem to have entertained the opinion that a Virginian born was of course superior to all the rest of the world. I have seen several specimens of these butterfly statesmen, who have come into North Carolina. They came with a full share of Jeffersonian doctrines, with a thorough understanding, as they think, of the '98 and '99 resolutions, about which they are eternally prating, with a little "strict construction and State rights;" and, sir, I have often observed that, when they have come in conflict with the plain sense of our people in North Carolina, at the bar, or in the legislative halls, they are, in nine cases out of ten, sadly overcome. And it must be so, while they think that to be a native of Virginia is necessarily to be a statesman by nature. Why, sir, it is melancholy to reflect upon the fact, which I see stated in a paper of the highest character, that there are now in Virginia fifty thousand white adults who cannot read!

Mr. MALLORY asked Mr. STANLY how many there were in North Carolina in the same condition?

Mr. STANLY said, sir, I do not know; I have not seen the returns. There are a great many, I fear, sir. But I wish to make the number less. I wish to obtain our share of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, that every poor child in the State may be educated; while most of the Virginia politicians are strenuously resisting the distribution of our land money.

I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I do feel proud of the present political condition of North Carolina. I think in our recent political contest she sustained an important and highly honorable part. In the dull and piping times of peace, she may have slept; but when she saw the rapid approaches of the Executive towards a despotism, she came forward gallantly to the rescue of the Constitution—to the rescue of liberty. The words of the great novelist, in speaking of the character of his countrymen, may, I hope, without vanity, be applied to North Carolina: "It has often been remarked (he said) of the Scottish character, that it shows most to advantage in adversity, when it seems akin to the native sycamore of her hills, which, scorning to be influenced by the prevailing breeze, shows no weatherside to the storm, but shoots out its branches with equal boldness in every direction—it may be broken, but can never be bended." So stands North Carolina, steadily in the path of duty; true to the Constitution, true to herself, and, therefore, true to the Union. Her sons, instead of dwelling upon the deeds of their ancestors, and resting in the shade of the great actions of others, bear about in their hearts the never-dying recollection of those deeds, and continually endeavor to advance her welfare, and make her, as she is destined to be, one of the first States of this Union. She stands firm, uninfluenced, unswayed, by the boastings and rantings of her "immediate neighbors." She stands between them, like her own Pilot mountain—Mount Ararat among her western hills, a distinguished land-mark in the desert, to which the weary pilgrim who may be lost in clouds of metaphysical sophistries, in the impenetrable bogs of Jeffersonian abstractions and "strict constructions," may turn his eyes with undoubting confidence that in her borders he will find comfort and repose.

Mr. Chairman, I have consumed a great deal more time than I wished or intended. I will bring my remarks to a close as speedily as possible.

I have mentioned, Mr. Chairman, that some others besides the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] appeared to favor direct taxation. The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. THOMPSON,] if I understood him correctly, found fault with the system of indirect taxation. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUBBARD] said "direct taxation ought not to be denounced;" and, sir, the same gentleman said, in the spirit and manner of the advocates of direct taxation, "the gentleman from New York would have trouble if he attempted to enact a tariff law"—a protective tariff I presume he meant. I should be glad to know what the gentleman meant by "trouble."

[Mr. HUBBARD was understood to say, if a protective tariff should be fixed upon the Southern country, the people of his State would not submit.

Mr. STANLY asked, what does the gentleman mean by not submitting?

Mr. HUBBARD said he meant resistance by any means, by force.]

Mr. STANLY said, I expected to hear the gentleman say so; it furnishes additional evidence that a spirit of disunion animates these advocates of direct taxation. The gentleman also said, if I understood him, that "the people of the new States would not submit to distribution." Let me ask the gentleman what he will say if New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania were to say, or either of them, that they would not submit to pre-emption laws? If New York should tell us she would not submit to a United States Bank? What is to be the character of our legislation if remarks of this kind are indulged in?

I wish to notice but one remark more of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT.] He told us he felt it to be peculiarly his duty, coming from South Carolina, to resist the proposition to tax wines and silks. One would suppose, from the gentleman's manner of treating the subject, that the people of his district and State consumed more wines and silks than the people of all the other States together. I understand that gentleman has not more than a thousand voters in his district.

[Mr. RHETT was understood to say about fifteen hundred.]

Well, sir, fifteen hundred. Why, sir, my district gives about six thousand, and there are several others in my State which give a much larger vote. And I have the vanity to suppose, sir, that my constituents make as much use of silks and wines as the constituents of the gentleman from South Carolina. I believe also, sir, that they have as much good sense, and can as readily perceive when they are oppressed, as the South Carolina people.

It is really ridiculous, sir, to hear gentlemen from that State speak so feelingly of their "oppressions" by these "plundering" tariff laws. Why, sir, the district of my friend from Illinois [Mr. STUART] gives nearly 60,000 votes! Yes, a single district. These hardy people in Illinois, although they are able and willing to encounter danger and hardships, still they know the comforts of luxuries; they clothe their wives and daughters in silks. They know what wine is. Now, sir, compare this District with the State of South Carolina.* I have ascertained, by applying at the State Department, that the "total number of white males over 21 years is 53,705"—fifty-three thousand seven hundred and five, in the whole State! North Carolina gave more than 80,000 votes for President last November. Ohio gave more than one hundred and seventy thousand votes at the last election. Does the gentleman believe South Carolina consumes more luxuries than all these Buckeyes? Why, sir, I know they have a reasonable attachment for "hard cider," but they love good wine, and they drink it, and their wives and daughters, as well as ladies elsewhere, deck themselves in silks. Does not the gentleman suppose that Pennsylvania with more than two hundred and eighty thousand votes, consumes her share of these luxuries? I beg the gentleman to think of the glorious Empire State—of New York, with her four hundred and thirty-eight thousand voters—with a population of more than two million three hundred thousand: does he not think they consume some luxuries? I know something of New York. I never hear her name without emotions of pleasure. I was there last year, sir, and saw her people assembled together, twenty and thirty thousand at a time. I heard the welkin ring with their shouts as the glad tidings of victory came in from North Carolina. I gazed with admiration and pride at her magnificent public works, and while borne along, as if by magic, through her rich valleys and fruitful hills, I felt at home; her territory was part of my country, her citizens were brothers; we were all struggling together, with one mind and one spirit, in resisting the encroachments of power. While I gazed in wonder and astonishment at the majestic cataract on her northern border—a scene which nature seems to have made for her own gratification—even this was insignificant in comparison with the moral Niagara of a noble people like hers, casting aside all attachment for her degenerate son, and gallantly coming to the rescue of the country. It is not only a glorious country, but it is inhabited by a noble race of men—men of strong arms and stout hearts. Sir, I wish the gentleman from South Carolina would visit that country. He ought to go there, and see what industry and enlightened public spirit can do in a wilderness. Look at her charitable institutions, her asylums for the deaf and dumb, for the blind, her common schools. He will see the difference between a people, a working people, guided by the lessons of experience and common sense, and one whose leaders are eternally in chase of sea serpents and jack-c-lanterns in politics.

Instead of finding a nation of "plunderers," as he and the South Carolina clique seem to regard our Northern people, he will find an educated, hospitable, brave, and intelligent population. Yes, sir, they have been "plunderers" once; they may be again, if honor requires it; they are ready and able to "plunder" a British army, if our soil should be invaded. I wish the gentleman would go there and look at that noble work, her Erie Canal, by which New York is making Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, yes, even the Territory of Wisconsin, tributary to her. Let him go there, and while upon the glad waters of Lake Erie he thinks of the name of Perry, and does not feel his heart beat with pride, if he does not feel that even there he is at home, he has not an American heart in his bosom.

*The population of South Carolina is: Total number of whites, 259,002; free colored, 8,279; slaves, 327,158—total aggregate, 594,439.

Mr. Chairman, if I can be excused while I say a few words upon a proposition I introduced some time since, I will conclude.

In June, 1836, Congress ordered the surplus money in the Treasury on the 1st January, 1837, excepting five millions of dollars, to be deposited with the States. The sum to be distributed was $37,468,859 97.

This sum had arisen from the sales of the public lands. It was intended to be a distribution bill—it was so declared at the time. It was called a deposit to save it from the veto of the then President, who had defeated the distribution bill by the lawless exercise of his power. He would have vetoed this bill, but that he knew it would be passed, in spite of his objections, by two-thirds of both Houses. At the extra session in September, 1837, a law was passed, at the recommendation of the President, withholding the payment of the fourth instalment from the States.

Many of the States have regarded this as a distribution bill. Some of them have divided it among their citizens; others have appropriated it to purposes of internal improvements. Even the act of 1837 gives proof that Congress intended the money should be paid to the States. The law proposed to withhold the fourth instalment until otherwise provided by law. On the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] it was postponed until the 1st day of January, 1839. That day has come and passed. The money is not yet paid. The Sub-Treasurers may tell where it is; I cannot.

It is a debt due to the States. Public honor, national faith, public justice, demands that it should be paid. I fear there is no hope that this Congress will do justice to the States. That the next Administration will, I feel confident.

I was under a pledge to bring in a bill to pay the fourth instalment to the States; but the dominant party in this House have prevented the consideration of the bill. On the 12th of February, I asked leave of the House to introduce a bill to pay the fourth instalment whenever the public debt should be paid. Leave was refused—ayes 66, noes 83. And, sir, there was but one supporter of the Administration among the yeas! This conclusively shows the feeling of the Van Buren party.

Mr. MALLORY of Virginia said he had voted for it as an act of courtesy to the gentleman from North Carolina. He was opposed to the bill.

Mr. STANLY said: There is no gentleman in this House from whom I should feel more honored by an act of courtesy than the gentleman from Virginia; but, sir, I presume he was the only one who was opposed to the bill that voted with that motive.

I wish, sir, to lay a duty on luxuries to pay this fourth instalment.

I have a table before me, taken from a public document, which shows the amounts paid each State by the three instalments. The third column contains the amounts due each State, proposed to be paid by the bill I wished to introduce. And I wish gentlemen to observe that the fourth column shows the amount which each State must be taxed to refund, if Mr. Woodbury's proposition to recall the deposits should hereafter prevail.

FROM SENATE DOC. NO. 14, 26TH CONGRESS—1st Session.

WM. SELDEN,
Treasurer of the United States.

TREASURER'S OFFICE, November 14, 1839.

Here is a plain question, easy of comprehension. The Secretary of the Treasury has told us, often, that these deposits still belonged to the General Government. He calls them our deposits, again and again. I propose to release the States from all obligation to pay back this money. The dominant party refuse to do so. I make the issue with that party: will you release the States—will you give up this money to them—will you pay them the fourth instalment; or will you recall the deposits already with them? If this money justly belongs to the States, why not give it to them? But you contend it does not; then, assuredly, you must, when you can, take away from them the money already received. Let the people understand this. I quote Mr. Woodbury's own language, and I say the question is correctly and fairly stated, when he, in his annual report, December, 1839, says:

"We must either provide for recalling portions of the public money now deposited with the States, or establish an adequate system of direct taxation, or at once resort to the contingent power contemplated in the existing laws concerning the tariff, when changes become necessary for purposes of revenue, and restore the duty on several articles of luxury now free."

I am willing to stand by this issue before the people. Will you tax the States, oppressed as they are with debt, to pay back the sums mentioned in the fourth column just referred to?

Will you bring upon this country the dreadful horrors of a system of direct taxation, with a standing army necessary to sustain it? or will you tax luxuries imported into the country, the burden of which the rich alone can feel?

Mr. Chairman, I have nearly concluded. I feel conscious of having consumed much time. I have done so in the discharge of my duty. For the present, I part with the gentleman from South Carolina. In discussing his opinions publicly declared, I have not intended to use personalities. I do most cordially and from my soul abominate his political principles. I regard members of Congress holding his opinions as worse than Abolitionists. The Abolitionists, the Tappan Van Buren Abolitionists, are a contemptible handful of deluded fanatics, ignorant of what they speak, ignorant of what they wish to do. They are unacquainted with our institutions, and I believe know little of our form of Government. But these politicians who are eternally accusing their Northern brethren with "plundering," who perpetually strive to create discord and hostility between different sections, seem willing, with a knowledge of the blessings of our Union, after having lived and prospered under it, to destroy the most perfect form of Government the world has ever seen.

Mr. Chairman, I regret to have perceived that one of my colleagues [Mr. SHEPARD] seems to have an inclination to support some of these opinions. If I could be surprised at any thing in this changing world, I should have been surprised at some of his opinions. He spoke of the 'greedy manufacturers,' and of the 'free trade party;' he spoke of those who were 'hungry and thirsty after plunder;' and intimated that, while one section might receive a 'shower of gold, another was burdened and oppressed.'

But what added more to my surprise was, to hear him oppose distribution. Yes, sir, the gentleman said that "the northwestern territory no more belonged to Virginia than to China;" and he said he was glad to see that one in whose opinion he had confidence said it was sound doctrine—he referred to the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] If I had said this, I might have been accused of favoring Abolition. But I congratulate my colleague that he and the gentleman from Massachusetts are found agreeing; and I must say, sir, I presume they are the only two in this House who concur in that opinion.

My colleague said he did it with no unkind feelings, but a great change had come over gentlemen. Now, sir, I think he is mistaken, the change has come over him. I think he once favored distribution.

[Here Mr. SHEPARD said he should like to have the proof that he ever had favored distribution.]

Mr. STANLY referred to his votes at the extra session, in September, 1837, when he opposed the postponement of the fourth instalment, and made a speech upon it.

Mr. SHEPARD was understood to say that, at that time, he was a very young man, and that he wished the money paid to the States, because he thought the Government did not need it. And that was more than three years ago.

Mr. STANLY said, my colleague pleads "infancy;" (some member said: The statute of limitations too.) No, said Mr. S. I know he does not intend to rely on that. But, sir, the plea of "infancy" cannot avail him. We were both young men then—he some years my senior; I had known him long; he was always sagacious, shrewd, and cool, never apt to act hastily. I listened to his speech with pleasure. We then stood side by side, denouncing corruption, and advocating the same measures.

It was his maiden speech. At the risk of being tedious I will read an extract. I make a long quotation that I may not be accused of doing him injustice:

Extract from the speech of Mr. C. SHEPARD on the bill to postpone the fourth instalment of the payment to the States, delivered in the House of Representatives, September 21st, 1837.

"If there be a deficiency in the Treasury, and this money which was promised to the States could be used, it is not proper that it should be withheld. They did not petition Congress for this boon; several of them, indeed, were opposed to the policy of the measure, and were partially forced into the acceptance of their shares; but after they had been led to expect this fund, and have commenced works of internal improvement, have founded schools and seminaries, and made other expenditures of local importance, it is not just that they should be disappointed. This is not a contract which could be enforced in a court of justice; but as the Governments of this Confederacy were erected for the benefit of the people, they should act towards each other with good faith and the strictest honor, in order that confidence and harmony might be permanently established. If this instalment be not paid, some of the States may be compelled to create stock and make loans to comply with their engagements; and here, perhaps, might be another source of derangement in the money market in the Union.

"An honorable gentleman from Kentucky has suggested that the bonds of the Bank of the United States should be sold to supply the wants of the Treasury; these bonds would probably be sought after in London or Amsterdam, and their sale in Europe would have a tendency to lower the rate of exchange, and hasten the return to specie payments. As the Government has been hostile to that institution, and is anxious to be freed from all connection with banks, this plan of relief is not only feasible, but ought to be satisfactory to the Executive. If this be agreeable, let us fail to carry into effect the extravagant appropriations of the last Congress; let the salaries of all the officers of this Government be reduced; let us return to the simplicity and economy of our predecessors, until we again have a redundant Treasury.

"Some gentlemen were in favor of this bill because it is not constitutional to levy money to be distributed among the States. No man ever claimed this power for the National Government. The surplus revenue has arisen from the sale of the public lands, and the 'deposit bill' is the fairest and most equitable mode of division.

"No patriot would attempt to disturb the 'compromise act,' and, if commerce revives, the revenue must be greater than a frugal Government can expend; and it would be wiser to anticipate our future income in the payment of this instalment, than to place in the hands of any Administration a large amount of money. It will be used for selfish purposes; more offices will be created; salaries will be increased; and every effort will be made to sustain parties at the expense of the people; or the scramble for appropriations will again commence on this floor—harbors for particular sections, and to improve private property, creeks and rivers, never before heard of, will again put in their claims for national patronage. Sir, in this contest for the public money, alike degrading to the Representative and corrupting to the people, North Carolina would get but little; therefore, if it is collected, and is not wanted for the constitutional purposes of the Government, common sense and common justice demand of me to support an equitable distribution. But is there a deficiency in the Treasury? The honorable gentleman from Tennessee has made a lucid statement, from which it would appear that the Government has ample means; the Secretary has sent us his report; the members of the 'Ways and Means' have made theirs, and they all disagree in the conclusions at which they arrive. I also have made a calculation, but, as older heads have differed, I shall not trouble the House with my arithmetic, and I shall content myself with the belief that there is no need of this bill, until it is proved more satisfactory.

"Several gentlemen have indulged in sarcastic remarks on the Secretary of the Treasury. It would be unbecoming in me to follow their example, but I must say, with due respect to that officer, that he draws largely on the patience and generosity of the American people. This country is free from debt, its citizens are industrious and enterprising, they have been blessed with fruitful seasons, and yet they have been suddenly arrested in their career of prosperity without foreign war, without the occurrence of extraordinary calamity. The schemes of the financial officer have signally failed, and he now comes up to this House to propose the abandonment of a cherished policy, the creation of a new debt, and a novel experiment upon the resources of the country. Sir, if, under these circumstances, a Chancellor of the Exchequer had opened such a budget as this to the British Parliament, he would have been scouted, and the King's Ministers would have thought themselves well off to have saved their heads. But here, in this boasted land of intelligence, the people suffer from the knavery or ignorance of their rulers, and many again submit to the yoke of party, and permit themselves to be again wheeled by artful appeals to their passions and prejudices.

"But, sir, I have departed from the subject. I rose merely to express my dissent to the bill under discussion, and to state what I consider the feelings and interests of North Carolina. When the great questions involved in the President's message are properly before us, I may again trouble the committee with a few remarks."

Now, sir, I leave it to the House to judge if my colleague did not favor distribution. If he did not contend then, as I did, and do now, that the surplus revenue arose from the sale of the public lands, did he not advocate "division" of the revenue from lands? Did he not support "an equitable distribution?" If "the good faith and strictest honor" required a payment of this land money to the States, has the lapse of three years changed the nature of "good faith and honor?"

My colleague is mistaken, sir; he has changed, not the Whig party. He is like the drunken man, who went to bed, and waited until the bed turned round again that he might lie down.

My colleague told us, in conclusion, that if "the new President should think and act for the whole nation, and not for a clique, or particular section, no member of the House would give him a more cordial support than himself." The gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] one of my colleague's "clique, or particular section" friends, gave utterance to something like the same sentiment. Now I beg of them—keep away from us. Do any thing but befriend us. We defy your opposition, but fear your friendship; it contributed much towards breaking down Mr. Van Buren.

I wish I had time, Mr. Chairman, to go into this question of distribution, but I know it is needless. If any question was ever well discussed, this has been. The whole argument will be found in the celebrated report of Mr. Clay, when the question first arose for the examination of Congress. In another report, made by Mr. Ewing, the argument was again presented with great power. We have heard it with great ability from the Senate during this session. Let me tell my friend from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] in answer to his fantastic idea of "distributing a deficiency," that we propose to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and to supply any deficiency in the Treasury by imposing duties on luxuries. We impose duties on luxuries not to distribute, but to support Government, "to pay debts," which he admits we have the power to do.

The money arising from the sales of the public lands we contend is a sacred fund, not to be squandered by the General Government. Give the proceeds to the States; it will lessen executive patronage; the States can then, in a great measure, adopt their own system of internal improvements, and keep out the hands of the General Government.

My friend from Virginia said the land money could not be separated from the money arising from customs. If this argument be good, no man who is the administrator of more than one estate, guardian of more than one child, or trustee for several persons, (all of which frequently takes place,) no one, in such circumstances, could be forced to settle his accounts. This General Government is a trustee; admit that, we can distribute peaceably and fairly.

I confidently look forward to the time when this fourth instalment will be paid—when national faith and honor will be regarded. I will not suffer a doubt to rest in my mind that the distribution bill will yet be the law of the land. Common sense and common justice demand it. Your suffering country demands it. After the fiful existence of the present party shall have ended, let us join our efforts to put down Loco Focoism forever. Let us not, in our struggles for party ascendancy, forget we have a country to serve. I most fervently hope I shall see the day when this great measure shall pass; when North Carolina shall successfully establish a system of common schools. I long to behold the day when the school house and the temples of the living God shall be in the reach of every family in her borders. Let not the glorious revolution of 1840 be without its benefits to those to whom we are chiefly indebted for it—the log cabin men of the country.

Educate the poor; elevate the condition of those who are to be our reliance in peace, our defence in war. Let every man in the nation be able to read his bible, and the farewell address of the Father of his country. Let it be known that by education, industry, and perseverance, the highest honors of our Government are in the reach of the humblest citizen. Diffuse education, and you advance the Christian religion; and the abominable doctrines of Loco Focoism, disunion, and direct taxation, will no longer find encouragement in any portion of our free and happy country.

Mr. Chairman, in bringing forward the proposition to raise revenue as I have mentioned, I was influenced by a desire to serve the whole country. My friend from Virginia [Mr. Wise] said, in speaking of this tariff question, with an air of triumph, "Try it, and see who will take the back track, like boys from a hornet's nest." I know, sir, it is much easier, and sometimes thought best, to swim with a popular current than to oppose it, although we may believe opposition to be right. I have thought otherwise. I like to take a little responsibility—I feel that I can safely rely upon the integrity, common sense, and patriotism of my constituents.

But, sir, if they should, as my friend intimated, disapprove of my conduct, I am ready to meet them. I should glory in being left at home by the attempt to discharge my duty. I have never sought office, I never will. I am ready to go to my constituents, as I did in the case of the ridiculous Atherton caucus, and tell them, if they disapprove of my conduct, I shall be happy in defeat. The hornet's stings have no terrors for me. Keep away the hornet stings of conscience; give me the satisfaction of knowing I have discharged my duty to North Carolina and to the country, and success is comparatively nothing.

I fear, sir, my ardent devotion to North Carolina may appear to some rather akin to Virginia boasting, which I have censured. I hope not. Though I love her honor and wish to promote her welfare, the wish does not monopolize my heart. It is nearest to it, but it is not alone. To love North Carolina is to love the Union—he who loves the Union must respect the old North State, for in all past conflicts she has never been shaken in her attachment to her sister States. No matter how violently the storm of Locofoco Abolition, aided by foreign influence, may prevail in one section, or the ridiculous fury of direct taxation, prompted by the spirit of disunion, may rave and fret in another, the North State stands firm and unshaken; yes, firm as the far-famed and most dangerous promontory on her coast—particular portions may be separated for a while, but the great body will remain steady, defying even the rage of Ocean itself—yes firm as the hearts of her people are in devotion to true Republican principles and in undying attachment to our glorious Union.

I wish to make her like New York in internal improvements; like Massachusetts and Connecticut are abounding in school-houses and in charitable institutions. I wish her to imitate her sister States in this exhibition of true Yankee feeling and spirit; the true American spirit which in war shows itself at the point of the bayonet, not in words; in peace, in cultivating the arts and promoting the good of the whole people. And, sir, if I fall, as my friend from Virginia anticipates, let me fall. The interest of my country and my State demand that I advocate this measure. That man is fortunate whose happy lot it is to fall in the service of his State. He leaves an invaluable legacy to his children. I desire no greater honor, I shall be "twice blessed" if I can enable those, by whom I may be remembered, to say of me he fell in the service of his country.

SPEECH OF MR. SOUTHARD, OF NEW JERSEY.

In Senate, January 15 and 16, 1841—On the permanent pre-emption bill, and the amendments proposed to it.

Mr. SOUTHARD said that he wished to express the views which he entertained on the subject of the present bill. And though he could not but regret the late hour at which he was compelled to commence, yet, as he desired that no delay should be occasioned on his account, he would proceed.

I understand (said Mr. S.) the questions before the Senate to be, first, on the amendment moved by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] which proposes a cession of all the public lands to the States in which they lie, with a partial graduation of their price when in the hands of the States. This was offered in the form of an amendment to a previous amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] which provided for a distribution of the proceeds of the public domain among all the States of the Union, with a partial pre-emption granting to the settler, if his property was not worth over a thousand dollars, three hundred and twenty acres of land at the Government price. It is possible that I might bring my mind to consent to all these matters in a modified form—I might vote for something in the shape of pre-emption and graduation, provided they should be strictly limited and placed on safe principles—but for neither, unless limited with a plan of distribution.

In approaching this question, permit me to remark, in the first place, that I cannot consent to adhere under what I regard only as a threat, founded on the power which may in future be exerted, if we do not consent to yield up these lands now. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. SEVIER] was pleased to commence and to close his remarks, addressed as they were, or should have been, to the intelligence and judgment of the Senate, with a direct intimation that we must now do what was required of us, or, when there should be power in the new States to enforce their will on this subject, we should be compelled to yield to necessity. I do not understand that kind of argument as addressed to the intellect, and much less to the conscience of a Senator, in the discharge of his high duty. When a great question is to be discussed, I do not comprehend how my judgment is to be made to yield by having it said to me, give these lands now, or hereafter we will take them as soon as we shall have strength to do so. I am not to be convinced by an argument of that character. If the dictates of my judgment and a solemn sense of public duty lead me to refuse my assent to measures proposed here, no appeal to future power, no threat of future vengeance, will induce me to record my vote in their favor. Such questions should be decided without reference to threats of any kind, and, in my apprehension, they are very ill-applied to a body like this, consisting of the high representatives of States, and standing here under the shield of the Constitution, for the protection of the rights of the people and the States which sent them.

Again. There has been introduced in the present argument much which relates to the catch-words of party, and the emblems and ensigns employed in the time of the election, to obtain the benefit of the impression they might make amidst the excitement of such a scene. I ask, what have these to do with the grave questions, to whom belong the public lands? and what is the duty of Government in their management? These questions are very little connected with log cabins. What have they or other political emblems to do with the inquiry, what is now our duty? Was the word log cabin introduced both into the bill and the title, as reported from the Land Committee, by way of sneer? And can a sneer conquer the judgment or convince the conscience? Or are these things intended to forward electioneering and party purposes? The question before us is far higher than those connected with the temporary occupancy of the Executive chair. It connects itself with the origin and foundation of our institutions—with all that has followed from that eventful moment to the present—and it presses on all that is hereafter to effect our children and our children's children. Such a question had no appropriate connection with electioneering emblems.

It is proper that I should thus notice these things, because I intend, as far as I can control my feelings, to avoid entirely all such allusions; and whenever I find myself approaching, in the course of my argument, any point to which they have been directed, I will endeavor to prevent myself from turning aside to reply to the arguments derived from them.

This is said to be a question of great excitement. It is so; but it ought to be so only because of the magnificent and profound interest which is inherent in the subject itself. It should not be a question of that species of excitement referred to in the debate, and which is found here, and in the State Legislatures, and among politicians, to a far greater degree than among the plain, laborious, unsophisticated portion of the community, either in the West or the East. It is easy to see why it is here made a question of great excitement, and the motives which lead gentlemen to make it so. It is so exciting in the Legislatures of some of the States because it is a question which addresses itself to the removal of the most painful of all the duties which the members of those bodies have to discharge. If a system of pre-emption and graduation and cession could be fully accomplished upon terms which they desire, they would be relieved from many onerous duties. Taxation would give them no trouble, internal improvements become a light burden, our joint property be the easy remedy for such difficulties. There is no mystery in the reason why politicians and legislatures make this a question of excitement; but it should be freed from all such associations and influences. Here is an immense domain, the common property of the United States. It is admitted even now, and has been, in this debate, to be the common property of the whole Union, and the question is, what obligation, under the history of the Revolution, the terms of cession, and the principles of the Union, rests upon us in the management and disposal of this great common property?

The first plan is offered to us by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] and proposes a distribution of the whole domain, lying within nine of the States, to those States. It gives it to them, and they either take it, by cession, and obtain the legal title to it, and perfect control over it, or they are to be the agents of this Government for its management. From the argument of the Senator, I could not distinctly understand whether his amendment was intended to secure an absolute cession to those States, so that Congress can no longer have any control over the property—or whether the States are to be regarded as the agents of the General Government, to carry out its purposes, and to make return to it of the results of their agency. In the first case, that of an actual cession of the whole territory to the States, the United States lose their title to the land, if they have one, and the States require it, and have the land as their own, absolute, indefeasible inheritance. When this shall be the case, if the doctrines which have been advanced by gentlemen from the new States be correct, all the obligations which those States may assume will be, not parchment, but pack-thread, broken by the slightest effort of the weakest among them. If the principles which have been asserted here be sound, that must be the result. I do not permit them to be so, but, arguing with those who do, I point them and others to the consequence which I think must ensue when the States shall possess the lands in a fee simple, and have the absolute control over them. They will take them—deny your right of interference; nay, deny that you have any interest in them. Their State sovereignty over all lands within their limits will be the ready answer to all your claims and rights.

But suppose the States to be mere agents of the Union to execute the duty which the General Government has entrusted to them in discharge of its own high trust under the instrument of cession. Put them in that position, and then how stand we? With our present land system still to control them, if we appoint officers to receive our portion of the money, we must keep up our registers and receivers, our land districts in the States, and our land department here. I mean that, so far as these States are concerned, all the characteristics and all the expenses of the existing land system must still continue. We gain nothing, or so little, that it is not worth consideration in relieving ourselves from responsibility and expense. They are our agents, and, as such, they must appoint agents of their own to sell the land. A citizen comes to pay for the land he has entered, and he offers to pay a part to the receiver of the General Government and a part to the receiving officer of the State. Suppose the State, or its agent shall say no. Or suppose an arrangement is made that the officer of the State shall receive the money and pay over the proper proportion of it to the United States, and he fails to do so, what is your remedy? He is not your officer, and where is your power to punish him? He is an officer of the State, and we have heard much of this Government having no power to enforce a constitutional obligation upon such. I ask, how will you enforce the payment of your money?

Look at it, then, in either aspect. You give the lands to the State in absolute inheritance, without retaining any efficient lien, or the States are your agents, and you are to enforce the obligation of the contract. Is it wise—is it discreet, to meet either alternative? Does either arrangement come within the faithful discharge of our trust over this property?

But suppose, again, a portion of the States to whom this cession is to be made shall refuse to receive the land on the conditions proposed. It has already been announced to us by one Senator that his own State is not likely to agree to such an arrangement, and that, if he be asked his opinion, he shall advise her not to agree to it. What then? Admit that Ohio shall refuse, that Indiana shall refuse, and some two or three other States in nearly the same situation with these shall also refuse—in what condition shall we stand? In this: We shall have made the grant to three or four States of an immense amount of land, and they will take all the benefits of it; while the other States, with our lands still within their limits, reject the proffered boon—demand of us the continuance of our obligations in regard to the whole territory, ceded and uncaded, and their portion of the proceeds from the whole. Three or four States take a rich inheritance for themselves and their people—have their pride, I had almost said passions, gratified, by the rejection of your authority as to your own property and still claim a participation of all the benefits of all the lands beyond their limits. The other States, in these respects, hold an inferior position. Is this right? Are we prepared to meet its consequences?

The bill says that the cession shall not be operative unless the States receiving the cession shall pass "irrevocable laws" in conformity with it. What is the meaning of this? Is it not the doctrine of the present day, (abhorrent, I admit, to my own judgment, and, in my opinion, utterly false,) that a Legislature can pass no irrevocable act—and has no power to bind its successors? Suppose such a doctrine shall prevail—the State Legislatures pass laws, which they declare to be irrevocable, fixing the rate of allowance to the General Government for the public land sold, and the very next Legislature shall repeal the law, and declare it of no effect. Where are you then? Have they not power to revoke, according to this doctrine? True, it is a bargain, and they assent to the terms of it; but then there comes a change of circumstances, and a change of public men, and a change of public opinion, and the Legislature may say, take back your land—we revoke the bargain, and by paying back your consideration we obtain a right to break our promise. How then? I believe I have as much faith in the integrity and honor of the States, and in their devotion to constitutional principles, as any Senator can have; but when I am called to make a bargain, with which I foresee that great principles and interests may interfere, and especially when I look at the ground some of these principles rest upon, I pause and wait before I yield my assent to the agreement proposed.

But suppose, again, that all the nine Western States shall assent to the offer of cession—what then? You have given them the entire public domain within their limits; you have distributed one hundred and sixty millions of acres among nine States of the Union. Have you divided the lands equally among them? Are the benefits to Arkansas and to Indiana the same? Are the shares of Missouri and Ohio alike? No man can look at the documents and not perceive that there is a high degree of benefit conferred on some States, and a very moderate one on others.

Where do you get your authority for making this wide discrimination between State and State? Show me where, in the terms of Union of these twenty-six States, and in the terms of the Constitution you get your authority to make any such distinction. I have not read the Constitution aright if you have such power; and I hope you have not. If you commence to exercise it, where is to be the end? Your laws, I thought, were to be equal. The States are not to regard each other as inferiors or superiors—as favorites or exiles from favor. You have no right to make any such distinction, and the moment you do, the seeds of discord and dissolution are sown, and they will grow. If part of the States shall concur in the proposed arrangement, you will be in a condition to be lamented. If all shall concur, you will have made a distinction which you have no right to make. I do not speak now of the distinction between these nine States collectively, and the remaining seventeen other States of the Union, but of a distinction among these States themselves, with whom you deal, and with regard to whom you propose to take a step which is a violation alike of equal justice and of the Constitution.

If I comprehend the effect of this amendment, and especially of the grant of land to the States—if the word cede is to be understood in its technical meaning, in that in which it is used in the instruments which gave us the land, or in any meaning in which it has ever been used, so far as I know, and the States shall refuse, or neglect, or omit, the payment of the money, then you create the relation of creditor and debtor between the General and the State Governments. I ask you whether it is wise, whether it is prudent and discreet to put this Government in the relation of creditor, and any one or more of the States in that of debtor to it? In such a relationship you will stand in a worse condition than did the Colonies in the Revolution anterior to the Confederation, and the States after the Confederation. A State owes you a large sum of money; during the Confederation such a State would have been commanded, (powerless, I admit, the command, and leading to a state of things which came nigh defeating the Revolution,) but it would have been commanded to make payment. It obeyed or not, at its pleasure. Now how will you enforce your demand? Arkansas owes you a million of dollars, and says that she cannot make payment; or, speaking in the spirit of her representative here, that she will not; where is your power to compel her? You would hear very different language then from what you hear now, and you would find that you had no constitutional power to coerce the payment but one, and that is the power to make war and suppress insurrection. You might compel payment, but it must be by drawing the sword, and bathing it deeply in the blood of your fellow-citizens. For such a spectacle I have no desire, and would avoid the cause of it. I would abstain from creating a relation so dangerous, because, should any State refuse that which as trustees it is your duty to demand, your only remedy is to yield, or to spill the blood of your countrymen. You must make your calculation either for results like these, or to listen to appeals made to you by sovereign States, in terms of subservency and humiliation, invoking your moderation, and begging forbearance. Before I would see States of this Union reduced to this, and begging at your bar that you will put off the day of execution, I would be almost ready to invoke the power of war itself. State degradation like that would be incompatible with the existence of the Union, and I regard the dignity of the States too highly to place them, by any act of mine, in such a situation.

Something has been said in this aspect of the subject as to the credit which is to be given to a State; and some of the arguments (such I suppose they were intended to be) sounded, in my ear, much like sneers at the credit system, and all that kind of party eloquence. I care little for sneers when dealing with such a question. It is not one of credit to the States, or of the States; but of the indebtedness of citizens to their own Government, and of States to the Union. This subject was referred to by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] in relation to the lands sold previous to cash payments. He was right in his reference. The lands sold and unpaid for, previous to 1819—'20, amounted to $21,775,327. It was a debt due from the people of the States, or, if you please, from the States themselves. It was due in Tennessee, in Ohio, in Indiana, and, so far as the Territories were inhabited, in the Territories. You had sold your land without receiving cash at the sales. The purchasers were then your debtors, but if the State takes the title, and is to pay, is it not our debtor just the same as individuals were in 1816, '17, and '18? What is the distinction? Then your debtors were a set of humble, faithful, industrious men, scattered over your new lands. They had bought the lands, but could not pay you; and it has been truly stated that there was not at that day a public man, that loved his country, who did not look at the condition of things with great alarm. How did you escape from such a condition? By relinquishing part of your debt; by giving time for the remainder; and by substituting for the future the wholesome system of cash payments. Now your condition is to be greatly changed. You are about to create a debt of immensely greater magnitude; and you take for your debtors, not citizens, upon whom you can act with directness and power, but States, over whom you have no control but that of force. You could not compel payment from citizens of the States, and yet you are to deal with the States of which they are citizens. You were afraid to bring the power of the Government to enforce the public right, for you were told that all your power could not reach the case; and now you propose to make States your debtors. And can you better control them? You are not to act on scattered individuals, but on corporate masses of men—on States, proud and haughty, and, if necessity require it, ready to resist your demand. Be warned in time. Avoid that condition of things. Create not that necessity. Let us see if we cannot continue to manage this public domain, and shun such threatening dangers. I think we can, and so believing, I would not render such results possible.

[Mr. SOUTHARD here gave way to a motion to adjourn.]

SATURDAY, January 16, 1841.

Mr. SOUTHARD resumed. After recapitulating the grounds of argument he had gone over, he proceeded: I have now a few further suggestions to address to the States themselves. The language of the bill is, "that the said States shall be exclusively liable for all charges that may hereafter arise from the surveys, sales, and management of the public lands, and extinguishment of the Indian title, within the limits of the said States respectively." How liable? How to be adjusted? What rights does it give to the States? What to the General Government? Upon differences of opinion, how are they to be adjudged? How claims enforced? A more fruitful source of conflict, not even the ingenuity of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] could have devised. But this is not all. Are we to understand that, according to the provisions of this amendment, the States who receive these lands are to extinguish the Indian title. Are they to take upon themselves the high relation in which the General Government stands towards the Indian tribes? If that is the meaning, I protest against the doctrine. This Government has no power to surrender this relation to any State or number of States. What right has Arkansas or Missouri to make a treaty with one of the Indian tribes? What right, if the treaty be violated, to punish or expel them from their territory? None whatever. It would be a direct infraction of the Constitution. How can this Government surrender its power to deal with the Indian tribes? Has the Union in any form assented to the surrender of this high constitutional power? Can the Union assent to it? And if a State has no right even to make a treaty with Indians, can this Government surrender the higher and holier power of determining where and how the Indians are to be disposed of by force? Can they say to any State, we give you the land—you pay for the Indian title, and have therefore a right to demand that it be extinguished when and how, and on what terms you please? Yet such must be the result. If the purport of this amendment is, that the States are to be regarded as having the power to remove the Indians by force, or to enter into treaties with them, it is utterly against the Constitution. How can the Government say to Ohio, for example, here is the miserable remnant of the Leni Lenape, the remains of the once warlike and formidable Delawares, who held control over the Northern Confederacy of Indian nations. They are now within your limits, but reduced to a few hundreds. You may make a treaty with them according to your own interests, or we will make it for you; and if they refuse to leave their ancient seats, you may remove them by any means which you choose—by force—by blood—by extermination. If there be a provision in the Constitution which justifies this, I, at least, have been unable to find it. These remarks have to do with the question of power.

Next comes the consideration of humanity and policy. These States have, or fancy they have, a deep pecuniary interest in speedily expelling the aboriginal possessors of the soil. Is it right, just, humane to let them decide on their expulsion, and the times, circumstances, and considerations which shall govern the decision, and without consultation or appeal? Are they the only States and the only people who rise above the weaknesses and errors of our natures, and can calmly see the truth and the whole truth through all the interests and passions which mislead others? And when the Union, and the people of the Union, have a recorded obligation, and in a record too which will not be erased or expunged, that they will regard these matters as a trust on their consciences and oaths, will they yield their duty to faith in others, and without the possibility of securing the performance of the trust? Should error be committed and wrong done, when and how can we make compensation—when and how relieve ourselves?

But I turn from this painful view to one of vastly inferior magnitude—yet one which has weight of its own in the scales of justice—the question of money. And in regard to this, I ask, are the States in whose favor the proposed cession is to be made, to bear the burden of the expense of our intercourse with the Indians and of removing them? If they are, then I entreat the Senate and I entreat gentlemen from those States to look at the consequences. Are they to sustain the expense of the Indian wars which may arise from their treatment of the Indian tribes left within their territory?

Should the Indians consider themselves aggrieved, as they are very likely to do, wars may grow out of their discontent, and the feeble remnants within these States may be connected with very powerful allies beyond their borders, and when oppression is perpetrated on the one, the other may be prompt to avenge it, and our history tells us there are civilized and Christian nations ready to give them encouragement. Are these States to bear the cost of the Indian wars which their own conduct may create; or are we not only to surrender the land and give up our power to deal with the tribes, but in addition to carry on all the wars which may grow out of the management and settlement of these lands? Does the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] mean that such shall be the result of his amendment or does he not? Such it must be, whether he designs it or not.

Is it a part of his plan that, while we cede all the land, we shall retain all the burden? How can we avoid it? Will any "irrevocable" act of a State Legislature relieve Congress from this liability when wars shall have arisen? Let the Indian warwhoop sound, and one drop of American blood be shed by an Indian warrior, and what must be the result? This Capitol will quickly hear it, and no sooner will it be heard than the power of this nation will be called up to avenge the deed. Can we refuse? No, sir, no. It would be impossible, and yet, with such a liability upon us, we are asked to surrender to the States on the frontier this entire matter, to manage according to their own notions of justice or feelings of antipathy. As I understand the plan, the old States are not only to surrender their respective portions in the public domain, but they are still to bear the burden and cost of every frontier Indian war. I ask, again, can we avoid it? Can we, under the obligation of our constitutional duties, and in possession of those sympathies which live and glow in the bosom of every American citizen towards every other American citizen as such—can we, in the very nature of things, avoid it? New Jersey has not a single Indian left within her borders; or, if there be here and there a miserable survivor of his race, he is a being so degraded as to have neither hope nor power, nor any capacity to influence the conduct of her people for either good or ill; but let the question arise whether Mississippi or Arkansas shall be protected from the incursions of a savage foe, and New Jersey will quickly give her aid, in men or money—the soldier's touch of the elbow, or the sinews which give strength to resistance or security of protection. She could not if she would, and she would not if she could, escape her obligations in this regard. She and all the States must take and bear the full proportion of burdens in such a case. However you may frame your laws, and how solemnly soever you may declare that the expense of Indian wars and the burden of their own defence shall rest upon those States which have received the grant, you never can carry such laws into effect. The heart, the head, the hand of every American citizen rise up together and proclaim it impossible. I ask, then, is it wise or just to make surrender? And for what advantage to these States, so far as money, or any rational interest, is concerned? They are to make the expenditures for sales, &c. and to exhibit their accounts, and we to receive them. But if done wisely, discreetly, and according to the terms of this compact, how must that account be stated? They are to take out, 1. The whole expenses, according to their notion of the expenses; and I know no mode in which we can correct them. 2. Out of the nett proceeds they are to pay over 65 per cent.—when and how they will—for your laws will give and can give you no remedy. 3. They are to retain the balance, 35 per cent. in full of their rights. Let the account be justly stated, and the matter fairly administered and they will find their reward to be the gratification of the avarice of the possession of money and land, without any redeeming result in honor, power, or even profit. They now get 5 per cent. This is lost. The distribution bill would give 12½ per cent. The balance is to meet their responsibilities and expenses. Will it do it? It may, but I submit it to the Senators of the new States to reflect on the results of this game which is offered them; and, if they cannot rise above the mere question of the possession of money and land, to decide whether they may not find themselves losers by the contact, while the Union also will be the loser. With me, however, this is, in comparison, but a small question. The question I propound and must decide is, what is our constitutional duty, and what are the rights of all the States?

But this amendment, give it all the force you will, meets not half of all the difficulties which now press upon us, and under which we are so restless and agitated on this subject of the public lands. What does it embrace? The lands within the limits of nine States of the Union, containing one hundred and sixty millions of acres. How many acres, in all, does this nation, according to the statements and estimate of the report of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. NORVELL,] now possess? More than a thousand millions. To get rid of this question, you are dealing with one hundred and sixty millions of acres, forgetting that by their side lie over eight hundred millions more. Do gentlemen suppose they are dealing with a trifle, or with only the one hundred and sixty millions? They forget the obstacles which beset them. What is to be the progress of this thing? We must keep up the existing land system; we must continue to bear all its expenses. We have given notice, whether constitutionally or not I shall not now discuss, to every American citizen, and even to every alien, that he has the right to go in on all these eight hundred millions of acres of land when he pleases and as he pleases, provided the Indians be not in possession. We have been told here that we cannot restrain him, and that to attempt it is vain. Well, admit it to be so, what then? Sixty thousand of these people get possession of a portion of this territory, and what is their next demand? By some rash conduct they get into conflict with the Indians, and then the whole military power of the nation must be drawn out to protect them in their trespass. But is that all? It is not. There is another principle, which has been boldly maintained here, that, whenever a Territory can number sixty thousand inhabitants, it not only may be admitted into the Union, but has a right to demand admission and equality with all the other States; and then, the moment it is admitted, all the land within its limits becomes theirs.

[Mr. LINN here interposed to explain. He had never heard it advocated—it certainly never had been by him—that the American people had a right to go upon Indian land the title to which had not been extinguished; on the contrary, land of that description had always been excluded in every pre-emption law, nor had any amendment ever been proposed, so far as he knew to the contrary.]

Mr. SOUTHARD. I must have presented my idea not so clearly as I intended, if the Senator's explanation has been rendered necessary. What I say is this: on the border of all these new States lie vast bodies of vacant land which we claim. The people, or foreigners, under the doctrine which has been here laid down, may cross over the line and settle upon it, for they may not know where the Indian title has been extinguished and where it has not. Having multiplied in numbers, even if they be all foreigners, they may come here and require admittance, and when admitted may, according to the provisions of this amendment, demand all the land upon the same terms. I do not say it is distinctly claimed that our citizens and foreigners can lawfully go on land to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, but they do in fact often go on such land, and there can be no argument against admitting them there as soon as the Indian title shall have been relieved, for the language of the amendment is "whenever the Indian title has been or shall be extinguished." Here I say we maintain a principle which will authorize our citizens or aliens to go without the limits of a State into the lands of Iowa or Wisconsin. We assert and maintain their right to do it, and in doing so we bring ourselves into collision with the Indian tribes. And when a large number of these settlers shall send up their cry to our doors "You as our Government are bound to protect us:

the merciless savage is upon us: come speedily to our help!" how can we refuse them? I would not avoid it? I would not seek to avoid it. I admit, in its fullest latitude, the obligation of the Government to extend protection over all its citizens. I would have the name of an American citizen an impenetrable shield over every man who bears it, as in old Rome, at the cry "I am a Roman citizen," the uplifted arm of tyranny and oppression was paralyzed and fell powerless at the sound. I would have it so here. At the cry "I am an American citizen," I would be ever ready to put forth all the energy of this Government for his protection and defence. But, while I admit this, I insist that, when we are laying our plans for the future, and can plainly see that a certain arrangement will tempt the States into a situation which is likely to bring us all into trouble, it is an argument why we should refrain from making the arrangement. Settlers have no right, in bodies of fifty or sixty thousand, to go upon the public lands and bring upon the whole nation all the calamities and expense of an Indian war. Look at the consequences of this amendment. The nine new States take all the land within their limits. Presently the Territory of Wisconsin comes and knocks at your door. We shall hear and admit her into the Confederacy. According to some gentleman, we must do so, because we have no power—no constitutional power—to refuse. Well, Wisconsin is admitted, her territory contains millions of acres, and she then turns around and demands that you shall cede all these lands to her, as you have ceded to Arkansas and Missouri. Can you deny her? You cannot. The moment she comes into the Union, if this bill passes, all the land within her limits is hers; and must be hers, and will be hers, if you now consent to the cession which is proposed. What next? Presently Iowa comes and knocks, and she demands the same privilege as Wisconsin. She tells you that her people have gone there on the public land; that they have increased and multiplied until they have attained the constitutional numbers; and now they have a right to be a State and to enjoy equal prerogatives with all the other States. "True," say they, "there are Indian titles in the way, and there may be Indian wars, but give us all the land, and then put your hand into the Treasury of all the old States, and foot up and pay the bill of all the expense."

Your eight hundred millions of acres are daily being swallowed up by the progress of population. Territory after Territory will apply, and the moment you admit them you have surrendered every foot of the public land which they contain. You are virtually surrendering it now; for how can I stand here, after having given the land to Arkansas, and refuse it to Wisconsin and to Iowa, and to every Territory which may be formed to the Rocky Mountains and the mouth of the Columbia river? Thus you are to have the burden of the settlement of all these Territories, of the extinction of all the Indian titles, and the expense of all the Indian wars; and then to surrender to them every acre of that inheritance which the old States purchased with blood, when the claimants were unknown, when they were yet in the loins of their fathers.

There are various other objections which lie as well against the general character of this amendment as against its details, and which, to me, appear to be insuperable. I had intended to suggest a number of them, but I fear it will be unwise to attempt this, further than to call attention to one or two. On the question of price I have already commented, in showing how the States will be situated as to the profit they are to derive from the proposed arrangement. There is another feature in the plan to which I have already alluded under other aspects of the general subject. This compact, it is provided, is to be irrevocable. The States are to declare it perpetual, inviolable, now and forever, and the General Government is to be equally bound. Now, are we grown so wise, in our day and generation, as to be prepared to bind both the General and State Governments, in a manner irrevocable, for all future time, no matter what unknown events may arise hereafter? Gentlemen, to be sure, may flatter themselves that their intelligence can stretch its piercing ken through all time to come, and anticipate and provide for every possible posture of affairs. Our fathers, however, had not equal intelligence. Go back but a quarter of a century, and where do you find a single man who ever looked at the condition of things that now exist? Yet they, I am inclined to suppose, were as wise as we. I ask those who are so very ready to enter into mutual obligations, which are to be irrevocable through all future time, whether in peace or in war, whether in prosperity or the deepest distress, if they believe that they are so wise as to be able to foresee all that will happen, and how such an arrangement will certainly bear upon events not yet present? If they tell me they are, then I bow to them as prophets induced from above with knowledge and foresight such as does not fall to the ordinary lot of humanity. For my humble self, who claim no such high prerogative, I must object to that feature of perpetuity. We are binding ourselves, blindfolded, without knowing what circumstances will arise or what will be the future conduct of these States in relation to the contract their representatives are now so ready to make. Nor can we anticipate what may be our own necessities. I object to entering into an irrevocable bond of this description. Let us pass such laws in relation to this public land that we may reach it when justice, policy, necessity may demand. Let us place the subject so that we, or those who follow us, can lay our hands upon it—so that we and they may look round, may see what our condition is—may measure all our duties and obligations, and then decide according to the existing state of things at the moment of our or their action.

I object, again, to the want of power in this Government to enforce the provisions of its own bargain, if this is to be the bargain. Look at the fifth clause of this amendment, and see how you are to enforce it. On the principles of this Union and under the powers granted you by the Constitution, you cannot do it.

And here I may notice another item, though it is a small one, in the details of the scheme. I refer to the cession here proposed to the State of Tennessee. I do not know enough of the circumstances of the case to judge for what reason this direct grant is to be made to that one State. She is at here placed upon the same ground with the other States, but stands as an exception among them. There may be good reasons for this; but I am, for the present, incompetent to conceive on what just ground a provision like this can rest.

But my chief objection to this amendment lies at the foundation of it. It has regard to the basis on which the whole rests. I oppose it as a cession of the property of this nation. What is that property? It is an inheritance in land, wider in its extent than the widest limits of the Roman Empire; an inheritance almost equal to those far-spreading lands which British rapacity and power have been able to obtain for her in this the height of her glory and dominion. Need I say that such an inheritance is valuable? How came you possessed of it? Where did you get it from, that you have the right to give it away? How did you get it, that you may deal with it as a bounty to one class of States, and exclude another part from its possession? When those who represented the American Colonies proclaimed them to be independent of the British Crown, they looked, one and all, to the Crown lands as being sufficient eventually to relieve them under the burden of the struggle. These lands were to pay the Revolutionary debt, so that the Colonies might come out of the great contest free from poverty and suffering. There was not one of the Colonies but looked to this source for relief. Hear what Maryland has said. Listen to what New Jersey said when the articles of Confederation were presented to her. She was not wanting in spirit or in love of liberty. She well knew that she was to be the Flanders, the battle-ground of the Revolution; that her property must be wrecked in the storm; and though she might come out victorious, and even rich in glory, she must be hopelessly poor in other respects. She therefore made her appeal to her sister colonies, demanding that, while others became possessed of immense wealth in these lands, and while her blood mingled with theirs, and was poured out in streams on many a battle-field fought in the common cause, she should not be left alone in poverty and distress, while they were proud and powerful. Her appeal was listened to, and one of the grounds of the cession of these lands to the United States was that very appeal. As one of her representatives on this floor, I have not forgotten enough of all I have heard from my elders of the sufferings she endured in those days, to be willing here to surrender what, in the crisis of her trial, she demanded as her due, and what was freely yielded to the justice of her demand. The whole of these lands were relieved by the Revolution from the claims of the British Crown, and they became the common property of this nation by what has here been called the "generous" surrender of Virginia and other States. I would rather call it their just surrender to the equal rights of an equal suffering and an equal triumph. I think I do more honor to Virginia and those other States in saying that they believed it to be just, than in putting the act on any other ground—of magnanimity, liberality, or self-denial. A generous act it was, but its justice was its highest encomium. The land came into our possession as a common fund, for the common use and benefit; and I stop not to inquire whether the transaction was financial or otherwise. Discuss that point as you may, it will come to this at last, that whether the cession was made on grounds of finance alone, or with a view to what the history of our war required and justice demanded, and to sustain our Republican Government, our civil liberties, and thereby to preserve the hope of human liberty, it will be found of little consequence. I care not. In every aspect, these lands became the common property of the Union for the common use and benefit of all the States. It has always been so managed, and so regarded. During the early history of the Government, it was never looked at in any other light. Search our history from beginning to end, and you will find that all this doctrine about surrendering it to a few of the States is a notion of very modern growth. It is not a quarter of a century old, and I think we are becoming wise a little too fast, and that we are taught these lessons of wisdom by States then unknown and unborn. The men who composed them were infants in their mothers' arms, or brothers and sons of these whom they would now deprive of their inheritance. The oldest of them had not learned to read from this Virginia grant was made, who now stand here to teach us that the public domain is no longer to be regarded as common property, held for the common use. I prefer to take lessons, on such a subject, from those who were themselves in the struggle which purchased them, and formed the compact; of those who knew their rights, and were willing to deal equally and justly. They knew the grounds on which they proceeded; they prepared and exhibited to the world the principles they held, and I am inclined to believe that they were at least as patriotic in their views and opinions as those who stand in a position where local interests and State pride have their full operation on the conclusions of the mind.

But the idea that we are, either by this cession or by pre-emption laws, to take away the inheritance of the old States, has coupled with it another objectionable feature. The land belongs to all the States in fee simple. But suppose it did not, and that it had been purchased for the benefit of those who settle on it without pretence of law, I ask, how has it been paid for? You will find, when you look into the actual state of facts on that subject, (I do not refer to the Indian way of estimating the value of the land,)—you will find that reckoning the money paid for Louisiana and Florida, together with the expenditures under the existing land system, 150 millions of dollars have been paid out of the Treasury, while but 108 millions have as yet returned into it. The lands are debtor to the United States—to the old States—to the amount of forty millions of dollars. And yet we must now surrender the whole; we must forget the blood which has been shed, and all the sufferings which were endured, to earn this land, and give it away to all who choose to come and claim it. Is this just? Is it right? Take as an example the case of the State of Arkansas; and I take that State only because she furnishes a striking illustration of the nature of this measure. Louisiana cost us, in the first instance, and in the subsequent expenses of interest and otherwise, some twenty-three or twenty-four millions. Indeed, if the account were accurately stated, with the interest, its cost would amount to little if any short of thirty millions. This money was paid for the territory, without regard to the public lands already bought; and bought, too, at the most precious price ever paid in human history. Now, what is the state of this purchase? It is said by some that the lands in Arkansas—a part of this territory—are in value one-fourth part of the whole; but I suppose that estimate is quite too low.

It may be so. I care not. Put it even at one-fourth. The people of Massachusetts, New York, Delaware, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, paid their full proportion for the whole. Say, for Arkansas some seven to ten millions of dollars. What then? They have received back, from sales of lands in Arkansas, only $3,110,000. And now, what do these, our good friends, so very modestly tell us? It is true you have not yet got back more than three millions of your ten, but you must give up the balance to us. I think they might, without pretence to much moderation, at least wait till all we have paid out is returned to our pockets before they ask us to give up to them the whole estate.

This is a striking fact as to one State, but it applies, in all its force, to many other portions of the Western States, as well as to the lands of Louisiana. I have paid ten millions for a plantation; you go into possession of it; I get three millions of my money back, and you then say, give up the whole to me. I ask again, is this just? But you answer. My pride, my delicate sense of honor, forbids me to submit to you; I can't think of it. I ask, I demand, the surrender of the entire estate; and if you do not give up to me now, in a very few years I shall be strong enough and I will take it from you. Is it possible that we can consent to principles like these as the principles of a common union among independent States? I think not. I hope not.

I have called the attention of the Senate to the case of Iowa, Wisconsin, and Florida. What is Florida—for which we paid five millions of dollars? Florida, as we all remember, knocked at your door but a year ago, pretty unfortunately, for admission into the Union. How much have you received from Florida? Will any gentleman tell me? Yet you are here, by the principles of the bill and amendment, to give her all the land within her limits. If you are to give to one State or Territory, you must give to all. There must not be a handbreadth of difference in the benefits you confer on the different Territories and States of the Confederacy. The large States, perhaps, may not feel satisfied to be treated on a level with the small ones; but I hope I shall not be thought absurd in maintaining that, as to all favors, the States and Territories are to be placed on the same level. I can know no difference between them. I will never consent to treat some as higher, and others as lower. Whatever you grant to one you must grant to the others. On the principles in this amendment, the old States—worthless old bodies, I grant, but they were through the struggle of the Revolution—are to lose their rights in the common domain, that they may be given away to the young States since born. Experience often teaches us that the young frequently take pride, and are a little too apt to tread upon the heels of those who go before them.

It is perfectly apparent, as it seems to me, that this cession proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] leads to the results I have indicated, as absolutely inevitable, especially when connected with your pre-emption principles. You authorize citizens, virtuous, useful, and patriotic, or otherwise, or aliens, unknown to your Constitution and laws, who may readily be collected by money and power for dangerous purposes, to go upon your territory, and 60,000 of them may demand to be placed on an equality with old Virginia, and Massachusetts, and Connecticut, and New Jersey; and when the demand, which you cannot deny, is granted, they must possess the whole land, own it in their own right, pay you if they please, but, whether they do or not, enforce from you the defence of them and their lands, whether they keep any part of their bargain or not. My feelings rebel against every portion of the scheme. My judgment can find no apology for it. It breaks up the very foundations of our rights, and disorganizes the action of our system of Government.

I wish I could add the expenditures of the Government for Indian wars, and the portions of country for whom they were made. It has been, however, for the people of the West—for these new States. But, say gentlemen, ought not those people to be protected? Unquestionably. When did the old States hesitate to furnish men and arms at the first note of Western danger? Pressed down as those States say they are, let them at least remember that not one dollar of the amount has ever been expended for the protection of the territory of the old States. I beg them to remember also that, of this amount for Indian wars, New Jersey and the other old States have paid their full share. Has there been a hostile Indian on the soil of New Jersey? Was the money expended to save her citizens from massacre? No, no; she paid her share on the principle, that, when any portion of the Union is endangered, millions of stout hearts should be prepared to bleed, and twice the number of sturdy hands ready to strike in its defence. I affirm that there has not been an hour when the rights of our Western brethren were neglected, or a vote which forgot their claims to our sympathy. And if money was paid at any time for the defences of the old States, they were equally for the ultimate protection of the new, and paid in much greater proportion by the old than the new States.

On this point of general defence, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. LINN] would apply the proceeds of these lands for the support and increase of the Navy, and seems to take merit from the idea that this is most for our protection. And what interest have the States on the seaboard in the augmentation and maintenance of a Navy, which the Western States have not in an equal, if not a greater, degree? If I were called upon to say what part of the Union is most interested in our gallant little Navy, and in making it all that patriotism can demand that it should be, I would point to the Valley of the Mississippi; every portion of which can be reached in its vital interests by any naval power greater than our own. More interests depend on the outlet of Western commerce at the mouth of the Mississippi than on any, I had almost said all, the ports of the Atlantic seaboard. Hence the value of your Key West station and perhaps other stations which should years ago have been fortified and furnished for the protection and relief of the Navy when engaged in the defence of that great western commercial emporium, the outlet of the wealth—the security of the interests of the great valley.

I rejoice in the proposition, because it seems to be a waking up to their true interests in the West, after a long, long sleep. I remember when, in another station, I urged, with a zeal which was regarded as importunate, the increase of the Navy, and the protection of every interest on the borders or connected with the Gulf of Mexico, I met d.m. eyes and heavy ears, and had for my reward, often, too often, the noes of friends and the scorn and sneers of opponents. Times are changing. Our Navy may now look to more of justice and encouragement. Our stripes and stars, around which—whether in the breeze or the battle—so many affections of the patriot's heart cluster, and which, in the calm and in the storm, when peace demanded only their countenance, or war their power and vengeance, have steadily, and without change of course, borne onward the rights, the honor, the glory, not of our land only, but of liberty and free institutions—these stripes and these stars have promise of good; let it come, let it come.

But still, I may not, I cannot, adopt this proposition. The ocean should forever be our battleground. Our soil should be untrodden by a foeman's foot. Our Navy, the bulwarks of our defence which float upon the waves, should look for sustenance and power to no one of our separate and distinct resources. They have a right to demand them all, if all be necessary; and until they are so, I cannot agree, deeply as I love them, to set apart a particular, separate fund, and especially this fund, to their support. Loosely and ardently as I have struggled for them, I would not let them—no, nor any other great and commanding interest—rest on one, and especially this one, of our sources for revenue and expenditure. I would not consent to put the maintenance of this arm of our defence, or jeopard it, by resting on any one interest or resource in the Republic. I would put it on the general Treasury; and I would demand for it what should cause the stars and stripes, its flag, to wave in that conscious independence of which it is the emblem. Why should we devote this specific revenue to that object? It was purchased by the States—by the Revolution accomplished by the States. It was devoted to them for their relief. They have paid the debt of the Revolution almost without its aid, but they have a right to have the balance, the remainder, to restore what they have expended, to meet their wants, to promote their prosperity. If they choose to surrender it, I cannot aid in that surrender. If New Jersey is prepared for it, she ought to find some other agent to be her instrument in the sacrifice.

There is another point which I ought to suggest. We have bought from the Indians about four hundred and forty-two millions of acres; we have paid about eighty-five millions of dollars for them, of which we have got back only about forty-five millions. Yet we are to give up what we have purchased before our expenditure is returned. Throughout this whole land scheme, I perceive this one leading, one controlling idea. Although, as the Representative, of the people of all the States, we are still out of pocket; though we have paid out enormous sums which have never been returned to us, yet we are to surrender every acre we hold to a few of the States, who have paid very little of the whole amount. Twenty-six have purchased an estate; nine, who have paid the smallest share, say, give the whole of it to us, on our own terms. What right, I ask, have you to do any such thing? Where is the principle of common union in such a demand?

But we are told that those States have already paid enormous sums into the Treasury; and the argument is, that the balance should go to them, on such terms as may best suit them. How have these sums been paid? The lands within their limits, belonging not to them, but to the nation, have been sold, and the money received has come to the nation, as the proceeds of its own property. Those States have paid nothing but as purchasers—purchasers of lands which have made them rich, as their rapidly growing population and comfort abundantly prove. Are the sellers, under such circumstances, under heavy obligations to such purchasers for additional acts of liberality? But who paid this money? Did the people of the new States? They had no people to purchase or pay. A part of the inhabitants of the old States, taking their resources from the old States, and making purchases, thus became citizens of the new. The sums paid into your Treasury were paid by the old States—by their citizens—out of their means. Those who chose to desert them, to seek new homes, and higher prosperity, ought not now to turn back to the ancient domicils of their parentage and birth, and utter reproaches because they are not permitted to take for nothing, or on their own terms, all that remains vacant and uncultivated of the inheritance of those they left behind. Look over this chamber. I believe you will find some sixteen or eighteen Senators who were born in the old States, some of them, perhaps, now with princely possessions; with an average, at least, of wealth beyond those who are here from the seaboard. How came they here and thus? They left their relations, took their means, sought fame and prosperity, and found them in a country apt to furnish such results. But is it quite benevolent or just for them or others, the partakers of a like destiny to seek to deprive those they left behind, of their own blood, and, in a less enviable condition, of their share in the common inheritance? Let me suppose a case, and use the pronoun I. I have a brother. We inherit a few acres of worn-out land in a narrow State. We have also a common property in the West—a property from which we derive an income. I choose to remain and manage my share of the paternal estate, to let the incense still burn on the family altar, and meet, as I may, the destiny of the family hearthstone. He chooses to part with his portion—take its proceeds, and adventure to our Western property. He does so. And the moment he arrives and pays the required sum, to have a part set off to his exclusive use—he tells me that he has a right to my share also—that he is a pioneer—that he has encountered the perils of the wilderness—that he has merits far beyond mine—that I must yield to him—and if I do not, he either has or soon will have the strength to take what he claims—and he will take that which is mine—mine by the sacrifice of Revolutionary blood—mine by the dearest price which human nature can pay—mine by the compacts and covenants of the Revolutionary hour. He may succeed—but if he does, it is the triumph of unlicensed power over right and justice.

But I deny the authority in another aspect. How do Congress hold these lands? and what is your authority over them? We do not own these lands. We only represent those who do. We are the trustees for their management. Can a trustee, at his pleasure, part with the trust fund, and put it out of his hands, and either give it or confide its management to another? Are we any thing more or less than trustees? Congress, it is true, must, under the Constitution, determine on disposition of the land; but they do it in their relation to a trust fund. Have we any power to part with the fund? Where is such power given to us? And where, too, is that other principle which is involved in the amendment—the power to appoint trustees of our own choice, under ourselves? In what court of equity, in what court of honor, in what heart, can such a doctrine find its sanction? You have been appointed a trustee, and, without any authority from your principal, you are to hand over your trust to another. Such an act would be denounced in every court as a violation both of honesty and honor.

Disputants may debate about terms and expressions. They may reason about the effects of changes from the old Confederation and the old Congress, to the new and existing Government. But are we not, by these changes, which have been made by those for whom the trust is held, put in the place and stead of those who first received the trust? Does not this Government represent, and by their will and their command, those in whom they first confided? Is it not, with a mere change of form and name, the same trustee? Do not all the original responsibilities and duties rest upon us, in all their force? And can we avoid them, without quibbles, unworthy of an advocate, in the humblest tribunal? No, Mr. President, we stand here, in possession of the trust property, bound to execute it—to execute it faithfully, according to the original purposes to which it was devoted. There is not an honest and intelligent chancery on earth, which, if it could reach us, would not compel us so to discharge our duty.

But it may be asked, how, then, are you to divide and distribute that fund? I shall not enter at this moment into a discussion of that part of the subject; but will remark that the persons among whom we propose to divide the inheritance are the very persons from whom we have received the trust, who own and are competent to decide for themselves on their interests. They are competent to receive it. They are the owners: we are trustees. If they say to us, keep the title, but divide the proceeds among us, and we obey their mandate, is there any violation of justice or law in such a division? It is the only mode by which we can effect the just application of a common fund. Graduation and pre-emption apply the fund only to a few of the owners—not equally among them all. But when you distribute the proceeds you can do exact and equal justice to all and to every part of the Union. I can see nothing either in the law or in the terms of the contract, or the principles of justice, which forbids me to adopt the measure. So far from it, I think I see in it the only and last hope of those who made the purchase to receive one dollar of their money. If you will not agree to distribute the proceeds, they must buy their account to lose the whole. What hope can New Jersey, or Connecticut, or Rhode Island entertain of receiving any return for the millions they have paid, and all the labor they have bestowed to earn this rich inheritance? None; none. And if you go on with your pre-emption bills, and your graduation bills, and your cession bills, till you have parted with the last acre out of your possession, then will have been accomplished before the civilized world a grand exhibition of the justice of Republican communities. After the country has united in an arduous and agonizing struggle for national independence, and poured out its blood like water, and secured for those to come after them a rich inheritance of free principles and social happiness, one of the great prizes which they won is seized and ravished from the possession of those who gained it, and who suffered for it. Is this your Republican justice?

But we are told that this domain is a subject of constant difficulty in the transactions of our public business—that it is a prize to be fought for—a stake for which political gamblers will always be contending—and that, if we would have any peace, it must be removed from our control. That these lands will always be held out as a bribe by the ambitious wherewith to obtain power; that we do not possess sufficient firmness and virtue to resist; and that such a bid will be made for votes, through the promise of this vast territory, as must disturb all the future regular action of the Government. It may be so. But I think that, if there have been bids made, the bid of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. C.] far outstrips the whole of them—and I hope no future dealer in the commodity will be able to equal him. But is it so? That Congress cannot perform its regular legislative duty on account of the immense prize which the public domain holds out to ambitious men and to parties within its halls? I am reluctant to believe it. But if it be true, by whom is the bribe offered? and on whom does it act? It must be offered by the new States, or by those who court their favor. They have the lands within their limits. Their politicians can make bids, but those from the old States cannot so well do it, without the desperate hazards which ambition is, sometimes, mad enough to encounter.

When I hear gentlemen say that there is a political game to be played by means of the public lands, what am I to understand but that the new States hold a great prize, and that they can offer it to unchastened ambition, if it gratify their wishes. A political game? Where? Where does it operate? Not, surely, on the great mass of the people of this country. I do not believe the public lands, if they were worth ten times as much, could bribe the American people to give their suffrages in any quarter which their judgments and their hearts do not approve. One thing I know, that no aspirant for power or place can purchase the votes of New Jersey at any such price. How it may be with others, I can only judge by what I see of the virtue and consistency of those who represent them—and by their conduct.

In connection with this idea of our corruptibility, by means of the public lands, it occurs to me that another suggestion is worthy of some notice. It comes, however, from a different quarter, and is subject to another construction. It is this, that our political affairs have been matter of stock speculation on the Exchange of London. The inference—if any inference is intended to be drawn—must be, that London stockjobbers and London capitalists have some connection with the party opposed to the existing Administration, and have had some influence in the recent election, and must have some in its future results and effects. And the Administration—the Executive—by its acknowledged organ, announces such to be their true opinion; an organ on which it seems more to rely than on any and all other means and instruments of defence—pride themselves as these means and instruments may. Now, to me, this is a marvellous idea; suited, indeed, to the sense of right and wrong of any editor, sold, soul and body, to his party; but reckless of every consequence save one—success. But, when offered on this floor, it should be sustained by evidence, which might at least afford an apology for asserting a fact which, if true, inflicts unending degradation upon our country. So far as relates to the late election, I have said that I could not, here, and on this occasion, discuss it. I have proved that, at other times and other places, I was not slow, however inexpert, to seize and wield the weapons of political strife. But other matters claim our attention—far higher, both to my own State and the Union, than the temporary possession of Executive power, or the triumphs of the hour to a party? But the character of the country, the virtue and integrity of our widespread people, require that suggestions, coming with the pomp of authority and the confidence of influence, and which must, however they may be intended, affect the future action of the nation, should demand at least an inquiry as to the foundation on which they rest.

I ask them for the evidence. What is it? So far as yet developed, a banking-house in London has written a letter, and articles in newspapers and reviews, and perhaps some books, have been published in London. When, and in what case, has it been established that this was the proper evidence by which to try the character of our parties, or the character and motives of our people? Since when have opinions, emanating from that source, been so much in favor as to be considered conclusive on such a point? Sir, we are changing rapidly; banks and banking-houses abroad are now regarded as good guides in estimating the character of our parties and people.

But who is this banking-house? What opinions have they expressed? What gives to their opinions such weight? How were they induced to say any thing on such a subject? I understand them to be an ordinary banking house in London, (Huth and Co.)—dealers in stocks and money—one of the firm being for the time a director in the Bank of England. They have no peculiar knowledge of us, nor connection with us; nor capacity to judge of us or of our interests, characters, or motives. I do not know that they have the slightest connection in feeling or interest with the Whig party—though it would seem that they have with a portion, and that not an unimportant one, of the supporters of the present Administration. What induced them to give an opinion? The State of Missouri chose to issue certain stock, or obligations, which rested upon the responsibility of the State, and by which money was to be raised to be used in the State. She chose to send, or permit to be sent, some of this stock—this State security—to London to pass it off and get the money which was needed. Her agent, I presume, sought the company, and not the company him, and the company was induced to manage the securities for the State, and sell them or otherwise procure the money. In all this what had the Whig party or the majority of the people to do? They surely did not control Missouri while the Senator was so commanding in his influence. They did not send the securities to London. They did not select the agent there. And if that agent, the agent of an Administration State, and Administration interests, has expressed opinions, it does not seem to accord very well with fairness and justice to bind us or the people of the country by them. It would be as fair and as just to receive as binding the allegations and opinions of the representative of that State, her Senator here, as conclusive. I should hardly be willing to place the evidence of the agent in London above that of the selected representative of the State in Washington. The latter holds a far more commanding position. But what opinion do Huth and Co. express that its evidence is to be so controlling? It seems to me, in substance, to be nothing more than this: that State securities, and those of Missouri among them, cannot be sold in the present condition of things; and that those who wish to invest their money in them are not willing to do so because they are fearful of the opinions, and principles, and conduct which prevail, and which are to be anticipated from the party in power in this country; but that they would be somewhat relieved, and more willing to buy, if the Opposition should succeed. Now, if this opinion be ever so absurd and monstrous, I beg that we may not be saddled with it; that, if rebuke is to be given, it be applied by that State to this unworthy agent, and that he be taught by his principles more justice and good sense and courtesy towards them. It may be a difficult task for him to alter his convictions. He buys and sells, not for himself, but for those who desire to make sure and permanent investments. He does not buy to hold, but for sale to others. The London brokers and banking-houses are but the agencies through which the retired and quiet holder of money makes his investments. And if he will not buy, they cannot sell. And could he or they buy with safety? Was there not justice in the opinion expressed? proper grounds on which any man would hesitate to hazard his property. Have not the General Government and Administration States said and done enough to make a prudent man pause? Recollect the course of one State, and her want of punctuality in paying the interest; the avowed principles of the Executive of another State; the doctrines promulgated in so many quarters of influence; and, worse if possible than all, the volunteer, unnecessary resolutions of this body about assuming State debts. If you had money to lend, would you lend it those who avowed such principles? Would you not prefer to lend it to those who entertained different principles, and acknowledged the unchanging obligation of their bonds, in whose hands they might be found?

But enough of this. I ought not to reason on such a question on the floor of this body. Before the representatives of what are proudly called sovereign States, shall it be said or insinuated, without rebuke, that the people of those States have been influenced in their highest act of sovereignty by the exchange of London? Is there money enough in London and Paris, in Holland, or the combined wealth of Europe, to bribe the voters who decided the recent election—to govern their suffrages, when great principles of Government and civil liberty are to be discussed and decided? Then have I miscalculated the virtue of my countrymen.

But if the gold of British bankers did operate with such a deadly and resistless power, it must have been somewhere, and can be pointed out. I ask where? In what State of the Union? Was it in Indiana? or Ohio? or Delaware? or Vermont? or Massachusetts? or Connecticut? or Rhode Island? or Georgia? or New Jersey? or was it in Missouri? or which of the States was brought to its vote by influence from the London Exchange? Let us have some specification. And if no single State be named, then I put it to Senators, and ask them, one by one, to say whether it was their State that was "bought up by foreign capitalists? Was it in your State? or yours? or yours? No; no stock-jobbing combinations could ever accomplish a political revolution such as has changed the face of this entire land. I have no belief in any such degrading of persons or my country. I plant myself upon the intelligence, the honor, the virtue, of the American people, and I believe them far above the reach of any such influences.

I do not believe the proposed scheme as to the lands will operate at all to remove from our deliberations here the struggle of party opinions. If things have reached that point, or if we are servile and money bought, we had better at once give up the Republic to the spoiler. It is not worth struggling for, if it had become already so corrupt as such arguments assume. Let each Senator apply them to his own State, and is he think them merited, let him be content. But as applied to me and to mine, I repel them with indignation.

I have now concluded what I have to say in regard to the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] comes next. I have already expressed some of my opinions in regard to that. But I now repeat the expression of my hearty concurrence in a part of his amendment. I have said that I might be induced to go both for pre-emption and graduation, provided they are connected with distribution, but I must have distribution; and even then the graduation and the pre-emption must be carefully guarded. I am not satisfied with his proposition in this respect. It gives too much land. If the pre-emption be, indeed, intended for the poor man, half the amount he proposes to allow is amply sufficient. I go on the presumption that the fact in this respect is as it is presumed to be by the law. Nor am I satisfied with a limitation of the pre-emptive right to persons not worth a thousand dollars. I am willing that the poor man should possess a roof and a hearthstone that he may call his own, especially such as have had to struggle with adversity, but I go on the ground that there should be no distinction as to property in any of our legislation. It should be the act of the man, and not his property, that should form the ground of distinction. Give a privilege to-day because a citizen is not worth one thousand, and to-morrow you may and will make it ten, and the next day twenty—or you may, which is more probable, reverse it, and deny a privilege because he is too poor. Equal laws—equal privileges under the laws, and equal rights, for rich and poor—for poverty and wealth—even for profligate idleness and thriving industry—are the principles of our system—the theory of our institutions—the broad and immovable basis of the religion we profess and the liberty we would cultivate. I am not willing to depart from it for any temporary expediency—or any ingenious theory. If it be right to give the settler on the public lands a preference in the purchase, let him have it without counting the number of dollars in his pocket—without telling him your poverty justifies your nation's charity, or is the reason of your nation's justice. Tempt not your citizens to make pretence of poverty that they may acquire, by gift, either privileges or wealth. It is not a fit principle to guide our legislation. And yet, Mr. President, I must vote for this amendment of my friend (Mr. CRITTENDEN) from Kentucky, because his proposition contains two objects: the distribution of the proceeds among the States and this modified pre-emption—and, by the rules of the Senate, I cannot have them divided. I will take both, for the present, in preference to the bill of the committee, or the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN] and will endeavor, in the final action, to separate them, and establish what better suits my views on this point.

Having submitted my views of the amendments, I have reached the bill of the committee, and in what I have to offer in regard to it, I hope to be brief. Its particular provisions have already been examined by several Senators, and it is therefore the less necessary that I should dwell upon them. I could not make them more clear than they were made by the Senator from Connecticut on my left, [Mr. HUNTINGTON] whose argument I hold to be unanswerable. I yield to it my assent, and need not, and shall not, attempt to repeat it.

To the simple principle of pre-emption, as such, and connected with no trespass on the rights of the country, I have no great objection. I can, at least, content myself to submit to it if it be properly regulated. But here is a bill, calling itself a pre-emption bill, which holds out a thousand millions of acres of land as a lure to tempt all people on the face of this wide world to come and seize it. It is a bill without limit in point of time, and almost as illimitable in point of territory—wholly without restriction as to color, race, or country. The African, the Indian, the Hindoo, the Austrian, the Russian, the Spaniard, the Frenchman, the Englishman, all are alike invited to come and take a portion of our soil and at once become American citizens, and receive a title to land which can never be recalled. Nay, we are so anxious to give away these lands that we offer them to infants of the age of eighteen, who cannot make a contract, under our laws, but whom we propose to free from the iron control of parental authority. When we purchased the largest portion of this same territory, and were bound by solemn treaty, our supreme law, to recognise and protect the rights of the inhabitants, we refused all claims to titles unless the claimant was, when the right was acquired, the head of a family or twenty-one years of age.—3 Laws, 652. Our liberality grows apace, in our zeal for pre-emptions—our justice is not so rapid in its motions. We are quite ready to admit for the whole race of man what we denied to those in whose favor the obligations of right and mercy were presented. Who makes this grant? Who issues this irrevocable proclamation? The Government. I would suggest to you, sir, if it be not, at least, a plausible idea, that, when the Government thus grants land to an individual, and he takes possession of it, the very act does not make him a citizen, and no subsequent escheat can interrupt his possession. But I do not stop to discuss this point. This bill is in violation of all the principles of all the laws in regard to the public lands which this Government has ever passed. In 1807, when the "great apostle of Democracy," who is quoted by some gentlemen much as the ancients quoted the responses of their oracles, was in the Presidential chair, a bill was passed directing the Executive to carry the laws for the protection of the lands of the Indian and national domain into effect; and, if the settlers refused to submit, to use the force of the Government in removing them. On what principle of that act is the present bill founded? I know that it was imputed to that apostolic Chief Magistrate, as he has been irreverently called, that when he urged the passage and gave his assent to the law, he had his eye on the Bature at New Orleans, and wished a pretext for removing the claimant; but that I did not believe. I was one of his admirers, and was satisfied that the law originated in a conviction, on the part of Congress, and on his part, also, that the public domain of the United States was not to be trampled upon and plundered. Subsequently and under peculiar circumstances, the inhabitants of Lower Louisiana, and also of Kahokia, Kaskaskia, and one or two other settlements, were granted pre-emption rights to the lands they held. On what grounds? Those in Lower Louisiana had taken possession of their lands in virtue of grants and public documents from the Government which had ruled them; but, owing to some defects of title, they were unable to enforce their right. The country passed into our hands, and became subject to our Government. These people were not pre-emptioners in any sense now given to the term. They had not rushed upon their lands without pretence or color of title. They settled in good faith, thinking they had a valid title to the lands they occupy. So in relation to the Kaskaskia settlers. They were the subjects of a foreign Government, and had been upon their lands for a long course of years. They had improved their possessions, and accumulated around them the comforts of life, and the Government resolved that it would not disturb them. This was just and right; but these people had not gone upon land in violation of law, and taken possession of it by building a log cabin, or planting a potato patch. All our other pre-emption laws were influenced by considerations which operate on the judgment and justice of a Government. In all your laws, you have said that, up to a given day, and under certain specified circumstances, settlers who had possessed themselves of your land should be protected, and held at the prices for which you were willing to sell it. But what do you say here? Come one, come all. Come from the four corners of the earth and with the four winds of heaven, settle on our public domain, and take a quarter section of land to the reward of your merit. But this is not all. If eight or ten seize, together, upon one quarter section, they may spread themselves over all the adjoining land, till they have each got a quarter section. You send forth a proclamation to the homeless, the homeless, the unprincipled of the world, and throw open to them all the public land of all the States of this Union. While I speak thus, I must not be considered, and will not submit to be represented, as saying harsh and unkind things of those who are called pre-emptioners. I have burdens enough to bear, without this addition of false and groundless accusations. I admit these settlers to be as upright, correct, and virtuous, in regard to other matters, as their fellow-citizens, though I do not think them right in thus seizing the property of others. I am ready to concede to them equal merit with others, save in this—they have, heretofore, violated the laws of their country, and you now offer to bribe all the inhabitants of the globe to imitate them. But while I will do them the amplest justice, I cannot consent to sit here and hear it said that they are men of more perseverance, industry, enterprise, virtue, and patriotism than those whom they have left behind them in the old States, or that the negro of Africa, the lazzaroni of Naples, and the serf of Russia, have such merits, and may be rewarded at our expense. I am not willing to hear these perpetual contrasts between the people of the old and the new States. It is constantly rung in our ears that pre-emptors are men of great intelligence and enterprise—quite the guardians of the country. Indeed! Where did they get their intelligence? And if of more virtue, where did they acquire it? Of more devotion to their country—on what theatre did they learn this extra ultra patriotism? That they understand the principles of civil liberty better—where did they get their knowledge? Who are they? They are either foreigners, coming here from lands of despotism, or they are descendants of the men of the Revolution. If they come from abroad, why shall I admit their superiority over men born amidst the blessings, and imbued from their cradles with the love, of civil liberty? I admit no such thing. But if they are the descendants of the men of the Revolution, how came they by such exclusive and peculiar virtue? No; when I admit their equality with others, I admit every thing which can be justly demanded. Above all, I am not prepared to acknowledge that these settlers, either past or future, are men of such pre-eminent excellence that I am bound to submit to a wrong perpetrated on me and mine in order to reward them. I do not admire such contrasts. What right have the people of Illinois over the people of Delaware or New Jersey which authorizes us to say to them, You have so much merit, that we will take the property of the people of those States and give it to you? I hold it better and more just to act upon the principle that the people of the several States stand all on one common platform, and make provisions which shall apply equally to them all.

There is another idea which has been advanced here, to which I can never yield assent. It is, that we are, now, at that point in the history of these lands where we enjoy, for the last time, the opportunity of acting on them freed from compulsion; and if they are not now ceded, they will very soon be seized. I have said that this was not an argument properly addressed to the judgment: but what kind of argument is it to the feelings of an equal and an honorable man? To equal sovereign States? Gentlemen say, in substance, "We shall soon possess the balance of power in the valley of the Mississippi, and then we can vote you down, and, then, we will have the land with your consent or without it." If this were true, what sort of argument is it to address to me, as an independent Senator, standing here in the discharge of my duty to my State? I do not believe it to be true. I am not at all alarmed by the threat. In the first place, they will not have the balance of power in the valley of the Mississippi, but, if they should, they will find, on this point, a divided empire. I do not admit that, because they may have a majority of numbers, therefore political power must be on that side of the mountains. There are many other things which go to make up political power besides mere numbers. And among them, for I cannot pause for a full enumeration, are there not the advantages and influence of commerce and the means of protecting that commerce? The connection and ready intercourse with other nations who control the interests of the civilized world? Fifty millions of freemen may live and prosper in the great valley between the Alleghany and Rocky Mountains; but if they do, they will not form an exclusive Chinese Empire, but will seek avenues to and connection with those who can unite with them in promoting their interests. Have not the fastnesses of their barrier mountains been already broken open, their ravines made streams for transportation, their frosty summits iron passways for the farmer, the miner, the manufacturer to traverse with the products of his labor to the marts where that labor may best find its recompense? They will not rely on the mouth of the Mississippi alone, but on every bay, stream, and harbor of the Atlantic coast.

In my opinion, if this Union lasts, no man will ever see the centre of power a hundred miles west of Piusburg. I say to these aspiring States, you cannot get the political power of this country. But, if you do, it is an unfounded idea that all the feelings of the people of the valley of the Mississippi must be tributary to such notions in regard to the public lands. Where is Ohio now? Where will Indiana shortly be, when there comes to be a new State beyond Missouri? Even now, Indiana, by her Legislature and her Senators, refuses to accept your bribe of the public lands. And thus you will go on and find that as fast as new empires rise in the extreme West, just so rapidly will other States, now new, be passing over into the condition and acquiring the interests and feelings of old States. Your threats about seizing the public lands, because you will have the balance of power, if addressed to me as a persuasion to cede them to you now, I value as nothing. I do not believe that your power to get possession of those lands will ever be greater than it is at this moment. Hour by hour, as Missouri, Arkansas, and Michigan, and Wisconsin, and Iowa become settled, so also, hour by hour, will other States wheel into line, and stand with us on the great question of the public domain.

When I hear gentlemen proclaiming to us, in threatening tones, that this question must be settled, that they will soon get the power, and then they will do, not what they suppose to be wrong, but what I do, it gives me no alarm. Do they remind me that Wisconsin will soon be a State, and will add weight to their side of the balance? I look at Ohio, and remember that she is at our end or the beam. Do they threaten me with Iowa? I look at Indiana. Do they point to the Far West? I point them to the whole slope on this side the Mississippi. At every hour they must lose more than they gain. I am therefore unconcerned on this point of force. But suppose they were able to put their threats in execution, I hold the right of the old States to the public lands to be unquestioned and unquestionable; and if asked to surrender that whole domain, I say "Come and take it." If I must surrender it, I had rather surrender it to the pressure of your power, than tamely give it up under alarm at your threats.

I have but a word to say as to the idea that this Government does not possess the power to enforce its own laws, to protect its own property, to perform its duty as trustee. It may be so; but is it wise to proclaim, in the ears of a listening world, that our boasted institutions, and this our American Union, rest on such principles that we are incapable of protecting our own admitted property? I know, indeed, too well, that a spirit of resistance to law has risen, within a few years, far beyond the point it had ever attained. The historian, if faithful, will trace it to the last twelve years of our annals. I know that there are men who are for taking all power and judgment into their own hands, and who supposed that, under the influence of passion and interest, they can decide better and more wisely than our judicial tribunals, and have higher authority than the laws of the land. But I trust the hour has not yet come for announcing that, in America, the Government and the laws are not strong enough to enforce the rights of the nation against individuals. I hope it is not so. I would ask Senators from those States, and I wish them to answer the question, not to me, but to themselves, would you prevent our own citizens from going to settle on such portions of this land as now belong to your States? Are your State Governments so weak, so broken down, that they cannot prevent this? Where your States have had large tracts given them, for works of internal improvement, or for other objects, do you protect your own land, or do you not? And if you do, is it right to come here and say to us "We, the State Governments, are abundantly strong to protect our lands, but you, the Government of the Union, are utterly powerless to protect yours?" It is demanded of us that we shall pass pre-emption laws as an act of justice to the new States. These States hold large tracts of land, which are their own; will their Senators be good enough to show me the pre-emption laws they have passed? Or do they think it is well enough to urge this policy upon us, while they repudiate it themselves? How much stronger would their argument be, if they could say, "This thing is right in principle, and you see we practise it in our own case?" But is it so? If a pre-emption law which is to affect my land is a good thing, why would it not be as good if it affected theirs?

I have one more objection to urge. I feel strong repugnance to that feature which calls men of all nations to come and take a part of our public domain. The invitation is too broad. No matter what climate a man may inhabit; no matter what hue a Southern sun may have burnt upon his features, if he is in the form of man, he is invited. And it is now claimed for the States that they may make him a citizen at what time and on what terms they please. I have not read in the history of our Revolutionary struggle, in the Articles of the Confederation, or in the Federal Constitution, any thing which holds out to foreigners a bribe to come, nor justifies the States in making them our fellow-citizens at their pleasure. These doctrines are new, but they fit each other, and united, lead to consequences which demand that we pause and reflect. Why hold out such offers? Do we need an army of foreigners to come among us because we are incapable of managing our own affairs? or because they are men of better political and moral principles? or that they may protect us? I repeat here what I said as to pre-emptioners. I will not be thrown into the position of one who is an opponent of foreigners. None of the miserable slang on that subject can apply to any portion of my life. The question here is not as to the terms on which we shall admit them, but as to the wisdom of thus inviting them, and to the power to admit them as citizens. It is not whether they shall pass through a probation of five years or of ten years, or whether a simple oath of allegiance alone shall place them in the possession of the privileges and under the obligations of citizenship. But who has a right to say what the terms of admission shall be? You invite them to take your land in Illinois; can Illinois, as soon as they get possession, say they shall have the right of suffrage—be citizens of that State, and thus, by force of the Constitution, entitled to all the privileges of citizens in another State? A Swede, or an African, who was never a slave in this country or elsewhere, who has been freed, accepts your invitation—takes your offered quarter section—can that State make him a citizen of the Union? Is this power of creating the citizen lodged in the States or in the Union?

The question is not answered or affected by an amendment which was offered to that bill, that if the foreigner declared under oath his intention to make the land his home, he might be a pre-emptioner. It respects not the mere oath of intention or allegiance. It rises higher. Can the States make a citizen of the Union? It was not so when we were colonies. Then the power was in the British Crown. The Parliament might say who should be admitted to citizenship in England; but even Parliament itself could not declare that a Frenchman should be a citizen of one of the British colonies. The Crown was then the depository of that power. And let me remark that there are few, if any, of the great principles of American liberty which are not ultimately founded on the prerogative of the British Crown, as in opposition to the powers of the British Parliament. The King prescribed to us who should be admitted as our fellow colonists. We gave up that power to the Confederation. Before that, each State was independent of every other in this respect. But the Confederation was to control the exercise of this power, lest one colony or State should, by admitting whom it pleased, be able virtually to say to another colony or State who should be its citizens. The power given in the Confederation over the subject of naturalization, was intended to reconcile the conflicting action of the States. Some received citizens in one way, others in another. The power conferred on the Confedration may be found in 1 Laws, 14, article 4. The reasons for giving it and the difficulties which arose under it, are explained by Mr. Madison in The Federalist. I need not detain the Senate by reading them.

Then came the Federal Constitution which created the Union; and what does it teach? Its first words are, "We the people of the United States." Who were they? They were the citizens of the United States. The honorable Senator from South Carolina said he would like to hear a definition of what a citizen is. I have no skill at definitions, but I think I can describe who are and who are not citizens. At the time the Constitution was adopted, the people of the States formed it. The mere holding of land did not constitute a man a citizen, or one of the people of the States. A State may, if she pleases, allow an alien to take land, and hold and transmit it by her laws, and yet he may not be a citizen of the State or of the United States. We must go beyond that. The moment you allow a man the power to vote, the moment you give him power to vote in the political government, you make him a citizen—one of the people. We need not go back to Rome on this matter. The man who possesses political power, united to the common rights of person and property, is your citizen. He must owe his allegiance here, be subject to all duties, possess all rights, or he cannot be a citizen with us. The language, "We the people of the United States," meant such, and none others. They formed their Government for themselves—not for Englishmen or Frenchmen—but for themselves alone, and such as they chose to admit, upon terms which they should, in their joint capacity, prescribe. The power to prescribe these they could not leave to the States. Would you have Maryland say to New Jersey, you shall receive this man because I have made him a citizen? There was, therefore, a necessity of some common rule, and the authority to prescribe it must be placed somewhere, and it could be placed nowhere but in the common councils; and accordingly the Constitution declared that Congress should have the power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." Could it be uniform, and yet leave the power to the States? Naturalization is the investing of an alien with the rights and privileges of one who is native born. That is the whole idea. When, therefore, the Constitution says that Congress shall have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, it means this, and this only: Congress shall prescribe the terms on which a foreigner, an alien, shall be admitted to the rights of a native—be one of "We the people." Can there be a uniform rule unless it is prescribed by some common central power, and by that alone? There obviously cannot. The very object to be attained requires that the power should be vested exclusively in one body, in the Federal Government.

I hold, therefore, the Constitution of Illinois and so much of the Constitution of Michigan as undertakes to admit foreigners to citizenship to be null and void—a violation of the compact. We entered into the Union on certain terms and conditions relative to representation, taxation, and other matters. It was necessary for us to say who should be admitted as copartners. But if an individual State may say this, the relative position of the States is changed—the conditions at once broken and destroyed. Illinois admits, we will suppose, 10,000 persons to vote who are aliens, not naturalized, whom she has not had the consent of other States to admit—what is the effect upon New Jersey? It is this: that foreigners, strangers probably to our principles of government, our habits, our interests, to our very language, may outweigh and overcome the citizens of New Jersey in the choice of a Chief Magistrate, and in all the management of all our public affairs. Is this fair? Is it right? This doctrine puts it in the power of certain States so to arrange as that foreigners shall send enough to make up the majority of Representatives on the floor of the other House, and may decide the choice of President. The States, it is said, are too wise and just, and will not do this. I do not say they will; but I would rather stand by the Union, and trust the principles of the Constitution than them. We agreed that there should be a uniform rule of naturalization—a uniform rule in New Jersey an in Michigan, in Delaware and in Illinois. But is the rule now uniform? No. And if the other States should proceed after the example set by Illinois and Michigan, we shall soon have as many rules as there are States. I am not willing that such an unconstitutional and pernicious doctrine shall pass without giving it my condemnation. I insist that it is a violation of the Constitution. Read the powers granted in that instrument to Congress, and see if, where similar language is used, the power is not always exclusive. This point has been brought before the Supreme Court, and there was no dissentient voice in regard to it. I dread the consequences of this doctrine, more especially when I see such a bill as this, tempting aliens to come, giving them our lands, that the States may make them citizens. I am not willing that the members of the House of Representatives shall represent aliens, for in process of time aliens may come to be a majority, and may choose my Chief Magistrate. This law may make them so numerous in Wisconsin and Iowa as to control your native vote, and make laws for your States. I will not leave it to one State to say that they shall be permitted thus to control the general interests of all the States. Whom may not some of the States make citizens? Cast your eyes in certain directions, and you can readily see what might be done. And recollect that the moment a State has pronounced a man a citizen, the shield of the Constitution is placed over him for his protection, and he must be protected as a citizen, every where: in all the States. I entreat gentlemen to pause before they establish this doctrine. For myself, I will not hold out inducements either to our own citizens or to aliens to come and take possession of our public lands. It is a proposition obnoxious to the laws and to the Constitution, and to all the fundamental principles of our Government and Union, and I must resist it. I am willing foreigners shall come and enjoy all the privileges which I do—I am willing to have them as neighbors and as friends, and let them stand by our side in battle—but they must cease to be aliens first.

My doctrine in regard to these lands is simple—neither clothed in mystery nor connected with party politics. We have a great inheritance for us, our children, and our children's children. We ought to preserve it, not give it away or waste it. The hasty disposition of it is not demanded by our condition. Our population and our strength will not grow in proportion to our haste to part with it. We should have had our sixteen millions of citizens, if Wisconsin and Iowa had not been thrown open to intrusion. We should not have had a population so near the Rocky mountains and the Pacific, but we should have had less cause for the expenditure of money, and more vigor to resist a foe. Let us remember a maxim of wisdom—festina lente—and not throw over a region which we cannot command, a population which we cannot, without distress and difficulty, protect. Let us give to enterprise and to the pioneer all that enterprise and the pioneer may reasonably require, but let us reserve something for the citizens of the old States, who, when population crowds, may there seek competency and a home. The seaboard States are thickening in the future years—and years with nations are but as days to individuals—they will be crowded, dense, requiring an outlet, like the compact regions of Europe. Let it be found West—far West—but still within the boundaries of a common empire of free institutions. Use these lands liberally, not wantonly—preserve, do not squander them. Let the citizen of the old States, who bought them, look to them as the heritage of his children. Thus used, they will strengthen the Union, and last while centuries of liberty roll by.

REMARKS OF MR. HUNT,

OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, February 22, 1841—

In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill, in reference to the proposition submitted by him on the 18th of that month.

Mr. HUNT said that gentlemen having made a motion which overrode the one submitted by him on Thursday last, defined their positions and discussed, at length, matters and things in general and that motion being now withdrawn, after having answered the purpose designed by it, the question recurred upon his own proposition, which was, to strike out the proviso of the section under consideration. His proposition was a plain, matter of fact, business one, and the remarks he had now to submit were of an unpretending, business character. Time had been, at a former period of the session, when he had felt desirous of giving, somewhat at large, his views in relation to the course of policy of the present Administration, the present condition of the country and its finances, and our future prospects; the opportunity to do so had not been given him, and he felt that the time for such discussion had now gone by.

The chairman of the Ways and Means, in undertaking to reply to the grounds upon which he had based the motion, had been more oracular, and, as it seemed to him, (Mr. H.) less ingenious than was his wont. With an apparent air of triumph, he had asked, how the gentleman from New York (Mr. H.) could claim to be a friend of retrenchment and reform, while submitting his proposition to strike out the proviso of the bill? How gentlemen could, on this floor, support such a proposition, (as the one to strike out,) with the fact before them, that the clerk of the Federal Court in the city of New York had received $18,000 per annum; the district attorney of the Southern district of New York $28,000 a year; and the marshal of Mississippi $87,000 a year?

And all this (said Mr. H.) was put to the committee and to the country as news, as information communicated to this House for the first time by the chairman of the Ways and Means, when most of it had been in possession of gentlemen for near a twelvemonth past.

He (Mr. H.) had, on a former occasion, stated that he had in his own mind doubted whether he had not better leave the former part of the proviso standing, that part requiring quarterly returns of the amount of fees and emoluments, with a view of guiding future legislation; but upon reflection he had felt satisfied that sufficient information had already been received to enable a committee to correct these flagrant abuses. He had stated, in all sincerity, that should he be spared to take his seat in the 27th Congress, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would find him, (Mr. H.) if not in advance, at least by the side of the gentleman in every legitimate work of legitimate reform. And he should redeem the pledge thus given. Retrenchment and reform were called for by the people—the doctrine was a cardinal one with the incoming Administration. But to correct all the abuses of an Administration that, for twelve years past, had been squandering the money of the nation in support of parasites and favorites, in demoralizing the country and breaking down its institutions, was a work, not of a moment, but of patience, labor, and time.

The chairman had said that you have an example of the sort of connection proposed by the proviso in your custom houses and your land offices—that the officers of these establishments receive by way of compensation a per centage on the revenues collected and the amount of land sales. Be it so. Yet a very little reflection would convince the worthy chairman that the cases bore no analogy to each other, and that the practice of Government, in relation to the collectors of customs and the land offices, went but a very little way, if any, towards answering the objections urged by him (Mr. H.) to the proviso in question. Your lands are sold at the minimum Government price of a dollar and a quarter per acre. The hardy pioneer, the actual settler, and the land-shark, the speculator, must pay this amount, whether the receiving or collecting officers receive any compensation or not. That Government chooses to pay its collecting officers by giving them a per centage on the amounts collected, adds not a farthing to the burdens of the purchaser, or to the price of the lands. Precisely so is it with the customs. The duties imposed from public policy, for protection, for countervailing the action of foreign Governments, or, as Southern gentlemen perhaps will prefer stating it, for revenue alone, are to be paid at all events. And the burden to the tax payer is not increased by giving a compensation to the officer from the gross amount collected.

Not so with the district attorneys. With the exception of a salary of $200 allowed most of them, their compensation was made up of fees, increased by the increase of business done by them. The chairman had said these fees were too large. Mr. H. had said the same, when he originally submitted his proposition. He had said the amounts received were entirely disproportioned to the labor rendered; and whilst he would allow to public officers a liberal compensation—one which would command the talent and worth of the country—he would cheerfully unite in any well devised plan for relieving the people, and thus reducing the amount received by these Federal officers.

But the original bill proposes no relief to the unfortunate suitor—to the class of men, of all others, least able to bear excessive burdens. No; so that Government may but replenish coffers emptied by its own extravagance and profligacy, the poor may continue to struggle on under the load of excessive impositions. And this is the practical operation of the chairman's ideas of reform—of retrenchment. A fair exponent of the doctrine preached on the house tops, and believed by a confiding people twelve years ago—not a principle of which has been carried out.

Passing from the bill, as reported by the committee, and looking for a moment to the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. THOMSON,] in connection with the other proposition coming from the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CAVE JOHNSON,] other and insuperable objections present themselves. Mr. H. had no objection to the proposition to place the Federal officers on the same footing with those of the respective States—let the tariff of fees be the same for both classes; but the two propositions alluded to, and which gentlemen of the Administration, in their new-born zeal in the cause of economy, had the power to establish, would produce the result of levying a duty for the Treasury of perhaps 50,000 dollars from the marshal in the State of Mississippi, by one scale of State fees, and only 10,000 dollars from the same officer in the State of New York by another and totally different scale of fees. And this system of imposition of duties, excises, or taxes, call it by what name you please, was at war with the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution; that section provides that the Congress shall have power—

"1st. To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States."

The want of uniformity was of itself a sufficient objection, in his mind, to the course of legislation now proposed. This course was also, in his opinion, (though he did not profess to be very learned in rules of order,) opposed to all orderly legislation. It was thrusting into a simple appropriation bill provisions changing existing laws in reference to an important class of officers; provisions hastily propounded amidst the hurry of debate, without consultation, without deliberation, and but ill calculated, in his judgment, to effect any beneficial object. If this sort of legislation was to be tolerated, we must, ere long, look into the Appropriation bill for the civil department for all the important provisions which are to regulate the conduct of the federal officers of the Government. But he had not placed his objection mainly on the ground of order. He barely noticed that ground as worthy, he thought, of grave consideration.

The true remedy for the difficulties under which the country had for years labored in reference to the officers included in the bill in committee was, coolly, deliberately, and understandingly to frame a distinct bill making them salary officers, having reference to their location and the business done by them, as ascertained by an examination of a series of years; or by a fee bill, governed in its graduation by the same considerations; and not to institute a partnership between this Government and its officers, in an income wrung from the poor, and that, too, by provisions such as, in his opinion, would, in their result, leave the Government in some of the States without Marshals, Clerks, or District Attorneys.

Men fit for the stations would not take them under the operations of the proposed amendments

DEBATE ON THE TREASURY NOTE BILL.

SPEECH OF MR. W. C. JOHNSON,

OF MARYLAND,

In the House of Representatives, February 5, 1841—

On the bill providing for an issue of Treasury notes.

The bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes to the amount of five millions of dollars being under consideration, and Mr. BARNARD of New York having moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, giving notice that, if the motion prevailed, and a report to that effect should be made to the House, he would then offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the subject of making provision for the wants of the Treasury be referred back to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions—

First. To bring in a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow ten millions of dollars on the credit of the Government, and to issue bonds or scrip therefor.

Second. To bring in a bill imposing duties for additional revenue on wines, silks, linens, spices, and other articles, being luxuries, imported into the United States; but in such manner as not to conflict with the principles, policy, and spirit of the act of March, 1833, commonly called "the Compromise Act."

After Mr. ADAMS had concluded his animated speech,

Mr. WILLIAM COST JOHNSON of Maryland rose and obtained the floor, but was requested by Mr. WISE to yield it for a short explanation.

Mr. WISE having concluded his remarks in response to Mr. ADAMS,

Mr. JOHNSON proceeded by saying that his purpose in gaining the floor was not to continue the exciting and personal discussion. When the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] yielded the floor to him for an instant, he had, if he might be allowed to use the cant expression of the day, defined his position; and he doubted not that it was fully comprehended, notwithstanding the intended sarcastic remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts. He would, however, say that it gave him no distress of mind to be classed with those who thought that their character and their honor were worth being preserved and protected. Whilst the gentleman rebuked, with so much severity, the consequences which grow out of personal discussions and assaults, who was there so fond as himself in generating what he denounced? In the whole range of his observation, (Mr. J. said,) he knew of no one who seemed more to take as a model and a study the striking characteristic of "Tam O'Shanter's wife" than that gentleman—"of nursing his wrath to keep it warm." He did not envy, nor would he discuss the propriety or morality of, such a course; but would proceed briefly to explain his main object in claiming the attention of the committee.

[Mr. P. F. THOMAS here asked Mr. JOHNSON to give way for a motion that the committee should rise. Mr. J. said he would as willingly conclude what he had to say that evening as in the morning; but, as he was willing to consult the pleasure of the committee, he would yield the floor the motion. The motion was made and the committee rose.]

The next day, when the House went into committee, Mr. JOHNSON resumed and said that his purpose, when he reached the hall this morning, was to occupy not more than five or ten minutes of the time of the committee, and then to move that the committee should rise and report the bill and amendments to the House, but he found the House had resolved to continue the discussion in the committee until seven o'clock this evening. He would still, however, be very brief and general in his remarks, as he had prepared no data, and it was the farthest from his purpose to make a set speech. He should not do so because he had, from the commencement, been opposed to the scope of the whole discussion. He was opposed to it, because he foresaw, or thought he foresaw, in its ineptness, that there was no object of public and permanent good to be attained—that the whole discussion was thrown open merely for argumentation. He believed from the beginning of the session, that the party which controls in this hall—the Administration party proper—meant to do nothing, studiously intended to do nothing, of a salutary and useful character, beyond the necessity of passing the usual appropriation bills. That they meant to adopt no measure of general relief for the suffering country—were for allowing the session to pass through in profitless debate, and were for throwing the whole responsibility of every public measure on the Administration which is quickly to succeed them. Under this full and firm conviction he was unwilling to trespass on the attention of the committee, or waste time which might much more properly be devoted to the consideration of private bills, and measures which could not be tortured into party questions. But if there was one solitary member of the committee, of either of the two great political parties, who believed it to be the intention of the committee to act definitely on the question before them—on any great measure of public policy—any general system of finance—any enduring and abiding measure of national utility, he should be most happy to know who that member was, and he would acknowledge he had done that member at least injustice in forming the conclusion to which he had arrived. If (said Mr. J.) I thought that this committee meant or intended to take up for final action the great questions of the day, I should be among the first and the most anxious to see it done, and if my public duty should admonish me to give my views, I should do it most cheerfully.

Mr. J. said he would not go into a discussion of the bill immediately before the committee, in relation to issuing of Treasury notes, because he had given his views on the subject in sessions gone by. At the extra session of Congress, he was the first who gave his opinions on the subject, and he did not feel disposed to renew or repeat them. It was enough to say that he had from the commencement opposed the whole plan and system of Treasury notes. He had voted, at the extra session of Congress, and subsequently, against the emission of Treasury notes, and meant to do so again. No amendment of the bill could elicit his support or vote for it. He went against the measure then because he thought it unconstitutional, and he had seen nothing, heard nothing, to change his opinion. If he had a doubt upon his mind as to the power, he should not vote for the measure, because the Constitution points out two other remedies for every emergency to which the Government is subject in its fiscal operations. It is declared in the Constitution that Congress shall have the power to borrow money and to raise revenue from customs. He would go for a direct loan to meet the instant emergency; he would have gone for it at the extra session, and he would go heart and hand for a modification of the revenue laws, that the revenue of the Government might be made adequate to meet the liabilities of the nation. He would most cheerfully advocate and support these two measures, at the same moment and in the same bill. But, as he had avowed his belief that the Administration meant to do nothing for the permanent policy of the nation, he was willing that the responsibility should fall on the Administration in relation to the measures which it may either carry forward or omit; and he would not leap in advance of this Administration to place himself in the van of the next. He should let this Administration pass through all its course, do its own work, as it has power to do, in its own way, and, when the next comes into power, it can take its latitude and departure—can move forward with a knowledge of the past, and with a full hope of the future to speed it.

Mr. J. said he was not in his seat when the discussion commenced, and had not heard two or three speeches made early in the debate; yet, in relation to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. BARNARD,) who had moved to strike out the enacting clause in the bill, for the purpose of offering an amendment, which is now on the table, to wit, that revenue shall be raised by a duty on luxuries, taking the precaution not to interfere with the compromise act, whilst he would not go into a discussion of the question, even thus presented, he would give an opinion so far as to say that he would, with great cheerfulness, vote for it. But he did not expect to be called on to do this, for the committee would never take a vote on the subject; or, if it went to the House, it would never be passed upon at this session. But, having alluded to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, he felt called upon, as an act of justice to him, to say, that an imputation made the other day, that the plan was concocted in the dark, was a subtle and canvassed scheme, the result of caucus or hidden deliberation; that it was a secret spring to entrap the South, for the purpose of imposing a high tariff of protection, was, in every respect, unfounded and groundless. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] had submitted his proposition to him, and he [Mr. JOHNSON] had candidly given him his opinion, which was, that it would be useless and nugatory, that it might lead to discussion, but no could be anticipated from it, as there would be no vote taken; and the gentleman declared at the time, that he would move it as his own individual opinion, and that he meant, whilst on the floor, to debate it as his own proposition.

Mr. HUNT of New York here rose, and Mr. JOHNSON gave way for a moment.

Mr. HUNT said he had desired speaking upon the bill now in committee, but had hitherto failed in getting the floor; and after the order which had been read this morning, to take the bill out of committee at seven this evening, he did not feel any disposition to struggle further for the floor—he could not undertake to speak by a stop watch. He would, therefore, now only say a word in reference to a prominent topic introduced in this debate. He alluded to the tariff. And his sole object was to disabuse, so far as in his power, Southern gentlemen whom he felt confident wished not to deceive themselves or others on this subject. Mr. H. said he represented one of the largest, wealthiest, and most flourishing manufacturing districts in the State of New York, and he wished to say for that district and himself, that amongst the intelligent and patriotic men of that district engaged in manufactures, there was no disposition nor desire to interfere in the slightest degree with the spirit of the compromise act. In the revision of our tariff laws, which must soon (at all events) take place in reference to the revenues necessary to carry on the Government, his constituents would desire nothing which the patriotic statesmen of the South would themselves consider objectionable.

Mr. JOHNSON continued. He was very glad to have heard the remarks which had just fallen from the honorable gentleman from New York, although his allusion was to a different gentleman from that State. He was especially happy to hear what had been said, as it convinced him the more in what he was about to say to those of his friends from the South who have been so extremely captious on the question of the tariff, that they have done the mover of the proposition alluded to injustice, and he believed that whole region of country injustice. But while he had doubted the advantage of introducing the proposition at this time, he would say, as one living south of Mason and Dixon's line, that he approved of the measure—thought it wise and statesmanlike; and if he thought the committee was in a temper and mood to go into an examination of the merits of the question, he would offer an argument in its support. He differed from some of his Southern friends, who were so excited on the question. He differed from them—first in principle, and next in policy. He differed from them in principle, because he thought the whole entire question one proper and fit to be talked about, to be discussed, reasoned on, examined, and decided upon. He thought it fit and proper, in the Legislature of the nation, that all questions of political consideration—all questions of vast national moment, if within the scope and jurisdiction of Congress, should be calmly met and deliberately discussed. He differed with many of his Southern friends in the policy of their course, because, as the weakest portion of the Union in numbers, they should not force a collision with the North when the North has shown no disposition to urge a protective tariff, and is willing that the spirit of the compromise should be the basis of a new adjustment of the revenue laws. Are not the apprehensions of some Southern gentlemen appeased by the disclaimer made the other day by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] and by a similar disclaimer just made by the gentleman from New York? Let it be remembered that these gentlemen represent the strongest and most opulent manufacturing districts in their respective States. They have both stated that the alarm which has been sounded is unfounded, and that they are willing to meet the South on a proposition in conformity with the Compromise act; and if the people of the South say that they prefer a revenue adequate to the wants of the Government shall be raised by a tax on luxuries, not interfering with the compromise act, they are willing, and will go hand and heart with them. This has all been said, and yet we find gentlemen on this floor not only endeavoring to fan up the fires which have been exhausted in years gone by, but absolutely to fret the cold ashes into heat and flames.

Mr. J. said he would again ask those gentlemen who commend this course of action, whether, as Southern men, they are either wise or judicious in thus trying to force the people of the North into collision? What pretence had they to do so, when the North said to them, adopt your own plan and we will go with you? Is there a State in the whole South which can ask more than this? Is there one that is so anxious for strife as to hoist the war-flag when it has no enemy to encounter?

Mr. J. said he had not been present when the debate commenced, having been detained from the House by indisposition. The first speech which he had heard was from his friend from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON.] It was as speech so replete with argument, yet so simple and clear in itself—so full of practical wisdom—that he subscribed most cheerfully to its temper and its reasoning. He would not attempt to repeat the arguments, because it would be but to weaken and dilute them; and to dwell upon their force would be but to turn the prism to give varied tints and more blended hues to the primitive colors, without adding to their number or their beauty. He heard the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. NISBET,] in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RHEAT,] and to his system of direct taxation. His arguments, also, were complete and conclusive; and, as a Southern man, he most cordially gave his assent to them—both to their spirit and their letter. They had been attempted to be met, but not in the spirit in which they were offered, nor on their merits—but had been tortured by every gentleman who had attempted to answer them. First, by assuming that the argument was in favor of a tariff of protection, which on the contrary it repudiated; and, secondly, by asserting that the North wished to force a high protective tariff upon the South, which the Northern members openly, and again and again, have disavowed. Failing to excite others, gentlemen have themselves become excited; but he would predict that the excitement would be confined to that hall. It would meet with no response from the reflux voice of public opinion. Gentlemen warn the South to be alarmed. Why? for what? Because the Northern members say, in adjusting a great national question, they wish to consult with the South. Is this more than they have a right to do? Is it more than they ought to do? Yet are we appealed to to stand by our arms—to attack we know not whom, and to fight for we know not what! He had himself, in the short course of his life, met with so many real dangers, that he could not afford to be so prodigal of his courage as to expend much of it upon intangible, if not imaginary, difficulties. He could not return home among his constituents and awaken the echoes of his native mountain with the bugle note of alarm, or excite the peaceful and industrious inhabitants of the rich vales and green slopes with forebodings of evil. Were he to do so, they would regard him as wild as "the goat upon the hills." The time was when the South was excited on the question of the tariff, partly by the measure itself, and partly from political considerations—there was great hostility to the measure, and no little to its advocates. In that excitement, other questions and other interests were merged, for perhaps he ought not to say sacrificed. The great grain-growing and tobacco-growing interests of his own region were lost sight of in a discussion for years about raw cotton and manufactured fabrics. It was then said, if you will but destroy this onerous and oppressive measure of Government—if you will also quite destroy the odious and frightful monster, the Bank of the United States, we, who have been crushed into the dust, as my friend from Georgia [Mr. ALFORD] said the other day, the cotton interest, will revive—Southern hopes and Southern prosperity will then bloom again—the cotton interest will rear up its drooping head amidst the deluge of national oppression, and another Eden will present itself bright and joyous—the whole South will be made rich, wealthy, and prosperous.

Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. JOHNSON,) I must be pardoned if, in making these hurried remarks, I draw the memory of the committee, and especially those from the cotton-growing region, for one instant, back to the state of things which existed at the time to which I have alluded, and which have since occurred.

[Mr. ALFORD, of Georgia, here rose, and asked his friend from Maryland to give way, to enable him to offer a word of explanation. My friend (said Mr. A.) having alluded to me, I embrace this opportunity to make a short explanation. I am truly gratified to see the spirit of compromise that prevails here this morning, in regard to the tariff question, and to see our Northern friends agree to commit themselves to the Compromise. And I would ask the gentleman from Maryland, with all his contempt for what some others from the South have said, what he thinks it is that has produced this spirit of compromise in this House? The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] certainly made a strong remark in regard to a protective tariff, when he said he hoped this nation would make such a tariff as would afford some protection to the manufacturer of the North. That was and is strong language, and the gentleman from Maryland will certainly admit the fact, even now published in his printed explanation in the National Intelligencer, while every word of mine and of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] has been suppressed. I again say, I am happy to see the spirit which prevails here now; and if gentlemen had committed themselves at first as distinctly as now, it would have spared me the trouble of saying one word. And I stated, as the gentleman from Maryland will remember, that the productions of his district are very different from those of mine.

Mr. BARNARD desired the gentleman from Maryland to allow him the floor for one moment. He said it was not of any great consequence to repeat what he had already stated; but, as recently the whole course of debate has tended to a misapprehension of what he had at first said in reference to the bill, he would now say that, during the whole course of his remarks on that occasion, he did not utter one word in the least degree inconsistent with the remarks made yesterday—not one word—and he would beg leave to read a single sentence from those remarks:

"I hope that duties on imports will be so imposed—preserving, as I hope may be done, without sacrificing any great national interest, the policy of the Compromise Act. That, while we shall have revenue enough to meet the economical wants of Government, the rich shall not escape taxation by receiving their luxuries free of duties, the poor shall be relieved from undue and heavy burdens, and the industry of the country shall be protected from the injurious policy and measures of foreign legislation."

These remarks (continued Mr. BARNARD) are reported with great accuracy, and the only one is given in which, speaking of the future and not of the present, a misconstruction could arise; yet, upon this slight foundation, had a mountain of misapprehension been reared.

Mr. JOHNSON said he should not go into any investigation of the fact whether the disclaimer of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] to which he had alluded, was made before or subsequent to the speech of his worthy friend from Georgia. His impression was, that the disclaimer was made prior to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. ALFORD.]

Mr. CUSHING begged leave to say that it was correct, as has been suggested; that his remarks were made prior to those of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, and whilst up he would add, that there might be no misunderstanding in regard to his remarks, that whatever might be the precise meaning of the Compromise act, was a very serious question, much mooted in that House. As to this, he said nothing: of course, saying nothing as to what may be the precise import of the Compromise act, he could not have undertaken to say, and did not now say, whether he adhered to it as a specific compact. What he then said, what he now says, is, that he was for pursuing a spirit of moderation, compromise, and conciliation on this subject, and did not ask, as had been stated, for an extravagant protective tariff.

Mr. ALFORD said: He alluded more particularly to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HUNT,] who had but recently given an explanation.

Mr. JOHNSON resumed, and said he should not yield the floor again, unless some remark which he might make should render an explanation necessary; but he would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he would permit him, whether, by his present remarks, he meant to qualify or vary his remarks made the other day, and published in the Intelligencer?

Mr. CUSHING said: In no respect, in either letter or spirit.

Mr. LINCOLN said: My colleague speaks for his constituents, and not mine.

Mr. JOHNSON continued. That the original proposition of the gentleman from New York may be distinctly understood, he would ask the Clerk to read that portion of it which alludes to the plan of raising revenue, and to the Compromise act. It was then read as follows:

"Second. To bring in a bill imposing duties for additional revenue on wines, silks, linens, and spices, and other articles, being luxuries, imported into the United States, but in such manner as not to conflict with the principles, policy, and spirit of the act of March, 1833, commonly called the Compromise Act."

Mr. JOHNSON said that his object in requiring the reading of the proposition was to revive the recollection of the committee, and show that there was no hidden mystery in it, no plan or object to create a high tariff, or to disturb the legitimate intention of the Compromise act; and though the interruptions which he had encountered for explanations had kept him much longer on the floor than he expected or desired, yet he must express his gratification at the frank avowal of his friend from Georgia, [Mr. ALFORD,] and was pleased to find that that gentleman's apprehensions were removed since he had first taken the floor. He disclaimed any purpose to excite feeling or prejudice in any quarter of the Union, and if any thing he had said had been felt, it was not owing to the temper or motive in which it had been uttered, but to the truth of the remark itself. No one approved, Mr. J. said, more than he did, of the zeal with which the gentleman from Georgia always defended his position and the interests of his State; but the very feelings which actuated him should convince him that the right of opinion and discussion should be allowed to other gentlemen who represented other interests on this floor—interests which were not antagonistic, but far more harmonious and homogeneous than some members believed. His object in inviting attention to the past was to understand better the present, so that the policy of the Government could be wisely directed to the future. It was for that purpose alone that he had alluded to the state of facts which had existed but a few years ago, and the arguments then urged. These he wished to contrast with the present state of things, and desired that gentlemen would reconcile and explain them, so that he might vote understandingly, and conceive aright the existing and future course of policy to be pursued in legislating for the whole country. To this end, and with this view, he was going to show, when he was interrupted by his friend from Georgia, [Mr. ALFORD,] that at the time of the high excitement, a few years ago, in the South, we had a National United States Bank and a tariff—that it was then urged that these were the causes of great oppression to the cotton-growing interests. Now the facts which he wished to present were those drawn from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in 1836, on the subject of cotton, by resolution of Congress, and from Fortune's stocks. In 1801, the amount of cotton exported from the United States was about twenty-one millions of pounds, and it gradually increased until 1836, when it amounted to four hundred and twenty-two or three millions of pounds. For the greater portion of that time the bank existed and the tariff was in force, and during all that long period, with all the vicissitudes of commercial fluctuation and misfortune—all the incidents of exchanges and currency, the Secretary of the Treasury informs Congress that the average price of cotton was, from 1801 to 1836, sixteen cents per pound. He also states that, at ten cents per pound, the culture of cotton afforded a good profit to the producer, and the authority to which he had referred will show that, within that period, after paying all the expenses of labor and production and investment, over and beyond a profitable regular business, at ten cents per pound, the cotton planters realized a profit of upwards of sixty millions of pounds sterling.

But the United States Bank has been destroyed, the tariff has almost entirely faded away by the graduating Compromise act, and how stands the price of cotton now? Has it averaged since 1836 sixteen cents per pound? Does it sell at this moment for half that price? We all know that it does not. Mr. J. said he would be pleased if some gentleman would explain the cause of the present low price of that important staple. Can they reconcile the present low prices with the sophistry of "the forty bales theory."

[Mr. THOMPSON of Mississippi here said that he wished to call the attention of the gentleman from Maryland to the price of cotton between 1828 and 1833.]

Mr. JOHNSON responded, that it was not his purpose to dwell on details, but he spoke of general propositions and manifest facts. He knew that the price of cotton varied between those years, and that it varied between the year 1801 and 1836; that sometimes it rose as high as twenty-five and thirty cents; but he was speaking of the average price as given by the Secretary of the Treasury. He was anxious to see conclusions drawn by others from the facts which he had presented, as these facts forcibly impressed his mind with the belief that the question of revenue should be settled by calm reason, and not by impassioned declamation, addressed to the fears rather than to the understanding of the committee. He did not mean to urge a protective tariff, but was most strenuously opposed to a system of direct taxation on the part of the General Government, and the only plan to obviate it was to raise revenue from importations. He was free to avow that he was in favor of such a modification of the revenue laws as would supply sufficient means to support all the legitimate wants of the Government. As a Southern man, he was unwilling that the interests of the South should be made subservient to the rapid growth of the prosperity of the North, but he had no apprehensions of this nature. The factories of the North stand on existing laws, and are sufficiently protected and established to go on themselves, without legislative protection. The manufactures of the North, who are well established, desire no protective tariff—they are too sagacious to request it—because it would invite competition, and bring new capital and labor to compete with them. The increased supply would produce increased competition in the market, and the consequences, which always follow, of reduced prices. They know this, and will not ask you for a high protective tariff. The next proposition for the aid of the Government to protect manufactures will come, not from the north of Maryland, but from the south, if it come at all—from the hills of Virginia, from the iron and coal regions. The people of those regions may in time begin to examine whether it would not be better for their interests to encourage the establishment of factories at home than to depend upon the workshops of Europe—rather than pay for the labor of the North, the profits of the manufacturer, the charge of transportation, and the gains of the wholesale and retail merchant. These inquiries may arise in those regions of the South where the raw material is in a state of crude nature—where the water courses are not as yet interrupted, as at the North, by factories, but where they flow on to the bosom of the ocean, as unimpeded as when the morning star first rejoiced in the east. You may find that the people of Virginia, ay, even Virginia, may see in time that they should like to be placed under the same protection that other portions of the country have been—that they should like to see all the dormant capital quickened into power and usefulness. He should not urge them to ask a protective tariff; for while the interests of the North do not require it, the feelings of the South are not ready for it.

Mr. J. said he believed the people of the South were in advance of their politicians. The cotton region may find that Texas, with her genial climate and fertile soil, may enter into formidable competition in the cotton market; and they who are now so loud against protection, may look with more calmness on questions of political economy. He had seen factories of cotton at Lynchburg, and manufacturing establishments at Richmond. The coal, iron, and water power contiguous may yet develop untold wealth. Coal and iron in its vicinity gives Wales its wealth and prosperity; and what American but frets that this nation should pay to England alone, during the last ten years, eighty-five millions of dollars for the single article of iron? an amount equal to what the President, computes to be the entire amount of gold and silver in this country, though he did not believe there were fifty millions of specie in the nation at this time. That the cotton interest in the South is depressed is most true, and no one was more anxious than himself to see it flourish. But direct taxation would not accelerate its embarrassment, because, by the Constitution, the slaveholding region would have most to pay. The gold mines of the South give but little wealth to the nation, and he was the last man to urge a people to be gold hunters. When Spain abandoned her workshops, and expelled the Moors, who were her best mechanics, she built up factories, with bordering nations, which gave them wealth in commerce and men in war. The immense amount of bullion which was brought her by the discovery of the new world, and her extended commerce, could not make her independent; all the gold and silver which her colonists dug up, and all the bullion which was extorted from her conquered provinces, were insufficient to pay other nations for those very luxuries and articles with which she once supplied all Europe; and, gradually degenerating from that time, Spain has become what she is now—the crumbling corner of a once mighty empire. What was the best mode of supplying the wants of the Government, was the true question to be considered. Other questions which might arise were incidental—the balance of trade for instance, involving in itself the question of currency. He would not go into an examination of these, because he wanted information as to the condition of the Treasury, and no one could give him that knowledge, for no two agreed upon the subject. He would not take a step in the dark, and while he had no light he would pause. When a proposition for protection, direct or incidental, shall be presented, it will be time enough to discuss it; but he was free to confess that he was anxious to see agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, advance hand in hand in this nation. We cannot be prosperous without their high advancement; and he believed that time would prove that manufactures were as important to the South as to the North. In the South, they would give greater independence in time of peace, and in time of commotion within, or war without, they would give the assurance of protection to our institutions. Even in Eutopia, where its best wisdom is borrowed from Plato's Commonwealth, Sir Thomas Moore, in this beau idéal of a happy people, would have them till the land and pursue the mechanic arts by turns, shifting the population in regular rotation from town to country. He would have the whole people acquainted with mechanics and the useful arts.

Mr. J. said he had been in Canada, and seen the system of colonial dependence—a dependence which showed poverty, ignorance, and stupidity in the people, when contrasted with those of the States. He had seen the whip-saw used beside the waterfall of the St. Lawrence, where five hundred dollars would have built a complete saw-mill; and so in all other matters, and why? Because the mother country did not countenance manufactories in Canada. It was the same policy which she had pursued towards these States when colonies; every effort was made to stifle the genius and curb the enterprise of the people. Manufactures of all kinds were discouraged, and every thing was to be procured from the workshops of the mother country. To foster and encourage her manufactures at home—to find employment for her surplus population—to afford her the means and articles of traffic, the policy was, as it now is, and ever will be, to make her colonists believe that every article of comfort, every instrument of art, and every implement of industry, could be made cheaper and better in the mother country; and thus the colonists, continuing the mere producers of the raw material, should remain forever tributaries—tributaries to an exaction from which no industry, no patient labor, could relieve them.

Mr. J. said he would not discuss the power of the Government to give protection, nor would he discuss the policy of such an exercise of power; it was unnecessary; but reverting to what had occurred in the past history of this country, and what might be its future policy, he would remind gentlemen, and particularly his Virginia friends, that the first movement in reference to the encouragement of domestic manufactures was from Virginia; and that Mr. Madison had urged it, as was shown by his friend from New York, [Mr. MONROE,] who had read the preamble of the second law passed by Congress, prepared and written by that sage statesman; and he would further remind them that Mr. Jefferson, in 1816, in a letter to Mr. Austin, repudiated the views he entertained when the Notes on Virginia were first published; and advancing, as he says, with his country, declared that, to be independent for the comforts of life, we must fabricate them ourselves; we must place the manufacturer by the side of the agriculturist; and, further, that experience had taught him that manufactures are as necessary to our independence as to our comfort.

Mr. J. said his own devotion to the interests of the South rested on more than mere professions, and he had given such evidences of this as no one would question. He had but alluded to certain facts and circumstances to admonish his Southern friends not to force collisions that were unnecessary, and to avoid excitements when they were unproductive of good in any quarter. He had been constrained, on more than one occasion, to request gentlemen from the South to speak for themselves and for their constituents, and not, in the benevolence of their nature, to take the whole South under their especial charge. He was not annoyed, but often amused, when some member from that region rose and spoke as if he were armed with the thunder of Jove, to threaten, command, or destroy—when such member would draw the circle of the South as contracted as possible around himself, so as to make himself the centre—the peculiar representative of the South. It reminded him of a Mandarin in some Chinese circular battery, which has bristling cannon pointed in every direction, but the commander, filled with apprehension on the appearance of the first sail, without waiting to see whether it be a harmless merchantman or a ship of war, orders a general fire, when a loud discharge will ensue; the balls flying in every direction, seldom reaching the enemy, and often doing great injury to friends around. He regretted to find that members were anxious to draw a distinction among the Whigs—of Republican and National Republican Whigs. He could perceive no beneficial object in it. Such gentlemen should remember that General Jackson was a high tariff man; Mr. Van Buren was also ultra on that question. And, if he might be allowed to make the allusion to a gentleman who often alluded to him in debate, he would say that, if he was not mistaken, the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] had stated more than once on the floor that he was opposed to the tariff bill of 1828, and only signed it when President because he did not think it republican and proper to interpose his veto between the representatives of the people and the people themselves. Mr. J. was himself willing to share in the censure, if any might so regard it, which might be attached to those who had opposed Gen. Jackson, for he had never supported his pretensions to the Presidency, for one moment, in thought, word, or deed, and could repose quietly on his pillow with the reflection. It was most true that he had never assailed his military reputation, for he never had felt prouder than when, in his youth, he had stood upon the battle-field of New Orleans—that field where Gen. Jackson had won his proudest fame. He always rejoiced, as an American, in Jackson's martial renown, and wished the chaplet to be perennial which he had won in arms amid the savannas and morasses of the South. The military reputation of such men was the property of the nation, and he would be the last to have it tarnished. Thus, when he thought an assault had been made upon the reputation of the President elect, a few days ago, he rebuked it; and the ardor of his feelings must be his explanation to the House for the decided point of his remarks on the occasion.

Mr. J. then took a rapid glance at many questions which had been introduced in the discussion, and, among others, the question of distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States.

He said he would not discuss the question then, unless the friends of the bill just sent from the Senate, in relation to pre-emption and graduation, should be forced to vote upon it, which he did not expect after the postponement of the debate on his amendment to the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. REYNOLDS,] of a similar character. If he was disappointed in his opinion, he would be pleased if the friends of that measure would frankly so inform him, for he would use that opportunity to answer the arguments urged against the plan of distribution, and give the reasons which actuated him in advocating it. In the silence of the House, he would dismiss the subject without further remark; but, before he resumed his seat, he must be allowed to express dissent from the warm denunciation which had been made against the propriety of calling an extra session of Congress. He knew that arguments could be urged both for and against the measure; but it was not the time or the place for discussion. It was the business of the Executive to decide the question, from the facts which should come before him after the adjournment of Congress, and he would not interfere with the Executive duties. It was not the calling of the extra session that destroyed Mr. Van Buren's administration, but it was the manner of his approach to Congress, after he had convened them. He came with a threatened veto in one hand, and the Sub-Treasury in the other; and, having already the sword, virtually demanded of Congress to give him the purse also. The boldness and folly of such a course will be a lesson to every Executive in future, and the day will be far distant before such another blunder or act of temerity will be perpetrated. Instead of throwing himself upon the wisdom of Congress, after making his simple recommendation of measures, he was for dictating, unconditionally, to the representatives of the people. It became a war between Congress and the President, and the people took sides, as they always will, for the independence of their immediate representatives and agents. The people, in decreeing a change of men, decided that they wanted a change of policy. If Congress is not convened, the measures of the present Administration will continue in force for twelve or eighteen months longer. New books will be of little value or service unless they are placed in the hands of faithful bookkeepers; and books and bookkeepers are of but little consequence unless we have withal wise and practical legislation. The "statu quo" doctrine, he believed, was not what the Whigs had been contending for through a long series of anxious years. All business has been standing still long enough, and life, vigor, energy, confidence, should be infused by wise legislation and decisive Executive action, that the interests of the whole country may advance, with renewed impulse, to an enlarged prosperity.

He was as much opposed to embarrass the Executive which is quickly to supersede the present, as he was that the Executive should interfere improperly with the legislative rights and duties of this House. He was as little devoted to Executive power, influence, or patronage, as any one. He was glad that there had been a change of Executive functionaries, but he could not, like the mountain Swiss, chime his merry anthem at the setting sun, nor, like the devout Persian, prostrate himself before the rising. That the leading measures of the next Administration may be opposed by some who have aided to bring it into power, it is but natural to suppose; but he believed that, so anxious were the people to see a new order of things, of men and measures, that many of the most zealous in opposing the election of Gen. Harrison would honestly yield their support to such measures as they might be convinced would redound to the benefit of the country. He did not expect that mere politicians would do this, but men whose only interest and object were the prosperity of the nation and the advancement of the public welfare. For himself, at least, he would say, that he would pause long and anxiously before he would take any step or position to embarrass the coming Administration. But, should a sense of public duty even make such a course necessary, he trusted that the evidence of twelve years' continued opposition to the leading men and measures of the dominant party was proof enough that a long war neither tired his patience nor subdued his energy. He trusted, however, he should never be put to the test. He would indulge in no forebodings, anticipate no follies; for sufficient unto the day was the evil thereof. He had given his opinions of the Executive, and expressed his confidence in the Administration which was about to succeed. He should not change that opinion or abate that confidence without abundant cause.

REMARKS OF MR. EVERETT, OF VERMONT,

In the House of Representatives, Saturday, February 13, 1841—On the Report of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PICKENS having moved that the report be laid on the table and printed—

Mr. EVERETT said that, as the report embraced the case of the Caroline as well as that of McLeod, (which alone had been submitted,) he should move to print all the documents relating to both cases. They had been heretofore published, from time to time, as communicated to the House. He desired to bring them together on this occasion, to enable the House and the country duly to appreciate the report, and the measures taken by the Executive to preserve our neutrality. He thought that, since the affair of the Caroline, every thing had been done which the means within the control of the Executive enabled it to do. He then sent to the Chair a list of the documents, (House Doc. 25th Cong. 2d Sess. Nos. 64, 73, 74, from page 25 to the end; 76, 302, and of 26th Cong. 2d Sess. No. 33, of 28th Dec. 1840, and 4th Jan. 1841; the Neutrality Act of March 10, 1838, and the President's Proclamations of 5th Jan. and 21st Nov. 1838,) which he moved to have printed with the report.

Mr. EVERETT said that, but for the remarks of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, he should not have taken part in the debate. He now felt it due to himself, as a dissident member of that committee, to state, in part, the grounds of his dissent.

The report relates to matters of the gravest import, and which are now the subject of diplomatic discussion between the two Governments—a discussion confided by the Constitution to the Executive. He felt great embarrassment in debating subjects of this character and importance with open doors. It was difficult, if not impossible, to do full justice to the subject, or to ourselves, without danger of saying things that should not be heard beyond these walls. I yield, said he, to the restraint imposed by the time and the place. I shall endeavor to say nothing that should not be heard by all. In the committee-room there was no restraint. I said things there that I shall not say here. Perhaps I ought rather to congratulate myself on being now thus restricted, than to complain of it, as in some of my views I stood alone in the committee.

Sir, in my judgment the report is uncalled for—ill-timed—and a worse than useless interference with the duties of the Executive. The discussion is now pending between the two Governments. The documents were communicated merely in answer to a call of the House. The Executive has not asked either for its opinion or action. At this time, why should either be desired? And what is the time chosen to put forth the gratuitous opinions of the majority—and, as the honorable chairman has said, of a bare majority—of a political majority of the committee? One Administration is about going out of power. In twenty days it will expire, and another succeed. Without intending any disrespect to the majority of the committee, I ask, is it proper, is it decorous thus to attempt to embarrass the incoming Administration—to compromise its course on subjects so delicate—so important? The report is little short of an officious interference of one Administration with things that belong to another.

But, sir, without regard to a change of Administration, is this interference proper or useful? Our foreign relations are committed to the Executive. Negotiations can be conducted only by the Executive. When they are at an end, this House—both Houses must act. Congress alone can dictate the ulterior measures. I do not mean to say there are not cases in which either House may, pending a negotiation, express its opinions. If the Executive be remiss in his duty—if he pursue a course deemed wrong in principle, or dangerous in its consequences—or if the Executive seek its opinion, with a view to give effect to its measures, it may be very proper for either House to express it. But, sir, the report has none of these grounds for its support. It is entirely uncalled for, and its effect may be to compromise the Executive to a course that its better judgment would decline; and to produce an excitement in the country that may create additional embarrassments, and new obstacles to the final adjustment of our controversies with Great Britain.

I pass the discussive character of the report—its reference to subjects not referred—its (to me) somewhat exceptionable language—and come to the matter referred—the case of Alexander McLeod. That case, and that alone, was referred to the committee, and to that alone should the report have been confined. That case, though connected with the case of the Caroline, rests on different principles. The case of Mr. McLeod, as presented in the documents, is entirely separate and distinct from the question, whether the destruction of the Caroline was or was not justifiable.

I desired that no report should be made while the negotiations were pending between the two countries. In my opinion, no opinion or action of this House was, at this time, required. I will now read to the House a statement of the negotiations to this time, so far, and so far only, as is necessary to the case of McLeod—and to show that his case, as well as the Caroline, are now the subjects of diplomatic discussion between the two Governments. Before I sit down, I will also submit to the House the substitute submitted to, and rejected by, the committee. I will here take leave to say that I have given this subject the most careful consideration, without party views or party feelings. It is above and beyond all party considerations:

"THE CASE OF ALEXANDER McLEOD.—The facts material to the subject submitted to the committee are, that, on the night of the 26th December, 1837, a detachment of the British forces stationed at Chippewa, in the Province of Upper Canada, crossed the Niagara to Schlosser, in the State of New York, and there made a hostile attack on the steamboat Caroline, the property of an American citizen, killed and wounded a number of American citizens, captured the boat, towed her into the current, set her on fire, and sent her in flames over the falls.

"On the 5th January, 1838, the Secretary of State communicated to Mr. Fox, the British Minister, a copy of the evidence furnished to the Department of this extraordinary outrage, committed from her Britannic Majesty's Province of Upper Canada on the persons and property of citizens of the United States, within the jurisdiction of the State of New York; and stating that it would necessarily form the subject of a demand for redress upon her Majesty's Government."

"On the 6th February, Mr. Fox communicated to the Secretary of State a despatch from Sir Francis Head, Lieutenant Governor of Upper Canada, containing the distinct avowals, that the Caroline was destroyed by order of Colonel MacNab, commanding the militia in her Majesty's service, and that he (Sir Francis) approved the act.

"On the 22d May, Mr. Stevenson presented the subject to the consideration of her Majesty's Government. After referring to those avowals, he said that, 'under such circumstances, it was not to have been expected that the whole proceeding could be regarded by the Government of the United States in any other light than as a manifest act of hostile and daring aggression upon its rights and sovereignty, utterly inconsistent with all the principles of national law, and wholly irreconcilable with the friendly and peaceful relations of the two countries;' that the case, then, is one of open, undisguised, and unwarrantable hostility." He concludes by expressing 'the confident expectation of the President of the United States that the whole proceeding will not only be disavowed and disapproved, but that such redress as the nature of the case obviously requires will be promptly made.' To this our Government waits the final answer of the British Government.

"On the 13th November last, Alexander McLeod, a British subject, was arrested and imprisoned by the authorities of the State of New York, on a charge of arson and murder, as having been engaged in the capture and destruction of the Caroline.

On the 12th December the British Minister made a demand on the President for the release of Mr. McLeod, on the ground that the destruction of the Caroline was a public act of persons of her Majesty's service, obeying the orders of their superior authorities; and that the act, according to the usages of nations, can only be the subject of discussion between the two National Governments.

"To this demand the Secretary of State has replied that the President has no power under the Constitution and laws of the Union to interpose between McLeod and the constituted authorities of the State of New York—and that 'the President is not aware of any principle of international law, or indeed of reason or justice, which entitles such offenders to impunity before the legal tribunals, when coming voluntarily within their independent and undoubted jurisdiction, because they acted in obedience to their superior authorities, or because their acts have become the subject of diplomatic discussion between the two Governments.' And that 'if the destruction of the Caroline was a public act of persons in her Majesty's service, obeying the orders of their superior authorities, this fact has not been before communicated to the Government of the United States by a person authorized to make the admission; and it will be for the court which has cognizance of the offence with which Mr. McLeod is charged, to decide on its validity when legally established before it.'

"The British Minister, expressing his regret at the decision, had referred the subject to his Government."

This statement, I repeat, is limited to the case of McLeod.

The points in difference in this case, are, 1. Whether McLeod, having, in the destruction of the Caroline, acted in obedience to the orders of the superior authorities of the Province of Upper Canada, is or is not amenable to the laws of New York, as for the crimes of murder and arson; and 2. If not, whether the Executive has any power to interpose between him and the laws of New York.

On these questions I forbear expressing any opinion, in accordance with the view that none is required of the committee or of the House. It is sufficient for the justification of the ground I have taken, that these questions are now the subjects of diplomatic discussion between the two Governments. The impropriety of the report is the more manifest, from the consideration that the discussion is but just commenced; and it is not unreasonable to suppose that, on questions of such limited extent, the Government in the wrong may, by the further discussion, be convinced of its error. At least we should wait the reply of the British Government, to which the subject is referred, and the issue finally tendered by its Executive.

The consequence of an error on either side may compromise the peace of the country. In case of reprisals, executed to the extreme point, the intervention of all the powers of Europe could not prevent a war. In view of these consequences, it may be proper to review the correspondence, to ascertain the positions taken on both sides that bear on the case of McLeod.

Mr. Forsyth, in his note of the 5th January, carefully and properly avoids giving any national character to the destruction of the Caroline. He calls it an outrage "committed from her Britannic Majesty's Province of Upper Canada." He leaves it to Mr. Fox to determine whether it was a public or a private wrong, or to assume or disclaim for his Government the responsibility. Mr. Fox, in his reply, (6th Feb. 1838,) gives it a public character, by communicating the fact that it was destroyed by the order of the commander of the militia in her Majesty's service, and that the act was approved by the Governor of the Province.

And here I must express my surprise that Mr. Forsyth should deem the late note of Mr. Fox to be the first avowal of the fact by a person authorized to make it. In the note of the 6th February, 1838, the fact itself was communicated by Mr. Fox. His late note is only the recognition and re-assertion of the fact. The fact then and now avowed is, that the Caroline was destroyed by persons obeying the order of their superior authorities; and Mr. Fox contends that those obeying were justified by the order. It remains to be seen whether the British Government will justify that order. McLeod's case is put on the first, and the case of the Caroline on the last.

[Mr. PICKENS. Does the gentleman from Vermont intend to say that the British Minister had ever, before his late note, avowed that the Caroline was destroyed by the order of the constituted authorities of Canada?]

Mr. EVERETT. I do say that Mr. Fox, in his note of the 6th February, did avow it. In the despatch of Sir Francis Head, then communicated, it is expressly stated that Col. MacNab commanded a body of militia stationed on the frontier; that in the night of the 29th, "he sent a party of militia, in boats, with orders to take or destroy her. They proceeded to execute the order," &c. Nor did he content himself with the mere communication of the fact, but even attempted to justify the destruction of the Caroline as an act of self-defence. Mr. Fox, in reference to the communication of Sir Francis Head, says:

"The piratical character of the steamboat Caroline, and the necessity of self-defence and self-preservation, under which her Majesty's subjects acted in destroying that vessel, seem to be sufficiently established."

"At the time when the event happened, the ordinary laws of the United States were not enforced within the frontier district of the State of New York. The authority of the law was overborne, publicly, by piratical violence. Through such violence, her Majesty's subjects in Upper Canada had already severely suffered; and they were threatened with still further injury and outrage. This extraordinary state of things appears, naturally and necessarily, to have impelled them to consult their own security, by pursuing and destroying the vessel of their piratical enemy, whosoever they might find her."

Mr. Stevenson presents the act, in connection with these avowals, as an act "of open, undisguised, unwarrantable hostility," "wholly irreconcilable with the friendly and peaceful relations of the two countries." He calls upon the British Government to disavow it. It is thus, by our Minister, characterized as an act of war. And it is for participating in this act that McLeod is arrested; and on this act, thus avowed and thus characterized, the question is made by the two Governments. Sir, I repeat, let negotiation be exhausted before Congress is called to act or to interpose its opinion, or to take a final ground, from which, when taken, there can be no retreat. Whether right or wrong, Great Britain may choose to put this controversy in advance of the others. Let us then be certain that it be not her strongest ground. It is much easier to be right at first, than to get right at last. We shall also look to the possible consequences of even the errors of our adversary. Is it not among the possibilities that she may deem herself bound to protect those who have obeyed the orders of their superior authorities in her service, and that, under the spirit attributed to her in the report, she may resort to retaliation? And I repeat, if pushed to the extreme, war is inevitable. Is it not, then, the safest course to leave the case in the hands of the Executive, without, at least, adding to the excitement, which, from recent evidence, is sufficiently rife?

But, sir, the report also embraces the case of the Caroline, which was not submitted to the committee. To exhibit the point in controversy, only one addition to the statement I have read is necessary, viz: That the destruction of the Caroline is attempted to be justified in the despatch of Sir Francis Head on the ground of self-defence. He alleges, in substance, that the force on Navy island proceeded from the American shore, and was augmenting, through the agency of the Caroline, unrestricted by the authorities of the State of New York, or of the United States.

This is the only ground taken by the British Government as a justification of the destruction of the Caroline; and, being taken, a report on the case of the Caroline should have met it directly, by a denial either of the fact or of the consequence.

I complain that that the case is not met. No, sir, it is not met. It is evaded. Mr. Fox says, "The place where the vessel was destroyed was nominally, it is true, within the territory of a friendly power; but the friendly power had been deprived, through overbearing piratical violence of the use of its proper authority over that portion of territory." And what is the reply in the report? "Now the insinuation of the British Minister that Schlosser was 'nominally' within the territory of the United States, may well be retorted, as we can with equal truth, say that Navy island was 'nominally' within the 'territory' of the British Government; for, at the period to which we allude, the people collected there had as effectually defied Canadian authorities as any portion of our people had ours." What is this, sir, but an admission that Schlosser and Navy island were equally in the power of the Patriots, in equal defiance of the power of the Government to which they respectively belong? What but an evasion, if not an admission of the ground taken, by Mr. Fox? Is this the position on which we are willing to rest our cause—to place the issue of peace or war? No, sir, no. I hope we can make a better case. In order to make our case, I think the facts should be re-examined. I am not satisfied to rest the case on the evidence taken. We should be in the right—we should be certain we are right, before we take our final stand. In my judgment, the evidence should be retaken. I desire that a person of the highest respectability should be commissioned to re-examine the whole case, with a view to arrive at the truth, whether for or against us. Perhaps, too, it might be advisable to ask the British Minister to join in the investigation. Let the testimony be taken on both sides of the line. For one, I desire to know how far the proper authority of the United States was overthrown by the violence of the Patriots. I desire further information of the character of the Caroline. In both respects, I think the evidence is defective. I repeat, that I desire the truth, and nothing but the truth. It is beneath the character of a nation to attempt evasion. I am not satisfied with the depositions that speak of the Caroline having landed certain passengers and certain freight. I desire to know the character of those passengers—whether civil or military; of the quality of the freight—whether merchandise or military stores.

I do not desire to fault the present Executive, or that it should be faulted by the next Administration. No, sir. The Executive should be a unit, in whosoever hands it is placed. What I desire is, that the evidence should be fully taken. If it sustain the course taken, as I hope it may, then that course will be sustained. If it do not sustain it, then the Executive will be at liberty to pursue such course as the new case shall require, and that, without imputing any fault for the past. We must in the end deny the fact or its consequence. As the evidence now stands, I am not willing to make up the final issue. This controversy should be conducted as honest men conduct their controversies, with a mutual and earnest desire to ascertain what is true.

I have fears that this report will encourage an excitement which should have received a severe rebuke. Whatever may be our sympathies with those who live under a Government less free than our own, we ought not to forget the duties imposed on us as a neutral nation. In the case of the attempts of our citizens on Upper Canada, there was but little cause for their sympathy, and no justification for their conduct. The people of Upper Canada were well satisfied with their Government. They have shown no desire for revolution. But our citizens have volunteered to make a revolution for them. Their conduct cannot be too strongly reprobated.

At the present time, no useful purpose can be attained by the report. It proposes no action. Its effect will be only to excite on the one side, and irritate on the other. The report which I send to the Chair is that which I proposed as a substitute:

"Appearing, that the reciprocal complaints referred to in the correspondence submitted are the subjects of diplomatic discussion between the Governments of the two countries, the committee, having entire confidence that the rights and honor of the United States will be sustained by the Executive, and entertaining the hope that the controversy will be brought to a satisfactory termination, are of the opinion that no action of this House is, at this time, necessary. They therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject."

SPEECH OF MR. BYNUM,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, February 17, 1841.—
In the Committee of the Whole, on a motion to strike out the appropriation to continue the branch mint in North Carolina.

Mr. BYNUM rose, and addressed the committee, by saying that he had arrived and taken his seat at a late period during the present session of Congress, with a fixed determination to remain at least one session a silent member of that body—a determination that he had come to from a variety of reasons, growing out of his peculiar situation, and the developments that had been recently made since the adjournment of the last session of Congress—but such had been the extraordinary, unprovoked, illiberal, abusive, if not to say the flagitious and wanton course that had been pursued by certain gentlemen in their false and indiscriminate denunciation of almost all that was democratic or republican in the nation—with the avowal of principles striking at the very foundation of the freedom, not only of our republican institutions as they were reared by our illustrious forefathers for the guarantee and protection of our liberties, but at the very powers and interests held directly by the people themselves, should he continue silent, and suffer such to pass unnoticed and unreplicated, without raising his feeble voice in opposition to both the truth and just policy of such doctrines, he should feel derelict in his duty as a faithful Representative, and guilty of treachery and treason to the great, vital and immediate interests of those whom he directly represented there, and whose interest he had ever attempted to resist the wanton invasion of upon that floor, or elsewhere, without regard either to personal hazard, or to political sacrifice. With him, the time had arrived when he had as little to expect from the benevolence and partiality of friends, as from those who had gained possession of power and of place against his will, and at the sacrifice of all that was dear and near to the sacred rights and interests of those with whom his interests, ay, his all, was so nearly, deeply, and inseparably allied, by an indissoluble identity; and he felt it to be his happy lot, while he stepped forth in defence of the sacred rights of others, to be thereby enabled to defend his own, which, to him, were held by far more dear than life itself. But as the limits of the proposition before the committee would not admit of the discussion of many of the topics to which he alluded, he would endeavor to confine himself to those which grew immediately out of the proposition then submitted for their consideration.

Sir, said Mr. B. it is not to the mere striking out the insignificant sum in the appropriation bill, as proposed by the honorable member from Kentucky, [Mr. GREEN,] to which I look; no, sir, no: had that been the only object or effect of the proposition thus unceremoniously made, I should have been one of the last members in this House to have raised my feeble voice against it. No, sir; it is not that to which I materially object; but, sir, it is to the designs, effects, and ulterior consequences of such a proposition that I object, and its insidious and covert tendencies, without knowing that such was the object of the gentleman himself, [Mr. GREEN,] who was its mover—for we often are induced to do things by others without being the least conscious of the influences by which we are moved. For the gentleman personally, my feelings are of a kind character, and I have no disposition to impugn in the least his private and personal motives.

This proposition I view, sir, as an antagonistical one to founding in this country—for the benefit of the yeomanry, the working, laboring, producing people, and for their use—a permanent and solid currency, either of hard money or upon a hard money, specie basis, by which paper can always be converted into specie at the discretion and will of the working and producing man who holds it, and who has paid for it, in his produce or labor, its full equivalent and consideration; and without which, I now contend that there never can be a permanent currency in the country, nor safety and security to the labor and to the products of the farming and planting classes of this nation.

For this reason I then oppose the adoption of this proposition, intended, as all must admit, and as it has been openly avowed here, to strike down your mints for the coinage of hard money, for the use of the farmers, planters, and mechanics of this country. Yes, sir, with a premeditated purpose, as avowed openly and covertly by those who have just come into power, to erect on their ruins a mammoth Bank, with all its branches and sub-branches extended in every State, if not county in your Union—flooding and carpeting the whole nation with its worthless paper promises—false, false, as they have ever been proven to be, upon the very face of the paper that bears the impress of their promises. The proposition on your table looks to this; it is to effect this object and none other; it is not a new proposition at all; it has been regularly made, and by gentlemen heretofore; with this intent; to effect which, your mints must first be destroyed, and all idea of a solid, permanent currency, founded on a specie basis, discounted and discouraged amongst the laboring, mechanical, planting, and producing classes of this country.

It has been with such designs, and to effect such an object, that a similar proposition has been annually introduced, and revived in this House ever since the establishments of those mints in the Southern sections of our country. It had its birth in hatred to a hard money currency, and one of paper to be found upon a specie basis, and has ever continued its jealousy towards any and all mints for the coinage, for the use of the people, of any thing like hard money, as a substitute for their false paper promises. It is one impediment in their way, and therefore must be removed for a more successful operation of their plundering banking system, as adopted throughout our entire country, and which involves directly their consideration in this discussion.

But before I proceed to say more on this subject, I must beg permission to notice the course of some gentlemen who have preceded me, and reply to some remarks that they have made in this discussion.

In the first place, I will notice a remark of the honorable member from Ohio [Mr. MASON.]

This gentleman has said that the Secretary of the Treasury had retained in office defaulters, after he had been informed, by correspondence that they were defaulters to a considerable amount to the Government.

Now, sir, this charge has been made often here and out of doors. I ask the gentleman if he will endorse it? Will he hazard his reputation upon this charge? No, sir, no; he dare not. I deny every word of it, and challenge that gentleman and all others, who, in their reckless abuse of that officer, have asserted it, to come forward with a single proof of the facts. Why have they not done it? They have often been called on for proof, but will now do, as they always have done, let it rest upon their own assertion.

Again, sir, the gentleman had said that the President had appointed to power men whom he knew to be defaulters.

This, again, was in keeping with the conduct of gentlemen of the Opposition, who had dealt in the most barefaced assertions for the last four years without deigning to produce a single fact, or even condescending to investigate them. It was a part of their tactics to avoid all investigation, as fatal to their objects of imposition upon the credulous and ignorant.

I again deny, sir, that there has ever been the least proof produced to this House, where it should, beyond every place, have been the first in which to have brought forward such evidence, showing that the President had, in a single case, ever appointed to office, or retained any individual whatever in office, that was a defaulter to this Government to the amount of one dollar—he knowing the fact, at the time, that such was a defaulter—and I dare gentlemen to produce one single instance, in which, upon the very first information being given of any defalcation, that the delinquent, as soon as the fact could be legally established, has not been removed, and all measures, that were in the power of the Departments, were not immediately resorted to to secure and protect the interest of the Government. But gentlemen have taken up the idea, and it has, to a certain extent, been avowed here, that upon the first rumor and intimation against an officer, the officer should have been forthwith removed.

Should such a course have been pursued by the President, then he would have been exactly such a wretch as his reckless enemies have represented him to have been; and such as every ignorant tippling shop politician in the country has denounced him as being. Sir, do honorable gentlemen here know, that if, in a solitary case, the President of the United States was to dare to turn out any individual from office, without giving to him due notice, and an opportunity to be heard in self defence, he would act directly in opposition to every principle of the sacred Constitution that he is sworn to respect and obey, and bring in truth down on him all those charges of tyranny, proscription, and cruelty, that he has been so repeatedly charged with, by the most vile and reckless opposition that ever has before, in any country, conspired to overthrow a Government, and prostrate the liberties of a free people. Sir, we are even told here that the Secretary of the Treasury ought to have had A, B, and C removed from office, and upon the mere charge of corruption and defalcation being made, either in this House or out of it, against any officer whose place might have been sought, or become an object of others, without waiting further evidence. Yes, sir, I have heard frequently, from the most ignorant declaimers of that party, such declarations made, in endeavoring to rouse and excite the people against the last and present Democratic Republican Administrations of the country; but never did I expect to hear such from a member on this floor.

Have gentlemen yet to learn that the removing power is alone in the hands of the President, and if your Secretary of the Treasury, or any other Secretary, was to dare to attempt it, as required by those who thus denounce them, they would be guilty of an act of usurpation, for which they would deservedly forfeit their heads, and render themselves infamous in all time to come? Never, sir, have I been more astonished than to hear such declarations falling from gentlemen professing to be men of intelligence, and occupying places that should be filled by no others. What! the Secretary of the Treasury removing officers, whose duty it is simply to ascertain the facts, and report them to the President, after affording a fair and an impartial hearing to the accused? Is this to be the doctrine and principles to be acted on by the ensuing Administration, and by them be carried out? Is it to be that mere rumor and suspicion, excited by some hungry office seeker for the place of his victim, are to be taken as evidence of guilt, and your infuriated Secretary is forthwith, and without a hearing, to usurp the power of removal? And is this the reform that you have so bountifully promised the people of this country; and one of the principles that the people decided on, in the last Presidential election? If it has been, then it must come with a vengeance. That there has been in this Government defaulters, and ever will be, under any future one, without regard to the party, in power, all honest and rational men will readily confess; but so long as a party, or the heads of the party do what is in their power to prevent defalcations, and expose them, as soon as satisfactory evidence is procured of the same, no honest or intelligent men in any community will ever hold them guilty of such offences, and at all subject them to censure for their commission.

Look, sir, at every instance where an investigation has been had in relation to the conduct of the executive officers; and see, in every individual case where corruption has been alleged, if it has not redounded to the most perfect acquittal of all participation, or knowledge, or connivance of it, whatever, by those much abused and persecuted distinguished individuals. Sir, there is not a parallel on record where there has been so much abuse, and so many charges made against any man, or set of men, with so little truth to sustain them. So little, did I say? To this day, there has not been one particle of evidence produced against a member of the departments, that could have, in any court of justice, subjected to censure the merest felon in the land. My allusion is to the conduct of the members who are at the heads of those departments which have been so wantonly assailed by the allied powers, both in and out of this House. Sir, I am no apologist of these men. I owe them nothing. I have had no favors from them—not even those to which I thought my constituents entitled; personally, I have asked nothing, and certainly from them I have little to expect at this time; but, as a Representative of a portion of the freemen of my country, when I speak of them as officers of this Government, to speak truly, neither in exculpation or in disparagement, save and except what truth itself shall demand, is a duty which I owe to justice, to myself, and to the country.

Mr. Chairman, frequent allusions have been made, here and elsewhere, to the conduct and character of one of the officers of the branch mint at Charlotte, in North Carolina, Colonel John Wheeler. He, too, has been arraigned for extravagance, prodigality, and corruption. Permit me to say, sir, with that gentleman I have long had the honor of an intimate acquaintance. I know him well, and his family before him; and I know him to be a gentleman of talents, of the highest honor and integrity, against whom the voice of scandal was never heard to hiss, until he had taken office under this Administration; a gentleman, sir, whose character would suffer no disparagement, if it did not rise in the scale of comparison with any of his predecessors upon this floor, or out of this House. But it is said he writes newspaper paragraphs. Grant it. And who has a better right, as a freeman of this Republic? His conduct has been assailed, and wantonly assailed? And has it come to this, in the new reform, that one is to be assailed here, accused, and condemned, and convicted, and not to be heard in his defence? When were such doctrines ever heard of before, or dreamed of being asserted in the congregated assemblage of freemen? The paragraphs alluded to were written in vindication of his own conduct; and who denies this right, or objects to its justice? I see in the papers that he has been charged with mismanagement and extravagance in his official duties, to the enormous amount of some $116, or $216.

Now, sir, from the knowledge of the character of that gentleman, had he dreamed of the least objection being taken to that account, I hazard nothing in saying that he would not for one moment have hesitated to have taken the money from his own pocket and paid it without a murmur. Yes, he would have scorned to have permitted his conduct to have been arraigned, as a public officer, however unjust it might have been for him to have paid the money, and subjected himself to the malice and censure of his unfeeling and unprincipled calumniators, when it must be recollected, too, that no part of this prodigious sum was appropriated to his own use, but wholly to the improvement of the property of the Government of the United States. Such is the amount of the charges made, and harped on so much here and at other places, against the officers of this Administration.

The charges of "corruption, extravagance and prodigality," have been made and rung upon every note of the political gamut, against the friends of this Administration. It has been so often repeated and re-echoed here, that our ears have been deafened and stunned at its reiteration. From the oft-repeated sounds without the variations, one well might suppose the words lithographed and set to note, from their regular and monotonous sound on this floor. It is immaterial upon what subject you are called on to act, this awful note is the first to greet the ear. Sir, it frequently reminded me of the cry of a certain mischievous bird, that has been a pest in the fields of every farming and planting man, from the earliest days of agriculture, and which, at the first approach of the planter, ceases to pull up his grain, flies off from his plunder with cry of "caw, caw, caw," and with equally as much meaning, and with as little variation, as do the honorable gentleman, who, upon every occasion are heard to cry here, "corruption, corruption, corruption," &c. Where, sir, is the corruption and extravagance so much complained of? Who has been guilty of it? We well know for the four last years, the appropriations by this and the other branch of this House, have gone much above the estimates of the Executive Departments and the recommendations of the President. Will it be denied, then, if there has been corruption arising out of the extravagance of this Administration, that this and the other branch of Congress are equally, if not more responsible for it, than the Executive Departments. Mark you, sir, there never has been yet, within my hearing, any charge made for the expending, and disbursement of more money than what has been appropriated by law, as passed by this House and the other body of Congress. The charge of spending more than was appropriated, I say has never been made, and of course, no appropriations can be made but by the assent of both bodies.

Now, sir, during the time of the highest appropriations and the greatest expenditures took place, which was in '33, '4, '5, the Opposition party themselves held a majority in the other branch of Congress, and could at any time have rejected such extravagant appropriation, if they had deemed it proper to do so; but they did not do it; they saw the necessity and indispensability of the expenditures, and never raised an objection to them.*

If there has been extravagance, then, it must have had its origin in this House, and for it the members of this body, individually or collectively, are responsible. The leading measures of the Government that have increased the expenditures to any considerable amount of a permanent character, were the increase of the pay of the navy, and the increase of your standing army—and who were the champions of these measures? An individual who stands high in the Whig party, and had a dinner given him in Norfolk for the part he took in getting one of those measures through Congress; and if you will look at the vote on the other subject, you will find an equal number of the Whig members supporting it, or a number nearly as great in proportion to their whole number in the House as that of the Democrats. You will find, too—and I say it to their credit—their votes, or a majority of them, recorded in favor of most, if not all the appropriations to carry on the Florida war. These are matters of record, that the journals of the House will show; by turning to the yeas and nays, as recorded on the several subjects.

What measure of an extravagant character, or one that has involved the expenditure of any very large amount, except what is embraced in the regular appropriation bills, that has not been brought forward, for the last several years, by a Whig?

I hold now in my hand the votes of the members of this House at the last session of Congress, upon the most prodigal and extravagant proposition that was offered in this House during the long sitting of the last session.

Journal House of Representatives, 1840, page 592.

On the motion of Mr. PICKENS, made the 13th of February, to amend the said instructions so as to read, "with instructions to consider the expediency of reporting a bill in favor of the measure."

On the motion of Mr. MARVIN, of the 13th of February, to substitute for Mr. PICKENS's motion the following: Also, that the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to report bills in accordance with the estimates contained in the reports from the Chief Engineer, and Chief of the Topographical Engineers, to the Secretary of War, and communicated to Congress by the President, making appropriations for the year 1846, for the continuance of the construction or improvement of harbors and roads, and the navigation of rivers, for which appropriations have been heretofore made; unless in any particular case the committee shall be of opinion that the particular work ought to be entirely discontinued; and in such case, if any, the committee shall submit to this House the reasons which lead to such conclusions.

The main question was then put on the amendment or substitute of Mr. MARVIN for the amendment of Mr. PICKENS, and passed in the negative—yeas 80, nays 112.

Of the 80 in the affirmative, there are 53 Whigs to 27 Democrats.

Of the 112 in the negative, there are 33 Whigs to 80 Democrats;

Leaving a large majority of the whole of the Whig party voting in favor of this, the most extravagant proposition that was made during the last session, and a large majority of the Democrats voting against it. Yet the Democrats are denounced for extravagance, and the Whigs are lauded as closefisted economists to the people.

But, sir, again, the next most extravagant proposition that was made during the last session, in the Committee of the Whole, was made by the member from Indian [Mr. PROFFIT, a Whig] to ap-appropriate $400,000 for the continuation of the Cumberland Road. Not being able to take the yeas and nays in a committee, the vote on this proposition was taken by tellers. And, sir, I took my seat there, near the place of the tellers, and counted the votes as they passed through, and three-fourths, or thereabout, of those who voted for this appropriation, were Whigs, and no gentleman will now deny it. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. THOMPSON] sat by me, and will bear me out in what I have stated, I think; and sir, strange, passing strange, I then saw certain gentlemen sneak through and vote for that proposition, who have been, and are now, the loudest in denouncing this Administration for extravagance, prodigality, and corruption; and who have rung to the very heavens their voices against the pitiful expenditure of one hundred and sixteen, or two hundred and sixteen dollars, upon the public grounds attached to the branch mint at Charlotte, in North Carolina; and which was spent, too, exclusively for the improvement of the public property. Sir, if we could be astonished at any thing that men could do at this time, these facts alone would be startling; but the public mind is not in a condition to hear facts, and old and young are ready to jump and run with every political culprit who will cry seek him, boy—seek him, boy, to draw attention from his own conduct.

But really, sir, it must have been amusing to an impartial spectator to have sat and witnessed, in this body, the transitu conditum of certain gentlemen of this most economical party, and to have observed what a jarring of language, and confusion of tongues, they exhibit in the somersets and changes that they are daily making before the world upon this subject of extravagance. Has any gentleman listened attentively at the speeches that have been delivered on this floor, within four weeks, without being satisfied of a most unaccountable change coming over the dreams of some of the minds of those honorable men, who heretofore have been so celebrated for the denunciation of this Administration for its extravagance and corruption? Could any one have listened at the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL], and that of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD], without being satisfied of this extraordinary change in their minds upon this subject? Can they fail to have seen, in the temper and tone of these speeches, that an infinitely more extravagant Administration than any we have yet had, was in contemplation? The gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD], demonstrated most clearly, no doubt, to his own mind, the necessity there was to raise our taxes, by increasing your tariff on certain articles, and this speech was acquiesced in, and sanctioned and complimented highly by the honorable member from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL]. But, sir, the speech of my honorable colleague, [Mr. RAYNER], above all others, proves most clearly the sudden revolution that has recently taken place in that party. While we have been denounced for extravagance, and for permitting the expenditures of the General Government to run up to $5,000,000, or $6,000,000 of dollars, my honorable colleague has spoken of, and advocated measures in his speech, that would, at the lowest calculation, involve the ensuing Administration in an expenditure of more than $50,000,000 per annum; and has gone on farther, and shown conclusively, no doubt, to his own mind, that this amount could be realized by an increase of taxes, by raising a tariff on luxuries, silks, wines, and linens, &c. While, sir, I acknowledge that my colleague made a most excellent speech, and in some parts of which I most cordially agreed with him, I must say, on the whole, it was one of the highest toned extravagant productions that I have listened to in this House, and to carry out the objects of which, in four years, would involve this nation in a debt, that no human eye can foresee. Others, sir, of the same party, have taken a similar view upon the same subjects, but upon whose remarks I will not dwell. One gentleman's, however, I would do injustice to omit—the honorable member from Maine, [Mr. EVANS].

Mr. Chairman, a gentleman of the talents, who is justly entitled to the position that he occupies here as a leader of his party, has had the magnanimity to meet this question openly and manly upon every occasion. Sir, he is no ordinary man. He never amuses us here with any shallow ideas that flit across his mind. No, sir, he speaks advisedly or not at all, and by so doing, he has well earned for himself the high honor that has recently been conferred on him by his party in the State of Maine. What does he say? What did he say on this floor during a debate, in which he had an occasion to reply to some remarks of my honorable colleague from North Carolina, [Mr. McKAY]? Sir, I am glad that the gentleman [Mr. EVANS] is present, and I have him now in my eye; and if I mistake him, I call on him to correct me. That gentleman then emphatically said, for I wrote it down at the time, that it was not to the amount that this Administration had expended, but to its not having spent enough, to which he objected; also to the manner and objects to which the money had been applied. He was the advocate of no penurious, close-fisted economy. He was for a liberal expenditure, such as was necessary to carry on all the internal improvements of the country, for repairing our fortifications, building harbors, improving our navy, &c. &c. This, sir, was what I then understood that gentleman to say, and all I have heard from him this session has been in corroboration of these views. (Mr. E. made no reply.) Now, sir, I ask again and again, how do these sentiments comport with this continued cry from this small fry of politicians about "extravagance and corruption?"—men, sir, that are not even permitted in council of the great agitators themselves, who have ulterior and higher objects in view.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is one other thing to which I wish to call the attention of this House and this country. The honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] has stated emphatically, I think, again and again, in this House, that it was not the gross amount of expenditures that had been made by this Administration to which he had objected, but more to their "niggardly parsimony," (I think these were the words which he used on one occasion,) and to the manner and objects of those expenditures. I, sir, have spoken, in another place, of this gentleman's high standing with his party, and the weight to which every thing that falls from him is entitled. Now, sir, mark it; I had the honor, but a few days since, to visit another part of this Capitol,* where this very subject of "the extravagance, prodigality, and corruption," of this Administration, was under consideration. It was then and there, for the first time, that I heard and saw the gauntlet thrown down by a distinguished gentleman,† and all challenged to touch it who dare to discuss, item by item, the expediency, economy, necessity, and propriety, of any single object of expenditure that had been incurred by the present Administration; and, sir, who can conceive my utter astonishment, when I saw this challenge declined, on the plea entered by another distinguished individual,‡ that it was to the gross amount that objections to its extravagance had been made, and not to the items or particular manner of the expenditures. Now, sir, here are two positions taken by men the most distinguished of their party, as diametrically opposite as are the poles, yet both are hurried on with equal fervor to the consummation of their ultimate, though diametrically opposite, objects. Sir, in this, they both cannot be right; there is a deadly cross fire in their own ranks, by soldiers of equal skill, that proves by demonstration, conclusively, that they are in a false position, and that a retreat or destruction is inevitable.

But the cry of "corruption, extravagance, and prodigality," still rings through my ears. This caw, caw, note, that has been so much rung in every section of our beloved country, to impose upon the innocent, but too credulous yeomanry of our hard working and laboring population, to win them from the productive interest and subjugate them to the rule of unproductive swindling corporations.

To expose the authors of these impositions, which, I confess, commenced and had their origin here, I hold in my hand a document which should forever put to blush the individual who shall dare repeat it again on this floor, however often it may be repeated by others abroad, for the want of better information. It is composed of the six standing rules, of the 26th Congress, of this House, and is to be found in the following words, page 50, "Congressional Directory," 1841:

"The following standing committees were appointed at the first session, and stand through the Congress:

Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State.—Messrs. Joseph R. Underwood, Kentucky; Joshua Lowell, Maine; Jesse A. Bynum, North Carolina; Joseph Trumbull, Connecticut; George W. Crabb, Alabama.

Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Treasury.—Messrs. George Evans, Maine; Lot Warren, Georgia; Charles G. Atherton, New Hampshire; Nathaniel Jones, New York; Thomas Osborne, Connecticut.

Committee on Expenditures in the Department of War.—Messrs. Peter J. Wagner, New York; Reuben Chapman, Alabama; Isaac E. Holmes, South Carolina; Nicholas B. Doe, New York; James Cooper, Pennsylvania.

Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Navy.—Messrs. Leverett Saltonstall, Massachusetts; Willis Green, Kentucky; Aaron Vanderpoel, New York; James Gerry, Pennsylvania; William Simonton, Pennsylvania.

Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Post Office.—Messrs. Richard P. Marvin, New York; Gurriel Davis, Kentucky; Linn Boyd, Kentucky; Henry S. Lane, Indiana; Joshua Lowell, Maine.

Committee on Expenditures on the Public Buildings.—Messrs. Edward Stanly, North Carolina; Thomas Henry, Pennsylvania; Joseph Forance, Pennsylvania; Nehemiah Earl, New York; Seth M. Gates, New York.

Here, Mr. Chairman, are six standing committees, composed of five members, with a chairman on each, and two others, who are Whigs, and are as violently opposed to this Administration as men well can be.

The chairman of each committee is a Whig, and with two others, making three out of five. They have full power of the investigation of any subject that may have had the least relation to any expenditures in any one of these several departments. Yea, sir, more, upon the suggestion, or the suspicion of any extravagance and corruption in any of those departments, it became their duty to institute immediate investigation, and to report the result to this House and the country.

It was the duty, also, of every member of this House, who should have entertained the remotest idea of corruption or extravagance existing in any of these departments, to have made it known by resolution through this House, and instructed the committee, who had cognizance of the facts, to have inquired into them, and reported forthwith the facts to the House and the country.

Here, sir, was the field widely opened to all investigation, with committees packed in their own favor upon every subject that was connected with the Government, financial and otherwise. Every department was thrown open to them, and they were invited to walk in; to examine to their hearts' content.

There was no longer a necessity for special committees to investigate fraud, extravagance, or corruption. Here they were appointed by their own Speaker, with three out of five members on each committee, with the chairman at their head. Here, sir, they have had full power to ascertain the facts in relation to every species of corruption and extravagance. For the whole of the last session, occupying near eight months, were those committees in session, and the whole of this present session; and what have they done in the way of detection and exposition of extravagance and corruption? Not one single thing, save and except $116 or $216, in relation to this said branch mint, and which all admit was laid out for the benefit of the public grounds connected with this mint. Such, sir, is the record, and are the facts in relation to this universal cry and "caw note" about corruption and extravagance, which has caused so much the condemnation of this Democratic Administration.

Such has been the facilities given to their opponents by the Democrats of this body to investigate every supposable case of fraud, corruption, or extravagance; and with what grace, I ask now, can any honorable gentleman rise here, and repeat this charge, knowing, as he must, that he has only to intimate it to one of his friends on those committees, or it becomes his duty, which he owes both to this House and his constituents, to propose to instruct one of these committees, to inquire and report the facts to the House, in relation to any suspicion he may have? Sir, have they done this? Will they now do it? No, no, no; such a course does not suit their purpose, as it makes an issue with them, and puts the accused on his trial, which is not a part of their tactics in politics. Their system is to condemn without a trial, and sentence before a hearing and by vague and sly insinuation, to infuse their poison in the public mind. They shun all investigation by which truth is to be elicited, and resort to indiscriminate charges, founded simply upon their own reckless assertion. Yes, sir, and by such a course have they been but too successful with the most innocent and credulous of the country. But I say again, such a course cannot "come to good." There is a redeeming spirit in the people, in the Democracy of this country, that must and will in time overtake them, or the Government itself is undone. What man have they attempted to proscribe in this way, that they have not already immortalized the memory of, wherever they have been brought to a fair investigation? Look at your Secretary of the Treasury, (Levi Woodbury;) they have erected, sir, for him, an immortality more durable than brass. They had their committee—and such a one! He passed its fiery ordeal, and what hair has been scorched? Others, too, whom they dared not to put on trial, whose conduct they shrank from all investigation of by committee, are doomed to rise above their petty calumniators and traducers in immortal glory. The American people only want time to reflect, to be convinced of the character of the unwholy warfare that has been waged against the Democracy, for the profits of their labor—mechanical and productive.

Mr. Chairman, we are frequently taunted with our promises of economy while opposing the administration of the honorable gentleman who now sits before me, [Mr. ADAMS.] The innocent and uninformed have been led to believe that the entire opposition of the Republicans to the administration of Mr. ADAMS was founded on its enormous expenditures in the public departments. Not so, sir. There were higher principles at issue in that contest than in any expenditure of revenue. The Democrats objected to the manner in which that Administration had come into power, as anti-Republican. The honorable gentleman never did receive a majority of the votes of the American people. He was not even the highest candidate who reached the House of Representatives, but was taken up, as it was supposed, by an unholy alliance between high contracting parties, though with a less vote than General Jackson, and was forced in on the people as a minority President—which aroused the Democracy in every section of the Republic to revenge this wanton usurpation of popular rights. The people took the subject in hand, and at the next election rebuked that Administration, by placing in power another, at the head of which they placed the distinguished individual who had obtained the greatest number of votes at the preceding Presidential election.

Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, in exposing the character and parties to that coalition, and while upon this subject, said:

"Sir, I have much to say, which neither my own weakness, nor my regard to the politeness of this House, will permit me now to say. As I have exonerated the principal in the weighty affair of the billiard table, I also exonerate him and his Lieutenant from every charge of collusion in the first instance, and, if it is in order, I will state the reasons for my opinion. When the alliance was first patched up between the two great leaders of the East and West, neither of the high contracting parties had the promotion of the present incumbent at all in view. Sir, I speak knowingly as to one of these parties, and with the highest degree of moral probability of the other. Can it be necessary that I prove this? The thing proves itself. The object was to bring in one of the parties to the compact, whom the Constitution subsequently excluded, and of course to provide for the other. A gentleman, then of this House, was the candidate who, to the last hour, cast many a longing and though not lingering look, with outstretched neck, towards Louisiana—jugulo quæsitæ nega ur—to discover whether or not he should be one upon the list. Sir, it is impossible that he could, in the first instance, have looked to the elevation of another, or have designed to promote the views of any man but in subservience to his own. Sir, common sense forbids it. But, sir, all these calculations, however ekilful, and DEMOIRS could not have made better, utterly failed. Mr. Crawford most obstinately and unreasonably, I confess, refused to die. It was certainly very disobliging in him. I saw him before I went abroad, and I thought it was an hundred to one that he could not survive the summer: he was then dead to every purpose, public or private. Louisiana refused to vote as obstinately as Mr. Crawford refused to die; and so the gentleman was excluded. It was then that Mr. Adams was first taken up, as a plaster, which we planters of the South translate, a hand plant.

"Sir, I have a right to know; I had a long while before an interview with the very great man; but not on that subject; no, sir, it was about business of this House; and he so far descended, I should rather say, of so great a man, condescended, as to elect me even with me. He said to me, among other matters, if you of the South will give us of the West any other man than John Quincy Adams for President, we will support him. Let any man deny this who dares; but remember, sir, he then expected to be a candidate before the House himself. If you will give us any other man, Sir, the gentleman in question can have no disposition to deny it. It was at a time when he and the present incumbent were publicly pitted against each other, and Mr. Adams had crowded defiance, and clapped his wings against the Cock of Kentucky. Sir, I know this to be a strong mode of expression. I did not take it literally. I thought I understood the meaning to be that Virginia, by her strenuous support of Mr. Crawford, would further the success of Mr. Adams. 'Any other man, sir, besides John Quincy Adams.' Now, as neither Mr. Crawford nor General Jackson, in the end, proved to be 'any other man,' it follows clearly who any other man was, viz: one other man, id est, myself, as a gentleman once said in this House, we will support him. But, sir, as soon as this egomet was out of question, of the South lost all our influence, and 'we of the West' gave us of the south this very John Quincy Adams for President, and received from him the very office, which, being held by him, we of the West assigned as the cause of our support, considering it to be a sort of reversary interest in the Presidency. (See the letter to Mr. F. Brooks.) It was indeed 'raisane in our mouth,' but we swallowed the arsenic.

"Sir, I will take the letter to the President of the Court of Appeals in Virginia; and on that letter, and on facts which are notorious as the sun at noonday, it must be established that there was a collusion, and corrupt collusion, between the principals in this affair. I do not say the agreement was a written, or even a verbal one. I know the language of the poet is true; that men, who 'meat to do a damned deed,' cannot bring even themselves to speak of it in distinct terms; they cannot call a spade a spade; but eke out their unholy purposes with dark hints, and innuendoes, and signs, and shrugs, where more is meant than meets the ear."

Such were the sentiments and such the testimony of that distinguished statesman, who is now no more. Such is the evidence that he left on record against these high contracting parties. He has told all posterity the principles for which the Democrats contended in their opposition to that Administration, and the example that they had resolved to make of those high dignitaries, who had dared to disregard the will of the people, and for considerations, implied or expressed, bid defiance to the known wishes of their constituents.

These things, Mr. Chairman, are not to be forgotten. It is good for the country that we sometime recur to first principles—it is the retrospect of the past, that sometimes throw light on the future; and gentlemen who contend under a leader, all covered with guilt, should be at least cautious how they throw corruption at others.

But, sir, we have been frequently taunted for extravagance, and it has been told that we contended for an economical Administration, and had deceived the country; that we had opposed the extravagance of the Adams administration, but had been more guilty of it ourselves.

Now, sir, here again I take issue, and will show that the principles then avowed on the subject of extravagance, were carried out in good faith, and adhered to by the Democrats most sacredly, until they had effectually accomplished their objects, and redeemed their pledge. Sir, they did object to the extravagance of that Administration, and the principles upon which it was founded; and, sir, it was not to your little "picayune two pence hapenny" extravagance of a little contemptible office-holder—not to a little outlay of one hundred and sixteen dollars, or the puny salaries of a few starving clerks, or to old spoons and dishes, old bed-heads, towels, and other culinary implements. No, sir, no: those were not the objects of Democratic reform—they were reserved for other men, and other times—to the other party, with a new born zeal. The Democrats looked at high objects; they were in no jest upon subject of extravagance to tickle the vulgar and delude the multitude. They went for principle, as I trust they ever will, and opposed principles which involved the expending and squandering of millions and thousands of millions of the people's money, and thereby incurring a national debt that unborn generations would never be able to pay.

What were those principles, then, involved in that contest? They were the principles on which was founded the right and expediency of carrying on a system of internal improvements by the National Government—that was the nature of the extravagance opposed with so much vehemence by the Democratic party; that was the character of extravagance that was so signally rebuked by the people in that great struggle. Yes, sir, an extravagance carrying with it a system of corruption and prodigality, that well might cause the people fear and trembling. It was to this kind of extravagance and corruption to which the Democratic party looked for reform and retrenchment, and which, sir, they have ultimately effected, triumphantly effected, and by no "humbuggery" about office holders, and high salaries, and "kitchen furniture."

The amount of the millions and hundred of millions of dollars that was sought to be expended then by the Opposition party, who are now to be placed in power for their notions of reform and economy, are justly illustrated by the following remarks of a distinguished Senator from South Carolina, [the Hon. William Smith,] who has since departed this life, at his private residence, in the State of Alabama; and, as a Southern planter of worth and intelligence, he has left few equals behind, and no superior. In this speech, delivered in the Senate by this distinguished and extraordinary man on the 11th of April, 1828, in opposition to the extravagance of that Administration, is contained these facts, to which I call the particular attention of the committee, in demonstration of the character of the extravagant measures then opposed by the Democratic party, but advocated then by the party now calling themselves Whigs:

"It was, Mr. S. said, among his objections to the system, the great inequality and injustice of its practical operations in the different sections of the Union. And this fact was fully demonstrated. At the present session there were applications from the Western States, all of which had received already large donations in public lands for at least 10,000,000 of acres for internal improvements and other purposes of their own. And there were applications now before Congress, in some shape or other, for appropriations for internal improvements in the different States, except the States of South Carolina and Georgia, for more than $300,000,000. And with all this preparation and appropriation in the other States to fill them with roads and canals, at the expense of the public Treasury, not a chain had been stretched, nor a Jacob staff planted, within the States of South Carolina and Georgia, by authority of the General Government, for that purpose; and because their Legislature have not deemed it constitutional, nor proper that their members in Congress shall join in the general struggle for the mere favors of the General Government, and higgie and huckster for a road or a canal, as they would in a market or fair for a bale of goods or an ox."

Here, sir, we are informed that at that time, at one single session, there were applications and projects before Congress to the amount of $300,000,000* for objects of internal improvements, without an application from two large and respectable States of this Union, which, taking the year 1818 as an average, exported within $3,000,000 as much as the whole of the States north of the Potomac,† except Maryland, that exported about $4,000,000.

This distinguished Senator in continuation said:

"Sir, it is not the revenue you collect on foreign merchandise that constitutes the real wealth of a nation. It is the amount of your exports you are enabled to send abroad, that constitutes your national wealth." "And turn it as you will, all your revenue is ultimately paid from the agricultural pursuits of the laboring community, who are entitled to their full share of the dividends of the Treasury."

Without going into the enormity of the inequality and prodigality of such an extravagant amount, which was then sanctioned by the principles and recommended by the self same party, that has since become the advocates of economy under another name, I shall confine myself simply to the enormity of the amounts that they then had in contemplation to expend. Let it be held in mind that $300,000,000 had been applied for, exclusive of two large States;† which, if rewarded according to their exports, would have increased these applications near $200,000,000 more, making an aggregate of about 500,000,000 dollars, at a time, too, sir, when this nation was in debt to the amount of near $70,000,000, which, had these measures met the approbation of the Democratic party, in the aggregate would have left this nation in debt not less than $570,000,000; and if that party had failed in their opposition to such measures, would have been increased by this time into a national debt of from one thousand to two thousand millions of dollars; just enough, sir, to have realized all their splendid hopes of a "great national debt being a great national blessing."

Such were the extravagance, prodigality, and corruption, to which we directed all our energies of reform in the revolution of 1828; against this monstrous doctrine, of British origin, that "a great national debt is a great national blessing," it was against that we waged war, which resulted in a glorious triumph, and the prostration of the whole "American system" party, who were then their advocates, but who are now again raised to power by the wild infatuation of a deluded country, who, in my judgment, are destined to witness (if they have not authorized it by their own recent acts) a reiteration of the same attempt to rivet on them the renewal of this self same "American system,"—with recuperated energies, backed and sustained by the omnipotent power of the great paper credit system, to filch from the laboring and productive classes the profits of their industry, and, by its power of oppression of those classes, to subjugate them, and force them to a final acquiescence and submission to their tyrannical and oppressive measures of tariff taxation—of extortion, and extravagance.

This is the species of extravagance and corruption, and their results, that the Democracy were pledged to oppose, and which they have faithfully carried out to the letter, so far as they have had the power. Nor have they failed, upon proper evidence being produced, to correct such other extravagance in any of the departments of the Government that may have occurred even amongst the salaried officers, however much of minor consequence to the great principles of extravagance, that they had in view for reformation and retrenchment.

It is remarkable, sir, to have observed the declarations of the honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. Adams] in relation to our State debts. He stated that the debts of the States were upwards of $200,000,000, and that they had been incurred for internal improvements, which should have been effected for them by the General Government—no great difference between the absolute debt and the projected one, as stated in the speech of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, to which I have referred; and the only difference is, likely, that which might be saved by the conducting such works by the States having them under their immediate control; and that of the General Government, whose control would be more remote and more susceptible of a loss. And in this, too, the honorable member gives us no obscure hint, that it is the design of his party, if they dare do it, to assume these debts of the States in some shape or other, and saddle them on the shoulders of the General Government. In fact, in substance, such were his emphatic declarations. But, sir, I will pursue that branch of the subject no farther, in vindication of the party with which I act, against the charge of extravagance and corruption, and feel perfectly safe in trusting the whole subject to an impartial public.

I will return again to the branch mint, for the continuance of which, a motion has been made by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Green], to strike out the appropriation. I consider this question as directly involving the consideration of a National Bank. We cannot be for abolishing our mints, without having in contemplation a substitute; and sir, no one will deny that that substitute is a National Bank. The annihilation of one is, in effect, the substitution of the other. They are, in fact, antagonistical propositions in a great measure. The friends of the one are prone to view the other with great suspicion.

Now, sir, I here take my stand, not only against a National Bank as a substitute for our mints—to afford the laboring agricultural classes paper promises as a substitute for gold and silver, as equivalent for their labor and produce—but, sir, against the whole system of banking as it is now carried on in this country, as one of plunder and robbery of the great planting, productive, and laboring classes of the country. I stand opposed to this whole system of robbery of the planting, laboring, mechanical classes, as one unknown to the constitutional framers of our Government, and one which was openly and expressly repudiated and rejected by them, in refusing to grant the power (while in the Federal Convention that sat at Philadelphia) to Congress to form, originate, or establish, any such corporations whatever. I oppose them, sir, as a spurious batch—an off-spring illegitimately begotten of your Government, both State and General, if you please, unauthorized, and not sanctioned by any safeguard of your nation. I oppose them as engendering, and as having already engendered, an interest and influence in the country, not provided for under the Constitution of the nation, nor foreseen, nor even dreamed of, by its illustrious founders—an interest that has grown, sir, with gigantic strides, and has thrown a shade, and does, at this time, both here and abroad, over all other interest known and provided for by the fathers of the Constitution.

Sir, what were the great interests referred to during the long discussions that took place in the Federal Convention that framed your Constitution? What were those referred to in your State Conventions that sanctioned your Federal Constitution? What were they, I emphatically ask, (after the preservation of liberty,) but the commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests of the country? They held them as the great primary interests of the nation, as spoken of, referred to, and reiterated over and over again in your Federal Convention, and in every State Convention that was held at that time in the nation; but, sir, which are now held as only secondary considerations to the great paramount interest of bank corporations, rallying around them all the unproductive interests and influences of the nation, more potent than all the others combined, and have thereby effected a most complete revolution in the whole theory and practice of your constitutional Government, and if not speedily arrested in their onward course, must in future make and unmake all your Presidents ad libitum, and monarchs too, if it be their pleasure.

Will any man here dare deny their predominant influence in this nation at this time over any one other interest, and all combined, of those to which I have referred. A fact not more humiliating to the proud spirit of every free American, than it is appalling to every friend to the freedom and independence of his country throughout the Republic. They have effected a revolution in our whole free Republican system, that the united armies of all Christendom could not have effected in the same length of time. Facts, which the faithful historian must record, to our shame and lasting infamy, proving ourselves a degenerate race of a noble ancestry.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are told that in the last Presidential election, the people decided in favor of a National Bank, and sanctioned this monstrous system of banking in the country. Sir, can it be so? I cannot believe it. We have not less than ten subjects that the people, we are told, decided at the last Presidential election, and have they done it? Here they are—

1st. That they are to have a National Bank of $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 capital.

2d. That the taxes are to be increased by an increase of your tariff (upon luxuries, you are kind enough to say,) &c.

3d. The distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.

4th. Internal improvement by the General Government, or the assumption of the State debts.

5th. Reform and retrenchment, and the expulsion of corruption, &c.

6th. The erection of light houses and the building and rebuilding of harbors, fortifications, &c.

7th. That the making a national debt to supply temporary deficiencies in the revenue, was preferable to the use of Treasury notes, looking to it as a national blessing.

8th. The immediate and unqualified repeal of the Independent Treasury law, and the immediate reunion of Bank and State to fleece and tyrannize over our people.

9th. The call of an extra session, to put in operation this odious system, before the people are allowed time to detect the imposition.

10th, and lastly. That General William Henry Harrison is a real, and not a sham hero.

I might add another, which the Abolitionists say was decided in their favor; but as it might be considered out of order, I shall omit it for the present.

[Here some of the Southern members said, in an under tone, it was out of order, and the chairman indicated that it would be.]

Sir, I shall not press it, although I believe it was decided in their favor as much as any other question was decided by the people, except that General Harrison should be President—an effect which was produced, in my opinion, by combined causes, brought about mostly by that great and potent influence of the banking interest, which, by a certain process, was made to circulate through and penetrate every city, village, and hamlet in the land.

I do not believe, sir, that the mass of the people were bribed by those institutions. No, sir; far be it from me to suppose such a thing. There was no cause for such bribery. But that these institutions, or those interested deeply in them, used them as political machinery to coerce, rouse and agitate the people against their Government, there is not a doubt in the mind of any intelligent man in this country, and that their means were used, in every possible way, to effect their object, there is just a little doubt? It may be asked, how was this done. I answer, in a variety of ways. First, by furnishing and circulating, by agents employed, political documents themselves; and secondly, by furnishing their partisans the means to do it; the enlisting public presses, by accommodations in their favor, and furnishing the means for by continuance of some, and the establishing of others, through the whole country, to operate upon public opinion, and to rouse and excite the people to resist any and every thing in Government that did not promote their immediate interests. Yes, sir, yes; you now have it; it was the influence of the banking institutions over the public presses of the country, that brought about, more than any other cause, the revolution in 1840; and, sir, with the same machinery and materials, they can bring about another in 1844, and 1848, and 1852, and as often as it becomes their interest to do so, until the people are arcused with a just sense of the enormity of their powers, and the variety of means they use to effect their objects, and pass sentence of annihilation or reform on their whole system of operation. Yes, sir, here is the interest. Here is the influence that has undermined the great constitutional fabric erected by the immortal fathers of the Revolution of 1776. This has been the operation of that baselessly power, unbegotten of the Constitution of our forefathers—rejected and repudiated by them in convention assembled, to influence and overcome the right of suffrage of a great and free people, in the selection of the highest presiding officer of the nation.

Yet we are insultingly told that the people wills that it should be so. We are told, too, if the banks are let alone they will give peace to the country. How, sir? How? I say while they exist as they are, there never can be peace or repose in this country. Does not the very success of their operations depend upon their expansions and contractions. While this process is continued, how can there be peace or repose? Sir, the very idea of a banks giving peace or repose to a people, is a contradiction in the very nature of things; they never, never, can have it while they exist unbridled, as they have been for years. I have asserted that the whole system of banking is a mere system of extracting the profits of the laborer and producer, from the hands of those who toil in its production; as an illustration of the fact, suppose there was a community of bankers, and no other subjects upon which they could operate? Can the mind conceive a condition more wretched, in which mankind could be placed? Why, sir, such would be the starving condition of such a community, that they would be compelled to feed one upon the carcass of another, until the entire society should become extinct.

But, sir, how different would that community be who lived without the curse of those institutions, who depend upon their honest labor for a livelihood, and the produce of the soil given them by the God of nature, whereon to feed and procure their raiment? In such a state, a community could not fail to enjoy all the blessings that the earth afforded, without the least prospect of starvation, or of suffering, where the means of industry were properly applied, and the greatest profusion and abundance in the production of the earth would be theirs. Such would be the striking contrast between a banking community, and one where a bank was not allowed to exist. It is therefore clear that it is from the productive interest alone, that banks derive their greatest profits, either directly or indirectly.

Sir, these institutions are at war with the best interests of the nation in another way. They attract both capital and labor of thousands and hundreds of thousands from the pursuits of productive industry and mechanical labor, and convert them into an unproductive mass of bankers, stockjobbers, speculators, and sinecures, and disseminate them throughout the country, to suck the very life's blood of those who do labor in mechanism, or in the cultivation of the soil. So far, then, they operate most injuriously to the great growing interests of the nation, and add nothing to the wealth of the country, but act as continual embarrassments to its onward course in the production of substantial national wealth, and creating continual embarrassments to the operation of our whole political machine, by their eternal contractions, extortions, and expansions, and thereby rendering themselves a blight to all our internal repose and national prosperity.

Their injurious operations, too, upon our manufacturing classes, seem to have been greatly overlooked by many of the first statesmen and financiers of the age. It does appear, sir, clear to me, that nothing could act more injuriously to the manufacturing interest themselves, than the banking system to which I have alluded, and at the head of which I have placed a great National Bank. It is clear to my view as noon day, (though no manufacturer,) that the whole operation of the banking system, as at present carried on, is in deadly hostility to every manufacturing interest in the nation, and thus here involves the immediate consideration of its operation on the tariff to a certain extent. To me it has been an unaccountable fact, that the most of those who professed the greatest friendship for the manufactures, and the most strenuous advocates for high protective tariffs, for the benefit of those manufactures, should be the loudest in their cries for a National Bank, and the most active advocates of every State institution of a banking character.

Now, sir, it does appear to me most obvious, that nothing could be more destructive to the manufacturing interests, than an inflated, bloated paper currency, given by these banks to the country; and to ask for protection, by a tariff, to your manufacturing interest, while you advocate the banking system with its inflated currency, does appear to be an inconsistency amounting to a state of delirium or madness—a heterodox at war with the plainest doctrines of an unbiased reason and practical common sense. Let us examine for a moment the practical operation? By this paper inflated currency, the price of every article of consumption, the price of every commodity necessary to be used in your manufactures—the price of labor, even, is raised to a fictitious and inflated value in your operations, to the amount of from one to two hundred per cent. Under these circumstances, your raw materials are manufactured at an immense cost, arising entirely from the simulated inflation of your paper currency banking system. They are then taken by the vender to market, (say in Philadelphia, if you please, and are there brought in competition, for the first time, with similar fabrics manufactured in Europe, (say in England, France, or Germany,) where the same or similar articles have been manufactured, with labor, with commodities of consumption, or use in the fabrication of the articles, procured at the prices given them by a most stable and permanent currency, at a less cost to the manufacturer, by from one hundred to two hundred, and sometimes four or five hundred per cent. By this means, it is clear that the American manufacturer, with no better article, is compelled to sell at double the price at which similar and often better articles can be purchased of the European manufacturers; and the consequence is, that he cannot sell at all, and he is driven out of market. What is the next step? He flies to Congress for a remedy. The European or foreign articles must be taxed to the teeth by a tariff, either to exclude them from our markets, or to lay it so high on them as to disable them from selling to us their articles, though of a better quality, at so low a price.

Sir, in obedience to the demand of the American manufacturer, the tariff-tax is raised from 50, 100, 150, to 200 per cent. on the foreign articles, to force them to a demand for their goods, the same high prices that the American manufacturer asks for his, or to quit your markets.

Well, sir, this is protection to American manufactures. Foreign articles are by this process either excluded, or are forced to be sold, at the same high prices that the home made articles are sold for. And, sir, contented might we be if this operation only stopped here, and its consequences were no worse.

At this, all clamor ceases from that quarter, though at a great public sacrifice to all other interests. Things for a while seemed to go on well; but on a sudden your banks again expand; and labor, and provision, and all necessary articles in the manufactures are again increased in valuation, and again an additional increase in the price of all American manufactured articles is increased and demanded, in proportion to the additional quantity of the expansion of your banks. What, again, is the result to your manufacturer? He is again undersold by the foreigner, as he is by the inflation and expansion of the banks compelled to sell, if at all, at a higher price, being forced by that operation to fabricate his articles at a greater cost. And what next, sir? The clamor for protection is again raised to the skies, and another demand is made on Congress to raise your tariff taxes, to enable our manufacturers to sell in our own market, and to compete with the foreigner, who has crossed the ocean, paid his tariff tax, and is enabled to undersell, by this operation, the American manufacturer.

In obedience to this demand, Congress again increases the tariff tax to 25 or 50 per centum; this affords temporary relief, and gives a momentary quiet, until, again, your banking capital is increased, or another expansion is made, and with the resort to the same process over and over again; and thus is produced, by the clandestine operation of this banking machinery, one continued scene of revolution, crash, and confusion, in the whole body politic.

[Here Mr. LINCOLN rose and called Mr. B. to order for discussing the tariff, and said he represented an interest deeply interested in that subject; and if the subject was gone into, he should feel it his duty to reply to the remarks of the gentleman of North Carolina.]

The Chairman (Mr. BELL of Tennessee) said, the discussion of the tariff was out of order.

Mr. BYNUM said that it was very far from his purpose to discuss the subject of the tariff at this time—in fact, nothing could be more so; his object was only to show how injurious to the operation of the tariff system the existence of a National Bank was, in connection with the whole banking system; and to prove by it the inutility of a National Bank, and its injurious operation upon the manufacturing interests; it was, therefore, perfectly in order for him to refer, incidentally, to the tariff.

Mr. B. continued: He had but one other view to take of this subject, which was, in relation to the process of the practical operation of the banking system on the price of the manufactured articles of the country, in demonstration of the injurious and destructive effects of the banking system.

I have shown (said Mr. B.) in what manner the banks affected the prices of manufactured articles of this country, under the protection of the tariff system. I will now undertake to show that so long as the banks are encouraged and stimulated to inflate your "paper currency," and raise all domestic articles to the prices of a "paper currency valuation," that the increase of your tariffs, and their continuation even, is but a bounty paid to your bankers out of the profits of the productive classes, without affording the least relief to the manufacturers, for whose benefit it is intended. Now here is the practical operation; and it is in the worst light that the subject can be viewed: by your "banking paper currency" inflated prices, every article is increased, and to its highest price. Then this was the natural process practically resorted to by your foreign importer, to undersell your American manufacturer. Remember the price of all articles is now at their maximum, or highest pitch. The foreigner imports his goods, pays the tariff tax on them, and sells them again in the market at the inflated price created by the paper currency. He receives his money in the currency of the country—paper, of course. His first step is to take it to the bank and demand for it the specie, which, so long as the banks pay it out at all, is given to the foreigner. This specie is taken back to England, France, or Germany, and is again laid out in the purchase of foreign manufactured articles, at a specie currency valuation, at a price less by from 1 to 2, or 500 per centum of their selling prices here, given them under the influence of the "inflated paper currency system;" and thus the foreigner is again enabled, by the low prices in Europe at which he buys, and the increased high prices here, at which he sells, to pay, without injury to himself at all, the amount of the increased tariff by which he is taxed here. By this process, you will see it is perfectly plain that by the increase of your tariff taxes, direct or incidental, while the banks retain the power of expansion, and your banking capital is increased, you afford, not aid to the American manufacturer at all, but keep him eternally in the hands of his foreign competitor; and what is equally impolitic and injurious, it keeps up a perpetual drain of the specie from our country, and leaves the banks in a situation totally unable to comply with their domestic engagements of keeping their paper equivalent to specie; by which ruinous and destructive policy the whole people of the nation are brought to suffer most distressingly—all sir, all, resulting from this most ruinous system of banking corporations and fictitious paper credit system. Such I have shown is the practical operation on the tariff system and the manufacturing interests of the country. Let them look to it, and be prepared to meet its consequences.

Mr. B. said I will now endeavor to show in what manner this paper money currency affects the great growing, planting interests of the South, if I should not be considered out of order in doing so, with the same view that I have attempted to show in what manner it operated on the great manufacturing interests of the North.

I this day believe the people of the South the most oppressed and the most deluded people in relation to the operation of their own Government, of any portion of people in the American Republic. They pay at this time, in many of the States, a greater tax, in proportion to their capital and private investments, than any people on the inhabitable globe. What are the operations of this "inflated paper system" on the planting; producing and exporting classes? Sir, the South constitutes very near the whole of your exporting interest. Rice, tobacco, and cotton, are the great articles of exportation of the country; they are exclusively of Southern growth, with a small exception. Now, sir, the price of those articles is but little affected, if at all, by our own "inflated paper currency," the prices of those articles depend exclusively, and almost entirely, upon the currency of those foreign markets in which they are sold—i. e. the currency of the English, French, German, and other European markets, where those articles are sold, and which currency, in those markets, is emphatically, to all intents and purposes, a specie currency, and below that of ours from fifty to two hundred per centum; and upon those foreign markets, with this specie currency, are the whole South, or at least the growing interests of the South, entirely dependent for the prices of the articles of their productive labor. The "inflated currency" here made by bank issues, cannot affect the price of their produce abroad. This is too plain to admit of a doubt in any practical view that may be taken of the subject. Then, sir, how is that great essential and invaluable interest from which we derive eight-tenths of our national wealth and revenue, (or there-about,) affected by this base, spurious, "paper inflated currency?" Sir, this is exceedingly plain to every practical Southern farmer and planter in the country; and, sir, here they are affected precisely as are the home manufacturers, by the "inflated currency of the bank paper;" to them, every article and commodity, for use and consumption, provisions, labor, necessities of clothing, the price of slaves, stock, superintendents' wages, mechanical repairs, and every conceivable commodity connected with their farming and planting establishments, and with the indispensable supplies necessary for their cultivation—all these staple commodities of rice, tobacco, and cotton, are produced and are purchased at the high and exorbitant prices given to them by the fictitious, "inflated currency of bank paper," thereby forcing, by this operation of the system, the Southern planter to purchase all necessities for carrying on his business in the home markets at the highest prices, produced by the "bank paper system," and forcing him to sell his production in foreign markets, at the low prices arising from a more stable specie currency or its equivalents. Our cotton, rice, and tobacco are sold, in the foreign markets, at the lowest cash prices, and are grown and produced here, with all the means necessary for their production acquired at the highest possible "inflated paper currency" prices. Yes, sir, yes, this is the actual condition of the South, over which they have groaned and slept for the last twenty-five years and more, for the want, sir, in my judgment, of practical men and practical politicians among them to expose the enormity of the system, and the direct inflictions of it, from which they have suffered so much and so long.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to show, and have at least satisfied my own mind, that the whole banking system, with a National Bank at the head, has operated most ruinously and destructively, not only upon the great planting, laboring, and productive interests of the nation, but that it has operated as a withering blight to the great American manufacturing interests themselves, and which I think will be shown to every intelligent, practical man, as clear as the sunbeams, who will fully and impartially examine the subject in all its bearings upon American interests.

It has been for these reasons I have taken my stand against this policy, and though alone I may be left, am determined to abide the result.

I am, therefore, opposed on those grounds to the abolition of our mints, to make way for the more effectual application of the enormous system of banking institutions—blighting and withering as I believe and feel them to be, upon these great, essential, and invaluable interests of my country.

Having now shown, Mr. Chairman, the pernicious influence and effects of these institutions upon some of the greatest interests of the country, it is almost needless to inquire, what interests are benefited by them? That there are a variety of interests benefited by their operation, there can be no doubt; to state them in detail would be a useless consumption of time—they may all be included under the head of the non productive classes, who live and enrich themselves, not by their own labor, nor by the cultivation and production of the soil—the owners of foreign capital* in this country are benefited by them—the great owners of capital in our own country are benefited by them and above all, those are mostly benefited who are invested with the privilege of issuing paper, called money, to circulate with interest, without capital, and who constitute emphatically (I had liked to have said the ennobled) but in truth, the privileged classes of the land. Added to these are the whole surplus, idle, floating population of the country, which are mostly to be found in your larger cities, in every section of your nation, who are always ready for any revolution and change of rulers in the Government, so they find ready employment in effecting that change.

It was from this reason more than any other, perhaps, that Mr. Jefferson was induced to say that he viewed your large cities "as cancer warts upon the body politic," and, sir, upon this subject Mr. Jefferson spoke with a prophetic tongue. Such, in truth and in fact, are the beneficiaries of this great banking system, that has outgrown the Constitution itself in power.

But there is one other view of these institutions to which I would call the particular attention of the committee and the country. I have often spoken, sir, of the taxes which were levied on the people by these institutions, and which were paid without a murmur, while they raised their voices to the highest pitch against taxes paid to Government. I have also spoken frequently of the aggregate losses that had been sustained by the people from the banks during the time that the "hue and cry" was set up against the Administration for extravagance, &c. I then asserted that the people had sustained a greater loss by the banks than by all other sources known to the country. I have asserted, upon rough calculations, that the people paid a greater tax to the banks annually than they had to their own Government. And, sir, what was then assertion and calculation only, have now become official facts, by estimation yet uncontroverted. Here is an exhibition of losses sustained by the people from these institutions, as laid before the Senate on the 12th of February, 1841, by the report to which I have just alluded, in obedience to a call by that body on the Secretary of the Treasury for information of "the losses by the General Government, and by the people of the United States, from the use of banks and bank paper." Here is the summary contained in that report of the aggregate losses of the public, and the annual amount paid by the people, by the productive classes, emphatically, to the banks of this country, to which I invoke the sober and serious attention of every man in the Republic, and particularly those who live by labor or productive industry. I read from the report, pages 14, 15, and 16:

1. Losses by bank failures	$108,888,721
2. Losses by suspensions of specie payments by banks, and consequent depreciation on their notes	95,000,000
3. Losses by destruction of bank notes by accidents	7,121,332
4. Losses by counterfeit bank notes, beyond losses by coin	4,444,444
5. Losses by fluctuations in bank currency affecting prices, extravagance in living, sacrifices of property, and by only a part of the other incidents to the banking system, not computed above, at least	150,000,000
Aggregate, computed,	$365,451,497

Amount paid by the community to the banks, annually, the last ten years, for the use of banking institutions.

1. The resolution calls for the sums thus paid, whether "directly or indirectly," and whether by "the people or the Government."

It may be, therefore, that the amount collected by banks from the community annually, for interest, exchanges, rents, &c. ought, in the opinion of many, to be considered as what is paid to them "for the use of banking institutions." Consequently, an attempt has been made, first, to form some estimate of this amount which shall approximate the truth.

The result has been, that the whole payment made to the banks for the use of them, their capital, &c. during the last ten years, has been in the aggregate

This would be annually on an average

To explain the amount thus received by banks annually, during the last ten years, the following data are submitted:

The aggregate capital and discounts of all banks in the United States, during that period, so far as can be ascertained from the Treasury reports on banks, and some estimates, have been as follows:

	Aggregate capital.	Aggregate discounts or loans.
In 1831	Not ascertained.	Not ascertained.
In 1832	Do	Do.
In 1833	Do.	Do.
In 1834	$200,005,944	$324,119,499
In 1835	231,250,337	365,163,834
In 1836	251,675,392	457,506,080
In 1837	290,772,091	525,115,702
In 1838	317,636,778	455,631,687
In 1839	327,132,512	492,272,015
In 1840	358,442,692	462,896,523

[In 1830, $145,192,268, as capital, and $200,451,214 as discounts or loans, have been ascertained and computed by Mr. Gallatin, in his Considerations on the Currency.]

[The above amounts stated as the capital employed in banking require some explanation. It has been the practice, in most parts of the country, to put banks into operation chiefly upon the stock notes of the proprietors. By the reports of the Legislature of Massachusetts, in 1838, it appears that many of the banks in that State, which are generally as safe as any in the Union, have been put into operation upon the naked promissory notes of the stockholders, with little actual capital, excepting that which has accumulated from the operations of the banks. These promissory notes are the principal basis of the paper currency issued in the first instance. If confidence should happen to be buoyant for a succession of years, the interest on this currency, paid in advance, compounded as it always is at short periods, soon enables the stock notes to be withdrawn, without the application of any capital whatever, by the original stockholders. On the other hand, should a previous general inflation give rise to a demand for specie for exportation, in the early stages of any new bank, or where the stockholders have applied the dividends to other purposes, it explodes, and the community generally lose the greater part of the circulation out at the time. (See Raguet on Currency and Banking, p. 115; Tucker on Money, p. 409; Gouge on Banking, part 1st, p. 137.)

But in these tables I am compelled to make the computation as to capital as if it was all real and paid in, (so far as returned paid in,) on account of the difficulty in discriminating the amount that is factitious from what is not so. But I do not consider any thing as capital, which is merely authorized and not returned as paid in.]

Estimated average bank capital, yearly, from 1830 to 1840

Estimated average discounts or loans, yearly, from 1830 to 1840

The loans have, in some years, been nearly double the amount of the nominal capital in the whole Union. Thus, in 1838, they were 180 per cent. on it, and in ten States exceeded 20 per cent. In scarcely any State is it believed that they are, by law, limited below that rate, and sometimes they are limited in their charters at only three times the amount of capital. (Gouge on Banking, part 1st, p. 51.)

As the income or gross profits are derived, not only from loans of the capital, deposits, and circulation, over and above the specie on hand, but from exchanges, and a larger interest than six per cent. in all cases, by the mode of computing and paying it, (and, in several States, from 7 to 9 per cent. permitted by law,) it is supposed that the annual gross income must average twelve per cent. on the capital. This would be, as before stated, in the last ten years, annually,

Or, for the whole period,

Now, by the evidence contained in this report, there are two facts brought to light, which are as astounding and startling as they are enormous in their magnitude. In this the gross amount lost by the American people through your banking system, is ascertained, to be, by the best estimation, $365,451,497. More than half the amount known to have been paid for the expenses of the Government, since the foundation of the Republic.

And, sir, within the last ten years, notwithstanding the "hue and cry" raised against the expenditures of the Government of the people, the people have quietly paid annually to these unproductive, destructive institutions, $28,000,000, without a murmur, at least from the friends of this system; a sum in amount one-third more than they paid as the necessary expenses of the whole nation, as administered by the National Government. Yes, sir, here are 28,000,000 of dollars annually paid to the banks of the country by the people; the productive classes chiefly, without a murmur, while they have arraigned, tried, and condemned their own Government for expending in its operations an amount by one-third less than they have paid in taxes annually to those fleeing corporations.

Now can it be believed that the people have done this knowingly? Can it possibly be presumed, with such a knowledge, and such evidence before them, they can or will decree, by their suffrage, the continuation of such a system? Will they ever assent to pay to the support of such a system, an amount by one-third more than they pay for the support of the whole of the American army, navy, our civil and diplomatic relations? No, sir, no, sir; they may suffer a temporary delusion, by their too confiding dispositions in politicians, and their credulity in the hired, suborned, mercenary public presses of the country, that have become the mere agents—a part and parcel of this great machinery in the system I have described, to keep up the delusion, while they wrest from the hands of the poor laborers and producers of my country, by extortion, yes, extortion, the unprecedented amount per annum of $28,000,000.

Sir, can this American people behold this spectacle, without deep indignation swelling in their patriotic bosoms, that must burst with revenge on the heads of those hiring agents and their employers, who have so long combined to rob them of their substance by clandestinely wringing from them the hard-earned profits of their toil, to the enormous amount per annum of $28,000,000?

Mr. Chairman, can there be an occasion conceived by a freeman, that calls more loudly for revenge, revolution, or blood? Here is a system unknown to your Constitution; nay, more, rejected by your immortal framers of that sacred instrument, while in council assembled; now trampling upon the Government of their choice, and wringing from the earnings of this people a sum of $28,000,000 per annum—more than your constitutional, legitimate Government dare do. And yet, sir, we are tauntingly told, that the people, in the Presidential election of 1840, decided that these things should be so; that this system should live in the resuscitation of a great National Bank, with powers and means more potent and alarming than any ever heretofore conceived or dreamed of by the American people. Do the advocates of this system flatter themselves, by the acts of mystification, through their cordon of disciplined public presses, that operate so systematically upon public opinion from one end of this great continent to the other, that it will continue to avail them in practising their deception and extortion upon the great laboring, growing, and productive interests of this country? And when they are suspected even of oppression or extortion, or producing even embarrassment amongst the people, they are to whirl with the facility of a practised legerdemain, the whole of their misconduct, exactions, and oppression, upon the shoulders of the Government, and thereby induce a deluded people to hold their Government alone responsible, while they make off with the "spoils" of twenty-eight millions of dollars per annum. Sir, are they not presuming too much, and drawing too largely upon the ignorance and want of intelligence amongst the great mass of the hardy freemen of this country? Much sir, much. Well sir, well, as they have succeeded in such calculation, to the eternal discredit of the nation, I am myself still unwilling, loth, and reluctant, to believe it; I will not, cannot, while there is a vestige of liberty for the freedom of thought to be exercised in.

But we are told that we are still to have rechartered a National Bank, and this whole system revived and invigorated under its auspices, and that the people have willed it.

Has such a decision been submitted to the people? What said the honorable member from Virginia [Mr. MALLORY] a few days ago? Did he not state emphatically, that if a National Bank had been decided on by the people in the last Presidential election, he had been deceived, and that he had deceived others? What said the member from Georgia, [Mr. ALFORD,] and another member from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND? Do they consider a National Bank to have been decided in favor of, in the last Presidential election? And what said another member from Virginia in relation to that and other subjects, which are said to have been decided by the Presidential election? There are members of the same party, and differ most widely from others of that party in their opinions relative to what was decided in that election. I have nothing to do with the differences of gentlemen on that side of the House, and refer to them only as evidence that nothing of a decisive character upon that subject was decided by the people in the recent election. There are other facts I could mention, of a similar character, to show the gratuitous and most fallacious opinion that has been expressed upon that subject here, and particularly in another branch of this body.

Sir, let us take admonition from the lesson that is now before us? What is the situation of that institution that it is now in contemplation to re-charter? Does not every breeze that blows from the North bring with it some additional news of the disastrous condition of that mis-called institution, the United States Bank? Is not that institution now lying gasping for life, from diseases brought on it by its own follies and iniquities, and in its crash burying beneath its ruins the prosperity and fortunes of thousands and thousands of the most innocent persons? Do we not feel even here the shock which its fate has created? Does not every paper that we daily receive from Philadelphia, bring news of some new disaster to the public that has resulted from the ill management of that most mischievous machine, whose credit is now down literally to nothing, and bringing down with it, as I have before said, that of the credit of thousands? Sir, I deeply feel for the community who have suffered so sorely from the death-like struggles of this expiring monster; but fear that it is but a part of retributive justice, for overweening confidence, and criminal credulity. Yes, sir, a credulity which is now becoming the disease of the age, and the curse of the times—a credulity, that has been rejected by the wisdom and experience of every age. The losses by that institution to the public, no man yet can tell the extent of. Every city and village in the nation will, in some measure or other, be affected by them. Ay, sir, and in the country too, will many feel most sensibly the effects of this most magnificent failure.

Were this an isolated case of the disastrous effects of these pernicious institutions, I would not press it here, in demonstration of the baneful and mischievous character of the whole system. But, sir, what mail arrives from the North, South, East, or West, that does not bring with it some news of some recent bank failure? I have this day heard of one in the West, Gallipolis, I think it was called; and, sir, they have become so frequent, that no man who reads or hears of them, retains it a moment on his memory, unless he has some particular interest in the result. The whole system is continually blowing up from the North to the South, at the loss and sacrifice of millions to the people. Yet rotten and destructive—ruinous and disastrous as every additional day's experience proves this whole theory to be, strong as it is, there has long been a party that has embraced the whole system as a part of their creed, and who are resolved to hazard all that is dear and valuable to the people of this country in its defence, with all its ruinous, destructive, and devastating consequences. And this, too, is attempted in the very face of the explosion and failure of three hundred and sixty-five of these mischievous incorporated institutions, since the year 1789.

Here, sir, is the statement from the official report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to which I have before alluded—page 4 and 5.

Number and capital of banks which have failed in the United States since 1789.

1. From 1789 to 1811—
Ascertained and estimated at 20 in number, and a capital averaging each $150,000.
This would make the capital of all failing between 1789 and 1811	3,000,000

2. From 1811 to 1830—
Ascertained and estimated at 195 in all, viz:
Ascertained by Mr. Gallatin, in his Considerations on Banks, 165.
Capital of 129 known	$24,247,309
Capital of 36 not known, and estimated by me in nearly a like ratio, at $190,000 each	6,840,000
[Capitals of both estimated by Mr. Gallatin at near thirty millions.—Considerations on Banks, page 50.]
Computed to have been unknown to Mr. Gallatin, 30 banks with like capital	5,700,000
[See Gouge on Banking, page 224, part 2d, first edition; where it is stated that 25 more had been ascertained than were in Mr. Gallatin's list.]

Whole capital of banks failing between 1811 and 1830	$36,787,309
--	--------------

3. From 1830 to 1841—
The banks considered to be already broken, or failed entirely, since 1830, are supposed to have been about 150; of which, 140 have been ascertained. The average capital must be at least $300,000 each. This would make the capital of the 150 equal to	$45,000,000

Now, sir, with all these startling facts before the eyes of this injured and much abused people, will there be any party who will dare to step forward with ruthless hardihood, and propose a revisitation and continuance of these evils upon the heads of this suffering people? Will they dare to rivet on this country another mammoth Bank of fifty or one hundred millions of capital, with branches to bestride this nation, and extort twenty-eight millions of dollars per annum from the laboring and productive classes of the country? Can the people, by the operation of any system of trained and disciplined public presses upon public opinion, ever be brought to bear such a state of things? Sir, re-charter such a Bank under present circumstances, and what President will ever dare again to throw himself in the breach, and stay its onward course of extortion and oppression of this devoted people? Where will you find another Jackson, who will dare to grapple with such a hydra?

[Mr. MORGAN of New York said, in an under tone, "no where, he hoped."]

No, sir, said Mr. B. you will not find such another, for General Jackson was no "sham hero," no "paper chieftain." His fame will not be sung in mock heroics, nor be transmitted to posterity by sham and ostentatious parades, to gull the witless mob. The plainest narratives of his services on the battle field are written on the hearts of his countrymen, and will be handed down to future generations as monuments, as durable as time.

Once more recharter this Bank, and you will give it a perpetuity which may well bid defiance to the whole power of your Government to remove! Once more en throne it, with increased capital and privileges, and you enable it to laugh to scorn the calamities of this mighty people, and to inflict, with perfect impunity, whatever of embarrassment and distress may become necessary to promote its interest or to gratify its cupidity—a power, sir, which, before your Government will ever dare to encounter, it will trundle and bow down its humbled and humiliated head. Under the reign of such an institution, with its variety of means and resources of operation upon the wants and necessities of the people, and on public opinion itself, tell me not, sir, of liberty—its very name will be a mockery of the inestimable freedom of my country. Away with that boasted power of the people of electing their own President! You will have transferred it to more arrogant, ruthless, irresponsible hands; while you retain for them only the name—a mere shadow of a thing!

Yes, abolish your mints! Conclude the tragedy—or catastrophe, I had better say. Obliterate every vestige from the minds of the people of a solid, permanent currency, founded upon a specie basis! Repeal the Independent Treasury system, that separates Bank and State! Reunite them again, to operate on the people, and grind them into dust, as did the "union of Church and State of old," and you will have repealed your Constitution, and put an end to American liberty.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

REMARKS OF MR. RIVES, OF VIRGINIA, IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The question being about to be put on the various propositions for the amendment of the prospective pre-emption bill—

Mr. RIVES rose and said, before the sense of the Senate was taken on the various questions about to be submitted for its decision, he desired to say a word or two in explanation of the votes he should give upon them. He had no design to enter into the debate, as he felt that would be out of place for one who had so recently taken his seat in this body, without having had the advantage of either hearing or reading the able discussion which had occupied its attention for the last three or four weeks, on the subject of the public lands. He wished merely to state a few general notions which would govern the votes he intended to give.

The public lands (said Mr. RIVES) are the common property of the nation. They are so expressly declared to be, and solemnly consecrated to the common benefit of all the members of the Confederacy, in the deeds of cession of the respective States which originally held them, or have been since acquired and paid for by the common treasure of the Union. He was, therefore, against all schemes for alienating or dissipating this common inheritance, either by the wholesale operation of a cession to the new States, as proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] or by the piecemeal process of prospective pre-emption rights, as contemplated by the bill of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] But while he was thus opposed to all partial or exclusive appropriations of this common fund to the special benefit of particular States or particular classes, he had always been willing to see it administered in a spirit of liberality and paternal kindness to the new States, in the spectacle of whose prosperity and magical growth no one felt a higher degree of patriotic pride, or a livelier fraternal sympathy, than he did. A kindly and fostering policy towards the new States, and equal justice to the old, ought, in his opinion, to go hand in hand in all our legislation on this great national interest.

In regard to the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] to recommit the bill of the Senator from Missouri, with instructions to report a plan for distributing the proceeds of the public lands among all the States, it is (said Mr. R.) a question which necessarily and inseparably connects itself with the general revenue system of the nation, and could not be safely or properly treated apart from that general system. The public domain had always hitherto been a collateral, and often a very productive, source of national revenue, lightening to the extent of its auxiliary contributions, the burdens imposed upon the general consumption and industry of the country. It is true that, since the extinguishment of the debt of the Revolution, and of the debt created by the last war with England, there may not be the same urgent necessity for its aid in the national finances; but its diversion to other purposes, at the present moment at least, he thought neither prudent nor safe. The entire revenue of the nation, embracing both the proceeds of the lands and of the customs, it is admitted, falls short at present of the actual wants and expenditures of the Government; and we have, moreover, a new debt of unascertained and indefinite amount hanging over us, the extent of which cannot yet be known. The revenue, too, we are informed by the Secretary of the Treasury, will be still further reduced in the ensuing twelve or eighteen months, by some five millions of dollars more taken from the customs under the progressive reductions of the compromise act of 1833. In this state of things, actual and prospective, to withdraw the proceeds of the public lands from the National Treasury, and to throw the Government for its support and expenses exclusively on the customs, would be, of necessity, to add very greatly to that branch of the public taxes, and to run the risk, at least, of reviving those angry contests about the tariff which so recently distracted the country with intestine divisions, and which threatened, indeed, at one time, the peace and even the existence of the Union.

I know (said Mr. RIVES) it is proposed to obviate this danger by laying the additional duties that would become necessary to supply the resulting deficiency in the revenue, on articles of luxury. He was himself in favor of subjecting all articles of luxury from abroad to reasonable duties. They were proper and legitimate subjects of taxation, and ought, in his opinion, never to have been exempted to the extent they have been. But it must be borne in mind that there is a limit even to this resource, both in the nature of things and in the policy and wisdom of legislation. These articles of luxury enter largely into the commercial exchanges between foreign countries and our own, and constitute with some of them, indeed, their principal means of payment for the productions of our soil and industry. To burden them, then, with duties beyond a certain point, would be to derange the natural relations of commerce, and to diminish, to a greater or lesser extent, the effectual demand for, and consumption of, our products in foreign markets. It must be remembered, too, that an increase of revenue is not always the consequence of an augmentation of duty. It was a saying of Dean Swift, he believed, that, in the arithmetic of the customs, two and two do not always make four, but oftentimes one. You may double the duty upon a given commodity, and, instead of doubling the revenue from it, you may reduce it one-half or more by discouraging the consumption.

He held it, therefore, impossible, with any data we have now before us, for any one to say a priori with a satisfactory approximation to certainty, whether the contemplated duties on foreign luxuries would produce money enough both to fill the place of the land sales in the public fisc, and to supply the deficiency arising from the progressive reduction of duties under the compromise act. Without going into any details at present, he would merely say that to him it seemed quite doubtful. Suppose, then, in the event they should prove inadequate to perform this double office, what would be the consequence? You must either resort to what are commonly called the protected articles to raise the duties upon them beyond the 20 per cent. stipulated by the compromise act, and thereby renew the bitter strife which we have vainly hoped was finally laid to rest by the conciliatory adjustment of 1833, or otherwise you must create a new public debt by resorting to a loan in some or other—either of them consequences which, he was sure, would be sincerely deprecated by gentlemen who, with other views, are inclined to give their present support to the policy of distribution.

It seems to me, therefore, said Mr. R. that, regarding it for the present as a fiscal question only, the proposition for a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands is necessarily posterior to, and dependent upon, the permanent adjustment of the tariff, which must take place during the next session of Congress. The provisional arrangements made by the compromise act will run out by the 1st of July, 1842, and the large and admitted deficiency in the revenue that will then arise must impose upon Congress, at their next session, the inevitable duty of revising and permanently adjusting the entire revenue system of the nation, with a view to that "economical administration of the Government" which is recognised and consecrated as a principle in the very text of the compromise act, and which he hoped and believed would be faithfully carried out by the new Administration. The subject was one of the highest delicacy and importance in all its parts and bearings, and he had no doubt it would be met in a manner worthy of the character of American legislators—in the catholic spirit of American patriotism, and not in the narrow spirit of sectional jealousy on the one hand, or local cupidity on the other—and he felt a high degree of satisfaction in the belief that its harmonious adjustment was destined to become a new bond of union between the various portions of our widespread Confederacy.

He was not disposed at this time to disturb the foundations of that system which had been established by the wisdom of our most experienced and renowned statesmen for the disposition of the public lands, and which had been so often the theme of eulogy here and elsewhere. It had become fashionable of late, in some quarters, to decry this system, but, for his part, he had not seen the bitter fruits ascribed to it. Under it, the new States had already grown up to an extent of wealth and empire which, for the rapidity of its progress, was unparalleled in the history of the world, and hitherto harmony and contentment had been reserved by it among all the members of the Confederacy. He would not say that changes might not become necessary in this system. But this he would take the liberty to say, in a spirit of the most perfect kindness and respect to his friends who represent the new States on this floor—that if that measure which they seemed, most of all others, to deprecate, (distribution,) should ever hereafter become the law of the land, it will have been owing to too eager efforts to appropriate to special and exclusive uses a common fund, which the older States, to secure their equal participation in, under the sanction of the most solemn compacts, might be driven to unite in placing in a situation where it would become the common interest to preserve and protect it for the equal advantage of all.

In conclusion, he would merely add, as the result of the views he had expressed, that he should vote against the proposition of the Senator of Illinois [Mr. YOUNG] to recommit the bill with instructions to report the plan of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. CALHOUN] for a session of the public lands to the new States; if that should be negatived, he would then vote against the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] to recommit with instructions to report a plan for distribution; and in the event of that being also defeated, he would then have the temerity to vote against the "log cabin" bill, so called, of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] certainly in no spirit of unfriendliness to the real tenants of those homely dwellings, but from a sense of duty to the cause of justice and equal rights, which they are ever the foremost to defend.

REMARKS OF MR. JOHNSON, OF MARYLAND,

In the House of Representatives, December 24, 1840—
In relation to the public lands.

The memorial presented by Mr. REYNOLDS from the Legislature of the State of Illinois, praying a reduction in the price of the public lands, coming up for consideration, and Mr. REYNOLDS and Mr. PICKENS having addressed the House on the subject—

Mr. WILLIAM COST JOHNSON called for the reading of the memorial, and the instructions proposed to be attached to its reference to a committee.

The instructions were "to report a bill to grant prospective pre-emption to actual settlers, and to reduce the price to settlers, according to the value of the land."

Mr. JOHNSON moved to amend the instructions of Mr. REYNOLDS, by striking out all after the word instruct, and to insert, "to report a bill to have the proceeds of the sales of the public domain divided among the States in an equitable ratio, to be used by the States for internal improvements, education, or any other purpose, as may be deemed wise by the several States receiving said distribution."

Mr. JOHNSON then proceeded to address the House at considerable length on the subject of the proposed instructions, and in reply to the course of remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. REYNOLDS,] and to some of the observations of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS.]

He hardly knew, he said, whether to express pleasure or regret that the proposition had been brought forward by the gentleman from Illinois, or that suggestions had been thrown out in relation to it by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS.] He (Mr. J.) hardly knew whether to express pleasure that the subject of the public domain had been introduced at this session, or regret that it had not been deferred until the meeting of the next Congress. If the next Congress shall be composed of materials such as have been already intimated on this floor, the question of time is one of grave importance. It was, however, one of those questions on which his own opinion had been matured, and upon which he was as ready to act now as he should be at any time. He believed it to be a question which required profound deliberation and cautious and wise legislation. And although the debate had sprung suddenly upon the House, he would endeavor to make audible his opinions, and the reasons of his opposition to much which had been said. He had listened to the lamentations of gentlemen from the far West; he had heard them implore this House to be kind and generous towards them; he had heard them make appeals as if they were in the most dejected and impoverished condition. If the State of Illinois had suffered, as the gentleman who had addressed them this morning would have the House believe, by the oppressive legislation of Congress, let him tell the House how it was that that State had increased in population in a ratio beyond that of any other State of this Confederacy; why it was that an overwhelming tide of population had flocked there; and why it was that she was growing up like a mighty empire in the West. When gentlemen approached the House in this way, they ceased to be either generous or just to themselves, their people, or this House.

Mr. J. then referred to the history of the Western States, and proceeded to demonstrate the fallacy of certain positions assumed by the gentleman from Illinois. He asked if it was oppressive on the Western States that the lands entered by settlers are exempted from taxation for five years after said entry, why it was that the gentleman had not made an effort to have that condition removed by Congress? He (Mr. J.) would vote for such a bill. But the fact was, the exemption from taxation of the lands of the settlers was really a bonus to induce purchases, and in a great degree to tempt emigration from the old to the new States. And this measure of munificence on the part of the General Government to protect the settler from land taxes by the State until he should be allowed time to settle the land and improve it, is called a gross outrage upon the sovereign authority of the States. The gentleman has failed to inform the House how many millions of acres of public lands the General Government has granted to the new States for the purpose of education. One thirty-sixth portion of the lands within their limits has been granted for this purpose alone, to the total exclusion of the old States; and this done, too, by Congress when the vote of the new States was very inconsiderable. But now we are told that the new States have found out their strength, that they will first advocate pre-emptions and graduation of prices, and, finally, a total surrender of the whole to their cupidity.

Mr. JOHNSON said that he was unwilling to treat so grave a question with the slightest levity, but he could not better illustrate the justice and force of the gentleman's remarks, than by stating that it called to his memory the incident of a last will and testament of a gentleman who resided in one of the counties of Virginia, as he was informed by a distinguished citizen. This gentleman had fourteen sons, towards all of whom he cherished the kindest regard and tenderest affection; and, as often happens with an ancient parent, the youngest child became the greatest favorite. The confiding parent got his youngest son to write his will for him, in which he gave his homestead and stock—in short, all his real and personal estate, to this most honest, youngest son, and the rest of the estate to be divided equally among his brothers. [Much laughter.] And so are the thirteen old States to fare, if the gentleman speaks the sentiments of the new States. After they have received grants of many millions of acres—after they have grown up vigorously amidst the liberal policy of the General Government, they come here and taunt the House with their power and strength; telling us that justice no longer had a habitation in their bosoms, but that they came here armed with power, and would teach the old States not only that they will receive without acknowledgment past kindnesses, but that, by force of numbers, they will rescue the just heritage of the old States from them. Language of this kind might do to flatter the vicious taste of some few men; but he believed that it did not speak the sentiments of the people of the West. He believed that they would scorn the man who would wish to rob his neighbor for his own immediate benefit. He believed that gentlemen who uttered this language were not speaking the sentiments of a magnanimous and high-minded constituency.

The gentleman urges upon the House the necessity for a reduction of the prices of the public lands, because some land has been surveyed for ten, and some fifteen years, that is not yet entered at the land offices. Mr. J. would ask if that was not owing to a want of population and capital rather than a want of value in the lands. Can it be expected that the whole public domain is to be peopled with inhabitants, from the Wabash to the Rocky Mountains, in a few brief years? The old States are now annually drained of their wealth and their population to fill up the West. And where, upon the face of the globe, is labor so well rewarded as in the new States, or where is wealth so rapidly accumulating?

If the gentleman will examine the reports made to this House, he will find that the lands estimated as worth but a quarter and the eighth of a dollar a few years ago are now entered with great avidity for a dollar and twenty-five cents. The simple facts connected with the settlement of the public lands overthrow all the gentleman's assumptions and reasoning.

And he would appeal to the members from Mississippi, even Tennessee, and especially Alabama, for the truth of what he would assert, that, in those States, at the present reduced Government price, if it was not a mode of continual practice for planters to enter lands at one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre, and place them in cultivation a few years, without renewing the soil by the mineral or vegetable manures, discard them and enter fresh lands, and continue this process until the destruction of the soil followed their advance, and a dreary waste was left by this migratory cultivation. The gentleman's proposition would be to encourage this process of desolating the lands, rather than invite entries for permanent abode and cultivation; and it would encourage false entries and perjuries, and feed the insatiate appetite of the thousands of land speculators.

Mr. J. then alluded to some remarks which fell from Mr. PICKENS, and said that he could not agree that the Western States were in the condition of colonies, nor could he advocate the views of that gentleman, as he understood them, to surrender the public domain at once to the States, upon the condition of their returning a portion of the proceeds of sales to the National Treasury. He would acquit the gentleman from South Carolina of any improper motive in his course, but he believed that there were those in the nation who were playing high political games upon the capital of the nation—who were offering, as in times of old, largesses of the public property to effect selfish ends. And the effort at the other end of the Capitol to surrender the public domain to the States would fail of its purpose; the prominent gentleman who may have expected to gain the favor of the pre-emption settlers and squatters, would find that they would most warmly oppose his plan, because they would find it more difficult to take advantage of the States than of the General Government. Their selfish purposes could be better attained by the present than by that plan; and, in the end, if that plan should be effected, the General Government would quickly lose the proceeds of sale, after it had disposed of its own right to sell. The suspension of a State would be more embarrassing to the General Government than the suspension of payments by a bank, and an execution would be an awkward process to coerce payment in the event of delinquency.

He (Mr. J.) did not look to the increased representation of the new States on this floor with the same distrust as many other members. He thought that Ohio and Indiana were old States, as far as their interests were involved. Their distributive share of the public lands was an interest paramount to any other; and so had Ohio spoken by its legislative resolves; and such he believed to be the real interest of all the new States as well as the old. He believed that the calm and practical judgment of the citizens of the new States would so decide. Not only those who have entered lands at Government price, whom the Government would now injure by reducing the price, but all save land jobbers and land speculators, and political speculators of small intrinsic capital, with but few exceptions.

The gentleman who first addressed the House [Mr. REYNOLDS] said that the Western States are embarrassed in their finances. He (Mr. J.) would grant it, and that fact would be an argument against the plan of almost wholly abandoning the public domain to rapacious speculators. The old States are also embarrassed; and hence the interests of the old and the new are identical. Their mutual interest is to have their own property divided fairly among the whole, so that they can relieve themselves from their embarrassments. His own State, (Maryland,) Pennsylvania, and other States, required their just share of the fund arising from the sales of the public lands. Maryland had commenced a vast system of internal improvement, and one too extensive perhaps for her present limited means; but, with her share of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, she could prosecute it, and be relieved from direct taxation, otherwise there would be great embarrassment. Pennsylvania has had recourse to direct taxation, and she has claimed, by resolutions of her State, as Maryland and other States have done, her just proportion of this fund, set apart by the acts of cession of the various States surrendering the public domain to the General Government as a trustee, to divide the trust fund faithfully and fairly among all the States.

Mr. J. then, turning and addressing himself to Mr. PICKENS, said that, if he had a just conception of the policy and interest of South Carolina, that State was anxious to extend her avenues of trade to the valley of the Mississippi, that the rich commodities of its production should be emptied into the lap of Charleston, and that her distributive share would come very opportunely to her financial relief.

[Mr. PICKENS here rose and said that South Carolina had adopted direct taxation to meet her State exigencies, and that the people very cheerfully paid it.]

Mr. JOHNSON resumed, and said that he did not doubt that the people paid the exaction with great cheerfulness, nor did he know that it was a high point of honor for a State or individual to pay willingly just debts. He only would say that the people of South Carolina were a most strange people, if they preferred paying direct taxation to be wholly relieved from it, and that they would pursue a course different from any other people if they would rather eschew their portion of the public land in order to have their own property oppressed with a system of taxation of which his (Mr. J's) instructions would greatly relieve them.

He (Mr. J.) would say, whilst alluding to the opinions of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] that there was one opinion which he advanced whilst he was on the floor that he would most cordially agree with—that this question of the public lands was not a revenue question. He (Mr. J.) thought that it should not be so regarded.

When the Constitution was formed, the question of the public lands was a question of fruitful discussion. Maryland had for three years, during the darkest period of the Revolutionary war, refused to sign the Articles of Confederation unless the States would make cession of the waste territory within their territorial limits. And when the Constitution was formed, the States surrendered all power over revenues derived from customs to the General Government, among other reasons, because by the acts of cession of the States the public domain was to be divided among the States in proportion to taxation and representation; and it never was expected that the General Government was to live upon the bounty of the States' property, like a Revolutionary cripple or a superannuated mendicant.

Mr. JOHNSON then said that the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] who advocated the postponement of this question and the tariff until the next Congress, only confirmed the convictions which he had formed when he first read the President's message, that no measure of finance or relief to the people would be urged by the present dominant party in this House during this session. That the people would have to look to the next Congress for hope and for useful measures. Standing, as the gentleman did, in the high confidence of the President, he (Mr. J.) could but regard that he spoke advisedly when he urged a postponement of all those grave questions.

[Here Mr. PICKENS again rose and said that he did not wish to be understood as saying that the President or his friends would recommend no measure of finance to this Congress, for he had no such authority, and only spoke for himself.]

Mr. JOHNSON resumed. The disclaimer of the gentleman was inconclusive with him (Mr. J.) as an affirmation of what he had intimated; for he (Mr. J.) felt assured that if there was any purpose on the part of the Executive or his friends to bring forward any measure of relief, that gentleman [Mr. P.] above all others would have been cognizant of the fact, and that he [Mr. P.] was too skillful a parliamentarian to throw himself at full length in the Executive path if there was any such purpose in contemplation.

It was now clear to his (Mr. J's) mind that all the very important questions to the country were to be delayed, and that the responsibility of deciding upon them was to be thrown upon the next Administration. Such a course reflected as deeply upon this Administration as it was really complimentary, though not so intended, to that which would quickly succeed.

He, (Mr. J.) like Mr. Van Buren, would, on the 4th of March next, be placed, by the Constitution, on the dignified level of a private citizen. But, whilst on this floor, he was ready to act upon all questions which might arise; and none would he more cheerfully speak and vote upon than the tariff. But he would not contend with abstract theories, nor would he show his heroism, however well armed, by aiming blows at advancing shadows. When the question should arise in a tangible shape, when a bill on the subject shall be reported, it will be quite time enough for a discussion. He had no doubt in his mind, however, that when that subject should be properly brought up for consideration, it would be found less fearful than many gentlemen imagined; he doubted not that it could be settled to meet the wants of the Treasury, and in a manner so that the North and South could cordially shake hands, even in this Hall of fruitful contention.

The policy, which is adopted by the Executive party, of doing nothing of usefulness to the country, made it only more incumbent on such members as himself, who stood in the minority, to propose at least some plan of relief for the States and the people of the States; and hence he had introduced his substitute, which he believed the calm judgment of the unprejudiced would approve.

Mr. J. then addressed himself to Mr. REYNOLDS, and said that the gentleman from Illinois had made one earnest or seemingly earnest appeal to the members of the Whig party to support his (Mr. R's) proposition, if they were really the friends, as they pretended to be, of the tenant of the log cabin. He (Mr. J.) would inform the gentleman that it was because he was the friend of the tenant of the log cabin that he had opposed his (Mr. R's) proposition and introduced his own; it was because he was really anxious to improve the condition of all classes, and especially the most needy, that he was for dividing their own property among themselves; it was because he was sincerely the friend of the indigent that he was for rescuing their own estate from the grasp of the land jobber and the land speculator, where that gentleman's measure would place it, and was for dividing it for the benefit of all. The tenant of the log cabin in Maryland had the same interest with the citizen of Illinois. The blood and treasure of the old States had won the public domain, and the deeds of cession had consecrated it as a trust-fund for the benefit of all to the latest posterity.

Does the gentleman desire that every citizen of the old States must abandon the land of his fathers and of his birth, and take up his residence in the new States, or be excluded from his own patrimony? Can he, as a statesman or a philanthropist, desire to see the old States depopulated? Does not the present broad and strong tide of emigration satisfy his ambition and sufficiently gratify his hopes and his pride?

He would not boast of his Democracy, because the professions of public men were generally heartless. But he trusted he was still not the less a Democrat if he boasted but little about it. His Democracy he would have to consist of this: As a citizen, to respect the will of a majority constitutionally expressed; as a legislator, to advocate and adopt such measures as would dispense the greatest amount of benefits to the greatest number of the people. And he humbly conceived that his proposition would diffuse the splendid inheritance of the people of the nation among all the States, so as to open avenues of commerce, and give a stimulus to agriculture and the mechanical pursuits. The proposition of the gentleman [Mr. REYNOLDS] would close the door of the log cabin to the schoolmaster: his (Mr. J.) would throw it open to the light of instruction. It would furnish the States with a fund which would rear up a temple of education in every region of the nation, and diffuse moral and religious knowledge to all the rising generations. And who that has looked abroad is not impressed with the necessity?

A morning's paper had informed him that Kentucky, as noble as that patriotic State is, was rearing up more than half of her children without proper education; and in Virginia and other States, the condition of the rising generation was as deplorable. The very foundation of our Government is based upon public opinion. Public opinion was almost as strong as the Constitution itself. And this public opinion should be enlightened, to be patriotic. Public liberty is unsafe when electors are too ignorant to understand the true interest of the nation; and he who is most ardent in the hope of having the wise genius of our Republican institutions transmitted, must advocate measures which diffuse universal education in every region of the nation. Congress discharged but half of its duty when it granted large amounts to all the new States and Territories for free schools and academies; it should have set apart a like amount to all of the States. Let the neglect of the past Congress be amended by this; or let his instructions go to the committee, that they may report at least a bill upon the letter and spirit of the acts of cession.

SPEECH OF MR. COLES,

OF VIRGINIA.

In the House of Representatives, February 2, 1841—
In Committee of the Whole, on the Treasury note bill.

Mr. COLES addressed the committee as follows:

MR. CHAIRMAN: It has not been my practice to engage in the general and protracted debates which have so frequently occupied the time of this House, and exhausted the patience of its members. I have, upon such occasions, given place to others more anxious to speak, and contented myself with a silent vote.

We are now on the eve of unknown changes: it is declared from high sources, that an eventful revolution in the policy of the Government is at hand. Vital questions have been introduced into this debate, which have not been decided by the people, and which deeply involve their individual and political condition. The present discussion may not enlighten the country, but it cannot fail to excite universal interest, and that degree of solemn reflection which will enable the public mind wisely to instruct those who are to come after us. In this respect, it is one of the most important debates that, at any time, has taken place in this country. If further apology was necessary for departing from my usual custom in now trespassing upon the attention of the committee, it may be found in the fact that an important interest of my constituents has been brought under review, and my course, in regard to it, particularly alluded to. The tobacco trade has been introduced in connection with retaliatory duties—the effect of which may be to enlist that interest into the dangerous combination with manufactures, for the establishment of a system of unlimited taxation. Under such circumstances, it is my duty to remain silent no longer.

I shall vote for the bill on your table—not as a party measure—not to favor the coming or the departing Administration—but to provide means for the Executive faithfully to execute the laws. If, sir, the new President, and the party who have elected him, shall truly aim to accomplish what was promised for them in my portion of the Union, they shall have, with little exception, my hearty co-operation in whatever station I may be placed. If they shall reform real abuses, reduce expenditures, oppose distributions out of the common fund, oppose taxation of the whole to enrich favored portions of the community, oppose a National Bank, and if they shall honestly aim to administer their trusts for the common good, and in strict conformity to the Republican maxims of Jefferson; then, sir, it will cost me no change of my previous course to lend my cordial support. All these promises were made. I knew better than to believe they would be fulfilled, and voted against the successful candidate. From an intercourse with members of both political parties, from their votes, and from their open declarations at this, as well as at former sessions of Congress, I have just as little hope now as I had then that any such results will take place. No, sir; it is evident here, and will shortly become palpable to the whole country, that the reigning policy of the new Administration must tend in a contrary direction. My position, should I again be honored with a seat on this floor, must necessarily be in the opposition. It will, though, Mr. Chairman, be a frank, decided, and determined opposition to measures which I honestly believe will be disastrous to important interests, and dangerous to the safety of free institutions, on which all that I hold dear mainly depends. Nevertheless, I shall not lend my representative character (after the example of others) to injure the interests and honor of my country, and to create confusion and distress, in order to render a party obnoxious to the people, who have, as I think, been unfortunately entrusted with the management of their public concerns. I have had no personal favors to ask of the President, and have as little care for the smiles or the frowns of his successor. It has been my object to perform my duty to the Constitution and to the people; and it shall be my endeavor to require the performance of the same duty by the Executive incumbent, whoever he may be.

The bill under discussion proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue five millions of Treasury notes. Does the condition of the Treasury require additional means, and if so, is this the best mode of supplying them? are questions to be considered.

It is not remarkable that there should be difficulty in clearly understanding Treasury reports. It is no new thing, and has occurred from the days of General Hamilton to the present time. The business of the Treasury embraces such a variety of subjects, and such a multitude of details, that it is impossible so to condense it as to make a balance sheet that can be fully comprehended at a glance. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, submitted in December last, says, that, according to the estimates made by the different Departments, of what would be required to be paid in the last quarter of the year 1840, there would be a balance of unexpended appropriations on the first day of January, 1841, of $10,549,905. In that event, there would have been little or no balance in the Treasury on the last named day. But the Secretary (having two months more to judge from) was of a different opinion, and estimated the payments of the last quarter of 1840 at about five and a half millions, which would leave a balance on hand on the first of the year of about one and a half millions, and a balance of unexpended appropriations of over thirteen millions. The Secretary appears to have been nearer right, since not so much as his estimate was called for, and, in consequence, the cash left on hand, as well as the amount of unexpended appropriations, were something greater than were even at the time of his report calculated on. Precise accuracy cannot be arrived at in these amounts until the accounts can be received from the remote points of this extended Confederacy. Nor is it important, for all experience justifies the expectation that the amount of appropriations remaining unexpended at the end of one year will about equal and offset that of the preceding. We may therefore fairly calculate that the amount remaining unexpended on the 1st day of January, 1842, will nearly or quite equal the amount existing on the 1st day of January, 1841, leaving the means of the year free to meet the amount of permanent and new appropriations.

Unexpended balances of preceding appropriations necessarily exist at the end of every year. They always have existed, and always must exist, without any regard to the amount of money in the Treasury; being sometimes greatest when the surplus amount in the Treasury is largest. Appropriations are made by one session of Congress, not for the service of the year alone, but to continue the operations of the Government until the close of the next session. If this were not the case, and there were at the end of the year no unexpended balances of appropriation, a very large portion of the public service would have to stop until Congress could pass the usual appropriation bills, which is frequently not done until June or July. No matter how much money might be in the Treasury, not a dollar could be drawn out without an appropriation made by law. What, then, would be the condition of the army and navy, together with all of your public works, without funds from the end of one year to the middle of July in the next? This balance of unexpended appropriations is denominated a debt, which in fact arises out of the customary and necessary action of the Government. An appropriation is the authority to pay out any money that may be in the Treasury, for specified objects. The amount of unexpended appropriations at the end of the year is ascertained without difficulty, by deducting the amount of payments from the whole amount of appropriations authorized by law. The Secretary's report is made up before the end of the year, and he is obliged, of course, to estimate the payments for the last quarter. He states with certainty the actual payments made in the three first quarters of 1840, at - - - $21,188,128 41

And estimates those expected in the last quarter (including $425,000 for the redemption of Treasury notes, and $30,527 71 cents, for balances of funded debt) at 5,455,527 71

This calculation would make the payments of 1840 - - - $26,643,656 12
Leaving in the Treasury on the 1st day of January, 1841 - - - 1,580,855 00

By examining the accounts that have been rendered in the different reports, and the laws of the last year granting appropriations, gentlemen might (with half the labor they seem to have devoted to this subject) have tested the accuracy of these estimates. The large documents giving an account of the total receipts and expenditures, which are annually submitted to Congress, exhibit the receipts, the payments, the cash on hand, the appropriations, and the amounts of unexpended appropriations at the end of each year, up to the year 1840. The details in the last quarter of that year cannot all be precisely stated, owing to the impracticability of getting in all the accounts so soon after the close of the year, but they can be estimated with sufficient accuracy for all practical purposes. By deducting the payments from the receipts, you have the balance that ought to be in the Treasury; and by deducting the payments from the amount of appropriations, you have the balance of unexpended appropriations.

If the Secretary was wrong in estimating the payments of the last quarter of the year 1840, it will not alter the final result. Say that less than five and a half millions were paid in that quarter; then there will be a larger balance of unexpended appropriations outstanding on the 1st of January, 1841, and a corresponding larger balance of cash on hand at the same period to meet it; which I understand are, to some degree, the facts. In the opposite state of the case, if more than five and a half millions had been paid, then there would have been less cash on hand, and a less amount of unexpended appropriations to discharge.

The President, in pursuance of authority vested in him by law, suspended the appropriations on certain public works. But the superintendents of those works, it is said, yielding to the importunities of the workmen, consented for them to go on, in a limited way, upon important parts of the works, on condition that they were to be paid at a time when the state of the Treasury would admit of it. I allude to this transaction now, only to show that it does not vary the general result, and cannot be an additional obligation; it constitutes a part of, and is included in, the balance of unexpended appropriations. It is represented by the Departments not to exceed $200,000; and, whether small or large, cannot be set down as an additional charge.

At this session the cry is changed; from the same quarter that we have heard, during the pendency of the election, charges of profligate expenditure; we now hear charges of parsimony, niggardly economy, and suspended payments, in order to throw on the next Administration heavy debts. How is this met by facts? The amount of unexpended appropriations is less on the first of this year, than it was at the commencement of this Administration, or at the beginning of any other year.

It was on the 1st day of January, 1837 - - - $16,946,670 53
On the 1st day of January, 1838 - 19,144,747 58
On the 1st day of January, 1839 - 17,839,935 32
On the 1st day of January, 1840 - 15,361,272 91
And is estimated to have been on the 1st day of January, 1841 - 14,000,000 00
These balances of unexpended appropriations are never all expended; appropriations to pay unsettled accounts, frequently exceed the amount found due on settlement; and appropriations to construct a public work or pay any other estimated demand, sometimes exceed what is actually required. If from these or any other causes any appropriation remains unexpended for two years, by a standing law it ceases to be an appropriation, and is returned (as it is denominated) to the surplus fund. In this way a variety of balances, amounting to from one hundred thousand to a million of dollars, have annually ceased to be authorized to be expended.

Gentlemen should be cautious in setting down unexpended appropriations as unwarrantable debts against a succeeding Administration. If the votes of a large majority of their friends, if the declarations on this floor, in the Senate, and elsewhere, of the most conspicuous members of their party, are to be taken as indications of the measures of the new Administration, the expenditures will be largely increased; and General Harrison will be fortunate if he does not, at the end of his term, transmit to his successor a balance of unexpended appropriations of twice the present amount.

A large permanent debt is said to exist, justifying an immediate loan, and increased taxation. Where is this debt? In what does it consist? The ten thousand claims which are said to be asking justice in vain at our hands, are placed as the first item. I have no doubt there are some instances of hardship, arising out of the impracticability of deciding on such a multitude of cases that are annually presented to Congress. When I first came to Congress my sympathies were frequently excited in behalf of pitiful claimants, said to be cruelly sent from your hall without justice or mercy. A little experience has taught me that most of these cases are cases that have been properly rejected at the accounting offices, many of them have been repeatedly presented and rejected here, and I have good reason to believe that very few, perhaps not one in a hundred, ought to be allowed.

If the new Administration is eager to constitute a national debt out of these claims, and will proclaim to the country that such claims will be paid, instead of ten thousand, it may have ten hundred thousand to satisfy. Does any one expect that the claims, amounting to five millions of dollars for French spoils before 1800, will be shortly allowed. Is it expected that this Congress will borrow money, or levy taxes, in order to grant to the States nine millions, the amount of the fourth instalment, of what was falsely called the deposits? Is it gravely expected that five or eight millions shall be borrowed, and vested in stocks, in order that the interest shall be ready to pay the annuities engaged to be paid to the Indians? or do gentlemen expect so soon to revive their favored objects of harbors, roads, and other improvements? or to unreasonably extend the public defences by studding your immense frontier with armaments, and whitening every sea with your navies? No, gentlemen, if you are to have a great national debt, made up of rejected claims, many of which are as old as the Government, and of new projects of distribution and wild extravagance, you must contract it yourselves—you cannot indulge the hope of beginning it in the few remaining weeks of this session. Go home first, and ask your constituents if General Harrison was elected for any such purposes. I will warrant that you have mistaken the issue at the late election, or many, very many of the voters have done so. It appears demonstrable that the balance of unexpended appropriations on the 1st day of January, 1841, may properly be assumed as including every expenditure that can fall on the year, except the estimated permanent appropriations and such new appropriations as shall be authorized at this session of Congress. It also is reasonable to expect a like amount to remain unexpended at the commencement of the next year. We have then, Mr. Chairman, only to inquire whether the cash in the Treasury, and the probable income, will be sufficient to meet the amount of permanent appropriations, and such as this Congress may authorize.

The balance in the Treasury on the 1st day of January, 1841, was estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury at - - - $1,580,855

And the income from all sources at - 23,142,618

Making the whole estimated means of the year - - - $24,723,473
On the other hand the estimate of the expenditures of the year 1841 are stated
For ordinary purposes at $19,250,000
For the funded debt, chiefly for the cities of this District - 149,200
For the redemption of the Treasury notes - 4,500,000
$23,899,200

Leaving a balance in the Treasury after discharging all the obligations of 1841, on the 1st day of January, 1842, of - - - $824,273

The above estimate of $24,723,473, as the means of the present year from all sources, is admitted by both sides of the House to be low enough; and particularly by those who are most competent to judge. I shall therefore not trouble the committee further on this point; and take it for granted.

The permanent and new appropriations of all sorts, ordinary and extraordinary, which have been estimated to be required for the year 1841, amount, as above stated, to 23,899,200. This estimate is greater by $1,764,480, for ordinary purposes, than is called for by the Departments, and will allow for other grants by Congress, and any unexpected diminution of the balance of unexpended appropriations, on the first of January, 1842. But it must be recollected, that the greater part of the above estimate of twenty-three millions is yet under the full control of Congress, and cannot be a charge, unless we make it so. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RHETT] has shown that it is ample for the service of the year. The Committee of Ways and Means, I understand, propose to reduce the amounts of many of the items. It would appear, therefore, that all objects not included in the estimate, and requiring appropriation, may be provided for, without trenching on its amount. I, and most of those with whom I usually act, will be disposed to reduce the appropriations still lower, and leave in the Treasury a larger balance at the end of the year, after paying all demands. Will those who have been preaching economy so lately, grumble at the allowance of twenty-three millions of dollars; which is nearly double the average amount of their pattern Administration? It is in keeping with first contributing to force on us expenditures, which they afterwards denounced as extravagant.

From the face of the statement I have presented, it would appear that no additional supply was required; but from the inequalities between the receipts and expenditures in the different periods of the year, some provision becomes necessary for the occurrence of larger demands, and diminished receipts, during the first quarter of the year. During the existence of the funded debt, and before the reduction of the tariff, more money was raised than was required for the ordinary support of Government; and no such contingencies were experienced. As long as the policy is continued of attempting to square the revenue with the economical wants of the Governments, we shall be liable to these temporary inequalities between the receipts and expenditures. The appropriations are made in anticipation of revenue to be collected from taxes on importations, and sales of public lands. They are fixed and demandable generally at certain periods; whilst the revenue is uncertain, and subject to vary from any estimate, no matter how carefully made. If after the appropriations have been made, and Congress should adjourn with every reason to expect a revenue adequate to meet its appropriations, an unlooked for deficiency should occur, serious embarrassments would be the consequence, unless the Executive had authority to suspend a part of the appropriations, contract a regular loan, or issue Treasury notes, which appear to be the only means by which such a de-iciency can be guarded against. During the last session, it was thought advisable to authorize the President to suspend a part of the public works, until the accruing revenue would justify their resumption. At this session it is proposed to authorize the issue of five millions of Treasury notes. They will not make any addition to the obligations of the Government, because they are not to be issued except for lack of timely means, and, when issued, stand in place of obligations incurred by the appropriations authorized by law. They are not required on account of any deficiency of the whole year, but to meet heavier payments than the accruing revenue in the earlier part of the year will be in time to satisfy, though by the close of the year it may be equal to the redemption of these notes, as well as all other charges. The want appears to be temporary, and is immediate. How shall it be supplied? No one will say that taxes can be made available in time. It is also well known that a regular loan cannot be had without more delay for advertising and contract than circumstances admit. To do what individuals are in the constant habit of doing, give their own notes instead of borrowing, or in other words issue Treasury notes, seems to be the only alternative. The issue of Treasury notes is no new thing. It has not been confined to this Administration, and has not the least connection with what is called the Sub-Treasury system, as some have ignorantly or deceptively represented. Their issue was authorized by six separate acts of Congress during Mr. Madison's administration. The then members from my district, Mr. Clay and Mr. Kerr, voted for them, although the latter, who is still alive, is far from being a Sub-Treasury man. Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Crawford, Mr. Macon, Mr. Lowndes, Mr. Cheves, Mr. Giles, and nearly, if not quite all, of the old Republican party, sanctioned or recommended their occasional use. Every known Government in the world, and I had almost said every individual, has, at some time, found it necessary to use credit in a similar mode.

The constitutional power by this Government to issue Treasury notes, has not been entirely without question; but it has been doubted so rarely, and by so few, that little weight of authority rests against it. I will not trouble the committee by repeating arguments much better urged in the able discussions on the constitutional question, at this, and at preceding sessions of Congress. For myself, it appears equally rightful to issue notes directly to original creditors, as to regular lenders; and much more so, than to give bonds to banks in exchange for their notes, with which to pay creditors.

The issue of Treasury notes is the most convenient mode of borrowing; and its very convenience forms the chief objection to its exercise—upon the ground that it may be better for an individual to deal at the furthest store, or borrow money from the most distant bank—a too frequent resort may be prevented by the additional trouble. In temporary and sudden emergencies, such as the present, the case is different; and the convenience becomes important to supply a want, which, if not supplied at once, need not be applied at all. The notes are authenticated after the manner of authenticating certificates of loans—are charged to the Treasurer as soon as issued, and have to be accounted for by him under all the guards that give security to the funds of the Government. They may be made ready to meet immediate wants, pay no interest until the day they are issued, are receivable, and generally are all received in payments of the dues to the Government; and they bear no interest at the end of twelve months from their date. Although they have greatly the advantage of regular loans, or of taxes, in being more speedily got and gotten rid of, yet the power to issue them is liable to abuses; and I am far from being favorable to its use, upon any occasion whatever, except the supply of a temporary want, in anticipation of an accruing income. It is not enough that there are objections to Treasury notes. There are objections to other loans, and to taxes—they, too, are liable to abuse. Although each may be necessary in its place, yet they are all evils, and the less we have of either the better.

As amendments to this bill, we are told that separate propositions will be submitted—to contract a loan for ten millions, and to raise the taxes on silks, wines, and linens. Both are unavailable for present purposes, and premature and unjustifiable as provisions for any probable want of the future. No one knows what the future will require. The new Administration and its friends, now in the majority, are to settle the scale of expenditures—they alone can properly estimate the supply. If they, contrary to their past votes, contrary to the declarations recently made on this floor, should prefer to redeem the pledges of economy lately made to the people during the canvass for the Presidency, they will have ample opportunity to do so. The Florida war, the purchase of immense tracts of land, the removal of Indians, and the reducing list of Revolutionary pensions, together with other objects of expenditure, will cease to hang so heavily on the coming Administration as they have on the present. The income of this year will, in all probability, meet its expenditures, including the redemption of Treasury notes. The income of the next may be adequate to economical wants. If, on the other hand, the coming Administration is to embark on the splendid voyage described by so many of its friends—if they shall attempt to sustain the fallen fortunes of banks and State stocks, by loans and distributions out of the common Treasury; then the proposed loan of ten millions, or the tax on wines, silks, and linens, will be but an insignificant beginning of the supply of the millions upon millions that will be needed.

We are asked, will you not tax luxuries? And much is said of the poor and the rich, with the view no doubt of getting up a poor man's feeling in behalf of this tax. Take off an equal amount of the taxes on necessities, and I will go with you. Until you do, before you levy this tax on luxuries, tell us what you mean to do with its proceeds. Is it for the proper service of the Government? No, sir: it is openly avowed, by many of the most influential members of the party, that it is to supply the place of the revenue from the sales of public land, which it is designed to give away to the States. I consider this object as totally unwarranted, and but the entering wedge of boundless extravagance and unconstitutional legislation. But how is it to be effected? The revenue from public lands is estimated at five millions; the proposed duty of 20 per cent. on silks, wines, linens, &c. will yield an amount not exceeding two millions more than is at present received from those articles. You will then have to go further into the list of free articles, and those paying a duty less than 20 per cent.

According to the very able report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to the Senate, on the subject of the reorganization of the tariff, it appears that, after June, 1842, all duties on importations now above twenty per cent. will be reduced to that rate, as limited by the act called the compromise act; and that, between the first of December next and the following June, the duties on the same importations will fall five millions short of their present amount. Presuming that the limit of twenty per cent. on protected articles will be adhered to, and that it may become desirable to supply the place of the five millions reduced by the compromise act in December, 1841, and in June, 1842, he proceeds to select from the list of free articles, and that of those paying less duty than twenty per cent. all articles in his opinion fit to be taxed; and shows that fifteen per cent. on this selected list will only raise the required amount of five millions of dollars. Silks, wines, and linens, are included. The importations of coffee amounted to seven millions, of tea amounting to two millions, together with all necessities which have been considered proper subjects of taxation, are also included. Now, sir, distribute the five millions from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and can any one shut his eyes to the consequences? You must exhaust at once, to supply its place, all those resources pointed out as necessary to supply the deficiency arising under the last reductions of the compromise act. If this deficiency has to be provided for, as most of the Harrison party, at least, think will be necessary, where will be your resources? Given away—the compromise forgotten—duties for protection raised higher than 20 per cent. and necessaries, such as salt, sugar, iron, and coffee, as well as luxuries, subjects to onerous duties. But this is only the first step. Follow up this lawless distribution, by distributions from the other branch of the revenue: enter on your system of harbors, roads, and other unnecessary and unauthorized measures, and you will have to add to the taxes faster than they have been reduced in the last ten years. Exorbitant and oppressive as they may become, they may leave but a scanty allowance for the wants of the Government, after paying the interest of the gigantic national debt, to which the policy of the Harrison party must lead us, unless it can be arrested by the interposition of the people.

It is said that the Treasury is bankrupt. If, sir, a temporary want of present means, in anticipation of a sufficient annual revenue, constitute bankruptcy, I glory in it. It forms the strongest guarantee against the contemplated waste and extravagance of the coming Administration. How is the Treasury bankrupt? has any legal demand been rejected during the last year? No, none can be pointed out. The taxes have been gradually reduced. But is there any falling off of resources? During all the affected and real ruin among bankers and stockjobbers, those who defend and support the country have wonderfully increased in numbers and in wealth. They hold in their hands ample resources for all proper purposes; you have only to call on them, and your wants will immediately be supplied. In the last ten years, one-third has been added to your population; and the assessments of property in the different States show even a greater increase of wealth. Whilst you have heard of ruin, ruin, ruin, every where, you have increased in population four millions of people; and in wealth, nothing short, perhaps, of one thousand millions of dollars. Has any nation such boundless credits as is possessed by this Government? What is the condition of most of the States in this Union, or of any State in Europe, compared to that of ours? Abandon not the policy that has contributed to such results. If this Capitol could be converted into gold, I would reconvert it into stone, rather than it should be made the instrument of corrupting and overturning the free institutions purchased by the blood of our fathers.

The character of the country is said to be at stake, and it has been gravely urged as an argument why this Government should extend relief to the sinking credit of State stocks and State banks. To what enormity would this argument lead? The first duty is not to foreigners, or to spendthrifts of our own land. Our first duty is to our oaths, and to our constituents; and the best mode of preserving our character is to perform our duties and confine ourselves to our own business. I deplore the fallen condition of State credit and the general ruin of banks and speculators. But their calamities have sprung from moneyed operations, in which this Government had no agency. On both sides, those concerned have been, and must be, their own guardians. They cannot expect this limited Government to burden the whole community, in order to stretch out relief to unfortunate or profligate portions of it. There is a much prouder characteristic than the credit abroad of any one class. The character we have for living in a land where a written Constitution guarantees equal laws and liberty, is far dearer to Americans, and more admired by the mass of sensible foreigners, than the standing of our stocks or the reputation of our bankers and speculators. To sink the first, in order to raise the latter, would be poorly compensated by the smiles and good graces of the money dealers of all the cities in the world.

There is much difficulty in properly arranging the tariff of duties. No necessity requires action on that complicated and perplexing subject at this session; and every view of it admonishes us that it is proper to leave all its parts free to be arranged in the best possible manner by the next Congress.

My constituents are, chiefly agriculturists, as is the case with the great body of the American people. They are ready to march in defence of the country, if need be; and will cheerfully contribute all that is required by an economical Administration; but, sir, nothing more. They are individually and politically interested in keeping down the taxes to the just wants of the country. They pay at least their equal share of the taxes; and, in addition, almost as much more, in the shape of profits laid on the taxes, by the merchants, through whose hands they receive their imported goods. They are injured in their exportations by taxing the importations, which are received in return for them, because you cannot permanently affect the one, without disturbing the other. For reasons more solemn than these, they are opposed to high taxes. They extend the sphere of the whole Government—aggravate the violence of parties, and of elections—invite unconstitutional and unjust legislation—increase Executive patronage, and multiply all those evils and corruptions, to which the best Governments are prone. All attempts at reform will be vain, without keeping this pregnant source of all mischief within due bounds.

The taxing power is the most dangerous power in our system. Republicans have insisted that this power was limited by the authorized objects of the Constitution. But if the opinions advanced by the first officer of the new cabinet (Mr. Webster) shall prevail—that the sense by Congress of the general welfare is the only limitation, and that the right to dispose of the money and other property is co-extensive—then a power carrying with it all other power has no practical limitation, and the people have just cause to be alarmed at the rapid progress of absolute despotism.

Mr. Chairman, a vital interest of my constituents has been introduced into this debate, in connection with a dangerous system of countervailing duties. No one on this floor individually, or as the representative of others, is more deeply interested in the tobacco trade than the individual who addresses you. Reluctant as I am to trespass further on the committee, I feel bound to attempt to expose such a mischievous movement, in whatever shape it may assume, from the imprudent rashness of friends, or the covert designs of enemies.

My colleague, [Mr. Wise,] in the course of remarks with which I generally agreed, represented the tobacco interest to have been in a prosperous condition and having nothing to complain of. The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JENIFER,] on the other hand, not only insists that this interest labors under injurious burdens, but that these burdens laid on the use of our tobacco in foreign lands are aggravated wrongs, appealing to the courage and patriotism of American citizens for redress by the strongest measures. With neither of these views do I agree. If the tobacco trade has been in an encouraging and satisfactory condition, why is it that, amidst the increase of every thing else in this growing country, the quantity exported, and the price of that article, have not materially advanced for more than half a century? Why is it that the cultivation of tobacco has been abandoned in the favored district of my colleague, once the garden spot of the world? Its product gave character to the far famed James river tobacco, and its fine Back river and other lands would now produce the best description of tobacco for the English market? It is because other products have become more profitable, and tobacco has been driven to places more remote from market. In like manner it has been retreating from the greater portion of the State, and is probably destined (if the causes that have produced these results shall not subside) to take its flight to distant regions of the West, beyond the reach of competition. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] stated the average in his State to be three thousand pounds per hand, and the price at about five dollars. This is much more than in Virginia. The average product there is not half that amount, and the price but little higher. Tobacco making with us, as an object merely of investing capital, promises little profit. Those who depend on its cultivation alone for revenue, have to live pretty much within themselves, and to exercise rigid economy. Some wealth we have amongst us, but it has been derived from inheritance or commerce; and few, or none, can trace its acquisition to the production of tobacco. Yet, sir, the condition of the people of my district is good in comparison with that of most of the people of the United States. Their habits had conformed to long continued low prices, and the slight increase of price in the last two or three years, arising chiefly from accidental causes, has given to all more than they had reason to calculate on. The reverse is the case with our Southern friends. They have enjoyed the receipt of three times our profit for a succession of years; their habits were conformed to their higher income; and now their receipts (from temporary causes I hope) had sunk to a level with ours; they consequently get less than they had reason to expect, and are in a most embarrassed and troubled condition.

Saying nothing, Mr. Chairman, of the effects on tobacco and other subjects of agriculture of our home policy in attempting to encourage and stimulate manufactures, commerce, and navigation, the injurious effects of foreign legislation cannot be mistaken. England taxes her subjects for the use of our tobacco 800 per cent. on its original cost; Russia 200 per cent.; Germany 100 per cent.; France, Spain, Italy and Austria have a rigid restrictive monopoly, admitting only from a few hundred hogsheads to one-sixth of their consumption at most, causing the forced culture of an inferior article, or the diversion of the trade to other quarters. An annual revenue is thus raised in Europe upon tobacco alone, of more than thirty millions of dollars; which is at least three times greater than the first cost of the whole quantity exported from the United States. The consequences must be to limit consumption, and in a much greater degree to reduce the demand for American tobacco.

I am aware that Virginia has some advantage growing out of the existing state of things. The high duties in England elevate the quality of the tobacco required for her markets, which the Virginia tobacco is best adapted to supply. And for a like reason, three-fourths of the limited quantity, admitted into France, is taken from Virginia. But these advantages may be temporary, and, at best, are not an equivalent for the immense reduction of the general demand. No, sir, remove, if practicable, all restrictions, and we are willing to enter into equal competition, in the supply of an unshackled trade. We have no apprehensions of foreign rivals, and we are assured that it will be to the advantage of every country in Europe to exchange other commodities for our tobacco, which they will find better than their own, cheaper than their own, and in quantity equal to the vast increase of their consumption.

Although the condition of the tobacco trade is not so good as not to be capable of great improvement, yet it is not so bad as not to be made infinitely worse, by ill-advised measures. Tamper not with it by hastily flying to untried experiments. Add not taxes directly affecting us at home, in the vain hope of removing the indirect effects of burdens on those who consume our product abroad.

Mr. COLES said that his friend from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] had thought proper to animadvert on a letter, giving an account of his course in the tobacco convention, and informed us that it was published in all the anti-American papers from Baltimore to Georgia.

[Mr. JENIFER here interposed, and said that he had alluded to the other articles on which he commented.]

Mr. COLES resumed, and said, that since he was mistaken, and as the articles referred to were not, as far as he knew, published in any paper friendly to him, he would omit to say what he intended.

Mr. COLES said that he was unwilling to obtrude a letter of his, or his previous course on any subject, before the committee, but they had been thought of sufficient consequence to have been brought up by another; and it might be proper here to give a brief history of this tobacco question, and his connection with it.

Mr. COLES said, that early after he became a member of Congress, a memorial from the Legislature of Maryland, and one from the first Convention of tobacco planters, were presented to Congress, and referred to a special committee on the tobacco trade. The gentleman and himself were placed on that committee, and had continued on similar committees raised at each session since. They had co-operated in all that had been done in those committees, except in one thing, and that divides them now. The gentleman will recollect that, in the first report made by the tobacco committee, a clause intimating an ultimate resort to retaliation, was stricken out at his instance; for which over scrupulousness, as the gentleman considered it, he has frequently laughed at him since. In pursuance of the recommendation of this committee, several measures were adopted, among the rest a resolution requesting the Executive to instruct our ministers and diplomatic agents abroad to bestow special attention to the tobacco trade. How this duty has been performed, the voluminous correspondence submitted from the State Department will testify.

During the last spring (chiefly at the instance of his friend, Mr. JENIFER) he had written a letter for publication, urging the usual reasons why the approaching tobacco convention should be attended; and as a further reason, "that if any lacked faith in the advantages to be gained, it might be important that mischief should be prevented." Believing that the tobacco convention would be a meeting of gentlemen from different parts of the country, whose purpose it would be to investigate the condition at home and abroad of a common interest, that they would exhibit to our own Government and to the world the importance of the tobacco trade, the burdens and restrictions under which it suffered, and the advantages to all parties concerned, of adopting the best modes of relieving them, but knowing the opinions of some in favor of retaliatory duties, he had even then alluded to them as a mischief to be prevented. The anticipated convention was held, but he was not a member of it; and the gentleman was mistaken in supposing that he had been twice a member.

He, for the first time, attended a tobacco convention, which met in this city on the 15th of January last. Extraordinary resolutions, proposing, among other things, a system of countervailing duties, were presented to that convention. He considered it his duty to warn the convention against the danger and impolicy of such a course. Nevertheless, the resolutions were adopted with but two in the negative; the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JAMESON] and himself. These resolutions were extensively published, and have since been presented to both Houses of Congress. To protect himself at home against the imputation of having been instrumental in passing resolutions so contrary to his uniform, and frequently expressed opinions, he wrote the letter alluded to, referring to the mischief he had before suggested, and giving an account of his course in the convention. This is the letter the gentleman from Maryland has thought proper to comment on. This is the course which he has had stronger reasons to adhere to, and has the fullest confidence will be approved by the great body of the tobacco planters in the United States. The gentleman from Maryland says that I, in this letter, admitted the grievance, and stated that there were two remedies, viz: negotiation and retaliation; adding himself, that the first having failed, he asked, will I refuse to take the second. If, sir, instead of playing upon a mixture of my words and his, he had adhered to the letter, he would have seen that I denied that the first had been fully tried, and that I considered the second, if a remedy at all, even worse than the disease.

He further asked if from 1783 to 1840 was not long enough for negotiation. Now, sir, let me ask him if from 1783 to 1838 is not nearly as long, and why it was that at the latter period he was so zealous in pressing negotiation? Had not negotiation then failed?

[Here Mr. JENIFER said that he did not know at that time what negotiations had taken place. It was not until the correspondence was submitted, at the last session, that he was aware of the state of the negotiation.]

Very well; the gentleman will find that this will not bear him out. He contends that negotiations on the subject of tobacco have been strenuously prosecuted down to 1840.

[Here Mr. TRIPLETT of Kentucky affirmed that it was so.]

The gentlemen are mistaken. I hold in my hand the correspondence to which they have referred me, as the only source of their information, in which not one word appears in regard to England, Austria, Germany, Russia, Spain, or Portugal, until after the date of the resolution passed by this House in 1837, and not a word in regard to France from 1786 to 1829. In the latter year Mr. Rives addressed a short note to the French Minister, not on the merits of the monopoly, but on the contemplated appointment of an agent to purchase for the Regie, creating the double monopoly, which has existed since. In 1833, Mr. Livingston took up the subject in some earnest, but the indemnity was settled, and tobacco forgotten. The negotiation was not seriously pressed, even in France, until General Cass opened it again in 1838, under special instructions. I call on gentlemen to show me where and when this negotiation has been so zealously and uninterruptedly continued from 1786 to 1840. This document cannot be mistaken. It was selected from the whole correspondence on the subject, which was submitted to the House by the Secretary of State, at the last session of Congress. The selection was made by the gentleman from Maryland, and if there had been any thing else of consequence, it would not have escaped his keen sighted vigilance. Did gentlemen expect in 1838, when this negotiation was commenced generally and actively, for the first time, that the fixed habits and prejudices, and the long established systems of Europe, were to be changed in a year or two? No, sir; they could have expected no such thing. They knew that time was required to obtain the necessary information, to impart that information, and to avail ourselves of opportunities depending upon ever changing circumstances. They must have known that if success ever was reached, that it must be by a slow and gradual process. Whence, then, the present impetuosity?

Gentlemen say that our ministers at the courts of London and Paris have written home that the negotiation was at an end, and that nothing more could be done in that way. It is, in truth, in a more promising condition than could have been expected. From the facts that have been elicited, and the manner our representations have been received every where, I have more hope of eventual success than I had at first. Let us look into the correspondence referred to. In the beginning of the very paragraph in which General Cass concludes by recommending retaliatory duties, you will find good reasons to show that his recommendation was wrong. In page 16, of document 229, 1st session, 26th Congress, General Cass says, in his letter to the Secretary of State, that, "From some observations made last session in the Chamber of Deputies, it is obvious that the public, and I think, in some respects, the Government, appreciate neither the extent of this trade, nor the peculiar advantages which France derives from it. In the event of the publication of the correspondence, it would become important that the grounds of our application should accompany the statement of the reasons which are given for declining to comply with it. Public opinion will finally operate upon the question, which has been violently attacked here, and which presents so many assailable points, in principle and in practice, that it is much easier to support it than to defend it."

In another part of the same letter he says: "But you will perceive by the course of the Marshal's observations in the letter, and of my answers, that the difficulty in the way of any change is to be found in the amount of the revenue, yielded by this system, and the fear that any substitute would be the less productive."

In Mr. Stevenson's letter to the Secretary, contained in the same document, he says, that from Parliamentary documents it appears that "the consumption in the United Kingdom was not less than 50,000,000 of pounds; of this quantity, duty was only paid on 22,000,000 of pounds." The balance being smuggled. "Hence it was," Mr. Stevenson said, "that the commissioners of the revenue, in their recent report to the Government, declared that the suppression of smuggling tobacco cannot be effectually provided against, except by removing the cause, viz: the excessive rate of duty." Again, Mr.

Stevenson says: "Indeed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer expressly said that he had no difficulty in declaring that the present duty of three shillings was infinitely higher than any just policy would sanction. The president of the board of trade also said, that he admitted the force of the opinion I had referred to, as expressed by him in 1830-'31, when he submitted to Parliament (as one of the ministers of the Government) a plan for the reduction of this duty on tobacco. These opinions he still entertained, and was desirous of seeing carried into operation." "They admitted that, with an overflowing Treasury, there was no duty of customs in which her Majesty's Government would be so much pleased to make the experiment, as that on tobacco. Such, however, was not the condition of their Treasury at this time." "Both, therefore, concurred in opinion, that the experiment of reducing the present high duty was very desirable, as well in relation to the interests of the United States as to those of Great Britain. They said they wished they could entertain the hope that it would be in the power of their Government to do it at an early day, but of this they could give no assurance. They begged me, however, to be satisfied, that, if it was possible, they would be as ready and willing as we could be to make the experiment." "The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in my last interview, emphatically assured me that he would not lose sight of the subject, but that the moment it was in his power he would submit a plan for the reduction to Parliament." "While, therefore, there is little hope of any speedy or acceptable change on the subject, we have at least gained, in so much, that the present system is admitted to be indefensible upon general principles, and a favorable opportunity only wanted to get rid of it. This, I flatter myself, under the influence of the enlightened and liberal principles of the age, may be looked to as an event more than probable."

Extracts of a similar bearing might be multiplied from the foregoing letters, as well as from the correspondence of other ministers. The treaty concluded with Sardinia in 1839, by a representative of the Government, acting under instructions in regard to tobacco, has not been without its effects already. Its removal of the transit duties has opened the interior to our tobacco; and I understand that, during the three first quarters of the last year, three cargoes of tobacco, amounting to over a thousand hogsheads, were received at Genoa, although none had been sent directly there from the United States before. At the instance of Mr. Niles, who concluded the treaty with Sardinia, Austria during the same year, repealed or modified her quarantine regulations at the port of Trieste, which had so embarrassed our trade with that populous empire as to leave little direct intercourse between us; the effects of which have been a considerable increase in the number of cargoes sent to that port, consisting of cotton and other articles including tobacco. In addition, I learn that the Austrian Government has manifested a disposition to take a larger quantity of our tobacco, after the example of France. These may be looked on as small beginnings; but, taken together with the manner our representations have been received every where else, are far from discouraging.

Gentlemen ask, will you not cease to appeal to the justice and magnanimity of Governments? It is, sir, a matter of trade between independent nations, and must be managed on the principles of trade, by appealing to their interests and not to their fears. Why are your ministers stationed at foreign courts? Will you abandon all negotiation, when you cannot succeed at once? Then call in your ministers from every court, and give from this Capitol law to the other nations of the world, to which they must immediately conform, or be threatened with retaliation, non-intercourse, reprisal, and war, as the final resort. Has this been the policy of our fathers? Did we abandon negotiation on the first failure of the attempts, going through a series of years, to obtain indemnity for French, Neapolitan, and other spoliations, which succeeded at last? Did we abandon negotiations in the various controversies with England and other countries? All of them did not finally fail, or result in war. The long controversies on the colonial trade were adjusted, not until 1830, by Mr. McLane's arrangement; we have yet questions pending with England, which have from the date of our independence been subjects of negotiation. Will you suddenly stop negotiation? I hope not, until war is, if it must be, inevitable.

The digest of commercial regulations abundantly shows the value of what has been achieved, and what may be expected from our foreign negotiation. Although much remains to be done, yet its progress has been steady and considerable, in removing the numberless restrictions which embarrassed our infant trade. Our liberal policy has had its influence on other nations, and much has been effected towards its propagation among them. The old system was one of oppressive restriction—interfering with, and attempting to regulate, almost every occupation of the people; but it has been yielding, by little and little, to the liberal spirit of the age. In nothing is the present period more distinguished than for the rapid progress of the principles of free trade. Scarcely a treaty has been made in Europe for the last ten years, without yielding some homage to those glorious principles.

The Secretary of State, in his report on commercial privileges and restrictions, made to the last Congress, says that "these prohibitions and restrictions, however, although affecting seriously our agricultural, maritime, manufacturing, and mechanical industry, cannot be rightfully regarded as evidences of hostility, but are to be imputed to that erroneous policy which seeks to establish the prosperity of a whole community by burdening the mass, for the purpose of securing unnatural profits to selected portions of its productive industry. The success of our efforts in the advancement of liberal principles of intercourse, has been such as to justify a hope that we may, by constant adherence to the true principles of political economy, and the use of the means fairly within our reach, be useful in correction of the opinions on this subject, which now form the great barrier to a universal, unrestricted, and advantageous interchange of the varied commodities of the civilized world."

All must be aware of the fact, that high duties, monopolies, and restrictions, have become subjects of intense interest and enlightened discussion throughout all Europe. The errors and impolicy of the old system in regard to them, must become palpable; and whenever they do, they will be mitigated or abandoned, no matter under what form of Government they exist.

Had I not already occupied so much time, I would here read an article on the effects of free trade in Switzerland, lately written by an able writer on the spot. It forcibly illustrates the superior prosperity of Switzerland, under its free trade system, over the surrounding countries, possessing higher natural advantages, but laboring under the existence of rigorous systems of protective restriction. The former country, in the midst of the restrictive policy of its neighbors, without retaliation, renders her peculiar advantages, limited as they are, available to the utmost: whilst the latter, by their protective legislation, repress, or divert from their appropriate employment, the superior natural endowments they have been blessed with, and are in a much worse condition.

It is to the comparative freedom of industry and trade that the United States owe their unexampled progress—not to miserable banking systems, monopolies, and protective restrictions. There can be no liberty unless labor is free. Take away the freedom of industry, which we hoped was guaranteed by our institutions, and you steal from them their brightest gem. Cease not to afford your example, and to extend your influence to break the chains which have bound the sinews of agriculture for ages, and reduced the lot of the husbandman (in many parts of the world) to that of a slave. To emancipate industry and trade from the fetters which Governments have imposed, under the delusive names of protection and retaliation, would be a revolution in the affairs of mankind, attended with greater and happier results than any human event recorded in history.

With freedom of domestic industry, and a reciprocal trade among nations, the peculiar advantages of each would receive their fullest development, and the comfort and happiness of all wonderfully promoted. Although the full achievement of a good so great and universal in its blessings may be hopeless, yet the partial attainment will be a benefit in proportion to its advancement, and the nation which, in these respects, is freest, will be richest and happiest. We have every motive to prosecute so desirable an object; we may look to our reward in the appreciated value of the superior natural advantages we enjoy, and to the proud satisfaction of contributing to the happiness of millions abroad.

Now, sir, as long as we have ministers abroad, it will be attended with no additional cost, and at least can do no harm, that they be instructed to be in readiness to avail themselves of all favorable opportunities, to promote the tobacco interest, as well as to advance the principles of free trade generally.

Suppose, though, that the negotiations have utterly failed, and are to fail forever; what then?

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. JENIFER] asks, will I not resort to measures of retaliation?

I answer, not as a matter of course even then. There is a plain rule of common sense which governs this question. No nation is justified in adopting measures of retaliation, such as are proposed, without almost a moral certainty of being thereby able to force the offending nation into its terms.

The taxes and restrictions imposed on the consumption of tobacco in foreign countries, inflict more injury on their subjects than on us. We can bear the lesser injury more easily and longer than they can the greater. Taxes laid on our citizens for the consumption of their products, operate directly on us, and but indirectly on those against whose taxes we propose to retaliate. The burden to us of such taxes may be in the proportion of five dollars for every one dollar it takes from them, in the reduced consumption of their products. If, sir, in subjecting ourselves to taxation, there is not a positive certainty of success in removing the taxes of other nations, it would be madness to attempt it. It would be equal to the folly of cutting off the nose to spite the face. Gentlemen seem to have overlooked this consideration. They have not attempted to demonstrate the mode of operation which is to give the least probability of success. In an attempt to do so, difficulties would have met them at the threshold, and thickened at each step of their progress.

The attainment of the object by the proposed means of coercion, is well nigh impracticable from the nature of things. Select France, if you please, as the first nation to be brought into terms. We chiefly take silks and wines from her in return for our cotton, rice, and tobacco. Lay a heavy discriminating duty on French silks, leaving silks from other nations free, or at a less duty—what will be the consequence? We see it, in the operation of the present duty of ten per cent. on all silks from beyond Cape Horn, and the Cape of Good Hope, leaving silks from other quarters free. This duty is evaded; India silks are brought to England, colored a little, and shipped to us as free goods. Reverse the case, and the result would be the same. Lay a heavy retaliatory duty on French wines. It would cost but a trifle to place on the casks or bottles, German, Italian, or Spanish labels; the wine might be sent by one of those countries, and come to us free of the discriminating duty. Similar results might attend retaliatory duties on other articles, the production of other countries. Your remedy would tempt evasions and frauds, and drive the trade into circuitous channels. It would also miss its aim, and would be even fruitless of revenue, unless you are prepared to enforce it by a system of custom-house espionage and penalties, inconsistent with our institutions.

We have been proceeding upon the presumption that Congress will indulge gentlemen with their experiments in regard to tobacco. Are there no difficulties here? The bill reported from the Committee of Manufactures a few weeks ago, proposed to lay a duty on silks from India of twenty per cent. and on other silks ten per cent. Was this intended to operate on India as a retaliation for not using tobacco at all? Suppose you attempt to change the discrimination against France, will you not be met in this House by conflicting interests? It is not France alone that you complain of, but of other nations in a greater degree; and, in fact of all Europe, in some degree or other. It is not one article only that is burdened by foreign legislation. In the report of the Secretary of State on the restrictions and duties of foreign Governments, before referred to, you will see many articles oppressively taxed as well as tobacco. I will select two: the duties on our bread-stuffs in England, France, and some other countries, amount almost to a prohibition. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TRIPLETT] stated that the duty on wheat in England was about forty per cent. but, sir, the duty in that country amounts to a prohibition except when large masses of her population are absolutely starving. Upon such occasions we may get a high price for our grain, but the market is generally so fluctuating that any farmer or miller who relies on European markets, is likely to be ruined.

Our extensive coast from New Brunswick to Texas is lined with inexhaustible forests in timber. The duty in England on our timber is two pounds fifteen shillings on the fifty cubic feet, and to an oppressive extent on lumber, staves, and shingles. Cutting off, in a great measure, our abundant resources from the supply of an immense demand for ship building, houses, and other objects. Now, sir, is it expected that Congress, representing all these interests, will consent to commence with tobacco, without including breadstuffs, timber, and many other articles. If a general system of retaliation is adopted, what will it lead to? An unmitigated system of high taxation. The protective tariff men will be ready to avail themselves of strength from this source. Most, or all, of the protected articles of manufacture will be obliged to be used in this general scheme of retaliation. You may succeed by means of a combination of interests in having taxes laid on, but you would seldom get two interests to agree at the same time in taking them off, even in case of relaxation by a foreign Government in regard to tobacco or any one article. No, sir; let us keep out of this connection. The tobacco interest is to be courted into a general system of increased taxation. It is to be used as the pretext for adding burdens on the many, without hope of sharing the benefits of the few.

In regard to foreign countries there is not one alone, but all, in some degree, to be operated against. Why do gentlemen speak so much of injuries from the regulations of France? Austria has similar restrictions. France takes seven thousand hogsheads of tobacco, and Austria not as many hundred. The latter is a great tobacco consuming country, with nearly the population of the former. In fact, instead of France being first to be complained of, she is among the last. It is all Europe you propose to war against; and in this war of who shall tax highest, it is not difficult to foresee who are to be the sufferers. Why, sir, foreigners will laugh at you for merely entertaining such a proposition. Had I not profound respect for the many gentlemen who advocate the policy, I would say it was absurd and ridiculous in the extreme.

It has been said that Mr. Jefferson, when Secretary of State, in 1793, did, in a report to Congress, sanction the policy of retaliation for exorbitant duties on our products in foreign countries. It was under different circumstances, and at a time when the principles of free trade had scarcely begun to relax the inexorable restrictive systems of that period. Those who adduce this authority should be governed by Mr. Jefferson's better authority, after years of experience and reflection. He had been minister in France from 1783 to 1786, took a lively interest in the tobacco trade, and was well informed as to all its bearings. He was President of the United States from 1801 to 1809; the condition of the tobacco trade became worse; but still not one word is heard from him in regard to retaliation on this account, or on account of any other foreign internal tax on our productions. If Mr. Jefferson was here now, it is presumable that he would give you stronger reasons why you ought not to resort to it, than prevailed with him through the whole period of his Presidency.

If you enter on the proposed policy, it will be the first time it has been adopted in the history of the Government.

[Here Mr. JENIFER read from an act of Congress, which he said enacted similar retaliatory duties.]

The section just read refers to a different subject altogether. Several other acts have like provisions. By these acts tonnage duties, and duties on the cargoes of foreign ships coming into our ports, were laid to counteract injury to our navigation, from the discriminating duties laid upon our ships and their cargoes in foreign ports. These acts could be made to affect the offending nation directly, without the power of evasion, and are very different cases from the present. There is not in all the statutes of the Government, one which was intended to operate as a retaliation against the internal taxes or restrictions of foreign Governments on our productions. Equal commercial privileges of our citizens in foreign lands, and equal exemptions for the cargoes of our ships, have been peculiar subjects of regard. The nature of the remedy can in these cases be effective. We have their citizens and their ships to operate upon, instead of our own. I am not sure, in the zeal to accomplish benefits for commerce and navigation, the interests of agriculture have not in our negotiations been too frequently overlooked.

In our own legislative history we can find no example to justify, and much to deter us from the proposed course. My colleague from Norfolk [Mr. MALLORY] reminds me of the West India trade. Yes, sir, the West India trade was sacrificed for a time, and Norfolk nearly ruined, by indulging merely the idea of retaliation. The act of Parliament of 1825, extended to all nations accepting them, very liberal terms of trade with the colonies of Great Britain. This country alone, I believe, refused to accept the terms, expecting to be able to force better. Negotiation after negotiation followed; we were refused the terms offered at first—the trade was sacrificed, and it was not until the arrangement of Mr. McLane, in 1830, that we were admitted to a participation in the trade on the terms we had rejected before.

No encouragement can be drawn from the history of retaliatory duties in Europe—one retaliation has generally brought on another, until a system of high taxes, restrictions, and monopolies have weighed down the laboring classes almost to the condition of brutes. A commercial war of this character was waged between France and England, that amounted almost to non-intercourse, until the benign influence of free trade principles began to relax its rigors.

The burdens imposed on our tobacco abroad have been complained of by several gentlemen as acts of hostility, which we had a right, and were called on to avenge. It has been considered in the light of violated honor, which should make the blood boil, and rouse the chivalry of American citizens. This is new doctrine in this country; no public functionary ever claimed the right to regulate the interior administration of any other Government. Our present ministers in England and France have both, in this correspondence, repudiated any such pretension, and so have our ministers elsewhere. It would be a most dangerous position—take it in regard to other nations, and they claim it in regard to this. The Holy Alliance may take a fancy to regulate your tariff, or to elect your President. England may require you to sustain the credit of banks, or assume the debts of the States. We may wrangle about these matters as we please, but foreigners must let us alone. The French Government may restrict their people to the use of sugar extracted from the beet; or to such poor tobacco as they may cultivate, free from the right of other nations to interfere; and other nations may exercise their discretion in similar respects, without the right of interference by France. England may carry the taxing of her subjects so far as to reduce the food of her poor to potatoes without salt, and the United States will have no right to complain of it as a wrong; yet I hope few will be found willing to follow her example.

Gentlemen taunt us with backwardness in asserting the rights of our suffering countrymen. What redress do they propose? Simply to tax them more, and over again. The remedy is misapplied; and if the wrong was of the character described, it would be too weak and too tame by far. No, if gentlemen are really in earnest, let them rouse up their courage and ask Congress to declare war at once. A war against foreigners, would be scarcely less disastrous than a war of taxation at home.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING] gave us a short supplement to the speech of the gentleman from Maryland, in which he stated that, in Massachusetts, the three great interests of that State were so balanced as to be opposed to a high protective tariff; but were in favor of an ample revenue for the wants of the Government, to be raised with a view to protect manufactures, and to retaliate against impositions on our agriculture. Let me tell him that, to carry out the Harrison policy on these principles, a high tariff in its greatest dimensions is at once constituted. You have only to add to this protective and retaliatory system the projects avowed so generally in this House and elsewhere, as leading objects of the new Administration, and you have a powerful conjunction of interests, breaking down the barriers of the Constitution, and overwhelming the equal rights and common welfare of the country.

SPEECH OF MR. HUBBARD,

OF ALABAMA,

In the House of Representatives, January 29, 1841—
On the Treasury Note Bill.

MR. CHAIRMAN: I will say a few words in support of the bill under consideration, in answer to objections raised against it; and will then reply to some general remarks made by gentlemen on the other side, as to the proper policy hereafter to be pursued by this Government.

It is admitted by both parties here, that we have not money enough in the Treasury to supply the wants of the Government for the first quarter of the year. All agree that more must be had; but we differ as to the best mode of raising it. The party opposed to me want to borrow and create a permanent national debt, and seem anxious to make the outstanding claims against the Government appear as large as possible, because they desire to have a large amount of money to expend under the coming Administration, and to raise which they propose to increase the taxes. The party with which I act believe that the taxes are already high enough, and that, instead of increasing them, we ought to cut off expenses as fast as possible; that the Government should spend less, make no permanent debt, and leave more for the people. We therefore think this the best mode of raising money for temporary purposes—because cheapest, and because it is safest.

It is cheapest, for this reason: if we issue our own notes, the credit of the whole Union being better than the credit of a part, composed of stockholders in any bank, we would circulate the Treasury notes, many of them at a less rate of interest than bankers could lend us the money for; and upon all the notes kept in circulation after interest ceased to run, would save the interest to the people. Besides this, these notes being made receivable for public lands and taxes, interest upon them would cease as fast as paid in; whereas, if we borrow from capitalists, and put the money in the Treasury in large sums, and give bonds for the loan, the people are made to pay interest from the date, and also lose interest on every dollar lying idle in the Treasury. Why, then, should the whole people, better credit than only a few, swap credit with the few, and pay boot? It won't do, sir. It is nothing but favoritism to a few capitalists; and gentlemen ought to find out some way to let the whole people live upon their own credit, rather than buying, at so high a rate, the credit of only a few of that people. This bill provides such a method; and if not the best, let gentlemen find out a better mode—always taking care to let the whole of the people be partners in the gain, and not a few of the wealthy or pretended wealthy.

Some gentlemen fear that if we adopt this cheap mode of raising money when we do need, we may, from habit, use it when we do not need. This argument, if it has any force, would compel us to adopt the most expensive schemes of Government, for fear the people would like a cheap one too well.

I have no such fears; and, sir, I should here have closed my remarks upon the bill, if gentlemen on the other side had been contented to stop their political strife. I thought that the country was tired, and wanted quiet—wanted the public business attended to. My friend, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. JONES, of Virginia,] who brought in this bill, said not a word in relation to party politics or the late election, and we did hope that no allusion would be made to it. But, sir, we are not allowed to get along in this quiet way. The election last summer, which decided that General Harrison should be President, and decided no other question, has not satisfied the great body of the Whig party in Congress. The people are to be carried further. Not only is what they call Loco Foco Van Buren Democracy to be put down, but, I much fear, Republicanism itself. The country has to be carried back to a period before Mr. Jefferson's day. The Government is to have a new direction given to it, if we are to believe the most talented gentlemen on the other side, who have marked out the line of policy which General Harrison is to pursue.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. BARNARD,] who leads in this debate, denies the correctness of that part of Mr. Van Buren's message which says that "the Government has answered the great objects of its creation;" and says that "General Harrison will pursue a policy to effect those great objects."

Let us look at that policy, however, as laid down by the learned gentleman; and we find it an effort to persuade the people to submit to much greater burdens than were even pretended before the elections.

Fortifications are to be built along the whole of our extensive seacoast and lakes, and also upon the whole of our western and northwestern frontier; old forts to be repaired; expensive barracks to be built, even in the wilderness, with public money, as if a soldier could not cut a board-tree and build a cabin; roads are to be cut out, from post to post, throughout the west and northwest. Did any one ever hear of propositions so extraordinary? Did the people when they elected General Harrison, ever dream of such things? Millions upon millions are to be added to the expenses of the Government, and the people taxed to raise it; and, at the same time, that part of the revenue received from public lands, which belongs to the whole Union, to pay the debts of all, is to be distributed to pay the debts of indebted States, contracted for their own benefit, and for objects in which those not indebted have not the slightest interest.

This, sir, is but an outline marked out for the action of General Harrison's administration, and for the future course of the Great Whig party. And, sir, how truly have the different members of this party, with but one exception, followed in the track marked out; and each, in his turn, according to the climate or locality of his constituents, and their ability to bear their part of the load intended to be laid upon them, taken his part? Some (like the gentlemen from New York) boldly take the whole; others, what they can bear at home; some, the tariff, bank, and internal improvements, all together; some, the distribution; some, the military; and some, the naval expenditures; some, harbors; some, light-houses; and some internal improvements alone; and some only take what to me seems merely an apology for the tariff, like my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] who says that the South once contended for taxing of luxuries; and if she won't now let wines and silks be taxed, she will be like the pouting child, who would not let his bread be buttered on either side.

Now, I understand that when the South took this course, she wanted the taxes laid on luxuries, and taken off of necessities; and if the same proposition was before her, she would desire the same thing now. But no such proposition is made; the tax on salt, iron, woollens, flannels, and all of the necessities of life, are left, to the great injury of the great body of the people; and it is proposed to add this additional tax to their burdens, not for support of Government, but for all of these splendid schemes of national expenditure, that the tax is to be laid; and, instead of refusing to have our bread battered on either side, we, of the South, are only refusing to butter both sides of the bread of every other section of the Union, where these large sums, extorted from our working people, are to be expended.

I consider this argument, therefore, a mere apology for a high tariff and excessive expenditure, and was sorry to hear it come from one who, in former times, stood up so manfully for Southern interests.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have somewhat wandered from the line of my intended remarks. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. EVANS] followed the gentleman from New York; and he took issue with the Secretary of the Treasury, both as to his facts, estimates, and policy. He denied that "there was any recorded evidence of the country's prosperity," as alleged by the Secretary in his annual report upon the state of the finances; and the gentleman has gone throughout the whole Union, and picked up here and there isolated cases of fiscal derangement. Now, sir, this must, and always will, happen; and under all Governments, whether Republican, monarchical, or despotic. But they furnish no just ground for revolution or change; and I was sorry to hear a gentleman of his talents exerting his great intellect, and powers of debate, to create dissatisfaction among our people, when there was comparatively so little ground for it. If he had only looked around him, he would now have found the British and French Governments so much distressed for money as actually to have to borrow millions. This pecuniary distress of those Governments is, without doubt, caused by commercial derangements brought about by the paper money system, which has prevailed with them as well as with us; and which derangement throughout this country, has wrongfully been charged to General Jackson's and Mr. Van Buren's administration. Gentlemen have effected their object by it. They have got into power; and it is time, now, to stop it. If they did not know better when they made all this complaint, they know better now; since they see that the strongest Governments on earth are suffering embarrassments under the paper system, as well as ours, and to a much greater extent. And it was on this account—because we had been enabled to get along better than others—because our exports and imports had gone on so well, and suffered so little—that the Secretary of the Treasury spoke of it as "the recorded evidences of the country's prosperity," which the gentleman from Maine has denied.

I now, sir, proceed to prove that the Secretary is right, and the gentleman from Maine wrong; and I do it by simply giving a list of the value of our foreign imports and exports for seven years before, and seven years after, the deposits were removed from the United States Bank, with the differences in favor of the last seven years (from 1833 to 1840) over the former seven years, (from 1826 to 1833):

Average annual exports from 1826 to 1833	-	-	-	$80,053,194
Average annual exports from 1833 to 1840	-	-	-	119,028,564

Difference in value of exports from 1833 to 1840 over the seven years before removal	-	-	-	38,975,370
--	---	---	---	------------

Nearly thirty-nine millions yearly!

Let us see how it stands with imports:

Average annual imports, from the removal of the deposits, for seven years	-	-	-	$141,143,109
---	---	---	---	---------------

Average for the seven years next before removal	-	-	-	89,386,005
---	---	---	---	------------

Yearly difference -	-	-	-	51,757,104
---------------------	---	---	---	------------

Nearly fifty-two millions!

Gentlemen say much of the excess of importations was the fruit of the State loans. Admit this to be true; the same cannot be said of the exports. They were, for most part, the value of the labor of that portion of our people who dig the ground for a living, and whom gentlemen are now so anxious to tax again; and afford evidences of their prosperity, as a whole, that cannot be disputed. And this evidence is upon record; and the record sustains the Secretary of the Treasury, and condemns the gentleman from Maine; and is a full answer to the main argument he has advanced against Mr. Woodbury's report.

I fully understand the object of this warfare so fiercely commenced against Democracy.

Brave men never cut and hack to pieces a fallen foe, without some further object in view. These gentlemen, therefore, I fear, do not believe that "Democracy has fallen;" or they have objects to effect, which require public excitement to be kept up and not cool, until these odious (and, to my mind, unconstitutional) measures of expenditure, and taxation are carried out and fastened upon the people. And, sir, I am brought to believe that such is their object and intention, from the remarks and the manner of the distinguished gentlemen from Kentucky, (Governor POPE,) a veteran in politics, with perhaps forty years' experience.

He heard his friends lay out their grand plan of operations—their National Bank, internal improvements, tariffs, and other splendid schemes of expenditure and taxation, with the greatest apparent delight; it seemed to fall upon his ear like notes of martial music, which had delighted him in his youthful days, and which again had been brilliantly struck up in the beginning of a charge. His countenance seemed to beam with joy, and he watched, as a skilful general would his untired soldiers, the younger members of his party; and, sir, when he noticed in their countenance some wavering, some giving way—heard some say "they could not do this," others "that they could not go that"—he became impatient for the floor, and, as soon as he had obtained it, commenced in the most animating manner to extol the proposed measures; and after he supposed that he had made them appear (if not popular) at least plausible, turned to his young friends, and encouraged them "not to be alarmed or faint by the wayside,"—"not to commit themselves too soon or too strongly against any measure of the Whig party." They were young and inexperienced; "they did not know what they might yet have to do;" and when he, as might be supposed, had infused into them a sufficiency of courage, he proceeded to point out to them a way to make these schemes of expenditure, taxation, and distribution, popular and acceptable with the people, he told them that "he was unwilling to see the revenue arising from the sales of the public lands go into the Treasury, because it robbed the poor and relieved the rich from taxation;" that this money "ought to go to the States, and be divided among them to pay the State debts, where it would relieve the poor from taxation."

But sir, this argument wont do for the young Whigs, or for the people; because they know better. They know that the Legislatures of the several States are compelled to tax property and wealth, as well as persons, and can make every man pay tax according to his property or income, whether his wealth is in lands, houses, stocks, banks, or money at interest, and dare not, therefore, tax the poor and leave out the rich—as is done here, sir, where you tax all articles of daily use, such as the great body of the people need, must have, and cannot do without; and then, sir, they are told "that the tax is equal," that "they need not pay the tax if they do not choose to use the taxed articles." This, sir, is a mockery, to tax articles such as every family must have—iron, salt, knives and forks, plates and spoons, and coarse woollens and cottons; and then tell them "they are not taxed unless they buy." And, sir, this same spirit would lead you to tax the air, light, and water, and then tell the people they need not be taxed unless they choose to breathe, drink, and look about them. These taxes, sir, upon articles of daily use fall most heavily and grievously upon the poor, and people in moderate circumstances, because they need, and must have and use nearly an equal amount with a rich family; and, therefore, a man with a family depending alone upon his labor for support, needs frequently as many of these taxed articles as a rich man, and is compelled on that account to pay as much of this indirect tax as a man who can command twenty, fifty, or a hundred laborers. Yes, sir, Girard, with his millions, could get along, and not have to buy more taxed salt, taxed iron, sugar, woollens, cottons, knives, forks, and spoons, than a day laborer with five in family; and he would enjoy all his property, with the almost unlimited means of making more, without being compelled to pay more for the support of Government than a common laborer. This, sir, is indirect tax—a tax upon articles of necessity. And, sir, it is proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky to keep up these taxes, and to take from the Treasury the amount for which the public lands are sold, (three and a-half millions of dollars,) and divide it out among the States, to pay State debts, and relieve rich men from taxation for that purpose.

The gentleman from Kentucky must put his young friends upon some other tack, to make these odious measures popular. The people, sir, begin to find out that taxation is taxation, whether laid upon lands, houses, or property, or upon food and clothing; and it will not be long before they will understand that it is more just to tax lands, houses, and money incomes, according to their value, than to tax food and clothing, according to men's necessities; and when the politician, who desires to protect the rich man's plantations, palaces, bank stock, and income, by crying out "direct tax!" and proposes to lay the tax upon food, clothing, and necessities, the people will understand it as well as the gentleman from Kentucky; and when he begs them for the money arising from the sales of public lands, to give to the States to pay State debts, and to relieve rich men's estates and incomes from being taxed according to their value, they will remember that he and his friends now refuse to take the tax off of iron, salt, sugar, knives, forks, spoons, plates, and every other article needed by the poor. The tax on French wines and French silks will, to the extent of the tax, fall upon the tobacco-grower and cotton-grower, and upon all of the people who raise grain, pork, stock, and provisions, and who exchange it with the cotton and tobacco-growers. And, sir, this three and a-half millions, yearly, additional tax, will have no other effect than to lessen the amount of cotton and tobacco which we sell to France; or it will lessen the amount of money which we get for it; and instead of falling upon the rich alone, who wear the silks, or drink the wines, will fall upon thousands of poor families, whose little sons and daughters are out in the sun when they should be at school, working the tobacco or cotton to make money to buy taxed iron, taxed salt, taxed flannel, taxed knives, forks, spoons, plates, and other necessities, without which they cannot live; and will fall, also, upon the sons and daughters of thousands of poor families in Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, who are working out, in the cold and heat, wet and dry, to raise corn, wheat, or stock, to sell to the cotton and tobacco-growers for money to pay for these taxed articles, which they are obliged to have for their families; so that if you lay this three and a-half millions of taxes on France, she buys that much less tobacco and cotton, or buys it for less money; the growers of which are able only to buy that much less grain, stock, and provisions, or buy it at a less price; and the gentleman from Kentucky can't see the working folks of any of the States, until he tries some other soft corn than this. If he and his party (who can, if they choose) will take the tax off iron, salt, flannels, coarse woollen plates, knives and forks, and such things as every poor family must have, then I will begin to believe that the Whigs want to distribute the public lands among the States "to relieve the poor from taxation;" but if they won't take this tax off such articles, nobody will believe them. Every man who hears it, will know it is nothing but humbugery.

The gentlemen from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] and from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] spoke of the pre-emption land bill as a humbug—a bait thrown out to catch votes, political gambling, &c. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us for a moment compare it with these great Whig schemes spoken of, and see which looks most like bait thrown out, or fishing for popularity. We only propose that the poor man, who goes West upon the public lands, clears them up, puts them into cultivation, and after mixing his labor with the soil and giving it additional value, that he shall have the right to buy that land, with his little improvements thereon, in preference to strangers who have no claim upon it, and who would be put to no trouble by having to go and buy an unimproved place. Is it not just? Is it not humane? Is it wrong or immoral? In thus taking the part of the poor Western men, or those poor men in the old States who desire to go West and settle and own small tracts of land, do we offer a bait to the great body of voters? Certainly not; for the larger portion of good public lands are in the Territories, where people have no votes in Presidential elections; and among the new States, by far the greater portion of men of influence live in towns, are interested in public works, banks, &c. &c. or are owners of land themselves, and feel and care but little for the poor settlers upon the public lands. It is clear, therefore, that our motives arise from a sense of justice, and not from any vote-begging or vote-catching disposition on our part. But how is it with gentlemen Whigs on the other side? Their mode of distribution of the proceeds of public lands is addressed to the whole of the old States, and all of the new not interested in the pre-emption system. It is addressed to the internal improvement interest; in fact, to all of the great masses, and combinations of masses, that desire to throw burdens off their own shoulders, and to lay them upon others. It is like the fisherman who lays out a long line in deep water, and fastens hooks at different depths, baited to suit the habits of the different kinds of fish. Near the surface plays the greedy and hungry fish. Little or no bait is required to catch him; only conceal the hook with a little white and red hair, or red flannel, and he strikes and is caught. My friend from Maryland, who has figured in the tobacco convention, [Mr. JENIFER,] and those who are trying to lay countervailing duties, under the notion of protecting tobacco, either know how to set this hook themselves, or will bite and be caught. I can assure them there is no bait upon it—scarcely enough of the appearance of bait to conceal the hook.

The next fish to be caught is a larger one, who swims much deeper, and he cannot be caught but with meat—"a large mouthful"—he will not nibble at a trifle: you catch him only by feeding him well. A National Bank, large appropriations, expenditures, and taxes, collected from a whole nation of people, have to be put together before he will bite. Is not that, also, Whig bait for the cities and great thoroughfares of commerce? and don't they expect to catch these big fish with it? Most assuredly they do. But there is a hook placed upon the bottom, in the mud, intended to catch "suckers," and this is baited with mush; and I have been of opinion, sir, that this project of countervailing duties was a scheme got up by the great tariff interests of the North, to distract and divide the South, by setting the tobacco and cotton interests by the ears, that we might be governed and controlled by our sectional prejudices, like England governs Ireland with her Scotch regiments, and Scotland with her Irish regiments; and therefore this seemed to me only bait for greedy, hungry fish, and I was surprised to find any tobacco-grower likely to bite. But, sir, this proposition for a National Bank, high taxes, high and extravagant expenditures upon roads, canals, harbors, dry-docks, fortifications, light-houses, barracks, and ships, is, sir, a bait at which all of those big fish will bite; but the idea that "it will be a tax upon the rich, and relieve the poor," and that by distributing the revenue arising from the sales of public lands among the States for these purposes, "that you will thereby relieve the poor from taxation," why, sir, it is all "a humbug." It is your soft bait, laid to catch "suckers;" and if I mistake not, you will find it too soft to catch them. Every disinterested voter in the Union must see, from the course taken by gentlemen here who go for distribution, that they are only fishing for "suckers" with soft bait, for most of them have made figures and calculations to show to their constituents how much each State would get out of the public Treasury by the scheme—not one of them has made and published a calculation to show

Estimating the cost of collection for seventy years at the present rate, and the amount of taxation to be such as to raise twenty-five millions a year, the people of the interior of the country would pay, in seventy years, one hundred and seventy-five millions to officers in the cities, for expenses alone; which they would get without interest; and if you put interest upon it every year, at six per cent. and add to it the principal, makes, in seventy years, the enormous sum of over two thousands of millions of dollars. It is true that but few of the people can make compound interest; but bankers and money-lenders in cities do make it; and it is no wonder that your large cities grow so rapidly, and a few managers within them make millions upon millions of dollars. It is no wonder that they should be so fond of indirect taxes, and of increasing them by every opportunity they can get, and of increasing the general expenses of this country. It is no wonder that the gentleman from New York should bring forward all of his splendid schemes of expenditure and taxation. It is fully explained in the fact that the real estate, houses, and lots, &c. in the city of New York alone, are worth nearly as much money—and have been so valued and assessed—as all of the lands, farms, cities, towns, and villages of the whole of that great State; and besides, if we go on taxing, collecting, and expending, in the cities, as we have done, the cities upon our coast will, in less than a hundred years, swallow up the industry of the whole of this extensive country; and city property will be to the whole Union, what the city of New York now is to that great State—be worth as much, or nearly as much, as the whole of all the other property of the Union. This never could be the case if taxes were collected, and cost of collection expended, in every county of the Union. When gentlemen can show that direct taxes would produce worse consequences than I have proven to flow from indirect, then it will be time enough to try and make it odious to talk of direct taxation. The principal objection, I presume, to direct taxation, is a fear that the people will see it and understand it; and a Representative would be afraid to go home and meet his constituents, after raising the taxes upon them, which he can now do by telling them "that he laid the tax so that it don't fall upon them, but falls on somebody else"—"on a rich man," or "a Southern man," or "a Northern man," or a Frenchman, or an Englishman—according to the place and company he is addressing.

Mr. Chairman, I gave my views about a National Bank last session. I attempted then to show that it was both unconstitutional and inexpedient. It would, in my opinion, be attended with most disastrous consequences in the present condition of our State and local banks. There is some solid capital in the country yet. People are more and more going to work, instead of relying upon credit, and, in a few years, times will get better; but if you charter a bank, all of the country banks will be prostrated, and the specie withdrawn, to enable the new National Bank to totter along during infancy, and the whole country will be overrun and scourged, as was the case from 1818 to 1827, by the late bank. But, gentlemen Whigs say that this has been determined upon. They have the power now, and, I suppose, intend to exercise it. It is, therefore, my duty to hold them accountable to the people for fair and just dealing when they make the charter; and if they act justly with the people when they give the keeping of their taxes to a bank, they are bound to demand from the stockholders, as a bonus, the value of the money left in the vaults of the banks to be loaned out on interest. When the Sub-Treasury bill was passed, those opposed to it contended it would keep twenty millions of the people's money locked up, and out of circulation. This we denied. But gentlemen have now changed their complaint; we are not now about to keep enough money on hand, since a Bank is likely to get it. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELT] thinks we ought to keep always on hand a quarter's salary; that is, one quarter of the yearly expenses of the Government. The gentlemen from New York and Maine suppose we ought to have regularly a balance unappropriated at the end of the year, of about eight millions, if I understood them. Now, the value of these deposits, on collecting, keeping, and disbursing for twenty years, (supposing balances on hand to be eight millions, and the deposits, after appropriations by disbursing officers, and sums lying in bank not called for, to be only four millions,) then the value or amount which the Bank would receive in twenty years, as interest on the people's taxes, lying in their hands and loaned out, would be $26,485,624—twenty-six and nearly a half millions of dollars; the present value of which, without expenses, would be $8,758,342—nearly nine millions of dollars—which could be given by any company for a charter, and then they would net six per cent. on their money so given as a bonus; and if they have any capital of their own to put in, the advantages of the charter, with the credit of the Government, will enable them, without doubt, to make expenses and profits out of their own money. I now tell the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JENIFER,] that the charter, with the use of the people's taxes, is worth nearly nine millions of dollars; and whenever he and his Whig friends do go to hire out to capitalists the labor of our constituents, that they will be expected to charge something like the value of money belonging to the people, and we will hold him and his friends accountable to the people if he does not.

I have, sir, given a general view of the extravagant and splendid scheme of expenditures and taxation proposed by the gentleman from New York. I will now notice the single one of fortifications, and our defenceless state, upon which he dwelt so fully. Whenever Governments desire to get the people to submit to increased taxation, and wish to silence all opposition, this is the cry: "war is coming, and we are defenceless." That was the cry in 1824 and 1828, when these odious tariff schemes were put on the country. Some only wanted to protect manufactories, that blankets might be made at home, "to keep our soldiers warm," and "iron provided for the manufacture of arms." And, sir, hundreds of millions were extorted from the laboring people, and wasted, squandered, and expended, gentlemen say; and still the country is defenceless, and more taxes are wanted. People begin to find out that this, too, is mere humbug. There will be no war, sir, unless Government finds out that it can make more out of their people by this mode of taxing, than they can make out of any other. For Governments, in modern times, have found by experience that it is easier and safer, and more profitable, to get their own people to hold still and be fleeced, than to attempt to make the same amount out of another nation by war. The plunderers, therefore, of nations of the present day, thrive better in peace than in war. But, sir, suppose I am mistaken, and we are to have war. This scheme of fortifying our immense seacoast and frontier is an absurdity. All of the work and wealth of the nation would not construct the forts which gentlemen would keep up, nor will it repair the old ones, so as to be of any use. It is agreed on all hands that the great increase of the size of cannon new in use, will enable a single vessel to knock down any fort we have built, or could build; that stone, brick, or mortar, cannot stand against them; and that the only mode of defence against such, is to arm vessels with guns of equal size, and meet the invaders on the water, and drive them off, sink them to the bottom, or sink ourselves. This is the only alternative, as it appears to me.

Nations, sir, have usually selected for their emblems some terrible animal of either the four-footed or feathered tribe—such as a lion, tiger, eagle, or hawk—an animal that could seize and tear its foes to pieces. But, sir, if we are to set all of our people to digging in the ground, and going into fortifications, we should take the eagle from our flag, and change the emblem. There is an animal called a "gopher," of the terrapin tribe, with a shovel in the fore part of his shell, with which he digs deep in the sandy lands of the South, and hides himself from his enemies; and we should select him as a fit emblem of our national character, if all of our people are to be engaged in digging out fortifications, as proposed by the gentleman from New York. Does the gentleman desire to see us a nation of gophers? I am sure our people would cease to think of any thing but hiding in the ground, if they saw the whole money and energies of the nation employed in digging out such hiding places. An invading enemy would have nothing to do but go around these forts; and the people, already accustomed to look upon fortifications as the only means of defence, would quickly surrender, unless they could get into these "gopher holes," where the enemy, after overrunning and subduing the country, would then dig them out at their pleasure. No, sir; make the character of your people correspond with that of the proud bird which you have selected as an emblem. Let them be ready to fly at and pounce upon an enemy, wherever he is to be found; not to flee from him, and hide in your "gopher dens."

A few general remarks, Mr. Chairman, and I shall close. We are not only considering this bill to raise money for temporary wants of the Government, but we are considering the state of the whole Union. And, sir, how different is the language I now hear, from what was said during the last session of Congress, previous to the election of General Harrison.

Then, gentlemen told the people that the Democrats had been wasteful and extravagant.

Now, they say that no reduction can be made in expenditures.

Then, they told the people [that we were for reducing the prices of labor.

Now, they are for increasing taxes and expenditures, which, in every country and age, has a direct tendency to reduce the wages of labor; because it is out of these wages the taxes are made up.

Then, they told the people that the Whigs went for reducing Executive patronage. But now, they go for every measure that must and will increase it. For, sir, these hundreds of schemes for clearing out rivers, making roads, light-houses, harbors, dry-docks, fortifications, barracks, &c. &c. &c. multiply the number of people who are to depend on Government for work and employment, in the shape of contractors, artists, and laborers; multiply, also, the officers to be appointed by the President and under his control, and that of his friends: all of these must add to the Executive influence felt in elections—an influence which the gentlemen had the benefit of, to a great extent, in the late election; for these men were getting hungry and alarmed at the reductions in expenses making by Mr. Van Buren—were greedy for another routine of taxation and expenditure, and therefore joined in the cry, and voted against him. The present proposed measures, therefore, have a direct tendency to increase this Executive patronage and influence.

It will not do for gentlemen to say that General Harrison only intends to serve one term, and, therefore, will not interfere and exercise this power.

They will remember that they charged General Jackson with appointing his successor. If this be true, why may not General Harrison? Is he better and wiser than Jackson? If he is, will every man that comes after him be wiser and better? This will not do for argument with the people, who will not allow great principles to depend on any one man. And gentlemen and General Harrison must follow the advice of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] and must practise here, after they get power, THE PRINCIPLES which they preached to the people before the elections.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARNARD] denies the truth of that part of the President's message which states "that our Government has admirably fulfilled the objects of its creation. And, sir, I have given an examination of the measures of Government proposed by that gentleman, for General Harrison and his party to make the Government answer the purposes for which "they think it was created." It is found, I humbly conceive, to be only a mode of bettering the condition of the great and already overgrown interests of officers, bankers, capitalists, politicians, and rich men, engaged mostly in commerce, navigation, and manufactures, and owning city property, at the expense of agriculture, mechanism, farming, planting, and labor, throughout the whole country besides.

I will tell gentlemen how they can make a plain Republican form of Government suit our people much better than any change they will be able to make. Let them, instead of employing their powerful talents and abilities in making our people dissatisfied, use those abilities in producing the only reform in our power—"a reform of our habits." Let them advise their people, young and old, rich and poor, against relying on bank credits for the means of support, instead of industry, frugality, and economy. Let them admonish people who have property, and desire to keep it, to cut down their expenditures; that their young men cannot longer be indulged in smoking, drinking, and idleness at taverns and hotels, if they expect to keep their property; that if they let their daughters marry such idle and extravagant young fellows, that they will live with them only so long as they furnish them money to spend in idleness, and that, so soon as the duties and drudgery of taking care of a family come on, these gay idlers have not energy enough to take care of them; that they generally leave their families in disgrace, as soon as the property is exhausted. Tell them, therefore, to discontinue all such idlers, and keep them out of their houses, and, by force of public opinion, compel them to work. Tell the wealthy and heretofore extravagant families, that they cannot keep their property, and go on with their extravagant indulgences; that the three Governments of England, France, and the United States, are all borrowing money to get along, and that our young men cannot indulge in boiling their hams in Champagne wine at the Astor House, going to theatres, and other such extravagant and wasteful practices. Tell them to lend their countenance to the prudent, industrious, and upright, however they may appear to want polish, and what is usually called refinement. Tell them that such make the best husbands and family connections. Turn to the poor and midding classes, and advise the youth of both sexes against buying things to wear, which their fathers cannot afford to furnish. Tell them that it was this, and their neglect of business—throwing the whole labor of families off the young, strong, and healthy, upon the father, mother, and smaller children—tell them it was this, and this alone, which has embarrassed them. Tell them, also, to encourage industry in their families and neighbors; to turn out of their houses the scamp who wants to figure in fine clothes, and who has nothing to give, and will not work to pay the merchant for them; and tell them, also, to uphold, with their countenance, the honest youth, however homely his appearance, who will earn his living by the sweat of his brow. Impress these truths and principles upon the public mind, and you will restore prosperity among individual families, and upon this great family of States. It is better than to try and relieve some by plundering others.

If General Harrison and his friends shall only pursue this course, I shall most gladly render him my feeble support. If, however, he follows the path which appears to have been marked out for him by his friends here—if he shall encourage or countenance these schemes of taxation, extravagance and expenditure—I shall be found in opposition, wherever I may make such opposition useful to a confiding but deceived and plundered people.

REMARKS OF MR. JOHNSON, OF VIRGINIA,

In the House of Representatives February 19, 1841—

A bill to extend, for five years, the act approved the 7th July, 1838, "granting half-pay and pensions to certain widows," being under consideration—

Mr. HOPKINS submitted the following amendment, viz:

"Be it enacted, That the provisions of the act approved 7th June, 1832, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution,' be, and the same are hereby extended, so as to embrace all those officers and soldiers, spies and rangers, who, under one or more engagements, shall have served for a term of three months or upwards, in the wars against the Indian tribes, at any time previous to the treaty of Greenville, in the year 1795; and on application at the proper department, and proof thereof, they shall be entitled to have their names placed on the pension roll."

Mr. JOHNSON said: I thank my honorable colleague for having brought to the notice of this House the long deferred claims of a remnant of our Revolutionary days and our Revolutionary struggles, the rights and interests of whom have been overlooked and neglected amidst the numerous acts of justice and liberality with which the records of the legislation of the country abound, and which do honor to the heads and hearts of American statesmen. Although millions have been annually drawn from the public Treasury, in discharge of that debt which the wealth of the nation can never fully discharge, no murmurs have been heard from the people; but, on the contrary, these acts have all been responded to by a generous community, in notes of unequivocal approbation, from the centre to the circumference of this widely extended country.

But, Mr. Chairman, I regret to say, that in the plenitude of our liberality, the old maxim, "be just before you are generous," seems to have been lost sight of. We have left, unprovided for, a class of soldiers whose services were equalled by few, and surpassed by none, whose claims have been rejected by the American Congress; while their compatriots in arms have been made comfortable by the bounties of the Government. I refer to that class of soldiers who continued the war from 1783, when the treaty of peace with Great Britain was ratified, down to the treaty of Greenville, in 1795.

Twelve long years did they continue the struggle against fearful odds, after the mild beams of returning peace had made glad the heart of every freeman in the Atlantic country—ay, sir, when the sound of rejoicing was heard throughout the land from Massachusetts to Georgia. These cheering notes reached not the year of the Western man: there was no peace to your trans-Alleghany brethren; for, although the civilized enemy had withdrawn his armies from the field, his savage allies lurked in the woods. Although a treaty of peace had been signed, yet he held on to his western posts, and virtually to the western country, maintaining his position by an armed force, under the vain hope, no doubt, that our glorious experiment would fail, and that, by keeping up the war through his Indian allies, he would stand ready to avail himself of the first advantage to recover his lost power, by adding the northwestern territories to his Canadian dominions. The history of the war proves, that, notwithstanding the acknowledgment of our independence by the British, they assembled in council with the Indians as late as the year 1793, when they admonished the savages that a new line must be drawn between the United States and the Canadas by the sword. And with that view, fortresses were erected on the Miami of the lake, and garrisoned by British soldiers.

The stipulations of the treaty of 1783 did not change the condition of your western people. The blessings of liberty, for the benefit of which you had prosecuted a seven years' war, had been but partially secured, and were not participated in by the western men: they found themselves in the deep recesses of a wilderness, far removed from succor, surrounded by innumerable hordes of merciless savages, by whom the war was continued with all imaginable horrors. The pecuniary means of your Government had been exhausted; your army was disbanded; and your Western people thrown upon their own limited resources, and cut off from the Atlantic States by the then almost impassable mountains. They had no place of retreat, but their log cabin, which they had sworn to defend, or die on the sill of its door! In this forlorn condition, they prosecuted the war from 1783 to 1795, with no hope of aid; no friend to support; no tongue to cheer; no pen to record; no eye to weep! Arm to arm, steel to steel, they met the savage, and struck for liberty! Nor was the conflict confined always to the harder sex: tender females became more than soldiers, and, forgetting the delicacy of their textures, fought bravely by the sides of their husbands and brothers, in defence of their humble domicils, their hearths, and cradled infants. Their little fields, whence alone their rations were drawn and their families fed, were cultivated at intervals snatched from the busy scenes of war; and while the son silently held the handles of the plough, the father was sentinel in a corner of the fence, and poised steadily the unerring rifle.

I have said there was no pen to record the deeds of chivalry, which the traditions of the times have dimly and imperfectly handed down. Could the facts be correctly detailed, a vacuum in the history of this country would be supplied with rich matter; and scenes of disinterested patriotism developed, adding many facts in the history of our countrymen, at the recital of which the hearts of freemen would beat high with national pride, and veneration for the character of the chieftain. But, unfortunately for our country, the story can never be all told: it must remain sealed up amongst the hidden treasures of the past. The remaining actors in the drama, whence alone the tradition might have been obtained, stand few and far between, like the oak, once wide spread and noble in the forest, but now in the old field, deprived of its vital sap, streaked with lightning, decayed in its roots, and ready to yield to the lightest blast.

Mr. Chairman, a few of these aged veterans still linger in the district I have the honor to represent; a district extending from the Alleghany mountains to near the Kentucky line, embracing a portion of the country watered by the Monongahela, the Great and Little Kanawha, and extending along the banks of the Ohio, more than one hundred miles. This portion of country formed emphatically the line of demarcation between the white and the red man during the Revolutionary war, and was the arena in which gladiators met. Your sentinel upon the outer wall was placed there, and ably and gallantly were your outposts defended.

It is mockery, sir, to say that those men were not engaged in the struggle for independence. They were the first who took the field, and the last who left it. The first battle fought in that contest was on the 10th of October, 1774, at Point Pleasant, in my district, and it was clearly connected with our Revolutionary movements. In fact, it may properly be styled the first battle of that momentous struggle. The contest was continued, with short intervals, down to 1795; and murders were perpetrated in the same district, according to my recollection, as late as 1793. And yet, it has been gravely said that "they were not engaged in your struggle for independence; that it was a private war between the white man and the Indian!" Let us see what the historian of that day said on this subject.

After speaking of the defeat of St. Clair, he proceeds to say:

"The Indian war now assumed a more serious aspect than it had hitherto worn. There was reason to fear that the hostile tribes would derive a great accession of strength from the impression which their success and the spoil they had acquired would make upon their neighbors; and the reputation of the Government was deeply concerned in retrieving the fortune of its arms, and affording protection to its citizens. The President, therefore, lost no time in causing the estimates for a force, which he deemed competent to the object, to be prepared and laid before Congress. In conformity with a report made on this subject by the Secretary of War, a bill was brought into the House of Representatives, directing three additional regiments of infantry and a squadron of cavalry to be raised, to serve for three years, if not sooner discharged. This bill experienced great opposition. It was argued, in favor of the bill, that the justice of the war could not be questioned by any who would allow that self-preservation and indispensable necessity could furnish sufficient motives for taking up arms. It was originally undertaken, and had been since carried on, not for conquest, but to defend their fellow-citizens on the frontiers, who, if not assisted, must fall victims to the rage and barbarity of their savage enemies. It was said to be proved by unquestionable documents, that, from the year 1783 to 1790, there had been not less than fifteen hundred persons, either the inhabitants of Kentucky, or emigrants on their way to that country, who had been massacred by the savages, or dragged into captivity; and there was reason to believe that, on the frontiers of Virginia and Pennsylvania, the murdered and the prisoners would furnish a list not much less numerous. In 1790, when a treaty was proposed at the Miami villages, the Indians at first refused to treat; they next required thirty days to deliberate; this request was acceded to, and, in the interim, the inhabitants were expressly prohibited by the President to carry on any offensive operations against them. Yet, notwithstanding this forbearance on the part of the whites, not less than one hundred and twenty persons were killed and captured by the savages, and several prisoners were roasted alive during that short period, at the expiration of which the Indians refused to give any answer to the proposition which had been made to them. The bill was carried for the augmentation of force required by the Executive."—pp. 336, 341, 342.

Will any one question the national character of this war, after reading the above extracts? The entire debate proves that Congress considered it a continuation of the same struggle for independence, as in truth it was. The western posts were still in the hands of the enemy, notwithstanding the treaty stipulations which required their surrender; the soil of your country was degraded by the occupancy of foreigners, and the national honor was tarnished by the non-compliance of Great Britain with her solemn treaty. It was national in every respect, and in every sense of the word; and great and lasting benefits resulted from its favorable termination. The honor of the nation was vindicated, and a source of revenue, incalculable in its extent, was secured in the acquisition of the public domain. It is from this source that you have drawn many millions of the money with which you have enriched your Treasury. Ay, sir, those millions of dollars which flow annually into that Treasury, are the proceeds of the sales of the public lands which were wrested from the common enemy, by the blood and valor, and reclaimed by the toil and industry, of the very Indian fighters whose cause I now endeavor to plead.

The same Western men who had continued the contest throughout the Revolution, and down to the treaty of Greenville in 1795—a period of twenty years—were the first to unlock the gates and open the avenues to the "far West," by which a safe and permanent entry was made into the Northwestern territory. They were, emphatically, the vanguard to the emigrating multitude, who, in search of a home and a competency, flocked to the Western country; at the approach of whom, the affrighted natives, pressed at the point of the bayonet, retreated with hasty steps to the banks of the Mississippi; thereby affording partial security to the bold and enterprising adventurers.

What, I would ask, was the situation of the West in 1795? A deep and almost interminable wilderness—"where the boughs of the lofty buckeye waving in the wind served but to swell the melancholy notes of solitary nature;" where a monotonous silence ever reigned, save when disturbed by the howl of beasts of prey, or the more hideous yell of savage man!

But, Mr. Chairman, never was transformation from the long silence of the forest, to the active, cheering, busy scenes of civilized life, so sudden, rapid, and so radical. Millions of freemen in the full enjoyment of all the comforts, and, I may add, all the luxuries of life, are now spread over that extensive and diversified country; and if we may be permitted to glance at futurity, and measure the probable increase of population by the ratio of the past, the time is near when a majority of the inhabitants of the United States will be found in the valley of the Mississippi.

Will Congress continue to disregard the claims of this meritorious class, after having provided for every other description of soldier? Will you do this, too, at a time like the present, when we are at peace with all the world; the national debt paid off; the country in the full tide of a prosperity unexampled in any nation, with a population exceeding seventeen millions, in the full enjoyment of all the blessings and immunities which Providence, in the plenitude of its goodness, has capacitated man to enjoy? I will not believe it! I think I know too well the liberal and honorable feelings of gentlemen of both parties. It is a subject elevated far above the party feuds which too often enter this hall, and prevent action upon important measures. I am sure the hydra-monster party will not be permitted to interfere in this sacred question. Will the Northern man hesitate to place these claimants upon an equal footing with the thousands of pensioners in his own section, where three-fifths of the pension fund is expended? Surely his sense of justice will forbid it! Shall we appeal in vain to the generous South on this occasion? No, sir; she has ever been feelingly alive to the claims of the war-worn soldier, and her liberality, which is proverbial, will not be withheld on this—perhaps the last—appeal in behalf of some of the few who remain unprovided for. To Western gentlemen I have nothing to say; the scenes which I have feebly attempted to describe are all familiar to them. The first impressions made upon their juvenile minds, were derived from the the traditional history detailed by their fathers; in which the thrilling incidents of Indian warfare were feelingly and eloquently detailed. And although no costly edifice or marble monument points to the place or commemorates the battle field of these heroes, yet their memory will be cherished in the bosom of every Western man, long after the most stately temples shall have been mouldered away by the ravaging hand of time.

I will only add, in conclusion, that, if aught be done to smoothe the short but rugged path which intervenes between the aged man and the grave, it must be done quickly. The fell destroyer, death, is rapidly removing him from earth, and hurrying him to "that bourne from whence no traveller returns!"

On reference to the report of the Secretary of War, it will be seen that more than two thousand pensioners have died during the last year. The number pensioned under the act of 1818, has decreased from about twenty thousand to less than eight thousand. Of those pensioned under the act of June 7, 1832, eight thousand six hundred and nine have died. Out of eleven hundred and eighty-six pensioned under the act of 1828, only six hundred and five remain.

A few short years, and the last relics of Revolutionary times will have been gathered to their fathers, the most of them having spent their latter days in penury and want, and dropped into the grave "unwept, unhonored, and unsung!"

Will an American Congress permit these things to transpire? If so, our lips should be hermetically sealed when the charge shall be repeated, which has been so often gratuitously made by the enemies of free Government—that "Republics are ungrateful!"
